The Company argues that here the Board is doing more than restoring benefits lost by the Company's unilateral action. It complains that under the Board's supplemental order, in situations where the Metropolitan plan offers greater benefits than the Blue Cross plan, the employees must receive the higher Metropolitan benefits and in situations where the Metropolitan plan pays less, the employees must be "made whole" for any out-of-pocket loss. In other words, the Company complains that the supplemental order causes employees to receive greater benefits than they would have received had the Company not committed the unfair labor practice. This disingenuous argument must fall.

When the Company unilaterally changed insurance plans, its action resulted in some favorable and some unfavorable changes to the employees. The Board's policy in cases of combine favorable and unfavorable unilateral changes is to order a return to the status quo ante with regard to the unfavorable changes, but to not penalize employees by ordering revocation of the favorable changes. See Moody Chip Corp., 243 NLRB No. 36, 18 (1979); and North American Mfg. Co., 224 NLRB 1252, 1260 (1976). We endorse the Board's policy. In effect, the favorable change becomes the established condition of employment. An employer can change this condition only as it can change any condition—by giving notice of the proposed change and by successfully bargaining with the union to secure the union's approval.

The Board's policy is entirely consistent with the purposes of the Act. The refusal revoke favorable changes simply ensures that, under whatever formula the Company implements to restore the employees' health benefits, the Company cannot use the Board's order as a license to abolish or alter any of the favorable changes resulting from its unlawful conduct without fulfilling its statutory duty to bargain. That some employees ultimately may receive greater benefits than they would have received if the Company had not acted illegally is not, theefore, the result of any defect in the Board's order. Rather, any potential for greater benefits is due entirely to the Company's unfair labor practice. Thus, the Board is not impermissibly dictating terms of ther parties contract. if is merely ordering its traditional remedy of a return to the status quo ante, combined with its traditional refusal to penalize employees by revoking benefits conferred as a result of an unfair labor practice.

The Company also argues that, since the original order did not include a monetary "make whole" provision, the supplemental order's inclusion of such a remedy necessarily means that it cannot be "more limited" than the original remedy, as we ordered in Keystone I, 606 F.2d at 180. But this argument is also wide of the mark.

Our objection to the original order was that it ordered the Company, upon request by the Union, to reinstate Blue Cross as the program administrator for all of the Company's divisions, when such reinstatement would have been economically disruptive, if not impossible. That the Board has now issued its traditional "make whole" order, although it failed to do so in its initial order, does not run afoul of our concern with the initial order. The Company cites no law, and we know of none, limiting the remedies in supplemental orders to those contained in original orders. Cf. NLRB v. Allied Products Corp., 629 F.2d 1167, 1173 (6th Cir. 1980) ("As a consequence of the remand, the Board expanded its make whole remedy to include [persons previously excluded]. We believe that the Board's expansion of the remedy is consistent with the Act * * *."). Thus, we conclude that the subsequent addition of the "make whole" remedy is proper. The Board's supplemental order does not flout, but is consistent with, or instructions on remand.

Finally, the Company admits that no employees have filed claims or grievances for monetary losses as a result of the change in health care benefits over three years ago. Therefore, it seems unlikely that the Company will suffer any significant loss as a result of the "make whole" order. But as we have discussed, even if the Company were to suffer a significant loss, we find the "make whole" order entirely proper.

The Company's last arguments are that the Board's order requiring the Company to ensure that in no circumstances shall benefits be lower than those currently enjoyed will allow windfalls to employees and will create severe administrative burdens. Neither of these arguments is persuasive.

First, contrary to the impression the Company attempts to create, in no case will employees receive any benefits above the cost to the employee of the health services provided. A brief examination of the effect of the Board's supplemental order on a hypothetical medical procedure costing $500 is useful. If the Blue Cross plan allowed a benefit of $500 but the Metropolitan plan allows a benefit of $400, the Company must "make whole" an employee for the $100 penalty created by the Company's change. But if the Metropolitan plan allows $600, the employee does not receive an extra $100; the employee only receives reimbursement for the cost of the care. If both plans allow less than $500, the employee must absorb the difference between the cost and the higher amount allowed. Thus, the employee receives the higher amount allowed by either plan, but under no situation does the higher benefit create a windfall for the employee.

Finally, the Company claims that the cost of maintaining two benefit tables—the Blue Cross table and the Metropolitan table—must be "severe". This argument falls of its own weight, for the Company argues at length that the Metropolitan benefits are better than the Blue Cross benefits—obviously, the Company already has and maintains two benefit tables. In any event, the Company proffers no specific evidence of any administrative burden and its argument amounts to nothing more than mere paper pleading. Furthermore, any administrative inconvenience must be blamed on the Company's violation of the Act.

VI

We have carefully considered all of the other arguments of the parties not specifically discussed in this opinion. We find those arguments either wanting merit or insufficiently important to warrant extended discussion; their discussion would not have altered this result. For the foregoing reasons, the Board's supplemental order is

NLRB v. Blevins Popcorn Co.

659 F.2d 1173 (D.C. Cir.), July 10, 1981

On petition to review determination of special master

Before WRIGHT, TAMM, and WALD, Circuit Judges

Opinion for the court filed by Circuit Judge J. SKELLY WRIGHT

J. SKELLY WRIGHT, Circuit Judge: In this appeal the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) seeks review of a determination by a Special Master that the Blevins Popcorn Company (the company) did not violate a contempt and purgation order issued by this court on September 16, 1977. In that order we stated that the company would face sanctions if it did not begin bargaining in good faith with the American Federation of Grain Millers, AFL–CIO (the union), which represented employees at the company's Ridgway, Illinois facility.[1] As we explain below, we conclude that the Special Master imposed an unduly heavy burden of proof on the NLRB. We also conclude that the Master may not have applied the proper legal principle in determining whether the company bargained in good faith. Thus we remand to the Master for new findings of fact and conclusions of law.

I. BACKGROUND

A. Enforcement Order and First Contemp Proceeding

On May 4, 1977 this court entered a judgement enforcing in full a decision and order of the NLRB issued against the company on June 19, 1975. See Blevins Popcorn Co., 218 NLRB 689 (1975). In its decision the NLRB found that the company had unjustifiably refused to bargain with the union over rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. The order, as enforced, directed the company to:

> (a) Upon request, bargain with the above-named labor organization as the exclusive representive of all employees in the aforesaid appropriate unit with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, and, if an understanding is reached, embody such understanding in a signed agreement.

On September 16, 1977, upon motion of the NLRB, this court entered a second order summarily adjudging the company in civil contempt for willfully continuing to fail and refuse to comply with the court's May 4 order.[3] The September 16 order stated that the company could purge itself of civil contempt by:

> (a) Fully complying with and obeying this court's judgment of May 4, 1977, by, upon request, bargaining collectively in good faith with the union as the exclusive representative of [the company's] employees in the appropriate unit, and, if an understanding is reached, embodying such understanding in a signed agreement, provided, however, that such agreement may be made subject to termination should the United States Supreme Court ultimately decide that [the company] was not obligated to recognize and bargain with the union.

> (b) Proceeding with the officials of the union to set an initial meeting date, not to exceed ten days from entry of this order, and thereafter proceeding to bargain upon consecutive days during regular business hours until all contract proposals on mandatory and lawful subjects have been considered and actions taken in relation thereto.

The order further provided:

> 3. That in order to assure against further violations of this court's judgment, this court assesses against [the company] a prospective fine in the amount of one hundred dollars ($100.00) per day if compliance with this order has not been commenced within seven (7) days of the date of this order.
> On further motion by the Board the court will take such other and further action and grant such other relief as appears just, reasonable, and necessary at that time.

B. Events From September 1977 to June 1978

Upon issuance of the court's contempt and purgation order, the company's attorney, Richard Brackhahn, sought to arrange a bargaining session with the union within ten days.[4] Because the union

[4] Brackhahn represented the company throughout the NLRB and court precedings, and participated in the negotiations with the union. The company was also represented by John Jolly, its Sales and Production coordinator. Both Jolly and Brackhahn conferred with the Ridgway plant manager, Charles McGuire; in developing the company's bargaining position. The union was represented primarily by Elmer Ferris, a staff representative of the American Federation of Grain Millers, Id. at 4.

Except where otherwise noted, our description of the events that took place between September 1977 and December 1978, described in Parts I-B and I–C of this opinion, are based on the Master's findings of fact. Because we remand so that the Master may reconsider the evidence in light of the proper standard of proof, some of these findings may change. As the discussion in Part II infra should reveal, our decision in this case does not turn on any of these findings of fact; we remand because we believe the Master misapplied the law.

Our description of the events that took place between September 1977 and December 1978, contained in Parts I–B and I–C of this opinion, is based primarily on the Master's findings of fact. In several instances we also refer to evidence that was not discussed in the Master's report; each of these instances is noted. The concurring opinion criticizes our descripwas unable to meet within that time, the parties agreed to begin negotiations on September 30, 1977. The parties later agreed that, at least initially, they would not meet on consecutive days as provided by the order.[5]

At the September 30 meeting the union presented at six-page contract proposal covering a variety of economic and noneconomic matters. Several of these matters were discussed. The parties first considered the union's proposal that departmental seniority based upon an employee's continuous length of service govern layoff's and recalls, and that plantwide seniority based upon length of service determine "bumping rights." [6] The company stated that it would prefer a seniority system based upon the ability of the employees. The parties also discussed the union's proposal that the contract include a grievance procedure culminating in binding arbitration, and that it contain a no strike/no lockout clause. The company stated that it had no objection to the principle of binding arbitration. Finally, although the union's proposal was silent on this issue, the parties discussed the length of the contract. The company proposed a three-year term; the union did not object.[7]

Further negotiating sessions were held on October 10 and 11, 1977. The union made a wage proposal, asking for across-the-board increases for all employees of 35 cents per hour in the first and second years, and 30 cents in the third year. The company rejected this proposal, claiming that it would place the company in a noncompetitive situation and might lead to a cutback in operations at the Ridgway facility. At the close of the negotiating session the company requested a break of four to five weeks so that it could prepare a counterproposal. The union agreed to the delay.[8] There is some evidence suggesting that the company had already prepared a proposal, and that its request for a postponement was not made in good faith.[9]

The next negotiating session was held on November 17, 1977. The company presented a full counterproposal, the terms of which were quite disadvantageous to the union. The proposal included (1) a management rights clause reserving to the company all "inherent rights" except those specifically contracted away;[10] (2) three-year wage increases for current workers by name rather than job classification,[11] (3) a clause giving the company the right unilaterally to grant pay at higher rates to current or newly-hired employees; (4) a clause reserving to the company the right to set wage rates for new or changed jobs; (5) 54 rules by which employees could be disciplined; (6) a no strike/no lockout clause with individual union officer liability in the event of illegal union activities; and (7) a clause stating that for purposes of layoff and recall seniority would be determined by the company on the basis of an employee's physical and mental fitness, ability to do the job, and experition, complaining that we have embarked "upon a lengthy voyage of factfinding unjustified by anything other than philosophical predilection." Concurring opinion (conc'g op.) at———. It proceeds to argue that we have acted in apparent disregard of the rule that a Special Master's findings of fact may be set aside only if "clearly erroneous." Oil, Chemical & Atomic Wkrs Int'l Union v. NLRB, 547 F.2d 575, 580 (D.C.Cir. 1976), cert, denied, 431 U.S. 966, 97 S.Ct. 2923, 53 L.Ed.2d 1062 (1977). See conc'g op. at 2. The concurrence misreads our opinion. We do not at this time parport to review the Master's findings of fact, which we concede could ordinarily be overturned only if clearly erroneous. Nor do we intend to engage in independent factfinding. Instead, as we explain infra, we simply point out that the Special Master committed several errors of law. The most important of these errors was his decision to impose a more rigorous burden of proof on the NLRB than was justified. Clearly, this error may have had an impact on his findings of fact. Under the circumstances, we do not believe that it is inappropriate to refer to evidence not specifically described in the Master's report. Of course, our description of the case is in no way binding on the Special Master, who must reconsider his original findings of fact, on remand, in light of the proper burden of proof.

[5] More specifically, they agreed not to meet on consecutive days to that the company would have an opportunity to study the union's first contract proposal, and so that the company and the union could exchange information on several matters that would be the subject of bargaining. Id. at 5.

[9] The document presented to the union on November 17 contained proposals very similar to those set forth in another document introduced as evidence at the hearings before the Special Master. The latter document contained language stating that the company's proposals were subject to "automatic termination" in the event of Supreme Court action favorable to the company. See NLRB Exhibit (BX) 58 at 1. The Supreme Court denied the company's petition for a writ of certiorari to review the May 4, 1979 contempt adjudication on October 3, 1977. Thus it would seem that a counter-proposal had been prepared before October 3.

[11] These offers ranged from a high of 15 cents per hour in the first year, 25 cents in the second year, and 20 cents in the third year for some employees, to a low of 10 cents in the first two years and 5 cents in the third year for others. See BX 24 at Appendix A. ence and continued length of service. Despite the company's earlier statement that it had no objection to the principle of binding arbitration, its proposal also called for a grievance procedure culminating only in nonbinding arbitration.[12]

After receiving the company's counterproposal, the union drew up a second proposal that bridged some of the gaps between the company and union positions. This posposal adopted much of the language of the counterproposal, and made significant concessions. In particular, on the question of seniority the union proposed that plantwide seniority based on length of service be used for layoffs and recalls, but that employees retained or recalled must also have the qualifications necessary to perform the work in question.[13] The union further stated that it would agree to allow the company to use temporary employees for as long as 90 days without the accrual of any seniority rights.[14]

The union's second proposal and the company's counterproposal were discussed at meetings held on November 29 and 30, 1977. Although seniority, grievance procedures, union security, management rights, use of temporary employees, and distribution of overtime were discussed at length, no agreement was reached on these matters. Agreement was reached on several minor issues, such as posting of seniority lists.[15] At the November 30 meeting company attorney Brackhahn stated that he would like to postpone further negotiations until January because illness in his family. The union stated that it would accept this delay.[16]

Although no meetings were held during December, several significant events occurred. First, the company decided to withhold an annual pay increase that it had given to its Ridgway employees during previous Decembers. The company justified this action on the ground that pay raises were barred while negotiations were in progress. When employees asked the plant manager, Charles McGuire, why they had not received raises, he told them that wages were "frozen" as a result of the union negotiations.[17] He further stated that "if the Union was not here [at the Ridgway plant] there would be a raise as normal, as the Company has always given them." [18]

The second event involved a letter sent by company attorney Brackhahn to plant manager McGuire, informing him of the status of the negotiations.[19] In this letter Brackhahn indicated that the company had adopted a rigid negotiating position. He stated that "no agreement has been reached on employees' wages" or on "employee insurance or hospitalization protection," because the union's position "remained economically unsound" and the company negotiators were "not about to agree to [the union's] position on these and many other issues discussed." [20] The letter further stated that the union's request for two 15-minute break periods was "ridiculous," that union membership would never be a condition of employment at the plant, and that the company would insist that all 54 work rules contained in its counterproposal be included in any contract.[21] McGuire passed the letter on to his supervisors, some of whom permitted the employees to read the letter. In addition, a handwritten version of the letter, copies by one of the employees, was circulated.[22]

submitted to the NLRB a copy of the letter which differed in several material respects from the handwritten version. Brackhahn's copy suggested that the company's opposition to union demands was not rigid, and in general cast the company's bargaining position in a more favorable light.[23] It now appears that the copy submitted to the NLRB by Brackhahn was a fabrication and that the handwritten version is accurate.[24]

Two more bargaining sessions were held in early January 1978, but little progress was made. At those meetings the company said that it would be unable to meet during February because one of its negotiators would be away on a business trip.[25] Additional sessions were scheduled for January 16, 17, 23, and 24. Because of a snowstorm, however, the first two meetings were cancelled. At the sessions on January 23 and 24 the union continued its efforts to find common ground. It offered a third contract proposal which incorporated the minor agreements that had been reached at prior meetings, and which made significant concessions in the area of management rights, wages, holidays, and paid vacations. With respect to wages, the union sought a first-year increase that would equalize wages for employees in five job classifications, and across-the-board increases of 20 and 25 cents per hour in the second and third years of the contract.[26] The company rejected this proposal, stating that the wage increase was still too high. The company further stated that it was dissatisfied with the union's proposed grievance procedure. The company did agree to several minor proposals, such as a clause setting the time for distribution of paychecks.[27] No other significant agreement was reached, however. The company continued to insist that the union accept the major provisions of its November 1977 counterproposal.[28]

At both the January 23rd and January 24th meetings the union stated that it would like to meet throughout the week. The union also suggested that the company find a substitute for the representative who would be away during February, so that negotiations could continue through that month. The company rejected both suggestions and stated that it would not meet again until March. The union felt that the company was taking advantage of its acquiescence in previous delays, and threatened to complain to the NLRB and to terminate negotiations. Although negotiations were not terminated, the union did subsequently complain to the NLRB.[29]

On March 10, before the next negotiating session was held, a few employees who were disaffected with the union asked plant manager McGuire if they could call a plantwide meeting to discuss withdrawing support from the union.[30] McGuire allowed a meeting to take place on paid company time, even though this was in contravention of past practice and in violation of the work rules contained in the company's 1977 counterproposal.[31] The meeting, which lasted about 30 minutes, failed to produce a vote to oust the union.[32]

Bargaining sessions were held on March 16th and 17th. The company stated that its Ridgway facility was in "bad shape" economically.[33] Seniority, wages, holidays, and paid vacations were discussed, but no progress was made. The union asked for consecutive-day bargaining, but the company refused, claiming that such meetings were unnecessary. It stated that it would meet again on April 5, 6, and 7, at which time it would present a final proposal to the union. The union agreed.[34]

[24] The Master never explicitly found that the Brackhahn version was a fabrication. He stated only that the handwritten version "differs in material respects from the original letter claimed to have been written by Brackhahn to McGuire * * *." Special Master's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law at A 11 n.6. However, in describing the contents of the letter the Master quoted from the handwritten version. Compare id. with BX 50. This strongly suggests that he believed the handwritten version was accurate.

[33] Id.

At the April 5th meeting the union and the company agreed on the number of holidays, on insurance and hospitalization plans, and on a pension plan. At the April 6th meeting the company presented a proposed seniority list, which ranked all current employees according to ability, experience, and length of service. This seniority proposal was tied to a new wage proposal, which was slightly better than the company's first offer of November 1977.[35] The union responded on April 7th by presenting a new wage proposal of its own. This proposal, which demanded less than the January proposal, called for increases on the basis of employee job classifications in the first year; small across-the-board increases would be made in the second and third years.[36] The company conceded that the union had "come a long way," but rejected the proposal.[37] It further stated that if agreement could not be reached on wages, it would not discuss any other union proposals. After a long discussion, the company claimed that it had nothing further to offer and wanted to adjourn for two weeks. The union demanded that the company make a final offer on wages at that time.[38]

The next meetings were held on April 19th and 20th. A Federal Mediator attended at the union's request. At the April 20th meeting the union suggested a system of "classification" seniority. Under this system layoff and recall would be determined on the basis of tenure within a designated job classification. Bumping rights would be based on plantwide hire dates and ability to perform the work. No agreement was reached.[39]

Because the Mediator was unavailable, no sessions were held during May.[40] The parties met again with the Mediator on June 19th, 20th, 21st, and 22nd. The company offered a slight change in its position on seniority. It drew up a new seniority list which grouped all present employees into separate departments and provided for department layoff and recall in accordance with the previous managerial ranking of employees. The union stated that it would accept this system if the company would agree to base bumping rights upon the employees' hire dates and ability to perform the work.[41] The company refused stating that it would not allow for unilateral ranking of the employees by management.[42] After several days of discussion devoted almost solely to the seniority issue, the Mediator declared an impasse.[43] The union wished to continue meeting, but the company withdrew, claiming that seniority was the key to resolution of all other major issues.[44]

C. Events From June 1978 to December 1978

The union continued to request further meetings, but the company stated that it would not meet again unless the union would agree to its position on seniority.[45] In late September 1978 the company withdrew recognition from the union on the ground that it had a good faith doubt as to the union's majority status. This claim was based upon a petition signed by a majority of the Ridgway employees to the effect that they no longer wanted the union to represent them.[46]

[35] A new vacation proposal was also tied to the seniority proposal. This vacation proposal offered less than the November 1977 vacation proposal. EX 24 at 13–14; BX 30; Tr. 1033–1038.

In his report the Master found that during the April 5th and 6th negotiation sessions the company "tried to break the impasse over seniority by offering to 'buy off' the seniority issue, i.e., offer more money for wages and have the Union give in on the seniority hiring date position." Special Master's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law at A 15. He further found that "the Union refused to talk about it * * * ." Id. The NLRB now disputes this finding. It argues that the "buy off" overture was actually a reference to the new seniority-wage-vacation proposal. Thus the union did not unreasonably refuse to consider a compromise. See NLRB brief at 28 n.35.

As the Special Master seems to have recognized, see id. at 22, the Mediator's declaration that the parties were deadlocked is not controlling on the question whether theare was a bona fide impasse that terminated the parties duty to continue negotiations. That question is partly legal in nature, the Mediator's finding was simply evidence that such an impasse existed. See note 55 infra (discussing bona fide impasse issue).

In early October 1978 the company granted a wage increase averaging 20 cents per hour to the employees of the Ridgway facility. This wage adjustment was intended in part to compensate employees for the company's failure to grant a wage increase in December 1977. The average raise exceeded the highest amount offered by the company [47] to the union during negotiations. Two of the employees who were responsible for circulating the anti-union petition were given the largest wage increases.[48] Additional raises ranging from five to six percent were granted in December 1978 in accordance with the company's established practice.[49]

D. Second Contempt Proceeding

On September 22, 1978, two days before it withdrew recognition from the union, the company asked this court to dissolve the September 16, 1977 contempt and purgation order on the ground that negotiations had reached a bona fide impasse.[50] The NLRB responded to this motion by filing an opposition statement and by moving for another civil contempt adjudication. In its motion the NLRB claimed that the company had violated the September 16, 1977 contempt and purgation order by failing to bargain with the union in good faith and by failing to meet with the union at reasonable intervals during the period September 30, 1977 through June 22, 1978. It further alleged that the company had violated the court's order by refusing to meet with the union after June 22, 1978 and by withdrawing recognition from the union. It asked this court to assess fines and to increase prospective fines.[51]

In March 1979 this court appointed a Special Master to hear evidence and make recommended findings of fact and conclusions of law with respect to the company and NLRB motions. The Master conducted several hearings in September 1979.[52] He issued his report on December 16, 1980.[53] The Master found that the company had bargained in good faith throughout the period September 16, 1977 to June 22, 1978. He rejected the NLRB's claim that the company had attempted to undermine the union by (1) repeatedly delaying negotiations; (2) withholding the annual wage increase; (3) allowing employees to read the letter from Brackhahn to McGuire; and (4) permitting the anti-union meeting to be held on paid company time.[54] The Master also found that a bona fide impasse existed as of June 22, 1978, and that the company therefore properly refused to continue bargaining with the union.[55] Finally, he found that upon receiving the anti-union petition the company had reasonable grounds to doubt the union's majority status and properly withdrew recognition.[56]

[55] Id. at 22. When parties have bargained in good faith but have reached impasse on all mandatory issues, the obligation to continue bargaining ends. See e.g., NLRB v. Big Three Industries, Inc., 497 F.2d 43, 48 (5th Cir. 1974); see also NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d 871, 881 (9th Cir. 1978). The NLRB offered two arguments in support of its claim that there was no bona fide impasse. First, it claimed that the company had not bargained in good faith, and that the courts will not recognize the existence of an impasse in the absence of good faith. Second, it argued that even if the company had bargained in good faith, there was no real impasse since there were many open issues at the time of the last meeting. The parties were deadlocked only because the company refused to meet again until the union accepted its position on seniority. See NLRB brief at 52–54.

The Master rejected these claims. As we have seen, he believed that the parties had bargained in good faith. Moreover, the parties were deadlocked. The Mediator had found that the parties negotiated to an impasse on the issues of seniority and wages. Moreover, "[s]ubsequent correspondence indicates that both the Company and the Union refused to budge on their respective positions." Special Master's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law at A 22. Thus the Master concluded that the company did not wrongfully refuse to continue bargaining with the union. He cited NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., supra, 567 F.2d at 881, which holds that when "a single issue looms so large that a stalemate as to it may fairly be said to cripple the prospects of any agreement," the parties' duty to continue negotiation to impass on all mandatory issues is suspended.

We have some doubts about the Master's conclusion that further bargaining would have been fruitless. Although the parties probably were deadlocked on the seniority and wages issues, it seems that they could have continued bargaining on a number of other issues, such as grievance procedures and arbitration. Negotiations terminated at least in part because of the company's intransigence. The Master should reconsider this issue in reviewing his findings of fact.

[56] The NLRB attacked the company's decision to withdraw recognition, arguing that when a union's representative status is based on Board certification, as in this case, there is an irrebuttable presumption that the union's majority support continues for a reasonable period, usually a year. See NLRB brief at 52 (citing NLRB v. Burns Security Services, 406 U.S. 272, 279 n.3, 92 S.Ct. 1571, 1578 n.3 32 L.Ed.2d 61 (1972)). The one-year certification period begins on the date the employer commences good faith bargaining. Here, claimed the NLRB, the company had not bargained in good faith. The Master rejected this argument. As we have

The Master concluded by recommending that the NLRB's motion for a further contempt order be denied and that the company's motion to dissolve the prior contempt order be granted.[57] The NLRB filed exceptions.

II. DISCUSSION

A. The NLRB's Burden of Proof

At the outset of the legal discussion contained in his report the Special Master stated that, to meet its burden of proof, the NLRB is "required to produce clear and convincing evidence in support of its allegations of contemptuous conduct * * *."[58] Despite this reference to the clear and convincing evidence standard, it appears that the Special Master actually imposed a far heavier burden of proof on the NLRB. Later in his report he suggested that the Board must prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt: he stated that, "if there is ground to doubt the wrongfulness of the conduct, the Company should not be held in contempt."[59] The Master also stated that "the proof must demonstrate that there existed a wilful and deliberate disregard of a court decree."[60] As we explain below, the Master applied the wrong standard of proof; the NLRB should not have been required to do more than produce clear and convincing evidence in support of its allegations.

As a general rule, the "reasonable doubt" standard of proof and the "willfulness" requirement are applicable only in criminal contempt proceedings.[61] In civil contempt proceedings the clear and convincing evidence standard applies[62] and the failure to comply with the court decree need not be intentional.[63] The explanation for this distinction lies in the different purposes of criminal and civil contempt. Criminal contempt is used to punish intentional misconduct.[64] Thus the procedural safeguards that attend any criminal proceeding, including the reasonable doubt standard of proof, come into play. In addition, the recalcitrant party's state of mind is a central issue. Civil contempt, on the other hand, is a remedial sanction used to obtain compliance with a court order or to compensate for damage sustained as a result of noncompliance.[65] Thus criminal procedure safe-seen, he concluded that the company did bargain in good faith for roughly one year after the bargaining order was issued. He went on to note that a disaffection petition signed by a majority of the employees is usually sufficient grounds to withdraw recognition. See Special Master's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law at A 23 (citing NLRB v. Alterman Transport Lines, Inc., 587 F.2d 212, 228 (5th Cir. 1979)). Assuming the Master's good faith determination was correct, see Part II–B supra, we agree with his conclusion on this issue.

guards are not applicable.[66] Moreover, the intent of the recalcitrant party is irrelevant.[67]

The Master never disputed these general principles. He noted, however, that this is the third stage of a three-stage civil contempt proceeding.[68] Such proceedings involve (1) issuance of an order; (2) following disobedience of that order, issuance of a conditional order finding the recalcitrant party in contempt and threatening to impose a specified penalty unless the recalcitrant party purges itself of contempt by complying with prescribed purgation conditions; and (3) exaction of the threatened penalty if the purgation conditions are not fulfilled.[69] The Master apparently conceded that the clear and convincing evidence standard should be applied at the second stage, and that no showing of willfulness would be necessary. He suggests, however, that the third stage is punitive in nature since a fine may be assessed.[70] Thus the wrongfulness of the recalcitrant party's conduct must be shown not just by clear and convincing evidence, but beyond any ground for doubt.[71] Moreover, the party's state of mind is crucial.[72]

These conclusions as to burden of proof are erroneous. The third stage of three-stage contempt proceedings does not lose its civil character simply because a penalty may be imposed. The third-stage proceeding is part of the process by which the court obtains compliance with its decrees; it supports the second-stage contempt and purgation order. At the second stage the recalcitrant party is put on notice that unless it obeys the court's decree and purges itself of contempt it will be fined or face other sanctions. At the third stage the court determines whether the party has fulfilled the purgation conditions. If it has, it escapes the threatened penalty; if it has not, the penalty is imposed.[73] To hold that the third-stage proceeding is punitive or criminal would be to hold that a court may never bring about compliance with its orders by imposing prospective penalties in civil proceeding.[74]

In fact, we have already rejected the claim that the third stage of three-stage contempt is criminal in nature, Bhrd. of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen v. Bangor & Aroostook R. Co., 380 F.2d 570 (D.C. Cir.), cert, denied, 389 U.S. 327, 88 S.Ct. 437, 19 L.Ed.2d 560 (1967).[75] Our reasoning in that de-

[68] See Special Master's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law at A 19 n.10. He stated:

> This proceeding is in the third stage of civil contempt where the exaction of penalty is determined and willfulness is required. It is not similar to the second stage of civil contempt where only a threat of penalty is made and willfulness is not a requirement. O.C. & Atomic Workers Int. Union, AFL–CIO v. N. L.R.B[,] 547 F.2d 575, 581 (D.C. Cir. 1976), cert. denind, 431 U.S. 966 [97 S.Ct. 2923, 53 L.Ed.2d 1062] (1977).

As further support for his decision to impose a willfulness requirement the Special Master cited NLRB v. Laney & Duke Storage Warehouse Co., supra note 60, 424 F.2d at 113. see Special Master's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law at A 19.

[70] See note 68 supra (quoting Special Master).

[71] The reasoning behind his decision to require the NLRB to prove the wrongfulness of the company's conduct beyond any ground for doubt is actually somewhat unclear. As we stated earlier, his report is ambiguous on this point; elsewhere he states that he is applying the clear and convincing evidence standard.

[73] Criminal contempt is often distinguished from civil contempt on the ground that it has as its principal purpose vindication of judicial authority. See Gompers v. Bucks Stove & Range Co., 221 U.S. 418, 441, 31 S.Ct. 492, 498, 55 L.Ed. 797 (1911). It might be argued that the third-stage proceeding is criminal, because the court is acting to vindicate its authority. But vindication of judicial authority is also present to some degree in civil proceedings. See Juidice v. Vail, 430 U.S. 327, 335–336 & n.12, 97 S.Ct. 1211, 1217 & n.12, 51 L.Ed.2d 376 (1977); Shillitani v. United States, supra note 65, 384 U.S. at 369–371, 86 S.Ct. at 1534–1536. "The civil nature of the contempt is not turned criminal by the court's efforts at vindicating its authority, an interest which may be implicated in either civil or criminal proceedings." United States v. Wendy, 575 F.2d 1025, 1029 n.13 (2d Cir. 1978); see also United States v. Work Wear Corp., 602 F.2d 110 (6th Cir. 1979).

[74] See Hoffman v. Beer Drivers & Salesmen's Union Local No. 888, supra note 66, 536 F.2d at 1273:

> [I]nevitably, wherever a compliance fine is assessed and an opportunity given to purge, the failure to purge will bring about a due date. The due date occurs because the actor has failed to use the key to the jail which the court provided. * * * The occurrence of the due date does not transform civil proceedings, whose sole aim is to secure compliance, into a criminal proceeding. Were it otherwise, compliance with laws or orders could never be brought about by fines in civil contempt proceedings. Always the final order requiring payment will follow the act or omission which constitutes the failure to purge.

[75] As support for his decision the Master cites another case decided by this court, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Wkrs. Int'l Union v. NLRB, supra note 63, 547 F.2d at 581. See note 68 supra. In that case we were confronted with the question whether there was an intent requirement in a second-cision turned on the relationship between the second-and third-stage proceedings:

> [T]he fine-imposing [i. e., second-stage] proceeding, to coerce compliance, set a future performance date. A later assessment of the fines so imposed, upon a showing of non-compliance, is not sufficient to require the classification of such an assessment as separately punitive. * * * Because a question of fact must be determined at this assessment [i. e., third-stage] proceeding (that of non-compliance by the specified performance date), the proceeding does not necessary become a punitive, criminal action wherein the recalcitrant party must be afforded the procedural safeguards of a criminal contempt charge.

380 F.2d at 578–579 (emphasis in original; foot-note omitted).[76] We indicated that the third-stage proceeding is neither criminal nor punitive in nature. Accord, Hoffman v. Beer Drivers & Salesmen's Union Local No. 888, 536 F.2d 1268, 1273 (9th Cir. 1976). See also United States v. Work Wear Corp., 602 F.2d 110 (6th Cir. 1979); United States v. Spectro Food Corp., 544 F.2d 1175, 1183 (3d Cir. 1976).[77]

Because third-stage proceedings remain civil in character, neither the reasonable doubt standard nor the willfulness requirement are applicable; only the clear and convincing evidence standard should be employed. The Master's decision to impose a more rigorous burden of proof in this case may have had a substantial impact on his findings of fact and conclusions of law. It is quite possible that his decision would not have been in favor of the company if he had not required the NLRB to show that the company had acted in "wilful and deliberate disregard" of the contempt and purgation order and that the company's conduct was wrongful beyond any ground for doubt.[78]

For example, as we stated in Part 1–D supra, the Master found that the NLRB had failed to substantiate its claim that the company had attempted to undermine the union during the period September 1977 to June 1978.[79] If a less rigorous standard of proof had been applied, his conclusion might have changed. The NLRB was able to point to a substantial body of evidence in support of its position. First, the company withheld the annual wage increase in December 1977; moreover, the plant manager told employees that they would have received the increase if it were not for the union's presence. We suggest below that the company may not have been free to withhold the incerase. See Part II-B infra. If it was not, then its action and the plant manager's explanation are stage proceeding. After observing that we were not dealing with criminal contempt or with the last stage in three-stage contempt proceedings, we held that there was no intent requirement. We reasoned that the purpose of a motion for civil contempt, at least at this second stage, "is not to punish intentional misconduct, but rather to enforce compliance with an order of the court and to remedy any harm inflicted on one party by the other party's failure to comply." 547 F.2d at 581 (quoting Doe v. General Hospital of D.C., supra note 63, 434 F.2d at 431). The Master apparently believed that this holding implies that a different standard applies at this third stage. We disagree. We merely suggested that third-stage proceedings can be distinguished from second-stage proceedings. We did not expressly confront the question whether a different standard applies. Here we do confront that question, and conclude that the same standard applies since the purpose of the third-stage proceeding is also to enforce compliance.

[76] In Brotherhood, the amount of the fine that would be assessed in the third stage had been determined at the second stage. Here, on the other hand, the second-stage order says only that $100 will be assessed every day if bargaining did not commence within seven days, and that the NLRB would be able to move for further penalties. See text at note 3 supra. The $100 per day fine is no longer applicable. Thus the precise nature of the sanction to be applied at the third stage is uncertain. We do not think this difference is sufficient to distinguish the cases, however. What is important is that at the second stage the recalcitrant party was told that unless it complied with the terms of the court's order it would face sanctions.

[77] The Master also cites a Fifth Circuit case as support for his decision to impose a willfulness requirement. NLRB v. Laney & Duke Storage Warehouse Co., supra note 60,424 F. 2d at 113. See See test at note 60 surpa. We choose not to follow that case. We note that the Fifth Circuit itself, in a case decided subsequent to Laney & Duke, stated, "The absence of wilfulness on the part of the Company from civil contempt. The crucial issue in civil contempt proceedings, as distinguished from criminial contempt, is not the employer's state or mind but simply whether the Court's order was in fact violated." NLRB V. Crown Laundry & Dry Cleaners, Inc., supra note 63, 437 F.2d at 293. In more recent Fifth Circuit cases a willfulness requirement has not been mentioned, NLRB v. J. P. Stevens & Co., 538 F.2d 1152, 1162 (5th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. Alterman Transport Lines, Inc., supra note 56, 587 F.2d 212.

[78] Below we summarize several findings of fact that might have been affected by the Master's failure to apply the proper burden of proof. There also the concurrence suggests that we are engaging in illicit fact-finding. See conc'g op. at 1147–1175; see also note 4 supra. Again, we believe that the concurrence misreads our opinion. We merely point out that if the Master had employed the appropriate, less rigorous, burden of proof, many of his factual conclusions might have changed. Because of this possibility, a remand is necessary.

[79] Of course, an employer who purports to bargain in good faith but who is engaged in efforts to denigrate and undermine the union is not fulfilling its obligations under the federal labor law. See General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 850, 855 (1st Cir 1973); Continental Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 495 F.2d 44, 48 50 (2d Cir. 1974); *A. H. Belo Corp. v. strongly indicative of bad faith.[80] Second, the company repeatedly delayed negotiations, despite the union's objections; its justifications for these delays were often quite flimsy.[81] The company's refusal to accede to union requests for more meetings is not consistent with the spirit of the September 16, 1977 contempt order.[82] Third, the company permitted and may even have encouraged disaffected employees to hold an anti-union meeting on paid company time, even though such meetings were contrary to company policy.[83] Fourth, employees were shown the letter from Brackhahn to McGuire stating that the company would not give in to the union on several key issues. Management may have hoped that the letter would convince employees that further support of the union was futile. Finally, the company attempted to submit a fabricated, less damaging, version of the letter to the NLRB and the Master;[84] certainly, this action is probative on the question of bad faith.

We remand so that the Master may reconsider his decision in light of the proper standard of proof. He need not conduct a new hearing; the correct standard may be applied to the existing record.

B. Legal Principles to be Applied in Determining Whether Bargaining was in Good Faith

In addition to our conclusion that the Master imposed an unduly, heavy standard of proof on the NLRB, we find that he may not have applied the proper legal principles in determining whether the company bargained in good faith.

1. Relevance of terms of company's counter-proposals

Before examining the facts to determine whether the company had bargained in good faith, the Master stated that the evidence must be viewed as a whole, and that the company's intent must be determined from the "totality of circumstances." [85] He also observed that "[i]n general, the obligation to meet and confer in good faith does not compel the parties to agree on a proposal or yield concessions and '[a]damant insistence on a bargaining position * * * is not in itself a refusal to bargain in good faith.' " [86] And he stated that "[t]he right to Union representation * * * does not imply the right to a better deal." [87]

The Master has not misstated the law: the company was not required to make concessions or to yield any position fairly maintained. However, it was under an obligation to make a sincere, serious effort to adjust differences and to reach and an acceptable common ground. See NLRB v. Insurance Agents' Union, 361 U.S. 477, 485, 80 S.Ct. 419, 425, 4 L.Ed.2d 454 (1960); NLRB v. Truitt Manufacturing Co., 351 U.S. 149, 76 S.Ct. 753, 100 L.Ed. 1027 (1956); Sign & Pictorial Union Local 1175 v. NLRB, 419 F.2d 726 (D.C. Cir. 1969); A.H. Belo Corp. v. NLRB, 411 F.2d 959, 969 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1007, 90 S.Ct. 561, 24

L.Ed.2d 498 (1970). In determining whether the company fulfilled this obligation, the terms of its bargaining proposals may be examined. Rigid adherence to disadvantageous proposals may provide a basis for inferring bad faith. If a company insists on terms that "no 'self-respecting union' could brook," Vanderbilt Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 297 F.2d 833 (2d Cir. 1961), it may not be fulfilling its obligation to bargain. See United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB, 441 F.2d 1005, 1010 (D.C. Cir. 1970), cert. denied sub nom. Florida Machine & Foundry Co. v. NLRB, 409 U.S. 846, 93 S.Ct. 50, 34 L.Ed.2d 87 (1971) (insistence upon "a particularly disadvantageous proposal" may be basis for inferring "some degree of bad faith"); NLRB v. Strauss

[82] That order required the parties to engage in consecutive-day bargaining. See text at note 3 supra. It is true that at the outset the parties agreed they would not meet every day. It is also true that the union acquiesced in most of the company's requests for postponements. Nonetheless, we believe that the contempt order imposed some obligation on the company to make a special effort to meet frequently. It is well established, of course, that dilatory tactics constitute evidence of bad faith. A.H. Belo Corp. v. NLRB, supra note 79, 411 F.2d at 968; *International Brhd. of Elec. Wkrs. v. The Master nowhere explicitly recognized that adherence to a disadvantageous proposal may constitute evidence of bad faith. This principle would seem to be of particular relevance here. As the Master's own findings of fact reveal, the company's contract proposals were quite harsh. The initial proposal would have given the company virtually unilateral control over hiring and discipline of employees, their layoff and recall, and the amount of their conpensation. The company also insisted on a no strike/no lockout clause, without the normal quid pro quo of binding arbitration.[89] During the course of negotiations the company's position changed only slightly. It did make relatively insignificant concessions on a number of issues. For example, its final wage proposal was somewhat better than the first. However, all wage offers were limited to named, current employees; the company refused to make an offer keyed to job classifications.[90] Moreover, the company never budged from its position that a seniority system would be unacceptable unless it was based on management's ranking of employees.[91]

We do not mean to hold that the company's proposals could not be justified. The Master does state that the company was in poor financial health and "could afford only a modest wage agreement." [92] He also suggests that the company insisted on a seniority system based on the ability of the worker because it wished to ensure that capable workers would not be laid off during nonpeak periods.[93] But these explanations are not fully satisfactory. The fact that the company could afford only a modest wage agreement does not explain why it could not key its wage offer to job classifications.[94] Moreover, the union's final seniority proposal explicity recognizes management's desire to retain capable workers.[95] The record as it now stands suggests that the Master may not have recognized that unjustified adherence to an unfavorable proposal may constitute evidence of bad faith. Thus, on remand, the Master should give express attention to this possibility in reviewing his conclusions.

2. Significance of decision to withhold annual wage increase

The Master rejected the NLRB's claim that the company's decision to withhold the annual wage increase was an act indicative of bad faith. Relying on the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 746–747, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 1113, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962), he stated that an employer could not unilaterally continue preexisting discretionary wage increases during the course of negotiations. Here, although the wage increases were customarily granted in December, they were based on discretionary merit criteria. Thus he reasoned that company's decision to withhold the increases until after bargaining had concluded was justified.[96] We are not convinced that the Master correctly applied the principles set forth in Katz.

In Katz the Supreme court held that an employer cannot unilaterally change conditions of employment during the course of negotiations with a union; if the company decides to alter a preexisting practice, it must give the union an opportunity to bargain over the change. The Court applied this principle to distinguish between automatic wage increases to which the employer has already committed itself and wage increases that are "in no sense automatic, but [are] informed by a large measure of discretion." 369 U.S. at 746, 82 S.Ct. at 1113. The employer would be required to grant the automatic wage increase unless it notified the union that it wished to make a change in the existing conditions of employment and gave the union an opportunity to bargain over the change. However, the employer could not unilaterally grant a nonautomatic, discretionary wage increase since "[t]here simply is no way in such a case for a union to know whether or not there has been a substantial departure from past practice * * *." Id. Thus the union could "insist that the company negotiate as to the procedures and criteria for determining such increases." Id. at 746–747, 82 S.Ct. at 1113.

[94] The argument that it could afford only a modest raise is also undercut by the fact that it granted a substantial pay increase after recognition had been withdrawn from the union. See text at notes 47–49 supra.

[96] Special Master's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of law at A 21.

As the Master stated in his report, the wage increases in question here contained both automatic and discretionary elements. The record strongly suggests that the practice of granting raises every December was an established benefit expected by the employees. However, the increase was not entirely automatic; the amount of the increase apparently depended on an employee's job classification.[97] Under the circumstances, if the company wished to discontinue entirely the practice of granting annual wage increases, it was required to bargain with the union first; Katz requires an employer to consult with the union before changing an existing condition of employment. But even if it did not wish to discontinue the practice of granting annual wage increases, it was required to consult with the union. The company could not unilaterally determine the size of the increase that each employee would receive; it would be required to bargain over this discretionary element.[98]

On the basis of the record as it now stands, we cannot determine whether the company fulfilled its obligations under Katz. The Master notes in his report that the company informed the union by letter that it would withhold the December wage increases.[99] In fact, the letter stated that the company would not make any wage increases during the bargaining process "that the law prohibits."[100] We do not believe that by making this vague statement the company satisfied its duty to consult with the union. Indeed, the letter is misleading. The law does not prohibit wage increases during bargaining. It simply requires consultation with the union.[101] On remand the Master should reconsider his conclusion that the employer's action was justified. If it was not, then the company's action may be evidence of an attempt to undermine the union, and indicative of bad faith.[102] The Master should direct his attention to the precise nature of the annual wage increase. He should also consider whether the company took any action other than sending the letter that might have fulfilled its obligation to bargain.

III. CONCLUSION

We remand this case so that the Special Master may supply the proper standard of proof in determining whether the company violated the September 16, 1977 contemp and purgation order. The Special Master should also give special attention to the question whether the company's adherence to disadvantageous proposals supports an inference of bad faith. Finally, he should reconsider his finding that the company properly withheld the December 1977 wage increase. If the Master concludes that his initial determination was incorrect and decides in favor of the NLRB, he should make recommendations as to appropriate sanctions.

Remanded to the Special Master with instructions.

> An employer with a past history of merit increase program neither may discontinue that program * * * nor * * * any longer continue to unilaterally exercise his discretion with respect to such increases, once an exclusive bargaining agent is selected * * *. What is required is a maintenance of preexisting practices, i.e., the general outline of the program, however the implementation of that program (to the extent that discretion has existed in determining the amount or timing of the increases), becomes a matter as to which the bargaining agent is entitled to be consulted.

Where the company wishes to continue the practice of granting partly discretionary wage increases, it may do so during the bargaining period without violating the labor laws so long as it is willing to confer with the union if the wages are questioned. In other words, it need not bargain before it grants the raise. See General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. NLRB. supra note 79, 476 F.2d at 854; *See also H. [101] The company could have simply continued its practice of granting annual wage increases in December. So long s it was willing to bargain if the union objected to the raises, it would have fulfilled its obligations under Katz. See note 98 supra.

[102] In NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962), the Supreme Court was concerned with the question whether the decision to withhold or grant a wage increase during the court of bargaining was an unfair labor practice under § 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act. Elsewhere, however, it has been recognized that a decision to withhold or grant a wage increase may be evidence of bad faith See, e.g., General Motors Acceptance corp. v. NLRB. supra note 79, 476 F.2d at 855.

TAMM, Circuit Judge, concurring in the result: Because I believe that the Special Master apparently applied an erroneous standard of proof, I concur in the result reached by the court.

Examination of the majority opinion, however, leads me to wonder why this court went to the trouble of selecting a Special Master in the first place. The majority opinion embarks upon a lengthy voyage of factfinding unjustified by anything other than philosophical predilection. If the majority desires to engage in such factfinding than it should sit as the Special Master sat, sorting through all of the documents submitted, observing the demeanor of the witnesses, and listening to all of the testimony in the six days of hearings that were conducted. Only then would this court's factfinding be of an acceptable level of quality. Until then, however, this factfinding appears as little more than an inspired exercise in legerdemain. See generally Nangle, The Ever Widening Scope of Fact Review in Federal Appellate Courts—Is the "Clearly Erroneous Rule" Being avoided?, 59 Wash.U.L.Q., 409 (1981). See also Wright, The Doubtful Omniscience of Appellate Courts, 41 Minn.L.Rev. 751 (1957).

I list below only a few examples of such sleight of hand in which the majority opinion either seriously questions the Master's findings of fact or sua sponte makes its own findings and draws its own inferences—without recognizing the existence of any standard of review governing our disposition of this case.

1. Maj. op. at 1177 note 9 and text accompanying: a finding that the Company's proposal had been prepared prior to the negotiating session held on October 10, 1977 and an inference of bad faith.

2. Maj. op. at 1178–1179 notes 22–24, at 1187 note 84 and text accompanying: a finding that the Company submitted a fabricated letter to the NLRB and an inference of bad faith.

3. Maj. op. at 1180 note 35: with reference to Union action at the April 6th meeting, apparent adoption of the NLRB's perspective over an explicit finding to the contrary by the Master. ¶ 15, Appendix at 15.

4. Maj. op. at text accompanying note 81: a finding that the Company's justification for delays "were often quite flimsy." Among the reasons credited by the Special Master in his findings included a family illness, maj. op. at 1178, a snowstorm, id. at 1178–1179, the absence of a Company negotiator for business reasons, id. at note 25, and the absence of the Federal Mediator, id. at 1180–1181. Moreover, the Union agreed to almost all of these delays.

The majority has apparently forgotten what this court stated only five years ago: "a court must accept the findings of fact of a master unless 'clearly erroneous.'" Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union v. NLRB, 547 F.2d 575, 580 (D.C. Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 966, 97 S.Ct. 2923, 53 L.Ed.2d 1062 (1977). This proposition has found universal acceptance by the courts in the precise context before us, that of a reference by the court of appeals of a master of a labor relations matter. E. g., NLRB v. Construction & General Laborers' Union Local 1140, 577 F.2d 16, 19 (8th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1070, 99 S.Ct. 839, 59 L.Ed.2d 35 (1979); NLRB v. Sequoia District Council of Carpenters, 568 F.2d 628, 631 (9th Cir. 1977); NLRB v. J.P. Stevens & Co., 563 F.2d 8, 14 (2d Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1064, 98 S.Ct 1240, 55 L.Ed.2d 765 (1978); NLRB v. John Zink Co., 551 F.2d 799, 801 (10th Cir. 1977); NLRB v. J.P. Stevens & Co., 538 F.2d 1152, 1160 (5th Cir. 1976). Were we examining an an ill-reasoned, arbitrary report, I might perhaps be able to understand the majority's engaging in role substitution. The report submitted by the Special Master is anything but arbitrary, however; instead, it is a thorough, balanced examination of the facts in this case, complied after six days of hearings and submission of numerous documents and briefs. I can discern no justification, therefore, for the majority's failure to adhere to the principles of review previously adopted by this court.

The majority stumbles even as its moves from its unusual factfinding capacity to its ostensibly more practiced role as expounder of law. In Part II B(1), for example, the majority advises the Master to take note of the principle that bad faith may be inferred from intransigent adherence to disadvantageous proposals. Certainly, examination of the substances of the parties' proposals is not forbidden, and, in certain circumstances, bad faith may be inferred therefrom. See, e.g., NLRB v. F. Strauss & Son, Inc., 536 F.2d 60 (5th Cir. 1976) (withdrawal of offer for three-year contract term and substitution of nine-day term). Courts, as well as the Board, must be very careful, however, not to dictate terms to the parties. United Steelworkers of America v. NLRB, 441 F.2d 1005 (D.C. Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 846, 93 S.Ct. 50, 34 L.Ed.2d 87 (1971). "Adamant insistence on a bargining position, then, is not in itself a refusual to bargain in good faith." Chevron Oil Co. v. NLRB, 442 F.2d 1067, 1072 (5th Cir. 1971). The employer is only obligated to make "some reasonable effort in some direction" at the bargaining table. NLRB v. Reed & Prince Manufacturing Co., 205 F.2d 131, 135 (1st Cir). cert. denied, 346 U.S. 887, 74 St.Ct. 139, 98 L.Ed. 391 (1953). As one commentator has noted, > courts have been particularly scrupulous in reviewing Board findings of bad faith when rooted in an examination of the positions espoused by the parties, even > when in the context of other indicia of had faith * * * [I]n those cases in which the Board has based a finding of bad faith upon the employer's substantive position at the bargaining table, the employer is insisting upon a set of terms which would place the employees and the union in a worse (or no better) economic position than had there been no contract at all * * * Moreover, this is usually accompanied by a refusal to offer serious and specific reasons for the employer's position or by an admission * * * that certain requests of significance for the union could be granted at no additional cost to the employer.

Gorman, Labor Law 489 (1976). On the basis of this standard, the Master should examine all of the circumstances, not merely the terms of the parties' proposals. He must then make a second and independent decision on whether the Board had met its burden of presenting clear and convincing evidence that the Company has in fact violated this court's order by failing to make "some reasonable effort in some direction at the bargaining table." NLRB v. Reed & Prince Manufacturing Co., 205 F.2d at 135.[1]

The majority opinion also questions the Master's conclusion that the Company's failure to continue the granting of discretionary merit wage increases while holding negotiations with the Union complied with NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962). The majority's focus in this discussion is unhelpful, however, until its conclusion. At that point, the majority opinion admits that the crucial question is whether the Company's action was "an attempt to undermine the union, and indicative of bad faith." Maj. op. at 1190. As the cases relied upon by the majority make clear, bad faith cannot be presumed from a failure to comply with Katz. General Motors Acceptance Corporation v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 850, 854 (1st Cir. 1973); NLRB v. United Aircraft Corp., 490 F.2d 1105, 1111 (2d Cir. 1973) (the company failed to "produce evidence that fear of violating the law by granting the increase was the actual motive for withholding it."). Thus, should the Master once again come to the factual conclusion that the "Company decided to withhold the December 1977 raises under the belief that it was barred from granting such discretionary merit increases while the bargaining was in process," ¶ 9, Appendix at 10, this court could not conclude that this decision constituted evidence of bad faith unless it found such a factual finding clearly erroneous.

The application of an improper standard of proof by the Special Master requires this court to reverse and remand for the Master's reevaluation. It does not require, however, either an intrusion into the Master's factfinding functions or an attempt to indicate in no uncertain terms the "'proper" result to be reached upon remand. Respect for this court as an institution should, however, preclude the Special Master from believing that the court has today exercised its power in a demand that the Master reverse himself.

Therefore, although I fail to see any justification for the court's order that the Master make new findings of fact, it has so ordered. The Master may well want to hold further hearings. I urge the Special Master, however, to exercise his independent judgment and to reach a result in harmony with the law as well as the facts, the latter of which, at the least, this court is clearly less familiar with than is the Special Master.

[1] Furthermore, although I realize that "each case is unique and generalization hazardous," Gorman, Labor Law 489 (1976), the Master should take due cognizance of NLRB v. Crockett-Bradley, Inc., 598 F.2d 971 (5th Cir. 1979), a case that resembles the one before us in a number of respects.

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Weick, Keith and Jones, Circuit Judges

281

Nathaniel R. Jones, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) seeks enforcement of its order directing Arrow Molded Plastics, Inc. (Arrow) to bargain in good faith with Local 146, United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL–CIO (the Union), even though the Union failed to obtain a majority vote in its representation election. The board also ordered Arrow to cease and desist from continuing certain unfair labor practices. We hold that Arrow's unfair labor practices were not so pervasive as to undermine the Union's previous card majority, impede the election process and to interfere with the employees' freedom to select a bargaining representative. Therefore, enforcement of the Board's cease and desist order is granted and enforcement of its bargaining order is denied.

I.

Arrow, an Ohio corporation, manufactures and sells injection-molded plastic products. In August 1977, the Union conducted an organizational compaign at Arrow's Napoleon, Ohio plant. A clear majority of Arrow's production and maintenance employees signed authorization cards. Consequently, Arrow petitioned for a representation election. The Board scheduled the election for October 21, 1977.

In September 1977, William Brock, an Arrow vice president, hired James Cavanaugh, a personnel consultant. Cavanaugh devised a plan to hold several pre-election meetings with Arrow's employees. The purpose of these meetings was to solicit employee grievances, in recognition that "there was a union knocking at the door." On several occasions, the employees of all three shifts attended the meetings.

At the first meeting, Cavanaugh informed the employees that he wanted to confer with them individually. During these individual conferences, he elicited their answers to a single question: "If tomorrow morning when you awakened you were the president of this company, what would you do?"

Cavanaugh and Brock conducted the remaining group meetings. Cavanaugh told the employees that he had prepared a report summarizing the information gathered from the individual interviews. In view of the forthcoming election, Cavanaugh stated that the contents of the report could not be revealed because "no promises, direct or indirect" could be made. Additionally, Cavanaugh recommended the installation of a "hot box" so that the employees' suggestions could be "answered" if possible. Furthermore, in response to employee inquiries of wage increases, Cavanaugh stated that Arrow's policy was to pay equal or greater wages than those paid "in our area for similar work by similar companies." Cavanaugh added that if the Union lost the election, it would take about ten days to get a raise, but if the Union won it could take six months to a year to obtain wage increases.

During these meetings, Brock also made several representations to the employees. First, an employee asked whether Arrow would meet with shift representatives if the Union lost the election. Brock replied that a reinstitution of the shift representative system was an alternative to union representation. Second, an employee questioned Arrow's disciplinary policies for absenteeism. An employee (Pearl Pinney) had been reprimanded for being absent when in fact she was on leave. Brock responded that Pinney's reprimand probably should not have been written and he would "look into it." Third, an employee queried the condition of the lunchroom. Brock stated that Arrow wanted to redecorate the lunchroom but that the pending election prevented the redecoration. Nevertheless, prior to the election, renovating materials including metal stripping, ceiling tile, paint and new carpeting were displayed in the lunchroom. Shortly after the election, the employees' lunchroom was completely redecorated and reequipped with new appliances. Fourth, Brock and Cavanaugh responded favorably to employee requests for tuition reimbursement for nursing school and "basket weaving" courses even though the company handbook permitted reimbursement only for "Company recommended education and special instruction courses."

On or about October 13, one of the three shift inspectors quit. Arrow's express policy for filling such vacancies is that "seniority shall control provided qualifications are equal." An employee with superior qualifications and seniority applied for the position. Arrow's superintendent informed the applicant that "if we didn't have this union business, we wouldn't have all of these problems." Until the vacancy was filled, the other two shift inspectors had to work 12-hour days. After the Union lost the election, the applicant was promoted to fill the vacancy.

On October 21, 1977, the Board conducted the representation election. The Union lost the election by nine votes. No ballots were challenged by either party.

On December 21, 1978, an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) found that the aforementioned conduct as well as Arrow's maintenance of an unlawfully broad, no-solicitation, no-distribution rule [1] constituted unfair labor practices in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq. Because Arrow's pre-election misconduct interfered with its employees' freedom of choice, the ALJ ordered Arrow to bargain collectively with the Union. The Board affirmed.[2]

Section 7 of the Act guarantees employees the right to freely select union representation. Section 8(a)(1) of the Act secures employee organizational rights by making it an unfair labor practice to "interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of" their Section 7 rights.

Arrow interfered with the employees' exercise of their Section 7 rights by improperly soliciting grievances before the election, by making certain promises and granting benefits, and by withholding benefits and threatening employees.[3] Additionally, Arrow maintained an overly broad no-distribution rule during the organizational campaign.

a. Grievance Solicitation.

Grievance solicitation during the pre-election period is not a per se violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. It is an unfair labor practice, however, to solicit employee grievances where the solicitation is accompanied by the employer's express or implied suggestion that the grievance will be resolved or acted upon only if the employees reject union representation. NLRB v. Delight Bakery, Inc., 353 F.2d 344 (6th Cir. 1965); Reliance Electric Co., 191 NLRB No. 1 (1971), enf'd. 457 F.2d 503 (6th Cir. 1972). In this case, Arrow initiated unprecedented meetings with its employees to solicit grievances. Arrow went beyond mere solicitation: it undertook affirmative steps to resolve those grievances at times and under circumstances which are highly questionable. In fact, this kind of interference in the election process is impermissible. NLRB v. Rich's of Plymouth, 578 F.2d 880 (1st Cir. 1978).

b. Granting and Withholding Benefits.

We agree with the Board that Arrow's conduct in granting and withholding benefits in order to discourage union activity is proscribed by Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. "The danger inherent in well-timed increases in benefits is the suggestion of a fist inside the velvet glove. Employees are not likely to miss the inference that the source of benefits now conferred is also the source from which future benefits must flow and which may dry up if it is not obliged." NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409, 84 S.Ct. 457, 460, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964).

The record is replete with instances of promises made with the intent to reverse the Union's previous card majority. Cavanaugh's promise of wage increases commensurate with Arrow's competitors was expressly contingent upon the Union's defeat at the representation election. Cavanaugh suggested the installation of a "hot box" so that employee suggestions could be "answered." Brock offered the shift representation system as a substitute for union representation. Brock promised to "look into" reprimands, redecorate and reequip the lunchroom, and reimburse employees for non-job-related education. Also, Arrow withheld an employee's promotion because of the "problem" caused by "this union business." Despite Arrow's disclaimer, promises were made and benefits were granted and withheld for no other reason than to forestall unionization of the Napoleon plant and to interfere in the election process.

[1] The employee handbook described the following as a disciplinary offense:

> Distributing literature, written or printed matter of any description on company premises without the specific approval of management.

It is undisputed that this rule was not enforced during the election campaign.

[2] However, one Board member dissented from the determination that Brock's promise to "look into" an allegedly improper reprimand was an unfair labor practice.

[3] Though the employer's free speech right to communicate its views to its employees cannot be infringed upon by a union or by the Board, such right to free speech is not absolute. Threats of reprisal or force or promise of benefit do not constitute protected speech within the meaning of section 8(c) of the Act. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 617, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1941, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). "Any assessment of the precise scope of employer expression, of course, must be made in the context of its labor relations setting. Thus, an employer's rights cannot outweigh the equal rights of the employees to associate freely, as those rights are embodied in section 7 and protected by section 8(a)(1) and the proviso to section 8(c)." Id. Consequently, Arrow's granting and withholding benefits during its grievance solicitation cannot fall within the purview of section 8(c) protected speech.

c. No-Distribution Rule.

It is well settled that Section 7 of the Act guarantees employees the right to distribute union literature on their employer's premises. Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945). A company rule which precludes solicitation and distribution of union literature at any time, including during nonworking hours in nonworking areas, is presumptively unreasonable. Id. at 804–805, 65 S.Ct. 988–989; Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 566, 570–571, S.Ct. 2505, 2514–2514, 57 L.Ed.2d 428 (1978). Special circumstances must be demonstrated to justify such a rule. In this case, no such circumstances were present. Therefore, Arrow violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by its maintenance of an unlawfully broad no-distribution rule during the organizational campaign.

III.

Arrow vigorously objects to the Board's imposition of a bargaining order. The Board attempted to justify the bargaining order on the grounds that Arrow's unfair labor practices were so pervasive as to erode the Union's previous card majority and to render the conventional remedy of a rerun election ineffective. We disagree.

The issuance of a bargaining order is a severe remedy which is properly utilized in only two situations: either "in 'exceptional' cases marked by 'outrageous' and 'pervasive' unfair labor practices * * * [or] in less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices which nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 613–614, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1939–1940, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). However, bargaining orders will not be enforced to remedy minor or less extensive unfair labor practices. Id. at 615, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. The reason for this result is that this latter category of unfair labor practices only marginally and temporarily impact on the election machinery. In that event, a fair rerun election is the preferred method of securing the employees' Section 7 rights.

It is equally inappropriate to enforce bargaining orders where the Board's rationale for the order was conclusory, NLRB v. Essex Wire Corp., 496 F.2d 862 (6th Cir. 1973); NLRB v. Eastside Shoppers, Inc., 498 F.2d 1334 (6th Cir. 1974); [4] or where the "classic tactics of discharge and widespread discrimination against the harassment of union sympathizers were not present * * * [and] (t)he unfair labor practices which occurred were of the kind whose effect would quickly dissipate," Donn Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 162, 166 (6th Cir.) cert. denied 447 U.S. 906, 100 S.Ct. 2988, 64 L.Ed.2d 855 (1980); or where a single unfair labor practice does not sufficiently undermine the election process. A to Z Portion Meats, Inc. v. NLRB, 643 F.2d 390 (6th Cir. 1981).

Applying these principles we are compelled to hold that the Board's decision to issue a bargaining order was not supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. We cannot minimize or ignore Arrow's improper grievance solicitation before the election, or persistent promises, grants and withholding of benefits, or unlawful no-distribution rule. Nevertheless, Arrow's misconduct fell far short of actual or threatened antiunion plant closures, disciplinary discharges, and employee surveillance which characterizes the cases in which this Court has enforced bargaining orders. Additionally, the passage of time since the first election militates in favor of a rerun election. Under these circumstances, a bargaining order is not warranted.

Accordingly, the application of the Board for enforcement of its order is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

Simpson Electric Company, a Division of American Gage and Machine Company, Inc. v. NLRB

654 F.2d 15 (7th Cir.), July 15, 1981—249 NLRB 148

On petition to review and cross petition to enforce Board Order

NICHOLS, Judge: This case is a petition for review and cross-petition for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). Simpson Electric Company (Simpson), is a division of American Gage and Machine Company, Inc. It operates 10 plants in various parts of the country, but the present controversy concerns only the one at Elgin, Illinois. The business is the manufacture of electrical parts and components. There is no known organization drive now at the Elgin plant, but Simpson objects to doing what it is currently still under NLRB orders to do, namely, to post a notice that it will not again commit the unlawful and unfair labor practice of attempting to influence an organizing campaign by granting a wage increase shortly before a representation election. Simpson denies it granted the admitted increase with any improper motive. The NLRB found to the contrary, but we hold that its finding lacks the support of substantial evidence. Therefore we deny the petition for enforcement and grant the petition for review.

The chronology of the case is significant. On June 6, 1978, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (Union), commenced an organizing campaign among Simpson's employees. On October 25, 1978, the NLRB conducted a representation election which the Union won. Simpson, however, protested unfair practices by the Union, and before November 17 learned informally that the NLRB agreed, and that the election would have to be run again. On November 17 Simpson announced increases in wages, fringe benefits, and health insurance, to be effective in all of its plants, including the nine others not involved in any organizing activity. Plans for the increase were budgeted and already in the works before the first election. Besides this, Simpson explains the timing as due to its well-informed anticipation of an increase in the federal minimum wage, which would benefit many of the same employees, and to the fact that an increase at recurrent intervals had become its regular practice. The NLRB Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) refutes this latter explanation on the ground that in prior years the mix of the benefits was different, a difference we deem very irrelevant. We may take judicial notice that inflation was raging on the pertinent dates, as it still is, and employees expected wage and benefit adjustments at least annually merely to stay where they were. It is not found that Simpson's employees felt overwhelmed by any unexpected shower of largesse. In fact, there is no direct evidence as to what the employees of Simpson's Elgin plant thought about it.

The NLRB seems to think Simpson should have delayed the increase past the Christmas season, not only at Elgin, but also at its nine plants not involved in the organizational drive. The unfairness of this solution to non-Elgin employees who were mere bystanders, if that, in the dispute, would have made it indefensible. Delchamps, Inc. v. NLRB, 588 F.2d 476 (5th Cir. 1979). On the other hand, to have delayed the increase at the Elgin plant alone certainly would have exacerbated a resentment of Elgin employees at this invidious discrimination. Whether their resentment would have been directed at Simpson, the Union, or the NLRB are matters for interesting speculation and possibly the answer would depend on how well they were informed as to the reasons for the delay. It would seem the Union could have been spared from at least sharing in the resentment only if the employees were kept in ignorance of the reasons for the delay and attributed it to the employer's whim. Some think or assume that the minds of employees are so easily manipulated and so easily kept in ignorance that they will think anything they are told to think. In the real world, employers and unions both find this difficult.

---

*The Honorable Philip Nichols, Jr., Associate Judge of the United States Court of Claims, is sitting by designation.

Simpson also says on November 17 it had not learned when the rerun election would occur and had recommended a cooling off period of 90 days.

On November 30, however, the NLRB announced that the rerun election would take place on December 21. Asked why if the NLRB thought the vote would be tainted by the wage announcement, it did not set the election at a later date, counsel responded this would have been to reward the wrongdoer. As further explained, Union organizing campaigns have a certain momentum which is interrupted only at the Union's disadvantage. Therefore, a delay in the election would make the Union's task more difficult. What this explanation fails to account for is that the Union's wrongdoing was the reason why a new election was necessary. On the other hand, whether the employer was also a wrongdoer is the very matter we are to determine. The explanation, therefore, assumes the answer and is a complete logical fallacy. We are given no rational reason why, if the rerun election was expected to be tainted, it was not set at a later date so the taint could clear away.

The law is clear that an employer commits an unfair labor practice prohibited by Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act if he announces a pay increase or withholds one with intent to influence an ongoing organizing drive or representation election. NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405, 409, 84 S.Ct. 457, 459, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964). See NLRB v. Gruber's Super Market, Inc., 501 F.2d 697, 709 (7th Cir. 1974); NLRB v. Furnas Electric Co., 463 F.2d 665, 669 (7th Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Drives, Inc., 440 F.2d 354, 363 (7th Cir. 1971); Texaco, Inc. v. NLRB, 436 F.2d 520, 524 (7th Cir. 1971).

This rule is easier to state than apply, for an employer who means to influence an election will rarely say so, and his intent must be determined by weighing the credibility of his denial against the attendant facts and circumstances he invites attention to. See NLRB v. Frantz and Company, 361 F.2d 180, 183 (7th Cir. 1966), where this court considered "substantial evidence on the record as a whole" in upholding the board's determination that the wage increase in question was granted to discourage employees from supporting the union. It is necessary to look to the evidence "as a whole" to determine whether a wage increase is an unfair labor practice, NLRB v. W.T. Grant Co., 208 F.2d 710, 712 (4th Cir. 1953).

The employer is not required to defer implementation of plans for benefit increases made before the Union drive and happening to come to fruition during its continuance. Pedro's Inc. v. NLRB, ——— F.2d ——— (D.C.Cir. April 13, 1981). The employer is in somewhat of a dilemma since the consequences of a decision to pay a planned increase, or defer it, may alike be the basis of an unfair labor practice holding if his own assessment of the purity of his motives is not shared by the NLRB. J.J. Newberry Co. v. NLRB, 645 F.2d 148 (2d Cir. 1981), invites attention to the dilemma an employer encounters if plans to improve employee benefits happen to come to fruition when an NLRB election is about to occur. The court concludes that an employer who withholds an increase shall be protected if he does not capitalize on the situation, if he acts on advice of counsel, etc. While the NLRB here thought the employer did capitilize on the increase, the facts reflect no more than an effort to inform the employees of what would be coming their way. This without more we do not consider capitalization.

During the continuance of the current inflation it would appear probable that the grant of an increase, at least within the rate of inflation, would have a minimal emotional impact upon the employees, unless the employer's propaganda invited employees' attention to its alleged bearing on the Union drive rather expressly. The denial of one, if persisted in, would have correspondingly a maximum effect, propaganda or no propaganda. Accordingly, we believe that a grant of benefits, according to a regular time pattern, not exceeding the rate of inflation, and without special propaganda, should be viewed as a neutral act, regardless of any mere time relation to an organizing campaign, as long as inflation continues. Inflation is something the trier of fact, the ALJ, wholly failed to take into account, and in face of it his reasons for disbelieving the employer's denials seem inadequate, arbitrary, and irrational. Cf. Delchamps, Inc. v. NLRB, supra. Our view is that routine unexploited wage and benefit increases within the rate of inflation, as here, should be viewed for section 8(a)(1) purposes as the same as no action in a condition of stable currency value. The employer also urged it was concerned by an excessive rate of turnover. The ALJ views this as inconsistent with the other reasons already given, but it is hard to see why. He says it was not a new situation and Simpson had lived with it for some time. Of course one might live with a cancer for some time, but this would not mitigate the seriousness of one's concern when one finally went to the doctor.

The foregoing would suffice to raise serious questions in our minds about enforcing the order even if the NLRB's setting the date of the election, actually only after announcement of the increase, had instead occurred before. In that event, the decision might be close. As the facts were, the employer could not know the election was imminent. The subsequent choice of an election date convinces us the NLRB either did not really think the increase would seriously influence the representation election results or else acted for improper purposes. We do not draw adverse inferences about NLRB motives as readily as it does about Simpson's motives, despite the implausibility of the explanation offered. We presume it acted in entire good faith. But we believe it may have been influenced to an impermissible extent by a desire to punish Simpson for its presumption in granting a pay increase at the wrong time, and would do so by creating for the Union a heads I win, tails you lose situation, by running a tainted election. If the Union won the election, the result would stand. If it lost, the election would be repudiated and the membership drive could continue unabated. We think the singling out of Simpson as the sole wrongdoer to be punished this way was unwarranted and improper, and as a prophylactic measure, we might well decline enforcement of the order even if otherwise warranted, to express our disapprobation of this procedure. This is the more indicated, since the Union has lost a third election and the only nonmoot issue is whether Simpson should post the prescribed notice. It was clearly unfair to Simpson employees not desiring Union representation to invite them to vote in an election when the NLRB would (unknown to them) nullify their votes if they proved to be in a majority, but effectuate a pro-union majority vote if that were to occur.

The ALJ's decision adopted by the board entirely fails to address either the employer's lack of knowledge of when the election would occur, as bearing on the employer's good faith, or the NLRB's selection of the closest possible election date as bearing on the genuineness of its belief that the election would be tainted and not reflective of the employees' true wishes.

Accordingly, in view of all circumstances, the petition for review is granted and the petition for enforcement is Denied.

NLRB v. Howard Johnson Company d/b/a Howard Johnson Distribution Center

650 F.2d 741 (5th Cir.), July 16, 1981—248 NLRB 539

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Ainsworth, Garza and Sam D. Johnson, Circuit Judges

Per Curiam. This case is before the Court on application of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) pursuant to section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. for enforcement of its order issued against Howard Johnson Company, d/b/a Howard Johnson Distribution Center (the Company) on March 17, 1980.[1] The Board found on the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment that the Company had refused to bargain with the Dallas General Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local 745 (the Union) in violation of section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, and ordered the Company to bargain with the Union.

In opposition to the Board's petition for enforcement, the Company argues that the Regional Director failed to conduct a full investigation of the Company's objections to the underlying certification election, and that the Board abused its discretion in refusing to remand the case to the Regional Director for further investigation, thus rendering the certification invalid. Specifically, the Company argues that the Board agent investigating the Company's objections failed to interview two company witnesses—General Manager of Distributions Bowerfind and Distribution Center Manager Ken Schultz, and that the testimony of these witnesses would have supported the Company's allegations that the Union made false and misleading campaign statements to employees and coerced employees prior to the elections.

[1] The Board's decision and order is reported at 248 N.L.R.B. No. 45.

The Board based its refusal to remand the certification proceeding to the Director for further investigation on the ground that, even assuming that the alleged manner in which the investigation was conducted justified the Company's failure to present affidavits of Bowerfind and Schultz to the Board agent, the agent's conduct in no way precluded the Company from demonstrating to the Board that such testimony, if presented, would have supported its objections. Consequently, the Board held that "regardless of the nature of the investigation here, the employer, in seeking to have the Board overrule a regional director's recommendation, was still required, under established Board policy, to supply the Board with specific evidence tantamount to an offer of proof, which prima facie would warrant setting aside the election before the Board will direct a hearing or require the Regional Director to pursue the investigation further. Regency Electronics, Inc., 198 N.L.R.B. 627 (1972); Bufkor-Pelzner Division, Inc., 169 N.L.R.B. 998 (1968)" (emphasis in original).[2] Consequently, the Board concluded that the Company's exceptions were "insufficient to justify remanding this case since they do not specify the disagreement with the Regional Director's findings of fact and they do not provide any indication of what the employer's witnesses might testify to, were they permitted to testify, which would contradict the Regional Director's findings." (footnote omitted).

It is beyond peradventure that "the burden is on the employer to demonstrate that the election was not fairly conducted." Contract Knitter, Inc. v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 967, 971 (5th Cir. 1977). This burden is a heavy one, and the objecting party must present "specific evidence" which on its face would warrant setting aside the election. NLRB v. Singleton Packing Corp., 418 F.2d 275, 280 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 824, 91 S.Ct. 47, 27 L.Ed.2d 53. Examination of the record leads this Court to conclude that the Board did not abuse its discretion in refusing to remand the representation proceeding to the Regional Director for further investigation of the Company's objections in this case. First, it is significant to note that the Board agent did interview the witnesses that the Company designated in its formal objections as witnesses supporting its disagreement with the Regional Director's findings, and that neither Schultz nor Bowerfind was so designated by the Company. Even more significant is the fact that the Company failed to indicate how these management officials could have had personal knowledge of misrepresentations which were alleged to have been made to employees, and failed to indicate in even the most general terms what testimony those witnesses would have provided to contradict the Director's findings.[3] Inasmuch as the Company's exceptions failed to specify the disagreement with the Regional Director's findings, and failed to provide any indication of what the Company's witnesses might testify to, were they permitted to testify, the Board's adoption of the Regional Director's findings without further investigation of the Company's objections was not an abuse of discretion in this case, and consequently does not invalidate the certification.

We have examined the Company's remaining arguments and find them to be without merit. Consequently, the Board's application for enforcement of its order is application for enforcement of its order is granted.

ORDER ENFORCED.

[2] Member Murphy dissented, based on her view that once an objecting party has alleged specific objectionable conduct and provided the names of witnesses "it [is] incumbent upon the Region to interview the individuals named by the Employer to determine the merits of the objections, and the failure of the Regional Director to have done that constitutes an abuse of discretion."

[3] The Company's objections simply stated that the two management officials would give "testimony in excess of that given by the rank-and-file employees relating to the misrepresentations, and their testimony would have been in direct contradiction to the alleged facts cited in the Regional Director's report on Objection 2 raising crucial and important credibility issues."

Electronic Components Corporation of North Carolina v. NLRB, 546 F.2d 1068 (4th Cir. 1976), relied upon by the Company, is inapposite. In that case, the employer provided the investigating agent with specific information concerning the substance of the proffered witnesses' testimony, and, equally important, the agent failed to conduct any investigation whatsoever.

NLRB v. Maine Caterers, Inc.

654 F.2d 131 (1st Cir.), July 16, 1981; certiorari denied 455 U.S. 940–251 NLRB 505

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Coffin, Chief Judge, Campbell and Breyer, Circuit Judges.

Breyer, Circuit Judge: The sole issue in this case is whether a group of "driver-salesmen" are employees or independent contractors. The National Labor Relations Board found that they were employees. We agree and enforce the Board's order.

The respondents are two closely related industrial caterers. One of them, Maine Caterers, Inc., makes meals, sandwiches, coffee, and similar items for sale at industrial plants during lunchtime and coffee breaks. The other respondent, W. H. Maine, Inc., leases trucks and customer routes to driver-salesmen who sell Maine Caterers, Inc. products. These driver-salesmen voted nine to one to be represented by a union. The Board found that, for purposes of collective bargaining, the two companies constituted one employer ("Maine"),[1] and it ordered Maine to bargain. We find sufficient evidence in the record to support the Board's conclusion.

The result in this case flows directly from two of our cases: Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d 596 (1st Cir. 1974), and NLRB v. Amber Delivery Service, Inc., 651 F.2d 57 (1st. Cir. 1981). Most recently in Amber we stated the relevant principles of law as follows:

> It is well-established that general principles of agency law govern the distinction between employee and independent contractor for purposes of the Act. E. g., NLRB v. United Ins. Co., 390 U.S. 254, 256 [88 S.Ct. 988, 989, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083] (1968); Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d 596, 597 (1st Cir. 1974). The House Report on the legislation specifically excluding "independent contractor" from the definition of "employee" outlined this distinction as follows:
> > "Employees" work for wages or salary under direct supervision. "Independent contractors" undertake to do a job for a price, decide how the work will be done, usually hire others to do the work, and depend for their income not upon wages, but upon the difference between what they pay for goods, materials, and labor and what they receive for the end result, that is, upon profits.
> H.R.Rep.No.245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 18 (1947), reprinted in 1 Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, at 309 (1948). Thus the Board, in applying the common law test of independence, has looked to the right of control: whether the putative employer has the right to control not only the results sought but also the means by which those results are achieved. E. g., Merchants Home Delivery Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 580 F.2d 966, 973 (9th Cir. 1978); Seven-Up Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 506 F.2d at 597–98; New Syndicate Co., 164 N.L.R.B. 422, 423 (1967). It has also looked to the risk of loss and opportunity for profit and to the degree of "proprietary" interest in, for example, a route or dealership. *E. g., Brown v. Id., at 60–61.

There is considerable evidence here that Maine has the "right to control not only the results sought but also the means by which those results are achieved". Id., at 61. The salesmen are first trained as salaried drivers. Henry Maine, one of Maine's owners, shows them "exact procedures" for running a Maine catering truck. These include the time to appear at each stop, the method of display, the manner to use with customers, and the proper method of driving. After training, the driver is no longer salaried, but Maine continues significant supervision. Maine does not allow use of the truck for other than serving Maine customers. Maine may add or subtract particular customers to or from a driver's route. Maine coordinates the time of serving any added customers with the driver's existing schedule. Maine supervises the driver's schedule. Maine supervises the driver's maintenance of the truck and its cleanliness. There is evidence that, at times, Henry Maine accompanies a driver on his route, checking the driver's stops and times, the driver's prices, the manner of food display, and the way in which the driver presents himself to the customers. Henry Maine has at times visited customers to settle problems. The written contract between the driver and Maine requires the driver to serve his entire route each business day and forbids him from deviating from the route or omitting services. It forbids him from serving anyone other than Maine's customers. It requires him to buy all "food, beverages, supplies and sundries" from Maine. And, Maine's interest in the manner of route service is enforced by the fact that the contract allows Maine (as well as the driver) to terminate the contract for any reason upon thirty days notice.

[1] Both companies are owned and controlled by William Maine with the assistance of his brother, Henry. Respondents have not challenged the Board's finding that Maine Caterers, Inc. and W. H. Maine, Inc. constitute a single employer for purposes of Board jurisdiction. See Radio & Television Broadcasting Technicians, Local 1264 v. Broadcast Service of Mobile, Inc., 380 U.S. 255, 256, 85 S.Ct. 876, 877, 13 L.Ed.2d 789 (1965). For convenience, respondents are collectively referred to as "Maine".

If one looks to "the degree of 'proprietary' interest in * * * a route," id., one finds that the driver has no interest whatsoever in his route. All routes are the property of Maine. Any additional customers found by the driver become the property of Maine. And, under the contract, should the driver leave Maine's service, he could not engage in industrial catering in Rhode Island for two years.

The major difference from Amber arguably lies in the area of "risk of loss and opportunity for profit". Unlike in Amber, the drivers here allegedly sell at prices set, not by Maine, but by themselves. They buy their supplies from Maine and resell them; thus they bear the risk of bad debts, spoilage, and theft. Moreover, their compensation comes from the difference between their purchase price and their resale price. Maine does not pay them salaries or provide fringe benefits or withhold taxes or social security. The drivers also have the right to hire substitutes—though there is evidence that the substitutes had to meet with Maine's approval.[2]

These factors are not controlling, however, for two reasons. First, there is evidence that the drivers' control of prices was limited. The contract provides that the driver "shall set the products purchased by him at reasonably competitive prices as suggested by [Maine] from time to time". Maine prints menus with prices, which are distributed to customers and posted on the trucks. Since a customer may be served by more than one driver-salesman during the course of the day, Maine is particularly interested in keeping prices uniform. Henry Maine has told at least one driver to reduce a price that he was charging on an item. Driver Michael J. Grady testified concerning Henry Maine's supervision and the "strongly suggested" prices:

> Sometimes [Henry Maine] would come along with me because I would ask him to come along. And, other times he would request it for what appeared to me to be supervisory reasons, such as: he would stand there and he would check my totals—if I was totaling a particular group of food that a customer was buying. He would sample my food. Check my appearance and make sure my truck was in proper operating procedure. He would make suggestions as to how I should improve it or change my operation around.
> Q. Did he ever tell you that you were charging too much for your goods?
> A. At times * * *
> Q. Now, can you explain to us, in your own mind did you feel that these suggestions were such that if you didn't follow them, you might be terminated?
> (After an objection, which was overruled.)
> A. Yes.
> Q. Why did you feel that way?
> A. Because of a combination of—it was strongly suggested and you would go along with the suggestion. If you don't go along with the suggestions—okay?

[2] And in both cases the contract provides that no employer-employee relationship exists.

You run into a certain problem—it would always exist.

In other words, you would feel—I would feel, personally, like you were running into a confrontation constantly if you didn't do that.

In particular circumstances, if I objected strongly to a particular price or something—then personal conversations that existed on a day to day basis would cease—if that's clear?

Second, and more important, here, unlike in Amber and Seven-Up, the drivers did not own their trucks.[3] They leased the trucks, paying for their gasoline and other maintenance. In Amber and Seven-Up, we found the fact of truck ownership a significant (though not in itself controlling) factor suggesting independent contractor status. This is not surprising, for a driver who owns a truck has more than his own labor at risk—he also has a capital investment. And, this investment gives him somewhat greater independence (in terms of his ability to find work elsewhere) than were only his own labor at stake. The fact of nonownership alone, tending to support a finding of "employee", more than outweighs any minor differences that Maine contends cut in the other direction.[4]

On the basis of this prior authority, the order of the Board is

[3] The trucks bear the inscriptions "Serviced by Maine Caterers" and "operated by [driver's name]".

[4] Maine seeks to distinguish Seven-Up on the grounds that, in contrast to this case, the contracts in Seven-Up were oral, Seven-Up billed customers directly, many Seven-Up drivers wore uniforms, Seven-Up set sales quotas, Seven-Up had meetings to discuss sales, Seven-Up conducted surveys to evaluate the distributors, and Seven-Up controlled the size of the territories. The record suggests that as to many of these items, the differences between Seven-Up and Maine are small. As to the others, we believe any differences are outweighed by the fact that in Seven-Up, many drivers owned their own trucks, yet we still upheld a Board finding of "employee" status. Here the drivers do not own their trucks.

NLRB v. Frederick's Foodland, Inc. d/b/a Bucyrus Foodland North and Bucyrus Foodland South

655 F.2d 88 (6th Cir.), July 17, 1981—247 NLRB 284

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before ENGEL, KENNEDY and MARTIN, Circuit Judges

PER CURIAM: This case is before us on the Board's petition for enforcement of its order against Frederick's Foodland, Inc., which operates two retail grocery stores in Bucyrus, Ohio. In March 1977, one of the two stores was destroyed by fire. It was reopened in March 1978; in the interim, employees of the two stores were combined in the one operating store, and about 25 of the roughly 85 employees were laid off by seniority.

On November 14, 1977, the Union[1] began its organizational campaign with a meeting at the home of employee Jane McClintock. Shortly thereafter a representation petition was filed, and a hearing was held on December 13, 1977. The parties stipulated that 5 of the laid-off employees should vote in the upcoming election, resulting in a two-store bargaining unit of 49 employees. By December 14, 26 of those employees had signed authorization cards. On January 5, 1978, a representation election was held, which the union lost by a vote of 28 to 18, with 2 challenged ballots. The Board then filed numerous objections and unfair labor practice charges against the Company.

The Board found that the Company committed numerous violations of § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Among the violations were coercive interrogations of employees, solicitations of grievances from employees, creating the impression of surveillance of union activities, communicating to employees that their support of the Union would be futile, promising benefits to employees to discourage support for the union, and granting an across-the-board wage increase shortly before the election in order to induce the employees to vote against the Union. The Board further found that the Company violated § 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by reducing the scheduled hours of employees McClintock and Shafer. Finally, the Board found that the union attained majority status on December 14, 1977, and that the granting of the wage increase without bargaining violated § 8(a)(5) as well as § 8(a)(1) of the Act.

The Board's order requires the Company to cease and desist from engaging in the unfair labor practices, to make whole employees McClintock and Shafer for any loss of earnings by reason of the unlawful reduction of their scheduled work hours, and to post the customary notices. Due to the serious and prevasive impact of the unfair labor practices, the Board further ordered the Company to recognize and, upon request, bargain collectively with the union as the exclusive representative of the employees.

[1] Retail Clerk's Union 31, a/w United Food and Commerical Workers International Union, AFL-CIO

On appeal the Company contends that the Board's findings are not supported by substantial evidence and that the facts of this case do not justify the issuance of a bargaining order.

Most of the testimony upon which the ALJ based his factual findings was disputed. It is the function of the ALJ to make credibility determinations. N.L.R.B. v. Franklin Property Co., Inc., 617 F.2d 447 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 118, 66 L.Ed.2d 47 (1980). Because the factual findings adopted by the Board are supported by substantial evidence in the record, they cannot be distrubed on appeal. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e).

In challenging the Board's finding of a § 8(a)(5) violation, the Company contends that the Union never achieved majority status. The Company argues that Bill Judy and Bill Wilburn were improperly excluded from the unit, and that Scott Oriens was improperly included. The proper unit, it concludes, included 50 employees, of whom only 25 had signed authorization cards on December 14, 1977. We disagree.

The Board's findings with respect to Judy and Wilburn are supported by the evidence. Because they were properly excluded from the unit, the union achieved a card majority regardless of the status of Oriens. Finally, at least with respect to the § 8(a)(5) violation in issue here, the Company's contention that the unit must include all of the laid-off employees is without merit in light of its stipulation that only five of those employees had a reasonable and imminent expectation of recall.

The company's final contention is that the Board's issuance of a bargaining order is not justified. We agree. This court has refused to enforce bargaining orders in cases where the unfair labor practice would not, in our opinion, prevent a fair election. N.L.R.B. v. Naum Brothers, 637 F.2d 589 (6th Cir. 1981). Viewing the record as a whole, we hold that the Board's decision to issue a bargaining order is not supported by substantial evidence. Factors contributing to our decision are the large increase in the number of employees in the unit due to the reopening of the second store, the passage of time since the first election, and the nature of the unfair labor practices found by the Board. Although there is sufficient proof in the record that those findings should not be disturbed, we believe that in the context of this case the violations cannot be deemed so pervasive and outrageous as to warrant a bargaining order under N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

Accordingly, the application of the Board for enforcement of its order is granted in part and denied in part.

Season-All Industries, Inc. v. NLRB

654 F.2d 932 (3d Cir.), July 17, 1981; rehearing denied September 15, 1981—250 NLRB 1284

On petition to review Board Order

GARTH, Circuit Judge: Once again we are asked to review the denial of a hearing by the Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board when grave assertions are made by the company that the "laboratory conditions" of a representation election were violated by actions of a union agent.

We have recently addressed different aspects of this subject in Anchor Inns Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 292 (3d Cir. 1981); Zeiglers Refuse Collectors, Inc. v. NLRB, 639 F.2d 1000 (3d Cir. 1981); and NLRB v. Campbell Products Dept., 623 F.2d 876 (3d Cir. 1980). In Zeiglers we reviewed the election process after an evidentiary hearing had been held to investigate irregularities. In Anchor Inns, we reviewed the election process where an evidentiary hearing had been sought by the company and denied. In Campbell, no evidentiary hearing was required because the Board assumed the truth of Campbell's contentions.

*Honorable Edward Dumbauld, United States District Judge for the Western District of Pennsylvania, sitting by designation.

Here, Season-All seeks an evidentiary hearing to examine the conduct and status of one of its employees (Sadler) who it asserts was a union agent and whose electioneering activities, Season-All claims, influenced co-workers outside the polling place while they were waiting their turn to vote.

The Regional Director conducted only an ex parte investigation despite the company's assertion that Sadler was a union agent and had identified himself with the union by saying that he was there "for the union, to keep management away from the polling area."

The Board sustained the Regional Director's refusal to investigate Sadler's status and issued and order directing Season-All to bargain with the union. Consistent with our recent pronouncements, we grant Season-All's petition, deny the Board's cross-application for enforcement and remand the case to the Board for an evidentiary hearing.

I.

Season-All Industries, Inc. produces thermal windows and doors. At issue in this case, is the representation of Season-All's employees by the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL—CIO (IAM).

A petition seeking a representation election was filed with the Board on April 2, 1979 by District Lodge No. 63 of the IAM. The election was held on June 29, 1979 and the relevant results were tabulated as follows:

Approximate number of eligible voters	79
Votes cast for IAM	36
Votes cast for [other unions]	9
Votes cast against participating labor organizations	25
Valid votes counted	70
Challenged ballots	5

Challenges are sufficient in number to affect the results of the election.

After the election, on July 5, 1979, Season-All filed objections to the conduct of the election. Season-All objected that "[a]n agent of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers engaged in electioneering outside the polling place." Season-All also alleged that Sadler urged waiting voters to vote for the union; that Sadler harassed female employees whom he felt were not favorably disposed to vote for the union; and that Sadler, by declaring that a company officer was improperly present at the polling area, implied to the voters that the company was engaged in wrongful conduct. The company charged that Sadler conducted his electioneering for a substantial part of the one hour period allotted for voting and within a few feet of the room where voting was taking place. In support of its objections, the company submitted affidavits of Thomas Mittlehauser, the assistant to the company's Industrial Relations Director. The charges in the affidavits supported the objections filed by the company and, among other things, claimed that Sadler had stood outside the polling place for some time and had told Mittlehauser in a loud voice that he, Mittlehauser, was not permitted near the voting place because of his position with the company.

After an ex parte investigation the Regional Director issued a Supplemental Decision on Objections and Challenges. He found that "Sadler was a rank-and-file employee and an eligible voter. * * * [and] held no position of any kind for the [union] * * *." (133a) The Regional Director "conclud[ed] that Sadler's conduct * * * can in no way be attributable to the Petitioner," although he conceded that "[i]n Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 [other courts and the Board most often cite this case as Milchem, Inc. although it was originally reported as Michem, Inc. Because many of the cases to which we refer cite the case as Milchem, we will use that nomenclature throughout this opinion.], the Board held that in situations where a party to the proceeding in cases of electioneering which is more than de minimis at the polling place while voting is in progress, the Board will find such electioneering to be per se a basis for setting aside an election." (134a) He distinguished Milchem, however, by stating that in Milchem, the "conduct complained of was engaged in by an agent of the union * * *" Id.

> All of the alleged objectionable conduct attributed to the alleged agent of the Petitioner relates to conduct of a rank-and-file employee, Ray Sadler. Sadler was an eligible voter.
> The election was held in an enclosed conference room at the Employer's facility, entered through a doorway. The voting period was from 11 a.m. to 12 noon. The corridor where employees were waiting in line to vote was located outside the doorway of an office area located between the corridor and the conference room. According to Thomas Mittlehauser, the Employer's assistant to the industrial relations director, he found it necessary to walk by the employees waiting in line to vote on his way to the nurse's office shortly after the polls opened; that on his way to the nurse's office, he noticed Sadler standing in the corridor, but not in the line of waiting voters; that on his return from the nurse's office, approximately 5 to 8 minutes later, he saw Sadler standing in the same position as previously; and that on this occasion, Sadler said to him, "What are you doing here, you have no right to be here, you are management," to which Mittlehauser responded "that he had been busy treating an employee and was on his way back to his office," and that Sadler then merely shrugged his shoulders. According to Mittlehauser, he also saw Sadler converse with some of the other employees in the line, but he did not know what Sadler said to such employees. According to one employee, she saw Sadler standing in the corridor greeting employees, such as saying "hello" or "how are you"; that one of the voters asked Sadler where his button was and that Sadler replied "it's against the law to wear them but we all know who to vote for." According to another employee, Sadler, while standing in the corridor, said to her, "thanks for coming to vote" to which she replied "so you think"; that Sadler shook the hand of an employee who had already voted and said "congratulations"; and that when someone asked Sadler why he was standing where he was, Sadler replied that he was there "for the Union, to keep managemen [sic] away from the polling area" and that he "did not want management to intimidate us." According to the same employee, Sadler talked to various employees in the line to say hello and "small talk" and that while he said things about the Union, she could not recall the specifics. A third witness waiting in line to vote, whose supervisory status is in dispute, states that Sadler got in line behind her; that as a voter passed the waiting line after voting that person said "we may get a vacation out of this" to which the witness replied to no one in particular, "perhaps an extended one"; that Sadler then said "I'm glad she brought that up because we will use it against her later; we will use that against them later"; that Sadler then said there will be no more favoritism that some people get raises and some don't; and that Sadler continued conversing with voters while in the line but that she paid no attention and did not know what was said. All of the above three witnesses are females. Except as set forth above, the investigation did not disclose any other remarks attributed to Sadler pertaining to the election. The estimates of the witnesses as to the length of time that Sadler was in the polling area ranges from 10 to 20 minutes. The estimates of the witnesses as to where Sadler stood while making his remarks ranges from 10 feet from the entrance to the polling place to 40 feet from the entrance to the polling place.

According to Sadler, he stepped out of the voting line when he saw Mittlehauser come back past the voting line and told Mittlehauser that he was violating the rules, that he was not supposed to be there and asked Mittlehauser to leave; that he then waited for the end of the line to reach him, there being approximately 25 people in line, and that when the end of the line reached him, he got back into the line, voted, and left the polling area. According to Sadler, while he thanked people for voting as they left the polling area, he did not thank anyone for voting any particular way, did not say congratulations" to anyone, and did not say "that we would use anything" against anyone. While agreeing that he stated that management was not supposed to be in the area and that he was watching out for violations after the Mittlehauser incident, he denies that he told anyone that he was "there for the Union to keep management away from the polling area." (131a–132a)

Evaluating this conduct according to the Board's standards for union adherents, i. e. non-parties as opposed to union agents, the Regional Director found that the conduct at issue did not substantially impair the employees' exercise of a free choice in light of all the surrounding facts and circumstances. Viewing "the evidence in the light most favorable to the Employer" the Regional Director found "that Sadler's conduct did not interfere with the results of the election." (135a) The Regional Director went on to order a hearing limited "to the issues raised by the challenges to" four of the ballots cast in the election. (137a)

Three days later, Season-All filed a motion with the Board seeking to have the Board reconsider its decision. Season-All stated that "[c]ertain of the factual conclusions set forth in the Supplemental Decision constitute findings of fact with respect to conflicting evidence, which findings should not be made absent a full hearing." (139a) Season-All contended that a proper investigation of the case, including a full hearing, would disclose that Sadler was one of four members of the in-shop union organizing committee and that his position was well known to the other employees. Moreover, Season-All argued that under the Board's decision in Pastoor Brothers, Inc., 223 NLRB 451 (1976) the conduct of Sadler established that he should be considered a union agent if he so represented himself to the employees.

On October 1, 1979, the Regional Director denied Season-All's motion for reconsideration. The Board affirmed this ruling on November 13, 1979. On April 3, 1980 the IAM was certified as the representative.

After Season-All refused the IAM's request to bargain collectively, the Regional Director issued a complaint and notice of hearing on May 12, 1980. Season-All filed an answer on May 22, 1980 in which two of its objections centered on Sadler's status and conduct and the NLRB's failure to hold a hearing concerning those issues. It also objected to having its computer programmers included in the bargaining unit as it claimed they were professionals within the terms of 29 U.S.C. § 159(b)(1).[1] Its fourth objection pertained to a managerial employee, who, it alleged, was improperly included in the bargaining unit. This last objection was subsequently abandoned at oral argument.

The General Counsel then moved for summary judgment which was granted by the Board.

II.

Although Season-All continues to press its objection that its computer programmers were improperly included in the bargaining unit, Season-All's primary complaint focuses on the Regional Director's refusal to grant an evidentiary hearing with respect to Sadler's status and conduct. Because we conclude that this latter objection is well-founded, we will vacate the decision of the Board and remand the case for a hearing and a factual determination with respect to Sadler's affiliation with the union committee and his activities.

As the Regional Director explained in his supplemental decision, the Board established a per se rule, as long ago as 1962, in Milchem, supra, that electioneering by a party to an election while the election is being held requires that the election be overturned.

In Milchem, the secretary-treasurer of the union had stood for several minutes near the line of employees who were waiting to vote. While there, he engaged them in conversation which he stated concerned only the weather and like topics. The Board, while acknowledging the innocuous character of these conversations nevertheless held that "sustained conversation with respective voters waiting to cast their ballots, regardless of the content of the remarks exchanged, constitutes conduct, which, in itself, necessitates a second election." Milchem, supra at 362. The Board went on to explain the basis for this holding. It stated:

> Careful consideration of the problem now convinces us that the potential for distraction, last minute electioneering or presssure, and unfair advantage from prolonged conversations between representatives of any party to the election and voters waiting to cast ballots is of sufficient concern to warrant a strict rule against such conduct, without inquiry into the nature of the conversations. The final minutes before an employee casts his vote should be his own, as free from in> terference as possible. Furthermore, the standard here applied insures that no party gains a last minute advantage over the other, and at the same time deprives neither party of any important access to the ear of the voter. The difficulties of recapturing with any precision the nature of the remarks made in the charged atmosphere of a polling place are self-evident, and to require an examination into the substance and effect of the conversations seems unduly burdensome and, in this situation, unnecessary. Finally, a blanket prohibition against such conversations is easily understood and simply applied.

(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this subchapter, the union appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof: Provided the Board shall not (1) decide that any unit is appropriate for such purposes if such unit includes both professional employees and employees who are not professional employees unless a majority of such professional employees vote for inclusion in such unit • • •

> This rule is nothing more than a preventive device to enforce the ban against electioneering in polling places normally applied in political elections and in our representation elections. It serves the same purposes of maintaining order and permitting voters to consult their own consciences without interruption. Additionally, by attaching a sanction to its breach, the rule assures that the parties will painstakingly avoid casual conversations which could otherwise develop into undersirable electioneering or coercion. In our view, the restriction here established gives every promise of having a salutary effect on the conduct of elections and offers no likelihood of abridging the rights of the parties concerned.
> We intend, of course, that our application of this rule will be informed by a sense of realism. The rule contemplates that conversations between a party and voters while the latter are in a polling area awaiting to vote will normally, upon the filing of proper objections, be deemed prejudicial without investigation into the content of the remarks. But this does not mean that any chance, isolated, innocuous comment or inquiry by an employer or union official to a voter will necessarily void the election. We will be guided by the maxim that "the law does not concern itself with trifles." We trust, however, that the parties to the elections, in order to obviate the sometimes troublesome task of defining what is to be considered trifling, will take pains to assure complete compliance with the rule by instructing their agents, officials, and representatives simply to refrain from conversing with prospective voters in the polling area.

The Regional Director sought to distinguish Milchem by stressing the fact that, in Milchem, it was undisputed that it was an officer of the union—"a party to the election"—who was the offending individual. (134a) The Regional Director, in his decision, then stated:

> Inasmuch as I have found that Sadler was not an agent or representative of the Petitioner, I conclude, therefore, that there is no basis under the above-cited cases [e. g. Milchem, Pastoor, supra] for setting aside the election on a per se standard, since the conduct involved was not engaged in by a party to the election. (135a)

Significantly, he did not comment on the conflicting evidence as to Sadler's status.[2] Indeed, the Regional Director's findings as to Sadler's status, while acknowledging the company's assertion that Sadler claimed to have been "there for the Union to keep management away from the polling area," (135a), does not indicate the evidence on which these findings of "non-party" were predicated. His decision continued:

> As previously indicated, Sadler was a rank-and-file employee and an eligible voter. Although Sadler wore a Petitioner button, he held no position of any kind for the Petitioner, nor had he been designated to act for the Petitioner in any way. He was not an officer of the Petitioner, was not a member of any committee of the Petitioner and had not been designated to act as an election observer by the Petitioner. The investigation failed to disclose any evidence that Sadler had been required by the petitioner to police the area where the voters were waiting in line to vote and, indeed, the investigation failed to establish any evidence that the petitioner was even aware of Sadler's actions.
> In these circumstances, I conclude that Sadler was not an agent of the Petitioner, noting particularly that he held no position of any kind with the Petitioner, had not been designated by

[2] The Regional Director did acknowledge that the record before him contained conflicting evidence as the Sadler's comments. We observe that the comments allegedly made by Sadler in the present case are far more egregious in content than the innocent conversations held in Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1962), which nevertheless resulted in the Milchem election being vacated.

> the Petitioner to act for it and that the Petitioner in no way authorized, condoned or was even aware of Sadler's activities. A rank-and-file employee's adherence to or preference for a labor organization is not sufficient to constitute such person an agent of a labor organization. Consequently, I conclude that Sadler's conduct, in question here, can in no way be attributable to the Petitioner

In both Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 292 (3d Cir. 1981) and NLRB v. Campbell Products, 623 F.2d 876 (3d Cir. 1980), this court held that "[a] party is entitled to an evidentiary hearing where its objection raises substantial and material issues of fact * * *. As a corollary, no hearing is necessary where the Board assumes the truth of the party's contentions, and then rules as a matter of law that, assuming the facts alleged, the challenged conduct does not warrant setting aside the election." Anchor Inns, supra, p. 296 quoting NLRB v. Campbell Products Dept., 623 F.2d 876, 879 (3d Cir. 1980).

"In Campbell Products, the employer alleged that a union supporter had been electioneering during the course of balloting. The Board assumed the allegation to be true and, relying on the traditional distinction drawn between activities undertaken by the parties to an election and those undertaken by rank and file employees, overruled the objection." Anchor Inns, supra, at 296 (emphasis supplied). The Campbell court focused not on the electioneering objection presented by Campbell, but rather on a second objection raised by Campbell which alleged that the Board had failed to adhere to its own policy and precedents by failing to consider the company's objection which had been filed beyond the five day period specified in the Board's regulations. In Campbell, therefore, while we overruled the Board with respect to Campbell's second objection, we upheld the Board's action in rejecting the electioneering complaint. We did so, because in Campbell, no question was ever raised as to the status of the employee—i. e. whether he was a mere employee, or a union agent, and of equal importance the Board had in fact "assume[d] the truth of [Campbell's] contentions" that the offender was no more than an employee. 623 F.2d at 879.

Here, however, the circumstances are dramatically different from those which we confronted in Campbell Products. In the present case, Season-All has asserted that Sadler was a union agent and that as a union agent he was electioneering during the balloting and this assertion was never assumed to be true by the Regional Director.

Similarly in Anchor Inns, a precedent in this Circuit directly on point, one of the company's compliants which led us to remand for a hearing, was that the status of the offending employee as a union agent had not been assumed as true and no hearing had been held by the Regional Director to resolve that issue. Thus, Anchor Inns's observations are instructive in this case. As we observe there:

> In NLRB v. Claxton Manufacuring Co., 613 F.2d 1364 (5th Cir. 1980), the Board, as in the case at bar, apparently believed that it was not required to decide whether the objector's affidavits raised substantial and material issues that prima facie warranted setting aside the election. Rather, the Board concluded that it might await the results of the regional direstor's ex parte investigation and credibility determinations before deciding whether a hearing might be warranted. The Fifth Circuit rejected such a procedure and declined to enforce the bargaining order. 613 F.2d at 1373. We find the Fifth Circuit's approach persuasive in this case. It would of course serve no useful purpose to require the Board to hold hearings when the evidence proffered will not affect the validaity of the election. However, in order to give the objecting party the full benefits of its statutory and Constitutional hearing rights it is necessary that at some point the Regional Director or the Board, in determining the substantiality and materiality of the factual issues raised by an objection, assume that the allegations contained in that objection are true. This was not done in the case at bar. Had the allegations been taken as true, they may have warranted setting aside the election.

644 F.2d at 296.

Here, the Regional Director did not assume the truth of Season-All's allegation that Sadler was a union ageant. Rather the Regional Director "substituted 'facts' gleaned from his ex parte investigation for the Company's allegation." Id. at 297. His finding that Sadler "held no position of any kind for the [union], nor had he been designatead to act for the [union] in any way," completely controverted Season-All's allegations. Thus, the findings which are reported in his decision not only are unsupported by evidence of record, but are even more seriously flawed, in that Season-All was precluded from participating in an evidentiary hearing at which it could examine Sadler and other witnesses and present its evidence and arguments.

The record clearly discloses that Season-All's initial objection to the election asserted that Sadler was an agent of the union. Paragraph four of Season-All's objection reads

> 4. During a substantial part of the period designated for voting, Roy Sadler, an agent of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers ("Petitioner"), engaged in electioneering activities in the corridor within a few feet of the door of the conference room in which voting was taking place.

Moreover, Season-All claimed that Sadler urged waiting voters to vote for the union; that he badgered employees whom he felt were not favorably disposed towards the union; that he influenced voters; that he implied that the company was engaged in wrongful conduct and that he conducted his electioneering outside of the entrance to the polling room for a substantial portion of the time allotted for voting. These charges were supported by affidavits filed both before and after the Regional Director's decision. While it is true that the affidavits filed prior to the decision did not specifically assert that Sadler was a union agent, Season-All's filed objections consistently maintained that Sadler was an agent of the union. Indeed, an affidavit filed by Season-All's industrial relations director subsequent to the union's certification and in response to the June 6, 1980 motion of the General Counsel for summary judgment, stated unequivocally that Sadler, together with three other named individuals, as a committee "repeatedly presented itself to Season-All management as having some connection with the [union]." (322a)

We recognize that this latter affidavit was not before the Regional Director prior to his refusal to hold a hearing on the company's charges. However, the assertions made by Season-All in its efforts to obtain an evidentiary hearing were more than sufficient under the standard announced in Anchor Inns, supra, to "prima facie warrant setting aside the election." Anchor Inns at 296. The following standard announced in Anchor Inns was satisfied in full by Season-All:

> In order to obtain an evidentiary hearing, the objector's proffer of evidence must prima facie warrant setting aside the election. The proffer may not be conclusory or vague; it must point to specific events and specific people.

Id. at 296. Cf. Vitek Electronics, Inc. v. NLRB, 653 F.2d 785, at 794–795 (3d Cir. 1981).

Season-All's proffer was neither conclusory nor vague. It referred to specific events (time, place and conversations) and specifically identified Sadler as the person whose conduct was being challenged.

Our conclusion in this respect is buttressed by the Fifth Circuit's decision in NLRB v. Carroll, 636 F.2d 111 (5th Cir. 1981). There, as here, electioneering took place while employees were waiting to vote.[3] The electioneering activities were conducted by two former Carroll employees. There, as here, the Board contended that the electioneering that occurred was not improper because the Carroll employees were not agents of the union and thus their conduct could not be attributed to the union. The court's response put that argument to rest:

> It is well settled that acts not attributable to the union warrant setting aside the election if the acts disrupted the voting procedure or destroyed the atmosphere necessary to the exercise of a free choice in the representation election. NLRB v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., 613 F.2d 1364, 1371 (5th Cir. 1980). In Home Town Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 379 F.2d 241 (5th Cir. 1967), this court stated:
> > We are not impressed with the argument that all coercive acts must be shown to be attributable to the union itself, rather than to the rank and file of its supporters. "The important fact is that such conditions existed and that a free

[3] NRLB v. Carroll, 636 F.2d 111, 113 (5th Cir. 1981), also held that

> Once the polls opened, the employees waiting outside in line to vote became a part of the polling place, and were entitled to the safeguards against interference espoused by Milchem.

We agree, for just as the court in Carroll found, we do not regard protection from interference to be reserved for only those employees who have gained access to the actual polling place. Voters, in the last few moments before voting, must be "as free from interference as possible." Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 162–63 quoted in text, supra p. 937.

636 F.2d at 113.

Carroll, recognizing that Board policy prohibited electioneering "at or near the polls," denied enforcement of the Board's order. Our reading of Carroll indicates that the Fifth Circuit does not restrict the per se rule of Milchem to parties but holds that even a non-party who disrupts the voting procedure or destroys the atmosphere necessary to the exercise of a free choice in an election, warrants the setting aside of the election.[4] We agree that in establishing and maintaining the "laboratory conditions" conducive to an election, no conduct disruptive or destructive of the exercise of a voter's free choice can be tolerated, regardless of whether the actions are those of a union agent or a mere employee. However, the failure to afford a hearing to Season-All in this case precludes us from making the determinations which compelled the Carroll court to set aside the election there. It was the same failure to hold a hearing after a prima facie case had been established by the employer in Anchor Inns, that prompted the court there to remand for an evidentiary hearing to resolve the essential issues bearing on the fairness of the Anchor Inns election.[5] Thus, both precedent and logic compel the same result in this case where Sadler's conduct and status have been disputed and put in issue by Season-All, but have never been the subject of an evidentiary hearing and therefore have never been properly resolved.

Season-All also objected to the Board's determination that its computer programmers were not professional employees as that term is defined in 29 U.S.C. § 152(12).[6] If the computer programmers were professional employees, they could not be included in a bargaining unit with non-professional employees unless a majority of such professional employees were to vote for inclusion in such a unit. See 29 U.S.C. § 159(b)(1) quoted supra at p. 936 n.1. No such separate election was ever held because the Board concluded that the computers were not professional employees.

The hearing held on April 17, 1979 resulted in an opinion of the Regional Director dated May 16, 1979, which was affirmed by the Board. That opinion states in relevant part:

> The record discloses that computer programming requires special education or training above the high school level of at least two years. However, the Employers does not require a four-year

[4] To the extent that Carroll interprets Claussen Baking Co., 134 NLRB 111 (1961), as requiring an election to be set aside whenever any electioneering takes place. Carroll's holding may be read as more far reaching in this respect than the decisions thus far in this Circuit. Cf. NLRB v. Campbell, 623 F.2d 876, 879 n.2 (3d Cir. 1980). Regardless of the reach of Carroll, under the circumstances of this case, we are constrained to follow the precedent of Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 292 (3d Cir. 1981).

[5] The dissent, while acknowledging that Anchor Inns establishes the governing legal standard for determining when the Board should conduct an evidentiary hearing (dissenting op. typescript at 1) apparently views the allegations in that case differently than do we. The dissent asserts that "Anchor Inns requires more substantial evidence than [Season-All provided] on the question of Sadler's status." Dissenting op. typescript at 3. Our reading of Anchor Inns persuades us that there is no difference in either the content or the quality of the allegations in the two cases.

In Anchor Inns, as here, the company filed objections to the Regional Director's report claiming that an evidentiary hearing on the objections should have been had. In addition to the objections made to the remarks of the alleged agent, Anchor Inns complained that:

> it should not have been held responsible for failing to produce evidence of Victor's agency status with the union. The strictures of Secion 8(a)(1), it was argued, precluded [Anchor Inns] from engaging in the type of investigation that would produce competent evidence of an agency relationship.

644 F.2d at 294–95 (footnote omitted, emphasis supplied)

Anchor Inns also asserted that even if Victor was not a union agent, his conduct tainted the election process. Similar allegations were made in Season-All's objections and are discussed in text above.

Thus, to the extent that Anchor Inns determined that an ex parte investigation by the Regional Director was insufficient in the face of specific allegations of misconduct by an alleged union agent, we can discern no differences between Anchor Inns and this case. Nor does our direction that an evidentiary hearing beheld in any way implicate the teaching of Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. NRDC, 435 U.S. 519, 98 S.Ct. 1197, 55 L.Ed.2d 460 (1978) (dissenting op. typescript at 1). We do no more here than require adherence to the Board's own policies which require an evidentiary hearing when objections raise substantial and material issues of fact. See Anchor Inns at 296.

[6] The term "professional employee" means—

> (a) any employee engaged in work (i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical, or physical work; (ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgement in its performance; (iii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time; (iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual, or physical processes; or
> (b) any employee, who (i) has completed the courses of specialized intellectual instruction and study described in clause (iv) of paragraph (a), and (ii) is performing related work under the supervision of a professional person to qualify himself to become a professional employee as defined in paragraph (a).

> While knowledge of the type of described in [29 U.S.C. § 152(12)(a)(iv) quoted at footnote 5, supra might be desirable for a programmer to have, it is clear that their work does not require it. Further, the record fails to establish that the computer programmers are engaged in other than pure programming activities. Accordingly, inasmuch as the Employer's computer programmers do not satisfy all of the requirements of Section 2(12), I find that they are not professional employees as defined by that Section of the Act. At best, the computer programmers are technical employees. Inasmuch as the parties have agreed to include technical employees, I find that the Employer's computer programmers are appropriately included in the unit.

While the Board has previously determined that a system analyst with wide discretion and significant amounts of technical training might be considered a "professional employee" in certain situations, see e. g. Aeronca, Inc., 221 NLRB 326 (1975), it has generally considered computer programmers to be technical and thus non-professional employees. See e. g., Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. NLRB, 440 F.2d 7, 9–10 (2d Cir.) cert. denied, 404 U.S. 853, 92 S.Ct. 93, 30 L.Ed.2d 93 (1971); U.S. Postal Services, 210 NLRB 477, 488 (1974); Computer Systems, Inc., 204 NLRB 255 (1973).

Here, the Board's factual determination that the computer programmers are not "perfessional employees" is "supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole" 29 U.S.C. 160(f), and giving our usual deference to the Board's expertise in a classification context, we conclude that the Board did not err in its ruling. See NLRB v. McQuaide, Inc., 552 F.2d 519, 532–33 (3d Cir. 1977); Mon River Towing, Inc. v. NLRB, 421 F.2d 1, 5 (3d Cir. 1969). But see Note, The NLRB and Supervisory Status: An Explanation of Inconsistent Results, 94 Harv.L.Rev. 1713 (1981).

III.

Having determined that Season-All was improperly denied an evidentiary hearing with respect to Sadler's status and conduct, we will grant Season-All's petition for review; we will deny the Board's cross-application for enforcement of its August 1, 1980 order; and, we will remand the case for an evidentiary hearing and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Costs will be taxed against the respondent.

ADAMS, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I agree with the majority that our recent decision in Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 292 (3d Cir. 1981), establishes the governing legal standard for determining when the Board should conduct an evidentiary hearing concerning allegations of election misconduct. I believe, however, that in this case Season-All did not satisfy the threshold requirement of Anchor Inns.

According to Anchor Inns, unsubstantiated allegations by the party objecting to an election will not suffice to compel the Board to undertake a hearing. Rather, "to obtain an evidentiary hearing, the objector's proffer of evidence must prima facie warrant setting aside the election. The proffer may not be conclusory or vague; it must point to specific events and specific people." 644 F.2d 292, 296.

Although hearings generally serve a useful purpose, requiring a hearing in the absense of a factual predicate warranting such an inquiry provokes unnecessary delay in the administrative process at the expense of the choice of a majority of the workers. Furthermore, we must be mindful of the admonition by the Supreme Court in Ver- mont Yankee Nuclear Power Corp. v. NRDC, 435 U.S. 519, 524, 98 S.Ct. 1197, 1202, 55 L.Ed.2d 460 (1978), that "absent constitutional constraints or extremely compelling circumstances the administrative agencies should be free to fashion their own rules of procedure." Under the majority opinion, the Board's rule that there should be a hearing only when the objecting party specifically substantiates its allegations is, in effect, abrogated. In its stead the majority would substitute a court-crafted rule that there must be a hearing even when the allegations are vague and unsupported.

The issue on which Season-All requests a hearing involves Sadler's status with the union.[1] Thus, under Anchor Inns, we must ascertain whether the employer proffered "substantial and material" evidence that Sadler was a union agent. The offerings by Season-All on this issue are, at best, conclusory and vague, and they fall short of being substantial. In its complaint, Season-All contended that "Sadler, an agent of the [IAM], engaged in electioneering * * *." (emphasis added). The employer then detailed the content of the statements that purportedly constituted electioneering. As to the allegations of union agency, the critical issue in this appeal, the company merely came forward with a single, vague item of evidence to support the claims of union agency. Season-All asserted that Sadler stated he was at the polling place because he was for the union."[2] This enigmatic statement suggests that Sadler held a position with the union.

The majority concludes that Season-All satisfied the requirements in Anchor Inns of concreteness and substantiality when it "referred to specific events (time, place and conversations) and specifically identified Sadler as the person whose conduct was being challenged." Maj. op., typescript at 940. But, these allegations by Season-All pertain only to the question of whether Sadler's comments were coercive; they are not apposite to the question of Sadler's position within the union.

All that Season-All offered on this crucial issue were the cryptic statement adverted to earlier and the conclusory allegation that Sadler was an agent. To warrant a hearing on the question of Sadler's status, Anchor Inns requires more substantial evidence than this. Also relevant here is the observation in Anchor Inns that "it would of course serve no useful purpose to require the Board to hold hearings when the evidence proffered will not affect the validity of the election." 644 F.2d at 296. The proffered evidence—that Sadler said he was "for the union"—is not of sufficient import to affect the election certification. Moreover, after an investigation the Regional Director found no evidence that Sadler either held a position with the union or had been designated by the union to police the polling area.

When the evidence produced by Season-All in the present case is measured against the substantiality requirement of Anchor Inns, it appears that the Board did not err when it declined to hold a hearing on the question of Sadler's union position. Inasmuch as I am bound by Anchor Inns, decided only a few months ago, I respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority opinion that directs the Board to hold a hearing.

United Parcel Service v. NLRB

654 F.2d 12 (6th Cir.), July 17, 1981—247 NLRB 861

On petition to review Board Order

Before Weick and Keith, Circuit Judges, and Porter,* District Judge

This case is before the court on petition of the United Parcel Service for review of an order of the NLRB issued against it on February 5, 1980, and reported at 247 NLRB No. 134. The Board has filed a cross-petition for enforcement of this order.

United Parcel Service Company is an interstate common carrier engaged in motor freight transportation and delivery. It has a facility at Roseville,

[1] The NLRB rule advanced in Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362, would apply only if Sadler is found to have been a representative of the union. In Milchem it was undisputed that the person who made the allegedly improper remarks was a union official, so the Board devised a rule to cover statements by parties to the election. This rule is largely inapposite to the narrow procedural issue presented in this case, because the inquiry into Sadler's union status is distinct from and preliminary to any consideration of Milchem.

[2] As the majority correctly points out, it was not until the unfair labor practice proceedings, a year after the election, and well after the Board had considered the need to hold a hearing, that Season-All, in objecting to the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment, alleged for the first time that Sadler had held himself out to the company as a member of a union committee, even though he was not on the Official list of union representatives. (A.324).

*Hon. David S. Porter, Senior District Judge for the Southern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

Michigan for transshipping parcels. The union represents the company's employees at this and at other terminals.

One of the trucks or tractors delivering parcels to the company's Roseville facility is known as the Mount Pleasant Trailer. On arrival, this trailer, which has a sliding or roll-top back door, is routinely parked on the level near the loading dock while the driver breaks the seal, opens the door and checks the position of the load. The door is always open as the driver starts backing the trailer down to the platform-dock for unloading.

The dock is about six feet above ground level. The platform about two feet wide and three feet from the ground is immediately adjacent to the dock. When parked for unloading, the back bumper of the Mount Pleasant Trailer rests against the foundation of the plaform. Above the bumper, there is a "well imprint" appropriately six to eight inches wide between the trailer and the platform.

The ground slopes downward to the dock platform and, on occasion, the sliding door of the Mount Pleasant Trailer shuts as the truck is backing up. When this happens, an unloader generally opens the door at the dock-platform. This requires the employee to step onto the platform, bend over and reach down into the well area to pull up the door. Because of the cramped space, maneuverability is limited. The evidence below showed that paackages have fallen from the Mount Pleasant Trailer as its door was being reopened at the dock, and several times an employee has been hit by these packages. The maximum weight of individual packages transported from the trailer is about 50 pounds. The average weight of the packages is about 10 to 15 pounds, and ordinarily the trailer is filled to about 20% of its capacity.

On January 3, 1979, the Mount Pleasant Trailer arrived at Roseville late and neither Katherine Carette, a pre-load supervisor, nor any of the loading dock employees on duty saw the driver break the seal and unlock the door of the trailer. Employees Aiello, Gregory Pozel and William Lowery first saw the trailer as it backed up to the dock with its door shut. After the trailer came to a halt, Carette directed Aiello to open the door; he refused on the grounds that it was sealed and locked and that the opening was "unsafe". Carette examined the trailer from the dock, determined that it was not sealed or locked, and again ordered Aiello to open it. Aiello refused once more, asserting that it was dangerous. At this point Pozel, seeking to avert further conflict, stepped down, reached into the well, unlatched the door and opened it. Aiello assisted in the operation. About an hour after the incident, the night manager and the supervisors summoned Aiello and William Wise, a union committeeman, to the office. The supervisor related that Aiello had refused an order to open the door of the trailer. In his defense, Aiello stated that "he felt it was unsafe for him to open up the door and that he thought he shouldn't do it". At that point, the manager and supervisor gave Aiello a warning notice charging him with "flagrant disobeying of orders". Aiello had earlier been charged with disciplinary warnings by the company and allegedly harassed his female supervisor on previous occasions. The company took the position that the January 3rd incident was a continuation of Aiello's disruptive conduct.

On January 9, Aiello prepared a grievance about the January 3 incident and the disciplinary warning. He was assisted by employee Lowery. The grievance stated:

> A warning notice was issued to me on Wednesday, January 3, on grounds of insubordination, and I wish to disprove this accusation with reasons listed below. According to the union contract, an employee under no circumstances will be required or assigned to engage in any activity involving dangerous conditions of work or danger to a person or property; therefore, on the day in question, I hesitated momentarily to open a trailer door > because of the distance between the door and trailer but—(1) proceeded to finish the work required upon opening said door and, (2) was not given the notice until the end of the shift after all work had been completed. I would now request that a demonstration be made in order to substantiate my claim that a hazardous situation clearly exists.

By January 11, Divisional Manager Palazzolo knew that Aiello had filed a grievance and telephoned him at home to discuss the grievance. Palazzolo was allegedly upset about the grievance and conveyed this to Aiello's, telling him that "maybe [he] should start looking for another job."

Palazzolo scheduled a meeting with Aiello for the next morning.

On January 11, William Range, a pre-load supervisor, chastised Aiello for talking to employees on duty after he had already clocked out. In the early morning hours of January 12 the night manager arranged a meeting with Aiello, supervisor Range and union steward Washington at which Aiello was charged with excessive talking and ordered him to remain silent throughout the night—not to talk or sing with other employees. Later in the morning, Aiello met as scheduled with Palazzolo. At this meeting the company gave Aiello a second warning notice. It charged him with "flagrant disobeying of orders, second flagrant in a two-week period". Aiello's disobedience consisted of his talking on January 11 and 12. Palazzolo noted that Aiello now had two disciplinary warnings and cautioned that a third would result in automatic dismissal. Palazzolo made it clear that if Aiello did not want to abide by the company's rules he should look elsewhere for work or become self-employed. Aiello protested that the two warnings were unfair and should be removed from his record. He later testified that Palazzolo responded that the warning notices would not be removed but that, if Aiello resigned, other employers would not be advised of the warnings. Aiello refused to resign, and Palazzolo admonished him to be a good employee.

On these facts the Board found that Aiello was engaged in protected concerted activity when he exercised his contractual right of refusing to perform an assigned task which is arguably dangerous and that therefore the company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by issuing a disciplinary warning for such refusal. The Board also found that the company violated Section 8(a)(1) by changing Aiello's working conditions and subjecting him to disparate treatment, issuing a second disciplinary warning based on such disparate treatment and twice threatening to discharge Aiello, all in retaliation for his having filed a grievance protesting an assertedly dangerous job asssignment and a disciplinary warning which resulted from his refusal to execute it.

The Board's order required the company to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found and from, in any like or related manner, interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. Affirmatively, the order directs the company to expunge from Aiello's employment records the disciplinary warnings of January 3 and 12, 1979, and all references to them, and to post an appropriate notice.

The controlling decision here is Aro, Inc. v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 713 (6th Cir. 1979) in which Judge Phillips held:

> For an individual claim or complaint to amount to concerted action under the Act, it must not have been made solely on behalf of an individual employee, but it must be made on behalf of other employees or at least be made with the object of inducing or preparing for group action and have some arguable basis in the collective bargaining agreement. Id. at 718

We do not find that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that Aiello refused to perform his duties on January 3 because of a complaint "made on behalf of other employees or at least be made with the object of inducing or preparing for group action." Aiello had a poor record of previous job performance; there was evidence that he refused to perform his work on January 3 solely because of personal problems with his female supervisor; and there was evidence that he continued to be a disruptive influence at the plant after the January 3 incident.

Accordingly, the Board's petition for enforcement of its order is hereby denied.

United States Postal Service v. NLRB

652 F.2d 409 (5th Cir.), July 17, 1981—250 NLRB 1195

On petition to review and cross petition to enforce Board Order

Before RUBIN, RANDALL and TATE, Circuit Judges

PER CURIAM: This case is before the court on petition of the United States Postal Service (the Postal Service) for review of the final order of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) in United States Postal Service, 251 N.L.R.B. No. 33 (1980), and on the cross-application of the Board for enforcement of its order. In its decision in this case the Board found that the Postal Service had violated section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (3) (1976), by issuing to each of two employees a warning letter that was based in part on the refusal of the employee immediately to return to work at the conclusion of a grievance meeting despite clear directions from his supervisor to do so. The Postal Service argues that the employees' actions were insubordinate and that its warnings were thus proper, but the Board argues that the employees' actions were protected activities under section 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157. We find that the Board acted within its authority in determining that the employees' behavior was protected; we therefore deny the petition for review and grant the cross-application for enforcement.

I.

This dispute began with an informal grievance meeting requested by R.P. O'Harrow and Jack Woods, who at the time of these events served as president and vice-president, respectively, of the American Postal Workers Union local at the San Angelo, Texas post office; the meeting took place with John Love and Robert Nichols, both of whom are supervisors at the San Angelo post office. After a heated exchange on a matter not relevant to this appeal, Love ended the meeting and asked O'Harrow and Woods to return to work. The two employees did not immediately return to work, but instead followed Love and Nichols out onto the workroom floor and continued to argue loudly. Love for a second time directed O'Harrow and Woods to return to work but O'Harrow continued arguing and both employees remained on the spot. As Love began to issue a third order to the two employees to return to work, O'Harrow suddenly stopped arguing and both he and Woods returned to their jobs.

Although O'Harrow and Woods did refuse immediately to return to work at the conclusion of the grievance meeting, their refusal was brief and caused no disruption among other employees. As the Board characterized their behavior:

> [T]his is not a case where employees adamantly refused to leave the meeting room when asked to pursue their grievance later and to return to work. Nor is this a case in which the employees tried to impede others who sought to leave. Here, the two employees followed the two supervisors back to the workroom floor. At least to this point their only "insubordination," if it can be called such, was in continuing to talk about their grievance as they walked along. When the employees and the supervisors reached the timeclock, Supervisor Love turned and said, "I am giving you a direct order. I want you to go back to work now." After what was by all accounts a momentary hesitation, and apparently before Love had to repeat the order, the two employees complied with it.

On the following day letters of warning for insubordination were given to both O'Harrow and Woods. Each letter was based in part on the refusal of the employee to return to work at the conclusion of the grievance meeting, and each warned that similar conduct in the future would result in more severe sanctions such as suspension or discharge.

II.

The Board was called upon in this case to reconcile two equally important but conflicting rights. On the one hand is the employee's right to self-organization, which in this case took the form of two employees' participation in an informal grievance meeting. As we stated in Crown Central Petroleum Corp. v. NLRB, 430 F.2d 724, 729 (5th Cir. 1970), "the filing and prosecution of employee grievances is a fundamental, day-to-day part of collective bargaining and is protected by Section 7 [of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157]." On the other hand is the employer's right to maintain discipline in its establishment. "An employee may not act with impunity even though he is engaged in protected activity. His rights, derived from Section 7, must be balanced against the employer's right to maintain order in his business by punishing acts of insubordination." Id. See Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 797–98, 65 S.Ct. 982, 985, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945).

This conflict typically arises in cases where an employee has been disciplined for conduct that occurred during the course of the grievance meeting. See, e.g., NLRB v. Florida Medical Center, Inc., 576

F.2d 666, 671–73 (5th Cir. 1978) (employee called administrator "a Mafia director"), Crown Central Petroleum Corp. v. NLRB, supra (employee accused a superintendent of lying). The Act has ordinarily been interpreted to protect the employee against discipline for impulsive and perhaps insubordinate behavior that occurs during grievance meetings, for such meetings require a free and frank exchange of views and often arise from highly emotional and personal conflicts. Both the Board and the courts have recognized that some tolerance in necessary if grievance meetings are to succeed at all; as we have noted before, "bruised sensibilities may be the price exacted for industrial peace." Crown Central Petroleum Corp. v. NLRB, supra, at 731. See Bettcher Manufacturing Corp., 76 N.L.R.B. 526 (1948). In some cases, however, the employee's conduct during the meeting has been found to be so opprobrious or disruptive that the Act's protection must give way to the employer's right to maintain discipline in its establishment. When the employee's conduct during a grievance meeting is "indefensible under the circumstances," the employer may indeed discipline the employee without violating the Act. NLRB v. Florida Medical Center, Inc., supra, at 673.

The Postal Service argues on appeal that O'Harrow's and Woods' behavior was in fact "indefensible" and therefore beyond the protection of the Act. See 251 N.L.R.B. No. 33 at 5–9 (Penello, M., dissenting). We disagree, for the Board found that the two employees' refusal to return to work was relatively brief and caused no disruption among other employees. We have examined the records as a whole and we find it to support the Board's characterization of O'Harrow's and Woods' behavior. Given this characterization, we cannot quarrel with the Board's conclusion that O'Harrow's and Woods' behavior was not so indefensible as to forfeit the protection of the Act. Cases considering employee behavior during grievance meetings underscore the central role that the Board serves in striking the balance between the employee's right to organize and the employer's rigth to maintain discipline. "Initially, the responsibility to draw the line between these conflicting rights rests with the Board, and its determination, unless illogical or arbitrary, ought not be disturbed." Crown Central Petroleum Corp. v. NLRB, supra, at 730, quoting NLRB v. Thor Power Tool Co., 351 F.2d 584, 587 (7th Cir. 1965). See Republic Aviation Corp. v NLRB, supra; Falcon Plastics Division of B—D Laboratories, Inc. v. NLRB, 397 F.2d 965 (9th Cir. 1968). The Board's conclusion in this case is neither illogical nor arbitrary; indeed, it rests on a reasonable and established policy tht in the context of grievance meetings the Act should be lenient with spontaneous employee insubordination that is not disruptive of other employees. See, e.g., NLRB v. Florida Medical Center, Inc., supra, at 673. Accordingly, we defer to the Board's judgment that O'Harrow's and Woods' conduct was not "indefensible."

The Postal Service does not challenge the wide discretion of the Board in this area, but does point to the unusual context of this case—that is, to the fact that the grievance meeting had aready ended when the "insubordinate" conduct took place. The Postal Service argues that when Love ended the meeting the Act's protection also ceased, i. e., that O'Harrow's and Woods' brief continuation of the argument and refusal to return to work was liable to discipline just as if the protected grievance meeting had never occurred. The Board rejected this argument. As the administrative law judge explained.

> [The Postal Service] has seemingly bifurcated the conduct of O'Harrow and Woods, finding protected that which occurred prior to Love's announcement [of the conclusion of the meeting] and unprotected that which occurred thereafter. Such an argument, however, would enable an employer, by its own whim, to define the nature of protected activity, and I believe such an argument is repugnant to the policies of the Act * * * I believe that the entire conduct of O'Harrow and Woods' * * * was within the res gestae of the grievance meeting.

We agree with the Board's conclusion that the Act's protection of an employee's conduct during a grievance meeting does not necessarily terminate the instant when the employer ends the discussion. This conclusion is supported by prior decisions of the Board and is eminently reasonable. See Thor Power Tool Co., 148 N.L.R.B. 1379, 1380, 1388, enforced, 351 F.2d 584 (7th Cir. 1965); Bettcher Manufacturing Corp., 76 N.L.R.B. 526, 537 (1948). Surely the principals involved in a heated exchange cannot be expected to suppress their emotions at a moment's urging by one who has been their adversary. As the administrative law judge recognized, the Act's protection of employee participation in grievance meetings would be seriouly threatened if the employer could at any emotional and argumentative point during the meeting call an immediate halt to the operation of the Act. We hold therefore that the Board may extend the Act's protection to a cooling-off period of brief duration at the termination of grievance meetings.

Of course, the appropriateness and duration of such a cooling-off period will depend upon the facts of each case, and this determination should be left to the sound discretion of the Board. As noted above, the Board has the primary responsibility for weighing the conflicting rights of the parties to determine whether an employee's conduct in connection with a grievance meeting is protected by the Act; this responsibility is not diminished when the case turns on the termination of the grievance meeting rather than on the employee's allegedly "indefensible" conduct. In this case the Board clearly acted within its authority and discretion. We therefore deny the Postal Service's petition for review and grant the Board's cross-application for enforement of its order.

PETITION DENIED and ORDER ENFORCED.

Brockway Motor Trucks, Division of Mack Trucks, Inc. v. NLRB

656 F.2d 32 (3d Cir.), July 20, 1981—251 NLRB 29

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before ADAMS, VAN DUSEN, and ROSENN, Circuit Judges

PER CURIAM: This proceeding arose as a result of a decision by Brockway Motor Trucks (Division of Mack Trucks, Inc.), in the course of a labor dispute, to close its facility in Philadelphia, without bargaining with the union over the possibility of the closing. The union filed unfair labor practice charges. The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) concluded that the employer's unilateral action constituted a violation of its duty to bargain under the Act, and ordered Brockway to bargain with the union and to pay the employees back-pay.

The Board petitioned this Court for enforcement of its order, and at the same time Brockway filed a petition for review of the Board's order.

We concluded that the record before the Board did not set forth sufficient information regarding the conditions leading to the decision by Brockway to close the plant in order to enable us to determine whether Brockway had transgressed its duty to bargain. Accordingly, we declined to enforce the order to bargain. In addition, we raised the question whether, even if there were an unfair labor practice, it would be appropriate to require Brockway to bargain, since the Philadelphia plant had, by then, been closed for many months, and the remainder of Brockway's operations had also ceased. We concluded that the NLRB could conduct additional proceedings regarding the matter should it wish to do so. 582 F.2d 720 (3d Cir. 1978).[1]

The Board did elect to conduct additional proceedings and, as a result, it concluded, once again, that Brockway had committed an unfair labor practice when it closed its plant without discussing the issue with the union. It ordered Brockway to bargain with the union and to pay back wages to the employees for the time between the closing of the Philadelphia location and the termination of the entire business.

Again, the Board filed with this Court a petition for enforcement, and again Brockway filed a petition for review.

While the petitions for enforcement and review were pending, the United States Supreme Court decided the case of First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 2573, 69 L.Ed.2d 318 (1981). In it, the Supreme Court concluded that an employer is not required to bargain with the union over its decision "to shut down part of its business purely for economic reasons." Id. ———, 101 S.Ct. 2584.

Based on the opinion of the Supreme Court in First National Maintenance Corp., the Board submitted a consent to a decree denying enforcement of the Board's order. At oral argument, held on [1] Judge Rosenn dissented on the ground that under the circumstances the employer had not duty to bargain with the union. 582 F.2d 741.

July 7, 1981, counsel for Brockway agreed to the entry of the consent, but sought clarification regarding two items: (1) it requested the Court to make certain that no charge against it of an unfair labor practice would survive the entry of the consent order; and (2) it requested the Court to impose costs against the Board.

In response, the Board assured the Court and Brockway that no unfair labor practice charge against Brockway would survive the entry of the consent order. As to the item of costs, the Board took the position that until Brockway filed a motion for costs there was no matter involving costs before the Court.

After considering the opinion of the Supreme Court in First National Maintenance Corp., the proffer of the consent order, and the representations of counsel, it is hereby ordered that the Board's consent to a decree denying enforcement of the Board's order shall be approved and filed of record; that the petition for enforcement, filed by the Board, and the petition for review, filed by Brockway, shall be dismissed; that the Board is directed to dismiss the unfair labor practice charge against Brockway; that costs are imposed on the NLRB, but the question of amount is reserved until an appropriate motion is filed by Brockway.

NLRB v. Gibraltar Industries, Inc. and Case, Inc.

653 F.2d 1091 (6th Cir.), July 20, 1981; rehearing and rehearing en banc denied October 7, 1981—237 NLRB 798

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WEICK and ENGEL, Circuit Judges, and PECK, Senior Circuit Judge.

ENGEL, Circuit Judge. This case is before the court upon the application of the National Labor Relations Board, pursuant to Section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. ("NLRA"), for enforcement of its order issued against respondents, Gibraltar Industries, Inc. and Case, Inc., dated August 24, 1978, and reported at 237 NLRB No. 60. The Board's order required Gibraltar to (1) cease and desist from interfering with employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights, (2) bargain with the intervenor, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union ("ILGWU" or "Union"), (3) reestablish operations at Olive Hill, Kentucky, and (4) offer the laid off employees reinstatement and make them whole for any loss of earnings.

This order was based, in part, upon a finding that Gibraltar had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the NLRA by creating the impression that employees' union activities were under surveillance, coercively interrogating employees about union activities and threatening plant closure if the ILGWU succeeded in its organizing campaign, and otherwise interfering with the employees' right to organize. The Board also found that Gibraltar had violated Section 8(a)(5), (3) and (1) by failing to bargain in good faith on wages with the ILGWU, closing its Olive Hill plant and transferring work to a facility located in New York, and insisting that any negotiations regarding the effects of the closure take place in New York, over the phone or through the mail.

At the same time, the Board ordered Case to cease and desist from interfering with its employees'Section 7 rights. The Board required Case to reinstate a discharged employee, Anita Wilburn, with back pay, finding that her termination had been motivated by anti-union animus. All references in her employment record regarding alleged poor work were to be expunged. In addition, the results of a union representation election which Upper South (a local of the ILGWU) had lost were to be reopened and retabulated. Even if the Union did not carry a majority, Case was to bargain collectively with Upper South.

This order was based upon a finding that Case had violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening its employees with loss of work if the Union prevailed in the election, interrogating employees about their Union activities, and coercing other employees into campaigning against the Union. The Board also found that Upper South had attained majority status in an appropriate unit and that Case's refusal to recognize the bargain with Upper South violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the NLRA.

Three major issues are presented by this appeal. First, did Gibraltar fail to bargain in good faith with the ILGWU and was its subsequent plant closure unlawful under the NLRA? Second, did Case unlawfully discharge Anita Wilburn because of her union support? Third, did Case engage in unlawful anti-union activities, thereby prejudicing the representation election and requiring a bargaining order? Under the law, the NRLB's decision must be upheld if there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the Board's findings.

> "[s]ubstantial evidence is more than a mere scintilla." * * * [I]t "must do more than create a suspicion of the existence of the fact to be established. * * * it must be enough to justify, if the trial were to a jury, a refusal to direct a verdict when the conclusion sought to be drawn from it is one of fact for the jury."

I.

Gibraltar manufactures sleeping bags and other quilted materials at a facility located in Brooklyn, New York. In early 1976, Gibraltar began manufacturing sleeping bags in a facility located in Olive Hill, Kentucky. Nevertheless, the lions' share of Gibraltar's business remained in New York, where employees had been represented by the ILGWU and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America.

Gibraltar's Olive Hill plant consisted of several sewing and quilting machines operated by seventeen employees. During the summer of 1976, the ILGWU began an organizational effort at Olive Hill. On October 12, 1976, the ILGWU was cerfitied as the exclusive collective bargaining representative of a unit of production, maintenance, shipping and receiving employees, pursuant to an election held on October 1, 1976.

Case manufactures clothing at a facility located in Olive Hill. It regularly performs subcontract work for Gibraltar. In 1976, Case employed approximately 200 workers. Early that year, Upper South, a local division of the ILGWU, began an organizational effort at the Case plant. Authorization cards were collected and an election was held on November 16, 1976. The employees cast ninety-four votes for Upper South and ninety-seven votes against; nine ballots were challenged on the ground that the employees were not members of the appropriate unit.

The Board and the Union contend that Gibraltar failed to negotiate in good faith after the ILGWU had been certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of the garment workers at Gibraltar's Olive Hill plant. The Union presented a contract to Gibraltar containing approximately thirty-seven major provisions. Although agreement was had on nearly thirty provisions, Gibraltar and the Union failed to agree on certain "economic items" which included wage rates, overtime policy, piece-work rates, and health care benefits. Contract negotiations lasted over a two month period; however, there were only two actual negotiating sessions. The course of events is summarized in the margin.[1]

Gibraltar claims it did not refuse to negotiate on "economic terms"; rather, it proposed a "two-year pass," that is, a two-year contract embracing the thirty mutually accepted terms but maintaining current wage and benefit levels. Gibraltar asserts that the nature of its operations (much of it being government contract work obtained on a low bid basis), as well as economic necessity and market conditions required a wage/benefit freeze until enough business could be obtained to sustain profitability. The Board, however, found that the company had not negotiated in good faith, noting Gibraltar's refusal to compromise on the "two-year pass" position and interpreting the company's pre-election activities (for example, interrogation and promise of benefits) as evidence of anti-union animus.

[1] October 19, 1976—The Union delivers its contract proposal to Gibraltar, containing thirty-seven provisions. Gibraltar requests time to study the proposal.

October 27, 1976—The Union and Gibraltar meet and begin negotiations. Agreement is obtained on numerous provisions, but no wage increases.

November 1, 1976—Gibraltar writes the Union regarding additional suggestions and acceptable provisions but remains adamant on wage increases.

December 9, 1976—The Union and Gibraltar again meet, after Gibraltar has laid off employees. Gibraltar expresses its willingness to sign the contract as then negotiated, incorporating existing wage and benefit levels. It suggests a two-year contract with further negotiations after the contract expires. The Union rejects this proposal.

December 17, 1976—Gibraltar contacts the Union indicating no changes in wages are possible. No agreement is reached.

December 20, 1976—Gibraltar writes the Union informing it of the decision to close the Olive Hill plant.

December 21, 1976—The Union writes Gibraltar requesting a negotiating session and additional discussions on the effects of the plant closure.

December 28, 1976—Gibraltar writes the Union proposing to discuss effects in New York.

January 6, 1977—The Union writes Gibraltar suggesting a meeting in Kentucky or other convenient place to discuss effects and requesting information on profits, losses, and other economic data concerning the New York and Olive Hill operations.

January 17, 1977—Gibraltar writes the Union refusing to supply information and again suggesting a meeting in New York or negotiations over the phone or through the mail.

A.

Upon a thorough review of the record as a whole, we cannot find substantial evidence to support the Board's findings. First, Gibraltar's pre-election statements and actions were not violative of the NLRA and do not demonstrate a hostile attitude toward the Union. Rather the record shows that Gibraltar's management viewed unionization as a prelude to increased wages and costs which would in turn prevent the Olive Hill plant from turning a profit. Gibraltar operated a much larger plant in New York, and Mr. Foreman, the president of Gibraltar, believed the Olive Hill work could be performed in New York if a profit could not be earned in Olive Hill. As evidenced by the entire record, Mr. Foreman's attitude was that of a rational businessman concerned about minimizing costs, a particularly relevant concern for a business that is involved in government contracts.

There was no evidence of any personal dislike for unions on Mr. Foreman's part; in fact, Gibraltar was unionized in New York. The record indicates that the company had a history of relationships with both the ILGWU and the Amalgamated Clothing Workers in New York.

Likewise there is no evidence that certain remarks of a subordinate supervisor created an atmosphere of surveillance at the plant. The suspect statements were abbreviated and ambiguous, occurred only twice, and were made privately to one other employee. Furthermore, we find no evidence that Mr. Foreman threatened plant closure or loss of work if the employees unionized; rather, Mr. Foreman's informal comments described the effect of a negotiation stalemate and possible strike on plant operations. In this particular instance, his statements did not transgress the free speech limitations articulated in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

The Administrative Law Judge took notice of a local newspaper article wherein Mr. Foreman was quoted as saying he would not be forced by anyone to do anything regarding the operation of the Olive Hill plant. At the administrative hearing, the reporter who interviewed Foreman was uncertain about the conversation and admitted that he had not reported the full context of Foreman's comments. Even if the article is accurate, it is at best ambiguous. The article provides no evidence that Foreman refused to negotiate, but only that he would not be told how to operate his company. These statements followed upon the heels of negotiations during which the company opposed union involvement in setting piece-work rates for government contract bids, in itself not an unreasonable bargaining position.

Finally, the record clearly demonstrates that Gibraltar negotiated and eventually agreed with the Union on many proposals. The Union requested and the company provided information on wage rates, job classifications, vacation policies and benefit programs. Gibraltar even made advantageous proposals on overtime rates. There also was testimony by the principal ILGWU organizer indicating the company's willingness to negotiate. Granted, Gibraltar stoutly resisted Union efforts to increase the basic wage package and to involve the Union in setting piece-work rates. Yet, it was no more unfair under the circumstances for the company to maintain this position than it was for the Union to press its demands. This was hard bargaining, the kind countenanced by the NLRA as an inevitable aspect of labor-management relations. It was not unfair bargaining. See NLRB v. United Clay Mines Corp., 219 F.2d 120 (6th Cir. 1955). See also McCourt v. California Sports, Inc., 600 F.2d 1193, 1200 (6th Cir. 1979); Fetzer Television, Inc. v. NLRB, 317 F.2d 420, 424 (6th Cir. 1963). In short, the evidence clearly shows that a bargaining impasse was reached.

Once negotiations came to an impasse, Gibraltar could temporarily close the Olive Hill plant for bargaining reasons. American Ship Building Co. v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300, 85 S.Ct. 955, 13 L.Ed.2d 855 (1965). Furthermore, the company could terminate it business operations for purely economic reasons without transgressing the NLRA. First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 2573, 68 L.Ed.2d ——— (1981); NLRB v. R. C. Mahon Co., 269 F.2d 44 (6th Cir. 1959). As we have indicated, the record does not support the Board's finding that Gibraltar was motivated by anti-union animus when it closed its Olive Hill plant; rather, the evidence shows a legitimate business reason (i. e., abandoning a non-profitable operation) for Gibraltar's decision.

However, the Board also found that Gibraltar had failed to negotiate with the Union regarding the effect of closing the Olive Hill plant. Upon review of the record, we believe Gibraltar stood ready and willing to negotiate regarding the effects of its decision to close the Olive Hill plant. On December 20th, Gibraltar wrote Mr. Janis, the principal Union negotiator, expressing a willingness to discuss effects. Given the circumstances, Gibraltar's desire to pursue discussions in New York does not detract from its expressed willingness to negotiate. Since the Olive Hill plant was closed, and both the Union and Gibraltar had their headquarters in New York, we see nothing unlawful or unreasonable with Gibraltar's request. As we read the record, the Union has failed to pursue Gibraltar's suggestion and in fact, has made little or no effort to discuss effects associated with the Olive Hill plant closure. See NLRB v. Royal Plating & Polishing Co., 350 F.2d 191, 197 (3rd Cir. 1965).

The Union also claimed Gibraltar violated its duty to bargain by failing to supply information on the company's costs, profits and losses, customer orders and cancellations, and comparative data on the efficiency of the New York and Olive Hill plants. Union representative Janis requested this information by letter after the Olive Hill plant had been closed. Gibraltar refused to comply with this request, asserting that the information was irrelevant to discussions on the effects of the Olive Hill plant closure.

In NLRB v. Truitt Manufacturing Co., 351 U.S. 149, 152–53, 76 S.Ct. 753, 755, 100 L.Ed. 1027 (1956), the Supreme Court stated:

> Good faith bargaining necessarily requires that claims made by either bargainer should be honest claims. This is true about an asserted inability to pay an increase in wages. If such an argument is important enough to present in the give and take of bargaining, it is important enough to require some sort of proof of its accuracy.

However, the Court did not establish a per se rule:

> We do not hold, however, that in every case in which economic inability is raised as an argument against increased wages it automatically follows that the employees are entitled to substantiating evidence. The inquiry must always be whether or not under the circumstances of the particular case the statutory obligation to bargain in good faith has been met.

Id., at 153–54, 76 S.Ct. at 756. Only recently the Supreme Court reaffirmed its decision in Truitt that the duty to supply information turns upon the circumstances of each particular case. Detroit Edison Co. v. NLRB, 440 U.S. 301, 314, 99 S.Ct. 1123, 1130, 59 L.Ed.2d 333 (1979). Thus, although the duty to supply information inheres in the obligation to bargain in good faith, this duty is not unyielding or invariable.

In General Electric Co. v. NLRB, 466 F.2d 1177, 1182 (6th Cir. 1972), our court held:

> [I]f the requested data is relevant and, therefore reasonably necessary to a union's role as bargaining agent in the administration of a collective bargaining agreement, it is an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act for an employer to refuse to furnish the requested data. (Emphasis supplied).

See also NLRB v. Rockwell-Standard Corp., 410 F.2d 953, 957 (6th Cir. 1969); NLRB v. J.P. Stevens & Co., Gulistan Div., 538 F.2d 1152, 1164 (5th Cir. 1976) (information that is relevant and requested must be supplied). And as our court indicated in NLRB v. Goodyear Aerospace Corp., 497 F.2d 747 (6th Cir. 1974), the duty to supply information can be measured by the scope of the obligation to negotiate which, in turn, may depend on the actual state of employer-union discussions at any particular point in time.

At no time during the two month period prior to the Olive Hill plant closure did the Union request information on Gibraltar's profitability. Only after the two parties reached impasse and Gibraltar lawfully ceased its Olive Hill operation did the Union request financial and wage information. Yet, at this point, the information requested was not relevant to discussions on the effects of the Olive Hill plant closure. Since Gibraltar was under no absolute obligation to negotiate with the Union on its decision to close the Olive Hill plant, First National Maintenance Corp., supra; Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 223, 85 S.Ct 398, 409, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964) (J. Stewart concurring); Levine v. C & W Mining Co., 610 F.2d 432, 438 (6th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Products, Inc., 439 F.2d 40, 42–43 (6th Cir. 1971), nor to continue actual contract negotiations once the Olive Hill operations were lawfully terminated, the requested information could not be compelled on these grounds. Cf. Goodyear Aerospace Corp., supra.

III.

A.

As for Case, based upon our review of the entire record, substantial evidence supports some but not all of the Board's unfair labor practice determinations.

We do not find substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that Gene Case, the president of the company, coercively interrogated his employees in violation of the NLRA. Mr. Case's inquiries into individual employee sentiment and opinion on the subject of unionization were sporadic, occurred in the general work area, and had no discernible effect on employee actions or attitudes. The ALJ inferred ill-will toward Upper South and individual employees from these isolated events. Such inferences are not supported by the record. Moreover, there was insufficient evidence that Mr. Case knowingly utilized plant supervisors to put pressure on individual employees.

On the other hand, there is substantial evidence for the Board's conclusion that Case had committed an unfair practice by interfering with the union representation election. Mr. Case requested Gibraltar's president, Mr. Foreman, to speak to Case employees about the election procedures. This, in itself, was not improper. Foreman visited the Case plant on three separate occasions to explain election procedures to the same group of employees. One speech occurred in September and another in November, approximately two weeks before the election. A third speech was given the day before the election. However, the evidence demonstrates that Foreman instructed the Case workforce on more than election procedures. It is clear that during these speeches Foreman painted a rather glum future for Case employees in the event of unionization. His comments were of a general nature and carried a veiled but strong threat of serious economic repercussions if Upper South won the election. As the ALJ noted, many of his comments were "based on unwarranted hypothetical assumptions." It must also be remembered that Mr. Foreman was well-known to Case employees as one of their company's principal customers. His statements as to the effect of the ILGWU's bargaining demands on Gibraltar's Olive Hill plant tended to characterize unionization as a threat to Case's business and, in turn, to its employees' livelihoods. Such a speech violates the rule established in Gissel:

> [A]n employer is free to communicate to his employees any of his general views about unionization or any of his specific views about a particular union, so long as the communications do not contain a "threat of reprisal of force or promise of benefit." He may even make a prediction as to the precise effects he believes unionization will have on his company. In such a case, however, the prediction must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey an employer's belief as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control

B.

As for Anita Wilburn, we have reviewed the record and find substantial evidence to support the Board's finding of a discriminatory discharge. As noted by the ALJ, Wilburn's work at the Case plant had been satisfactory; in fact, she had been working at Case for approximately six months without any complaint as to the quality of her performance. When Wilburn returned from a period of maternity leave, she became active in the Upper South unionization effort. Mr. Case and another supervisor asked Wilburn about her feelings toward the company and union. We do not find these questions to be unlawful in themselves. Yet, as noted by the ALJ, it was only after Wilburn continued to express her support for the union in the upcoming election (which included wearing a T-shirt which read “Dear Gene: If you bug me, the government will get thee”) that complaints about her work began to materialize. In fact, a few days after Wilburn refused to divulge who had printed the T-shirt she received her first warning. Within a month Wilburn had rapidly received a series of warnings, was suspended, and finally was discharged.

> When the record establishes a prima facie case that “the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him.” NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 34 [87 S.Ct 1792, 1797, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027] * * * (1967).

NLRB v. Armcor Industries, Inc., 535 F.2d 239, 243 (3rd Cir. 1976). See also NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666 (1st Cir. 1979). Considering all the circumstances surrounding the discharge, a prima facie case of discrimination was proved, and the ALJ properly determined that there was insufficient evidence of a legitimate motivation for the discharge.

C.

Finally, we must determine whether the Board's bargaining order is appropriate on the record before us. Case has asserted before the ALJ and on appeal that the authorization cards signed by Case employees were invalid since the Union procured these cards by misrepresenting their purpose. We conclude that substantial evidence supports the ALJ's rejection of this claim. In Gissel the Supreme Court stated:

> There is nothing inconsistent in handing an employee a card that says the signer authorizes the union to represent him and > then telling him that the card will probably be used first to get an election.

Gissel, supra, 395 U.S. at 606–07, 89 S.Ct. at 1936. Thus there is support for the Board's conclusion that the authorization cards were valid and indicated majority support for the union.

Nevertheless, as we stated in Donn Products, Inc., v. NLRB, 613 F.2d 162, 165 (6th Cir. 1980), “The Supreme Court [has] made it clear * * * that an election remains the preferred method of determining the choice by employees of a collective bargaining representative.” In Gissel, the Supreme Court specified two categories of unfair labor practices that could warrant the entry of a collective bargaining order: (1) “ ‘exceptional’ cases marked by ‘outrageous’ and ‘pervasive’ unfair labor practices,” and (2) “less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices which nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impeded the election processes.” Gissel, supra, 395 U.S. at 613.14, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. In our view, however, the conduct here comes within that “third category of minor or less extensive unfair labor practices, which because of their minimal impact on the election machinery, will not sustain a bargaining order.” Gissel, supra, 395 U.S. at 615, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. See also Donn Products, supra, 613 F.2d at 165.

The remarks made by Mr. Foreman to Case employes at the three separate meetings do not, on the record before us, rise to the level of an “exceptional case” involving “outrageous and pervasive” conduct.[2] In his decision, even the ALJ stated that standing alone, Foreman's pre-election speeches may not have violated Section 8(a)(1).

However, even if these speeches and the improper discharge tended to impede the election process and fall within the second category of unfair labor practices, such unfair practices must be considered “in terms of their past effect on election conditions and the likelihood of their recurrence in the future.” Gissel, supra, 395 U.S. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. We take this opportunity to repeat and to emphasize the Third Circuit's observation:

> In light of the general and highly desirable practice in industrial relations of selecting bargaining representatives through traditional election processes, a rule requiring the Board to set forth a reasoned analysis justifying a bargaining order under Gissel is salutary.

Armcor, supra, 535 F.2d at 244. Our court has consistently refused to enforce bargaining orders where the Board's decision was tantamount to " 'a litany, reciting conclusions by rote without factual explication.' " NLRB, v. East Side Shopper, Inc., 498 F.2d 1334, 1336 (6th Cir. 1974) (quoting NLRB v. American Cable Systems, Inc., 427 F.2d 446, 449 (5th Cir. 1970)). See also NLRB v. Essex Wire Corp., 496 F.2d 862, 863 (6th Cir. 1972). Particularly applicable to this case is our decision in Donn Products:

[2] Although we have upheld the Board's determination that Wilburn was illegally discharged, her discharge did not occur until after the election.

> The Board made no findings or detailed analysis as to the residual impact or continuing effect, or the likelihood of recurrence, of any of the unfair labor practices * * *. [C]ourts are not required to enforce bargaining orders based on conclusory statements unsupported by sufficient facts.

Donn Products, supra, 613 F.2d at 166.

The lack of analysis regarding the residual impact of the unfair labor practices is fatal to the bargaining order directed to Case, especially where we have found that the record does not support many of the Board's unfair labor practice determinations. In these circumstances, we believe the purposes of the NLRA and the stability of industrial relations will be served best not by a bargaining order, but by the union seeking another election if so desired. See Donn Products, supra. Our decision to uphold the unfair labor practice charges, based upon Mr. Foreman's pre-election remarks and Anita Wilburn's unlawful discharge, as well as the passage of time, should not only deter any possible efforts to subvert the election process, but should fully remove any taint from the prior violations.

Accordingly, the Board's findings regarding Gibraltar's violations of the NLRA are reversed and enforcement of the entire remedial order against Gibraltar is denied. The Board's findings regarding Case's violations of the NLRA are reversed in part and affirmed in part; those unfair labor practice findings pertinent to Wilburn's illegal discharge and Mr. Foreman's threatening pre-election speeches are affirmed and all other are reversed. The remedial order is partially enforced, to the extent that it requires reinstating Wilburn with appropriate retroactive benefits and relief to make her whole, and expunging her employment record of the warnings, suspension and discharge. The order enjoining Case from further unfair labor practices is enforced to prevent any interference with the employees' exercise of their Section 7 rights. All other aspects of the remedial order, including the bargaining order issued against Case, are denied enforcement.

NLRB v. Highway and Local Motor Freight Employees, Local Union No. 667

654 F.2d 254 (6th Cir.), July 20, 1981—248 NLRB 260

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WEICK, LIVELY and JONES, Circuit Judges

The National Labor Relations Board (Board) seeks enforcement of its order which requires Teamsters Local 667 to cease and desist from requiring part-time employees (casual employees) to pay a referral fee when the union does not offer any real referral services and which requires the Local to reimburse the part-time employees for any amounts paid as referral fees after August 22, 1978. The Board determined that the Local violated Sections 8(b)(2) and 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by charging these fees.

The union and the Memphis area trucking companies are parties to a collective bargaining agreement which provides for either an agency shop or a union shop which would require the casual employees to join the union. In Tennessee the casual employees do not need to join the union because Tennessee is a right-to-work state. Casual employees who do not join the union are not required to pay dues, initiation fees, or assessments. However, they cannot file grievances and do not get the same fringe benefits as full-time employees.

The collective bargaining agreement also provides that the union is the sole source for referrals when an employer needs employees, and states that the employer shall not hire employees unless they are referred by the union. In January 1978, the new president of the union decided to open a referral hall and enforce that portion of the bargaining agreement.

The union officials charged the nonmember casual employees one dollar a month less than union dues for the referral services although they had no idea what the referral hall would cost. The referral service had one clerical employee. She made up two sets of referral lists: one for the casual employees who worked for a specific employer (regular casual employees) and one for employees who would work for any employer on a part-time basis (miscellaneous casual employees). Each type of employee had to pay the referral fee each month to stay on the list. The union did not check to see if the employees were hired, nor did it keep records of the number of referrals. However, it did keep records of the employees who paid the referral fees and it circulated this list to the employers.

The employers did not call the hall for referrals, but contacted the employees directly. In December 1978, the lists of miscellaneous employees were sent directly to the employers by the union; the employers did not call the referral shall for referrals for miscellaneous employees.

On February 22, 1979, a casual employee filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board. The union discontinued its referral hall several weeks later.

The ALJ determined that the referral fees were excessive and unreasonable, but rejected the General Counsel's contention that the union did not actually operate a referral hall and not provide any referral service.

The General Counsel filed exceptions to the ALJ's decision before the Board. The Board concluded that the General Counsel's exceptions were persuasive and found that the union did not operate a bona fide referral hall. It ordered the union to refund all the referral fees it had collected from the casual employees and ordered it to cease and desist from its unfair labor practices.

In this appeal, the union contends that the pleadings before the Board never raised the issue of whether the referral service was bona fide, and that there was a failure of proof on this issue. We disagree. The union places undue emphasis on the ALJ's statement that: "The only issue in this case is whether or not the fee imposed was unreasonable in amount" and ignores the ALJ's formulation of the General Counsel's position that "no fee is reasonable because Respondent operated no referral hall and performed no service warranting any fee." In addition, at the beginning of the hearing the General Counsel explained that it was his position that there was not a bona fide referral service. The union was sufficiently on notice and the issue was fully litigated at the hearing.

The evidence is more than ample to support the Board's conclusion that there was not a bona fide referral service operated by the union. The union did not receive calls from employers for referrals, nor did it assist employees in being placed in part-time positions with employers. It merely collected the referral fees from the nonmember casual employees; the union's interest in these employees did not go beyond the referral fees they paid.

The order of the National Labor Relations Board is ordered ENFORCED.

Wyman-Gordon Company v. NLRB

654 F.2d 134 (1st Cir.), July 20, 1981—252 NLRB 1206

On petition to review Board Order

Before BOWNES and BREYER, Circuit Judges and WYZANSKI, Senior District Judge*

BREYER, Circuit Judge: Wyman-Gordon Company, the petitioner here, is a Massachusetts corporation headquartered in Worcester. Since 1976, the company has operated a facility in Danville, Illinois, devoted to the manufacture of crankshafts and other metal forgings. In June 1979, the approximately 140 hourly employees at the Danville plant elected to be represented by the International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America. That success did not come easily to the union; a previous organizational drive conducted in early 1978 had fallen short, and the outcome of the 1979 election was determined by the disposition of challenges to five ballots. In March and April 1979, while the second union campaign was gaining steam, the union filed charges against the company alleging various violations of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (3) (1970). After holding seven days of hearings, the ALJ concluded with respect to most of the General Counsel's allegations that the company was guilty as charged. Specifically, he found that the company (1) violated § 8(a)(3) both by discharging Daniel Wilson and by refusing to hire David Stark, in each instance because of the individual's union activities, and (2) violated § 8(a)(1) on thirteen separate occasions by coercively interrogating or threatening eight different employees, and one applicant for employment, with respect to their union involvement. The National Labor Relations Board summarily affirmed the ALJ's decision and order. The company now petitions for review and the Board cross-applies for enforcement.

I.

The Discharge of Daniel Wilson

We first treat the question of whether the company's discharge of Daniel Wilson violated § 8(a)(3) of the Act.[1] Our reading 138 of the record reveals the following: Wilson joined the company in February 1976 as a security guard. After transferring to the industrial relations office and then returning to his security post, in February 1978 he was accepted as an electrician trainee in the maintenance department. As part of the company's three-year maintenance training program, Wilson was required to complete a course in industrial electricity offered in the fall of 1978 by the Danville Area Community College. The course met for two hours and five minutes twice a week from August 21 through December 17. Wilson initially attended Professor Blackburn's section which met each Tuesday and Thursday at 9:00 a.m. Prompt attendance at this morning class proved inconvenient to Wilson, however, when in September he was transferred to the third shift at the plant. He therefore sought and received permission to attend, beginning on September 26, the afternoon session of the course, taught by Professor Rape on Mondays and Wednesdays at 1:00 p.m. As with all such trainees, the company not only paid Wilson's tuition and provided all necessary books and materials, but also compensated him at his regular hourly rate for all time—whether on-shift or offshift[2]—that he spent in the classroom. For on-shift classes, such compensation included an allowance of fifteen minutes each way for travel to and from the college.

Brock Blinn, a staff assistant in the industrial relations department, supervised all aspects of the training program including the college course work. By letter dated September 18, 1978, he advised the instructors of each of the four trainees studying at the college[3] that the trainees were being paid for their class time, that attendance should be recorded and that he would periodically check the attendance record; he had earlier informed the trainees that they were expected to attend. On January 2 and 3, 1979, Blinn sought to telephone the instructors in order to audit class attendance; the college was on semester break, however, and he was unable to reach them until January 15. On that day, after consulting his attendance book, Rape reported to him that Wilson had been absent from the afternoon class on nine occasions—October 23 and 25, November 1, 6, 8, 20, 27 and 29, and December 4—and that he had been unable to complete a practical wiring exam given near the end of the course.[4] Alerted to the possibility of employee dishonesty, Blinn expanded his investigation by requesting Russell Chaney, then the accounting supervisor at the Danville facility, to determine whether Wilson had been paid for the missed classes. After examining the payroll records, Chaney discovered, and reported to Blinn, that Wilson had received payment for all scheduled classes, at least for the period from September 15 through December.

[1] Section 8(a)(3) provides in pertinent part: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *" 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1970).

[2] In order to gain exposure to all facets of the company's operation, each trainee was required to change his work shift on a monthly basis. Wilson's schedule was as follows: August—day shift (7:00 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.); September—third shift (11:00 p.m. to 7:30 a.m.); October—day shift; November—second shift (3:00 p.m. to 11:30 p.m.); and December—third shift. His classes thus occurred on-shift in August and October, off-shift in September and December, and predominantly off-shift (with a twenty-minute overlap) in November.

[3] In addition to Wilson, three other maintenance department employees—Wes Wheeler, Harold Hinzman, Jr., and Ross Trimmell—were taking courses during the fall 1978 semester. Each of them was studying a different subject.

[4] Wilson also missed the class on November 22. Although Rape apparently made no mention of this absence in his January 15 conversation with Blinn, it was listed in the disciplinary notice which the company submitted to Wilson at the time of his discharge. Consequently, although the record fails to disclose when or from whom, it is evident that the company learned of this tenth absence prior to that date. At the hearing, Rape recalled the November 22 absence because Wilson had been scheduled to take the practical exam on that date. Having been absent on November 20 when the exam times were allocated, he was presumably unaware of this fact. The exam was given to different groups of students on each of four days: November 22, 27 and 29 and December 4. Wilson missed each of these classes and ended up taking (and failing to complete) the exam after class on review day, December 6.

On January 29, 1979, Blinn and Vernon Gehrke, the general supervisor of the maintenance department, met with Wilson and confronted him with a handwritten list of the absences earlier enumerated by Rape. In the face of conflicting testimony, the ALJ found that Wilson offered various excuses for the cited absences, "including that he was on vacation during part of the semester; that his son was ill; that he had reported late for class on two occasions; and that another class had been cancelled." [5] Wilson admitted missing four or five scheduled classes but protested that he had reported these absences to various company officials and should not have received payment for them. The ALJ also found that Wilson offered to make restitution "for any classes for which he had been paid"—an offer rejected by Blinn and Gehrke.[6]

Following this meeting, Gehrke inquired of Barry Kennedy, a maintenance planner at the plant, whether Wilson had ever reported being absent from class; as Gehrke recollected this conversation at the hearing, Kennedy replied that Wilson "might have told me [about] one or two." [7] Meanwhile, Blinn telephoned Rape and learned that at least one of Wilson's proffered excuses was inaccurate: Rape denied ever having cancelled or postponed a class.[8] Blinn also spoke with Chaney about the circumstances surrounding Wilson's receipt of a twenty-five dollar cash advance as payment for two missed classes. Chaney informed Blinn that, due to an administrative oversight, payment for the schooling of the four trainees for the week ending October 28 had been omitted from their paychecks. Jacque Marbury, the payroll control clerk, had no-

[5] In his testimony, Blinn recalled Wilson on January 29 explaining his absenteeism on the grounds that (1) he had been on vacation on October 23 and 25 and November 1; (2) his son had been hospitalized on November 6 and 8; (3) he had been late to class on November 27 and 29; and (4) one (unidentified) class had been cancelled on account of a Danville High School football game. Wilson, by contrast, testified that he explained at this meeting that he had missed only four classes: those on November 1, 6 and 8 because of his son's hospitalization, and that on December 4 because of a dental appointment. Gehrke's recollection of this part of the conversation, interestingly enough, largely paralleled that of Wilson, differing only in that he recalled an additional reference to a class cancellation; he made no mention in his testimony of a vacation in October or tardiness in November.

These conflicts in the underlying evidence reveal a regrettable ambiguity in the ALJ's findings on this issue. It appears from the face of his opinion that the ALJ credited Blinn's version of this conversation; his findings correspond most closely to Blinn's testimony, and his reference to the class cancellation suggests that he rejected Wilson's account at least in part. Yet, whether the ALJ's finding that Wilson claimed to have been on vacation "during part of the semester" refers to the October dates, and whether his finding that Wilson claimed to have "reported late for class on two occasions" refers to the end of November—all as Blinn testified—are important but unresolved questions. If Wilson in fact offered these excuses, they were untrue; as we describe below, Wilson was on vacation in early September rather than late October, and he was entirely absent from class on November 27 and 29. The company did introduce into evidence a handwritten sheet on which Blinn, purportedly in reflection of Wilson's comments at the January 29 meeting, had placed the words "vacation" and "late" next to the respective dates in October and November to which he testified. Notwithstanding this evidence, however, we are unable to interpret the ALJ's equivocal findings in this manner. That Gehrke failed to recollect any such comments by Wilson is obviously noteworthy. Moreover, the record reveals that, immediately prior to testifying about his statements at the January 29 meeting, Wilson was questioned about his actions during the college semester. In addition to reciting his four medically-related absences, he explained that (1) he had missed two classes in September while on vacation; (2) he had been late to at least one September class prior to transferring to the afternoon session; and (3) Rape had cancelled the November 22 class. Consequently, the possibility exists that, in his findings concerning the excuses offered by Wilson at the January 29 meeting, the ALJ did not credit Blinn's testimony concerning the references to a vacation and tardiness, but instead mistakenly incorporated Wilson's version—not of what was then said—but of what in fact earlier occurred.

[6] This last finding by the ALJ appears almost as a compromise between Blinn's and Gehrke's recollection—that Wislon had offered immediately and unconditionally repay the cited overpayments—and Wilson's testimony that he had offered only to repay any money that they could prove was owed. Implicit in the ALJ's finding is the suggestion, never explicitly stated, that Wilson on January 29 denied having been aware of his receipt of compensation for missed classes. Although Blinn testified that Wilson never voiced such a denial at this meeting, Wilson in his testimony suggested that he did, at least implicitly.

[7] At the hearing, Kennedy was questioned only about whether Wilson had in fact reported any absences to him, not about his reply to Gehrke on this question. In his testimony, he indicated that Wilson had informed him of one absence because of his son's hospitalization and had complained of difficulties in attending the morning class while working the third shift in September. Wilson, by contrast, testified that he had reported his absences on November 1, 6 and 8—all due to his son's illness—to Kennedy and his absence on December 4—due to his dental appointment—to Kennedy and two other managers. As discussed below., the ALJ credited Wilson on this issue.

[8] According to his testimony, Blinn at this time also checked, and found to be untrue, Wilson's alleged references to being on vacation in October and being late to class on November 27 and 29. If Wilson in fact voiced these excuses, but see note 5 supra, they were clearly inaccurate. The evidence was undisputed that Wilson's only vacation during this period occurred in the first week of September. And, Rape testified that Wilson was entirely absent on November 27 and 29. Perhaps more importantly, all students were expected to attend only one of the four classes—November 22, 27 and 29 and December 4—on which the practical exam was administered; had Wilson actually arrived late on two of these dates, he presumably would have been sent home.

tified them of the omission and, in accordance with company policy, had offered them the option of either receiving an immediate cash advance or awaiting an adjustment in their next paychecks. Wilson had opted for the former and, on November 3, had signed a receipt and received a twenty-five dollar cash advance as compensation for his attendance at the October 23 and 25 classes. Blinn, having learned from Rape that Wilson had been absent on these dates, inquired of Chaney whether Wilson had been aware of the reason for the advance. As Chaney explained at trial, he told Blinn that "there was no way [Wilson] could have received the money without knowing what it was for."[9] Based upon this information, Blinn recommended to Donovan that Wilson be discharged for theft. Donovan, a relative newcomer to the company, called the regionl director, James Adams, to inquire about the appropriateness of such a response. Adams indicated that it was the company's policy without exception to terminate employees for intentional misuse of company funds; he described several such instances in the past[10] and assured Donovan that termination was justified in Wilson's case.

On February 2, Donovan, Blinn and Gehrke reviewed the matter and decided to discharge Wilson for violation of the company rules proscribing "stealing in any form" and "conduct that violates common decency and honesty." Wilson was then called to the meeting. As the ALJ found, "[t]he charges against Wilson were reviewed and Wilson again offered to pay for any absences established by [the company] for which he had been paid." This proposal was again rejected and, in accordance with the company's policy, Wilson was temporarily suspended pending discharge. Following this meeting, Blinn requested and received written confirmation of Wilson's attendance record from Rape.[11] On February 141 6, after being presented with, and refusing to sign, an unsatisfactory performance notice listing ten absences from October 23 through December 4 for which he had been paid, Wilson was officially discharged.

In a dual motive case such as this one, the initial inquiry is whether the Board has made a prima facie showing that a "'significant' improper motivation" underlay the discharge decision. NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp, 598 F.2d 666, 671 (1st Cir. 1979); accord, NLRB v. Amber Delivery Services, Inc., 651 F.2d 57 at 68 (1st Cir. 1981); Statler Indus., Inc, v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 902, 905 (1st Cir. 1981). Although the ALJ did not explicitly make such a finding, we believe he did so implicitly and with the requisite record support. For one thing, Wilson was involved with the union and the company was aware of his involvement. See e.g., NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d 110, 118 (1st Cir. 1978). There was evidence that, from December 1978 through the date of discharge, Wilson was an active participant in the union's organizational effort—distributing literature, soliciting signatures on authorization cards and sporting a union button and sticker on his hard hat. There was also contrary evidence, suggesting that at least until the middle of January Wilson's union involvement was peripheral and covert. But this latter evidence was not credited by the ALJ, and we decline to disturb that determination. In any event, it was uncontroverted that Wilson had overtly demonstrated his sympathies, if not by the time Blinn initiated his investigation, than at least well before the date of discharge; this evidence was sufficient to call the company's motivation into question.

For another thing, there was enough evidence that Wilson's treatment was unusual to suggest that his union involvement figured prominently in the discharge decision. Wes Wheeler, another maintenance trainee studying at the college, was shown to have received payment for two missed classes.[12] Blinn learned of these absences from Wheeler's instructor between January 15 and February 15; upon determining that Wheeler had received payment for them, he notified Donovan and Gehrke. However, notwithstanding the company's professed policy of strictly and consistently punishing employee dishonesty, not only was Wheeler never disciplined for the two paid absences, but the matter was never brought to his attention. The disparate treatment of Wheeler and Wilson in response to seemingly identical offenses is obviously suggestive of improper motivation. Moreover, Wilson offered testimony, credited by the ALJ, that he had informed Kennedy of the four absences on November 1, 6 and 8 and December 4 and had also mentioned to Blinn and another supervisor that he had missed several classes in September. None of these individuals notified the accounting department of Wilson's absences (as Kennedy acknowledged he should have done) in order to permit the necessary payroll adjustments to be made. This laxity contrasts rather sharply with the rigidity of the company's subsequent action, thereby reinforcing the inference that these events provided a convenient pretext for discharging a union adherent.

[9] Blinn also learned during this time that Wilson had been paid for four additional absences in September prior to his transfer to Rape's class. However, because Wilson had mentioned to Blinn when requesting such transfer that he had "missed some classes," these absences were not considered in the decision to discharge him. Shortly before the hearing, Blinn learned in addition that Wilson had been paid for the two classes missed during his September vacation; these absences of course also played no role in the discharge decision.

[10] Adams cited as examples the theft of twenty dollars worth of a metal alloy and of a fifty-five gallon drum of oil; at trial, he expanded this list to include the theft of a "small" amount of money from a petty cash box and the falsification of a timecard. He also stated that, in each of these cases, the employee had admitted guilt.

[11] Rape's letter, dated February 5, read in part:

> [Wilson] began attending my class on the 27th of September and attended regularly until mid-term (dates 2, 4, 9, 11, 16, 18 of October). He then missed a complete week and from then on his attendance was poor. The dates he attended during the second half of the semester were October 30, Nov. 13 and 15 and Dec. 6. His poor attendance led to a very poor practicle [sic] examination and a poor grade for the course.

Wilson received a grade of "D" on the practical exam, a "B" on the final exam, and, along with four other students, a "C" as his final grade—the lowest mark given by Rape.

Since the Board made a prima facie case of antiunion motivation, the burden shifted to the company to establish "that it had a good reason, sufficient in itself, to produce the discharge." NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d at 671, quoted in Statler Indus., Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d at 905. As we have previously pointed out, this shift does not impose an overall burden upon the company to prove itself innocent of violating the statute. Rather, the company must come forward with evidence to point where no longer does a preponderance of the evidence establish a violation. NLRB v. Amber Delivery Service, Inc., supra, slip op. at 22. In this instance, the company met that burden. The simple facts are that Wilson missed sixteen out of thirty-six classes. He kept money paid for attendance. The company believed he missed at least ten. It believed he kept the money knowing it was for classes he had missed. Most of the absences were unreported and unexcused. The company had a strict policy of discharge for dishonesty. And, no other employee had anywhere near so poor a record as Wilson's.

The ALJ reached a different conclusion in part because he did not follow the Eastern Smelting analysis and in part because he focused on the wrong question. He defined the "crux" of the matter as whether Wilson "knowing[ly] accepted and retained" payments for his missed classes. The ALJ said no. He found that the inclusion of school pay in a trainee's paycheck was never specifically identified and that, because of confusion in the company's accounting practices, it was not easily detected. In addition, he concluded that Wilson was unaware of the actual purpose of the cash advance received on November 3, crediting Wilson's explanation that he had understood the cash advance to involve omitted "premium payments." Finally, he noted the absence of any formal mechanism for the reporting of class absences by trainees. His conclusion was that "while Wilson did accept as part of his pay, money for classes not attended, it was not an intentional attempt by him to steal from the Respondent." It followed, the ALJ indicated, that "given all the circumstances set out above, Respondent's overreaction to the matter, resulting in Wilson's termination, was motivated by antiunion considerations."

While we recognize the strong deference due an ALJ on matters of credibility, see, e. g., NLRB v. Pittsburgh S.S. Co., 337 U.S. 656, 69 S.Ct. 1283, 93 L.Ed. 1602 (1949), in this instance the record calls his finding into question. Cf. NLRB v. Payless Cashway Lumber Store, 508 F.2d 24, 27–28 (8th Cir. 1974) (rejecting credibility determinations of ALJ and Board). The record indicates that Wilson knew generally that he was being compensated for class attendance. Since he only reported four absences and denied the others, the ALJ's finding that he missed nine or ten implies his knowledge of payment for the others. And, Marbury, the payroll clerk, testified that she specifically explained to Wilson how he would be paid for two of the missed classes (although he denied that he understood this).

[12] Wheeler's instructor actually informed Blinn that six absences had occurred, but subsequent investigation showed that he had only received payment for two. On October 27, 1978, Wheeler had completed the company's training program and as a result had ceased receiving class payments. He had gained permission, however, to continue attending the course, without compensation, on his own time. Four of the six absences had occurred after this date.

We need not, however, disturb the ALJ's specific factual findings; even if he were correct in concluding that Wilson's receipt of the overpayments was in fact inadvertent, the issue is not Wilson's state of mind but rather that of the company. The "crux" of the matter is whether the company believed that he acted dishonestly and whether any such belief was sufficient to cause Wilson's discharge. See, e.g., NLRB v. South Shore Hosp., 571 F.2d 677, 684 (1st Cir. 1978) ("the question is the motive for the discharge, not the actual circumstances"); NLRB v. Prince Macaroni Manuf. Co., 329 F.2d 803, 809 (1st Cir. 1964); Raytheon Co. v. NLRB, 326 F.2d 471, 475 (1st Cir. 1964). Upon review of the record, we conclude that any finding that the company did believe, on February 6, 1979, that Wilson acted dishonestly would be unsupported by substantial evidence. Several factors deserve emphasis. First, although the ALJ credited Wilson's testimony that he had been unaware of the reason for the cash advance, the understanding of Donovan, Blinn and Gehrke on this issue at the time of discharge derived solely, so far as the record indicates, from Chaney's comment to Blinn that "there was no way [Wilson] could have received the money without knowing what it was for." There was no evidence to suggest that this statement should have been deemed unworthy of belief. Second, Blinn had ascertained by the end of January that at least one [13] of Wilson's proffered excuses was inaccurate. Finally, although again the ALJ's findings differ with respect to what actually occurred, Kennedy informed the three company officials that Wilson had reported only one of the ten cited absences. Taken together, these factors certainly warranted a belief that Wilson knowingly accepted the overpayments. Given the absence of countervailing evidence, we conclude that Donovan, Blinn and Gehrke did in fact believe that Wilson acted dishonestly.

Of course, there is still the matter of Wheeler who also missed classes but kept his job. In light of the company's failure to discipline or even confront Wheeler concerning his two paid absences, the further possibility exists that the company, once convinced of Wilson's dishonesty, decided to impose an unusually severe sanction in retaliation for his union activities. Two factors convince us otherwise. First, termination is an appropriate and common response to employee dishonesty—both as a general matter of company policy here. That Wilson was discharged, therefore, is not by itself peculiar. Second, the circumstances surrounding Wheeler's case were sufficiently distinct to render termination inappropriate—and thereby distinguish Wilson's situation. The Company had no evidence, comparable to that of the cash advance and the false explanation in Wilson's case, to suggest that Wheeler knowingly accepted the overpayments. The matter was investigated to the point of determining that he had been paid for only two of the six absences reported by his instructor—nowhere near the ten to sixteen paid absences recorded by Wilson. That the company apparently accorded Wheeler the benefit of the doubt and dropped the matter at that point was not unreasonable; a similar approach was taken with respect to four of Wilson's September absences. Thus, we find the different treatment of Wheeler explainable—not by the fact that he was "less of a thief," as the ALJ suggested—but by the dearth of evidence that he was a thief at all. For these reasons, we conclude that the company successfully rebutted the Board's prima facie showing.

The Refusal to Hire David Stark

The allegation concerning the refusal to hire David Stark can be treated in less detail. We find substantial evidence for the Board's finding of a § 8(a)(3) violation. In response to a newspaper advertisement for millwrights (defined at the hearing as "sophisticated" mechanics), David Stark submitted an application to Wyman-Gordon's maintenance department in October 1978. At the time he was a journeyman millwright with nine years experience at the neighboring Lauhoff Grain Company. Stark had become actively involved with the local industrial workers union during his years at Lauhoff, having previously held the post of shop steward and executive board member and serving, at the time of his application, as vice-president. The department's hiring process during this period typically involved several stages: (1) a screening interview by an administrative assistant, who prepared a "rating and recommendations" form describing pertinent background data and the interviewer's "gut" evaluation; (2) a review of the materials by Gehrke, the general supervisor, who weeded out those applicants in whom he lacked interest; (3) an additional interview; and (4) a joint decision by Gehrke and Donovan. Stark was given a preliminary interview by Judith Peevler on October 27. Several weeks later he received a standard rejection letter—notwithstanding that an individual with his qualifications, as Gehrke subsequently testified, was "exactly what we [were] looking for."

[13] And possibly more. See notes 5 & 8 supra.

That the company was aware of Stark's union participation is clear. Over Peevler's denial, the ALJ credited Stark's testimony that during his interview he fully described his union activities at Lauhoff in response 144 to her questioning on his subject. This credibility determination, which as noted below was buttressed by other evidence, was well within the "bounds of reason" and thus is controlling. NLRB v. Savin Business Machines Corp., 649 F.2d 89 at 92–93 (1st Cir. 1981). In any event, Donovan himself, by admitting that he knew during this period that the Lauhoff millwrights were organized, acknowledged an awareness—if not of Stark's union leadership—then at least of his union membership. This was sufficient to warrant further inquiry.

Against this backdrop, the company's concessions that Stark was amply qualified for the position, and that applications from comparably experienced individuals were "seldom" received, might alone have satisfied the Board's burden. But the General Counsel introduced, and the ALJ apparently credited, additional evidence of discriminatory motivation. Peevler, according to Stark, also remarked during the interview that the company was a "nonunion shop" and inquired how he felt about working under such conditions. Six current maintenance department employees, who were hired during 1977 and 1978 by Gehrke's predecessor, described similar comments being voiced to them at that time by any of five different interviewers. These accounts were in turn corroborated by Wilson, who worked in the personnel office from August 1976 through the fall of 1977. He stated that interviewers had been instructed to ascertain an applicant's union involvement, determine his attitude toward unions and, in closing the interview, to gauge his reaction to the statement: "We here at Wyman-Gordon choose to operate without the benefit of a union." Significantly, Peevler also worked in personnel during this period and, according to Wilson, consistently engaged in this course of questioning. Finally, in her written evaluation of Stark, Peevler wrote that he "[s]eems to lean toward believing in 3d party intervention"; on the basis of widespread evidence including Peevler's own admission, the ALJ found that the term "third party intervention" was a common reference to unions.[14]

The company's attempt to counterbalance the weight of this evidence was properly found wanting.[15] At the outset, it argued that Stark had applied solely for a supervisory position and thus was outside the statutory safeguards. It is undisputed that Stark expressed interest in such a post. But that such was not his exclusive concern is also evident: his overture to the company derived from an advertisement for millwright positions; he listed "maintenance supervisor or millwright" on his application as the positions desired; and he testified to this effect. The company advanced two additional arguments by way of preliminaries. First, it contended that the timing of any such discrimination was illogical; the union had just lost an election several months earlier and any new campaign was necessarily months away. Second, it pointed to the significant percentage of prior union adherents, both in the department workforce as a whole and in the crop of individuals hired between October 1978 and April 1979. But these arguments prove little. Having just prevailed in a close election, the company might well have been anxious to preserve this balance between pro- and anti-union employees; the margin and outcome—of the second election certainly suggest that such a concern would have been warranted. That the workforce at that time contained numerous union supporters would have amplified this concern.

[14] Although acknowledging her awareness of this meaning, Peevler explained that she had employed the term as a reference to Stark's retention of an attorney in connection with a worker's compensation claim at Lauhoff.

[15] In this context also, the ALJ (and the Board on review) failed to apply the Eastern Smelting analysis. But in contrast to his treatment of the Wilson charge, the omission here was one more of form than of sub-

And the significance of the subsequent hiring of several former union members is undercut by the ALJ's finding that union sympathies were carefully screened at the interview stage.

With respect to the actual decision on Stark's application, the company made no attempt to justify or explain it but instead asserted that none was made. It speculated that Gehrke overlooked his application because it had mistakenly been attached to that of Ron Parlier, who was interviewed by Peevler on the same day as Stark. In screening applications, Gehrke's practice at that time was not to place individual notations on each, but simply to segregate them into two piles marked "interest" and "no interest." Under the company's theory, Gehrke, after a partial review, placed Parlier's application (and thus Stark's) into the latter pile and returned the entire stack of rejections to personnel for individual processing; the secretary, upon discovering Stark's application in this pile, assumed it had been rejected and acted accordingly. Although not entirely implausible,[16] this theory was not so compelling as to render the ALJ's contrary findings unreasonable—particularly in light of the credited evidence concerning the interviewers' inquiries into union sympathies. For these reasons, we enforce this aspect of the Board's order.

III.

The § 8(a)(1) Allegations

Finally, the ALJ determined that on thirteen separate occasions the company coercively interrogated or threatened various employees regarding their union involvement in violation of § 8(a)(1) of the Act.[17] All of the challenged statements were voiced between late January 1979, by which time the union's second campaign had formally commenced, and the June election. The inquiry under § 8(a)(1) is an objective one which examines—not whether the employer intended, or the employee perceived, any coercive effect—but whether "the employer's actions would tend to coerce a reasonable employee." R. Gorman, Labor Law 132 (1976), quoted in Soule Glass & Glazing Co. v. NLRB, 652 F.2d 1055 at 1077 (1st Cir. 1981). A finding of coerciveness, "based as it must be on an assessment of the entire factual context * * *, is one in which we typically defer to agency judgment." NLRB v. Amber Delivery Service, Inc., supra, at 67; accord, NLRB v. Otis Hosp., 545 F.2d 252, 256 (1st Cir. 1976); Corriveau & Routhier Cement Block, Inc. v. NLRB, 410 F.2d 347, 349 (1st Cir 1969). With one exception, we conclude that the ALJ's findings are supported by substantial evidence.

Seven of the challenged statements were similar in content, involving one of the following variations: that if the employees opted for unionization, (1) bargaining would "begin at zero" and work up; (2) they would start with a "blank piece of paper" with "no pay and no benefits"; or (3) all present benefits would be negotiable and they would stand to lose everything. Whether or not such comments can reasonably be viewed as veiled threats of economic reprisal and withdrawal of existing benefits depends on the entire factual context. The Board itself has so recognized in weighing the analogous statement that bargaining would "begin from scratch." Compare Wagner Indus. Prods. Co., 170 N.L.R.B. 1413 (1968) (comment suggests only that unionization would not automatically result in increased benefits), with Astronautics Corp. of America, 164 N.L.R.B. 623 (1967) (comment threatens loss of existing benefits). We see no basis in the record for upsetting the ALJ's findings that these remarks carried a coercive overtone. See, e. g., NLRB v. Saunders Leasing Systems, Inc., 497 F.2d 453, 456–58 (8th Cir. 1974); NLRB v. Aerovox Corp., 435 F.2d 1208, 1211–12 (4th Cir. 1970); Surprenant Manuf. Co. v. NLRB, 341 F.2d 756, 761 (6th Cir. 1965).

stance. Once Stark's account of his interview was credited over that of Peevler, the Board's prima facie case was easily established; indeed, the company on appeal has focused almost exclusively on issues pertinent to its rebuttal. The ALJ's discussion of these issues corresponds closely enough to that fact of the Eastern Smelting analysis to permit our review (and enforcement) of his decision.

[16] At the same time, Parlier's application materials indicate that he received a second interview on October 30, three days after he and Stark were screened by Peevler. Although never satisfactorily explained at the hearing this fact would appear to undercut the supposition that Gehrke rejected him at the preliminary stage.

[17] Section 8(a)(1) provides: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1970). Section 7 provides in pertinent part: "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection * * *." Id. § 157.

Three of the remaining incidents constituted clearcut violations. In the first, an employee was heatedly informed by his supervisors that the workers were "liable to lose pay and benefits" with the advent of a union; that the bargaining process would take "a long time," for the length of which they would receive neither their annual raise nor quarterly cost-of-living allowance; that during a strike the employees could be replaced and not recalled for ten years; and that a strike could be called or dues raised without their "having anything to say about it." Second, two employees together approached their respective supervisors and inquired whether they would be able to change the dates of their vacations if the upcoming election were held during that time. One of the supervisors responded: "Tell us how you are going to vote and we'll let you know about your vacations." The third incident in this group was Peevler's interrogation of Stark during his interview.[18]

Two other statements constituted closer, but nonetheless cognizable, § 8(a)(1) violations. First, in response to an employee's complaint about the lack of flexibility in scheduling vacations, his supervisor remarked that the timing of vacations was company policy about which the union "won't be able to do anything." Although this was a fleeting reference, "even a single oblique remark can be considered unduly coercive in appropriate circumstances." NLRB v. Amber Delivery Service, Inc., supra, slip op. at 19. In the circumstances, we believe the ALJ was warranted in discerning a coercive implication that the choice of union representation would be futile. See, e. g., NLRB v. Kaiser Agric. Chemicals, 473 F.2d 374, 380 (5th Cir. 1973). The ALJ also found unlawful a single question posed to an employee by his supervisor as to his desire for union representation. The inquiry occurred during, but was unrelated to, a discussion in the supervisor's office regarding the employee's alleged "attitude problem." We find no error.

We do differ, however, with the ALJ's finding of a violation with respect to the final § 8(a)(1) allegation. The full account of this incident consists of the following testimony by the alleged victim: "Ken Lucas asked me how the union was coming along. I told him fine, I was working on it. He stated that I guess this is a free country and turned around and walked away." We think the ALJ should have walked away from this also.

IV.

The Remedial Order

The company's remaining contention is that the final catch-all paragraph of the Board's order—requiring it to cease and desist from "[i]n any other manner interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights under Section 7 of the Act"—is overly broad. Such a broad-based prohibition on future violations can be appropriate in the face of "persistent attempts to interfere with legislatively protected rights by varying methods." NLRB v. Union Nacional de Trabajadores, 540 F.2d 1, 11 (1st Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1039, 97 S.Ct. 736, 50 L.Ed.2d 750 (1977); accord, e.g., Morgan Precision Parts v. NLRB, 444 F.2d 1210, 1215 (5th Cir. 1971). We agree, however, that it is unwarranted on the present record. Although the company's unlawful practices were not isolated or fleeting occurrences, neither were they "particularly virulent" in nature.

2T. Kheel, Labor Law § 7.04[2], at 7-144 to -145 (1980). And, the claim upon which the General Counsel has concentrated his attention—Wilson's dismissal—has proven unsubstantiated. In addition, the company's various antiunion practices were directed principally at preventing the union from gaining a foothold. Now that the union has prevailed in this respect, it is reasonable to expect a diminution—if not of the company's antiunion animus—then at least of its unlawful actions. Consequently, while we enforce the more specific provisions of the cease and desist order, we conclude that the catch-all paragraph should be striken. See generally NLRB v. Savin Business Machines Corp., supra, 649 F.2d at 93; NLRB v. Beth Israel Hosp., 554 F.2d 477, 483 (1st Cir. 1977), aff'd, 437 U.S. 483, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978); NLRB v. Prince Macaroni Manuf. Co, 329 F.2d at 812.

Patsey Bee, Inc. v. NLRB

654 F.2d 515 (8th Cir.), July 22, 1981—249 NLRB 976

On petition to review Board Order

Before ROSS, HENLEY and MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judges

HENLEY, Circuit Judge: Patsy Bee, Inc. (the Company) petitions for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board directing Patsy Bee to bargain with the Northwestern District Council of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, AFL-CIO (the Union). The NLRB cross-appeals seeking enforcement of its order. We conclude that there is not substantial evidence in the record to support the order to bargain and deny its enforcement.

This cause arises from an attempt by the Union to organize the employees at the Company's plant. The Union filed a petition with the NLRB on February 23, 1979 seeking a representation election. The election was held on March 27, 1979 with 33 ballots cast for the Union and 38 ballots cast against the Union. On April 2, 1979 the Union filed objections to Company conduct allegedly affecting the outcome of the election.

The Administrative Law Judge found that certain Company conduct violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). In particular, (1) Company supervisors questioned employees about their involvement in Union activity; (2) supervisors made statements implying loss of employement or denial of benefits for particpation in Union organizing efforts; (3) surveillance or organizing activities was conducted; and (4) a broad rule against distribution of Union literature was implemented. The ALJ also found that certain statements by Company president Bachofer were protected speech under § 8(c) of the Act and did not violate § 8(a)(1).

To remedy the unfair labor practices, the ALJ recommended that Patsy Bee be required to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action. He concluded, however, that a bargaining order was not warranted in the circumstances, since the evidence had not shown that a second secret ballot could not fairly be held.

The Board adopted in part the ALJ's findings, but held that (1) the statements by president Bachofer were not protected speech and (2) Patsy Bee must be ordered to bargain with the Union. On appeal, Patsy Bee challenges only these two aspects of the Board's order.

The statements of president Bachofer in question here may be summarized briefly:

(1) January 3, 1979: Bachofer told employee Donna Flood that Patsy Bee customers would withdraw their contracts if Patsy Bee workers unionized;

(2) January 9, 1979: Bachofer told employee Pam Burgress that Jantzen and Artex, the two principal purchasers of Patsy Bee textiles, would pull their contracts if the plant went union;

(3) February 21, 1979: Bachofer told employee Jeany Smith that Artex would "definitely pull out" if the plant were unionized;

(4) March 1, 1979: Bachofer told employee Debbie Stotts that given the risk of losing the Jantzen contract the Company could not afford to be unionized.

The ALJ found the Bachofer statements were protected under § 8(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(c). That section provides:

> The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice * * * if such expression contains no treat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

The Supreme Court outlined the extent of the protection afforded to employers by § 8(c) in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). There the Court said:

> an employer is free to communicate to his employees any of his general views about unionism or any of his specific views about a particular union, so long as the communications do not contain a "threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." He may even make a prediction as to the precise effects he believes unionization will have on his company. In such a case, however, the prediction must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective fact to convey on the basis of objective fact to convey an employer's belief as to demonstrably probable consequences beyond his control or to convey a management decision already arrived at to close the plant in case of unionization. If there is any implication that an employer may or may not take action solely on his own initiative for reasons unrelated to economic necessities and known only to him, the statement is no longer a reasonable prediction based on available facts but a threat of retaliation based on misrepresentation and coercion, and as such without the protection to the First Amendment.

Id. at 618, 89 S.Ct. at 1942 (citations omitted).

This court has noted that under the Gissel analysis the employer's constitutionally protected right of free speech may be circumscribed when in addressing employees he opposes unionization. R.J. Lallier Trucking v. NLRB, 558 F.2d 1322, 1327 (8th Cir. 1977). He must be particularly careful if he "goes further and proposes to predict the adverse effects that unionization may have on his business, his employees, and their incomes or work opportunities." Id.; accord NLRB v. Intertherm, Inc., 596 F.2d 267, 277 (8th Cir. 1979).

The challenged statement of an employer must, of course, be evaluated in context, and the employer's right of free expression must be weighed against the equal right of employees to associate freely for collective bargaining purposes. Gissel, 395 U.S. at 617, 89 S.Ct. at 1941–42; R.J. Lallier Trucking, 558 F.2d at 1327; NLRB v. Crystal Tire Co., 410 F.2d 916, 918 (8th Cir. 1969). This balancing must take into account "the economic dependence of the employees on their employers, and the necessary tendency of the former because of that relationship, to pick up intended implications of the latter that might be more readily dismissed by a more disinterested ear." Gissel, 395 U.S. at 617, 89 S.Ct. at 1942.

In the present case, the inquiry is whether Bachofer's statements that unionization would result in the closing of the plant were predictions based on objective fact or threats of personal action he would take if a union was formed.

Respondent argues that Bachofer offered no objective facts supporting his statements about the likely consequences of unionization. He did not explain the basis for his statements that Jantzen and Artex would pull out or offer other evidence of the financial status of Patsy Bee. The Board contends that, because Bachofer's statements were unverified, and in light of the Company's other antiunion actions, the intended and understood import of Bachofer's statements was not an objective prediction but a threat of retaliation if the Union was successful.

Petitioner contends that Bachofer's statements were manifestly reasonable and based on the objective fact that Jantzen and Artex were likely to refuse to do business with Patsy Bee if its employees unionized. Petitioner says that Bachofer made it clear that he was not antiunion, but that based on his twenty-five years in the business, the consequences of unionization he had observed at other plants, the attitude of Jantzen and Artex toward unionized companies, and Patsy Bee's shaky financial status he believed unionization would result in the closing of the Patsy Bee plant.

Viewing the record as a whole, we find the inferences drawn by the Board are not supported by the evidence. We find unpersuasive the contention that Bachofer's predictions were based upon "subjective" considerations and as such were impermissible. The evidence, based upon the testimony credited by ther ALJ, showed that Bachofer's predictions reflected probable consequences of unionization beyond his personal control.

Bachofer stated that he was not personally antiunion but that he believed Jantzen and Artex would refuse to do business with Patsy Bee if its employees unionized. This belief was based on the established policies of Jantzen and Artex against contracting with union companies.[1] He further said that Patsy Bee's financial status was precasrious and thus the loss of the Jantzen and Artex contracts would have serious consequences. He discussed the Company's financial health and offered to show interested employees the Company's financial records. Bachofer also noted similar situations he had observed at other plants, including one that had been operated by his father.

[1] A Jantzen representative who visited the Patsy Bee plant during the Union organizing campaign reaffirmed his company's policy by noting to Bachofer that the Jantzen organization was "one hundred per cent nonunion."

Bachofer made no threats. His statements were not interspersed with antiunion comments. Bachofer suggesterd no retaliation against employees but, as the ALJ noted, postualated only "economic consequences reasonably forseeable as a result of predictable responses of key customers." On the whole, the statements reflects his belief, based upon objective facts, that unionization could have an adverse economic impact on Patsy Bee. In these circumstances, we find the challenged statements were protected speech under § 8(c) of the Act and did not violate § 8(a)(1).

The Company also urges that the Board erred in concluding that a bargaining order should issue. In light of our holding above that Bachofer's statements were permissible, and in view of the absence of substantial evidence that traditional remedies would be inadequate, we decline to enforce the order to bargain.

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 613–15, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1939–40, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Supreme Court acknowledged two situations in which the Board could issue a bargaining order: (1) where "outrageous" and "pervasive" unfair labor practices preclude a fair and reliable election; and (2) where the union once enjoyed majority status and the unfair labor practices, although less pervasive, "still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes."

In both types of cases the Board is required to consider "the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies * * * ." Id. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. Although the Board has initial discretion in framing an appropriate remedy, we have noted that:

> Gissel does not mean that the Board may require a bargaining order in every unfair practice case or that a court of appeals may not review an order where abuse of discretion is alleged. Where there exists little or no opportunity for the unfair practice charge to have a pervasive adverse influence upon the employees' sentiment in an election the Board should still revert to the traditional means of democratic ballot.

NLRB v. Regal Aluminum, Inc., 436 F.2d 525, 529 (8th Cir. 1971). Accord NLRB v. Hart Beverage Co., 445 F.2d 415, 420–21 (8th Cir. 1971); Arbie Mineral Feed Co. v. NLRB, 438 F.2d 940, 944 (8th Cir. 1971).

In this case the evidence establishes that the unfair labor practices produced little or no impact upon the employees' allegiance to the Union. NLRB v. Hart Beverage Co., 445 F.2d 415, 420–21 (8th Cir. 1971); Arbie Mineral Feed Co. v. NLRB, 438 F.2d 940, 943–45 (8th Cir 1971). Most acts found to be unfair labor practices occurred at the outset of the Union organizing campaign. Only three incidents occurred after the Union achieved a card majority.[2] In two of those instances the Board found that comments by Company official suggested antiunion sentiment. In the third, a supervisor threatened an employee with a "permanent layoff." In the context of the three month organizing campaign, the ALJ found that these three isolated incidents had no significant effect on Union strength.

In issuing the bargaining order, the Board relied primarily on its conclusion that president Bachofer's statements were unprotected and constituted "direct threats." No further explanation was offered other than a conclusory statement that "the odds for a free choice in a rerun election are minimal." Cf. Red Oaks Nursing Home, Inc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503, 508–12 (7th Cir. 1980) (denying enforcement of a bargaining order were the Board failed to explain its choice of remedy).

Having found Bachofer's statement protected, and in the absence of substantial evidence that the unfair labor practices would impede a fair election, we hold that the Board abused its discretion by issuing a bargaining order. Enforcement is denied and the case remaned to the Board for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

McMILLIAN, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I respectfully dissent. I would enforce the order of the Board. First, in my view, the Board's characterization of the company president's remarks as threats is supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole. I do not doubt that the company president sincerely believed that one or two of the company's major customers would cancel their contracts if the union organizational campaign was successful. However, an employer's sincere belief is not enough. "Conveyance of the employer's belief, even though sincere, that unionization will or may result in the closing of the plant is not a statement of fact unless, which is most improbable, the eventuality of closing is capable of proof." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618–19, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). Here, the company provided no evidence that unionization would in fact cause the loss of two major customers or that the loss of these customers inevitably would cause the plant to close.

[2] We assume for purposes of this discussion that the Union did obtain the valid signatures of a majority of Patsy Bee employees.

Second, I share in part the majority's concern that the Board is often too conclusory in ordering collective bargaining. See NLRB v. Permanent Label Corp., 106 L.R.R.M. 2211 (3d Cir. 1981); Red Oaks Nursing Home, Inc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503 (7th Cir. 1980). But see NLRB v. K & K Gourmet Meats, Inc., 640 F.2d 460, 470–74 ((3d Cir. 1981) (Gibbons, J., dissenting); NLRB v. Permanent Label Corp., supra, ——— F.2d ———, 106 L.R.R.M. at 2221–22 (Seitz, C. J., dissenting); Hedstrom Co. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 1120, 1128–33 (5th Cir. 1980). In my view, however, the Board has adequately furnished the court with an articulation of its reasons for imposing a bargaining order in the present case. After reviewing the company's unfair labor practices, the Board concluded that a bargaining order was warranted because of the company's systematic efforts to thwart the right of its employees to organize, the company's intentional interference with the representational election, and the adverse and continuing effect of the company president's threats to close the plant.[1] Because there was a showing that the union at one point enjoyed majority support, I conclude the Board reasonably found the present case was marked by serious unfair labor practices which, although perhaps not "outrageous" and "pervasive," "nonetheless still have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election process," NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., supra, 398 U.S. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940, and therefore appropriately issued the bargaining order.

I would enforce the order of the Board.

Bokum Resources Corporation v. NLRB

655 F.2d 1021 (10th Cir.), July 29, 1981—245 NLRB 681

On petition to review and set aside Board Order

McWilliams, Circuit Judge: Bokum Resources Corp. filed a petition to review, and set aside, a decision and order of the National Labor Relations Board which found that Bokum committed unfair labor practices in violation of section 8(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a) (1976).[1] Specifically, the NLRB found that Bokum refused to bargain with the International Union of Operating Engineers, Local 953, AFL–CIO, and the Laborers International Union of North America, Local 16, AFL–CIO, which had been certified by the Board as the employees' bargaining representatives following a representation election. By cross-application the Board seeks enforcement of its order.

Bokum is a mining company incorporated in Delaware and engaged in uranuim mining in New Mexico. The bargaining unit here involved is composed of all construction and shaft sinking employees working at Bokum's mine at Marquez, New Mexico, excluding office clerical employees, guards, watchmen and supervisors.

In a consent election in which thirty-four employees were eligible to vote, seventeen voted for the Union and ten voted against the Union. Four votes were challenged, and three eligible employees did not vote. Bokum filed timely objections, claiming that there was Union misconduct which adversely affected the election. Thereafter, the Regional Director of the NLRB conducted an administrative investigation of Bokum's objections in which the parties were allowed to submit evidence. The Regional Director then issued his report, in which he held that Bokum's objections were without merit, and he recommended that the Union be certified. Bokum filed timely objections to the Regional Director's report. On review, the Board adopted the Director's report and certified the Union.

*Honorable Luther L. Bohanon, United States District Judge of the Northern District of Oklahoma, sitting by designation.

[1] Bokum is charged with violating 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976), which provides that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise" of the rights granted by 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). Bokum also is charged with violating 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) (1976), which provides that it is an unfair labor practice "to refuse to bargain collectively" with the employees' representative.

Thereafter, Bokum refused to bargain with the Union, which then filed charges of unfair labor practices. Based on the Union's charges, the Regional Director issued a complaint. By answer, Bokum admitted that it had refused to bargain with the Union, and again denied the validity of the Board's certification of the Union. It was in this setting that the General Counsel for the NLRB filed motions to transfer the case to the Board and for summary judgment. The Board ordered the proceeding transferred, and then ordered Bokum to show cause why summary judgment should not be entered. Bokum, by response, reiterated its previously stated objections to the representation election and requested an evidentiary hearing.

The Board granted summary judgment, noting that all of the issues raised by Bokum in the unfair labor practices proceeding had been raised, or could have been raised, in the underlying representation proceeding. The NLRB further found that Bokum, in response to the motion for summary judgment, made no claim that it had newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence, nor did it allege any special circumstances which required a hearing into the fairness of the representation election. Accordingly, Bokum was ordered by the Board to bargain with the Union. The Board's decision and order appear at 245 N.L.R.B. 84 (1979). It is this order which Bokum seeks to have set aside, and which the Board by cross-application asks to have enforced.

In our view, Bokum, under the circumstances, was not entitled to an identiary hearing on its claim of election irregularities, and the unfair labor practice proceeding was ripe for summary judgment. In NLRB v. Moran Oil Producing & Drilling Corp., 432 F.2d 746 (10th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 941, 91 S.Ct. 941, 28 L.Ed.2d 221 (1976), appears the following pertinent comment:

> The Company argues that summary disposition was improper because, in the unfair labor practice proceedings, it was entitled to an evidentiary hearing on the correctness of the Director's representation determinations. The same contention has been presented to us in the cases of Meyer Dairy, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board, 10 Cir., 429 F.2d 697, National Labor Relations Board v. Gold Spot Dairy, Inc., 10 Cir., 432 F.2d 125, and National Labor Relations Board v. Jackson Farmers, Inc., 10 Cir., 432 F.2d 1042 [cert. denied, 401 U.S. 955, 91 S.Ct. 974, 28 L.Ed.2d 238 (1971)]. We have held that under § 3(b) the Board can delegate its unit determination functions to the regional director; that the decisions of the latter, if not set aside by the Board, are entitled to the same weight as Board determination; and that the limited review provided by 29 CFR § 102.67 applied > to Board review of any delegated action of a regional director. The Company does not claim that it has any newly discovered or previously unavailable evidence or that it was foreclosed from presenting any substantial and material evidence at the representation proceedings. Under the authorities cited, the matter was ripe for determination on the motion for summary judgment. 432 F.2d at 748.

See also NLRB v. Ethan Allen, Inc., 596 F.2d 936 (10th Cir. 1979), and NLRB v. Whitney Museum of American Art, 636 F.2d 19 (2d Cir. 1980).

Bokum asserts that an election notice which was posted at the Marquez mining operation was faulty. While the notice to which Bojum objects did not contain any incorrect information, it failed to state the polling times and place, and the unions involved. The Company contends that the posting of this incomplete notice caused the entire purpose of the election to be frustrated. It is important to note, however, that a notice that did contain all the correct information was posted about twelve hours prior to the election. The notice at issue is a printed form which is distributed by the NLRB. In addition to details about the election, the form includes general information about employees' voting rights, including a statement of conduct which is not permitted during a representation campaign.

Further, Bokum made no showing that the election notice about which it complains was posted by the Union or its representatives. Upon the record presented here, one could conclude equally well that the incomplete notice was posted by Bokum's own representatives. As the Board correctly held, conduct not attributable to the opposing party cannot be a basis for setting aside an election. Bush Hog, Inc. v. NLRB, 420 F.2d 1266, 1269 (5th Cir. 1969). See also NLRB v. Sauk Valley Manufacturing Co., Inc., 486 F.2d 1127, 1131 (9th Cir. 1973).

Bokum also complains that the election should be set aside because campaign literature distributed by the union was misleading. Bokum does not, however, point to any false information. Rather, the Company states that certain important facts were omitted. The NLRB has applied a liberal rule toward such "campaign propaganda," finding that it has to be seriously misleading to justify setting aside an election. Even if there were a rule requiring complete truthfulness, the campaign literature at issue would meet the standard, since the employer only alleges a "failure to disclose." Affirmative disclosure has never been required. See Florida Mining & Materials Corp. v. NLRB, 481 F.2d 65, 68 (5th Cir.), rehearing denied, 485 F.2d 687 (5th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 990, 94 S.Ct. 1588, 39 L.Ed.2d 886 (1974).

Finally, Bokum asserts the election should be set aside on the ground that the Union violated the rule of NLRB v. Savair Manufacturing Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973), by offering discounted Union memberships to employees supporting the Union. The situation here, however, is clearly distinguishable from that in Savair. In the latter case, the employees were offered waived initiation fees in exchange for signing "recognition slips" indicating Union support. The waiver of fees was available only to those employees signing the slips prior to the election. In contrast, the Board found here that the reduction in fees was available to employees whether they indicated support for or sought to join the Union before or after the election. The situation, therefore, resembles that in NLRB v. Whitney Museum of American Art 636 F.2d 19 (2d Cir. 1980), in which the Court of Appeals held that a similar fee waiver was not a ground for setting aside an election.

The petition to set aside the Board's order is denied, and the order of the Board shall be enforced.

Before FEINBERG, Chief Judge, and WATERMAN and VAN GRAAFEILAND, Circuit Judges

FEINBERG, Chief Judge: This case, incredibily, arises out of an alleged unilateral change of work rules in 1975 by six liquor wholesalers ("the companies") in breach of their respective collective bargaining agreements with the union representing their salesmen-employees. The dispute was submitted to an arbitrator, who found that the agreements had not been violated. Dissatisfied with this conclusion, the union succeeded in bringing the case before the National Labor Relations Board, which declined to defer to the arbitrator's award under the policy of deference first announced in Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080 (1955). Instead, the Board found that the companies had committed an unfair labor practice and issued a remedial order. Under the circumstances presented here, we conclude that the Board abused its discretion in not deferring to the arbitrator's award, and we deny enforcement of the Board's order.

I. Prior Proceedings

The companies are engaged in the wholesale distribution of alcoholic beverages to restaurants, bars, liquor stores, and the like in the New York City metropolitan area. Their salesmen, who work on a commission basis, are represented by petitioner-intervenor Liquor Salesmen's Union Local 2 of the

State of New York, Distillery, Rectifying, Wine & Allied Workers' International Union, AFL-CIO.[1] The companies' drivers are represented by Local 816 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, which is not a party to this litigation.

Collective bargaining agreements between the companies and the two unions were due to expire on October 31, 1975; as that date approached, negotiations of new agreements occurred simultaneously, but independently of each other. Under the expiring agreement between the companies and the drivers' union, the drivers bore responsibility for the collection of payment from all C.O.D. customers at the time of delivery. In the closing hours of negotiations over the new agreement, the companies agreed to free the drivers of this task. They did not inform Local 2 of this change, however, and negotiations between the companies and that union did not address the subject of collections before tentative accord on a three-year contract was reached on November 2, subject to ratification by the Local's members.

On November 3, officials of one of the companies, Peerless Importers, Inc., distributed to its salesmen a handwritten directive on the handling of C.O.D. accounts, stating that customers could mail checks or that salesmen could pick the checks up from the customers and bring them to the office, after which the order would be shipped. Caught short by these new procedures, several C.O.D. customers complained to the salesmen when they did not receive their deliveries. The salesmen, in turn, complained to their union about the added burden being placed on them.

By the time of the Local 2 ratification meeting on November 7, the union was aware of the change in collection procedures. At the meeting, the president of Local 2 spoke to the salesmen about the change:

> Without prior discussion with the union, some employees circulated photocopies of a handwritten instruction that salesmen are to pick up C.O.D. payments in the form of checks or otherwise in order to have the orders filled. This is a violation of our contract, and I direct you that this change in our work rules shall not be honored by you until further notice. I instruct you to disregard it, and I will so advise your employer.

With this instruction given, the salesmen proceeded to ratify the new agreement without further consideration of the collection issue.

Shortly thereafter, each of the companies circulated announcements to its salesmen outlining and clarifying the new procedures. With variations from company to company, the new procedures generally encompassed three options. First, customers could mail in checks, with delivery taking place upon receipt; this procedure involved a delay of three days or so. Second, customers could leave signed blank checks with the companies, lessening the delay in delivery though obviously creating other problems of security. Third, customers could give checks directly to the salesmen, who could either bring the checks in immediately or call in the check number and amount, turning in the actual check the next day.

The companies generally took pains to stress the freedom of the salesmen to choose any procedure they wished, asserting that it was the individual salesman's "prerogative" to pick up payment rather than adopt an alternative that involved less of a burden. There was, on the other hand, some evidence of pressure on the salesmen to collect the checks themselves. The salesmen, moreover, argue that economic realities made it essential that they handle the collections personally. Since the business is highly competitive, they point out, an unwillingness by one salesman to pick up payment and thus to permit same-day delivery will simply lead his customer to turn elsewhere. As the arbitrator observed, "[t]he sad fact from the salesman's point of view is that, except for a small number with exclusive rights to a few brands, each salesman generally competes with the salesmen representing other wholesalers, all selling the same brands at the same prices."

On November 12, 1975, Local 2 president Joseph Matranga sent a letter to the companies asserting that the companies had "unilaterally and without notice changed a very serious working condition that has existed for many years in the industry and which is raising havoc with the rights of our members in the pursuit of their occupation." The letter claimed that "some or all of the employers have instructed the employees to pick up payment in advance from all customers who are on a Cash or COD basis." Citing the dangers and burden thus imposed, and charging that the employers were violating both the National Labor Relations Act and their contracts, Matranga said he would "be available immediately at my office for an open and frank discussion of this matter in order to avoid a confrontation on this issue." On the same day, however, Matranga wrote the companies' counsel, enclosing a final draft of the new contract and asking him for his approval of the draft so that copies could be prepared for formal signature.

[1] For convenience, we will refer to petitioner intervenor as Local 2 or the Union.

Replying to the former letter the next day, counsel for the companies suggested that Matranga was "attempting to renegotiate the Teamsters', Local 816 contract," and denied that the employers had changed a working condition unilaterally and without notice. The union's response was prompt: the following day, Matranga filed unfair labor practice changes against one of the companies with the NLRB, alleging that the change in "work rules" constituted an unfair labor practice under sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (a)(5). Soon thereafter, however, the union withdrew the charges and in February 1976 served on the companies a notice of intention to arbitrate, in accordance with the arbitration provision of the collective bargaining agreements. When the companies resisted arbitration, the union reinstated charges against all of them in March 1976, adding a charge of refusal to submit to arbitration. The Board's Regional Director, however, deferred action on the charges pending resolution of the requested arbitration proceedings. The companies' effect to avoid arbitration finally failed on June 1976, when Judge Charles S. Haight, Jr., of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York denied their motion for a stay of arbitration and granted the union's cross-motion to compel the arbitration. Charmers Industries, Inc. v. Liquor Salesmen's Union Local No. 2, 415 F.Supp. 781, 787 (S.D.N.Y.1976).

The arbitration then took place under the auspices of the New York State Mediation Board, culminating in an award by arbitrator Arthur T. Jacobs dated April 7, 1977. In a careful opinion, the arbitrator concluded that "[t]he Employers did not violate their contract with Local 2 when they adopted their present C.O.D. procedures." He noted, first, that the bargaining agreements contained no provisions governing C.O.D. procedures, so that there had been no violation of the agreements' "direct wording." He also found no violation of "any meaningful concept of past practice," observing:

> In the absence of a past practice clause, arbitrators including this one, and the courts have nevertheless frequently found that past practice was significantly implied in the contractual relations involved and could be used to justify a decision and an award.
> I cannot so find here for several reasons which stem from the limitations of the contract. First, the salesmen although called employees are basically independent entrepreneurs (like manufacturer representatives) * * *.
> Past practice in the industry did not require the salesmen to collect on their C.O.D. accounts. Present practice is the same. It is the individual salesman who decides for himself whether to do so or not. If he decides to collect, then it is he who is going contrary to past practice and deliberately so. The companies are being consistent. They did not require salesmen to pick up C.O.Ds. prior to November 1, 1975 and they have told the salesmen consistently since that they are not obligated to do so.
> In the light of this very special employee status and of the companies' care to emphasize to the salesmen from November 2, 1975 on that whether or not they serviced C.O.D. accounts was entirely > their prerogative, it is impossible to find that the companies have been directing or ordering or mandating that the salesmen must service C.O.Ds.

Addressing the union's contention that the salesmen's "prerogative" to collect or not to collect was illusory, since economic reality made collections necessary, the arbitrator stated:

> The Union's argument that the wholesalers are engaging in a "sham," while conceivably true, was not proved by the testimony. The many salesmen who testified only proved what I just described: an industry where although they are represented by the same Union, each company's salesmen compete against the salesmen of the other wholesalers and as a group they have been unwilling or unable to require all of the Union's members to forego collections on C.O.D. accounts and to force such accounts to pay for their goods by themselves delivering or mailing cash, a money order, or a certified check to the companies.

The union promptly applied to the Board's Regional Director to re-initiate proceedings to consider the charges filed in March 1976. The Regional Director, however, refused to issue a complaint against the companies. Citing the Board's practice under Spielberg of deferring to arbitration awards that meet certain conditions, the Director noted:

> In the instant case, there is no evidence that the arbitration proceedings were not fair or regular. Moreover, the evidence indicates that all parties and their counsel participated in the proceedings and the arbitrator was aware of the unfair labor practice issue. While the arbitrator's award may not be the one the Board would issue, where the Spielberg standards discussed above are met and the result is not clearly repugnant to the Act, the Board defers to the decision of the arbitrator [citation omitted].

The Director distinguished the decisions cited by the union to justify setting aside the award on the ground that they had not been cases in which an arbitrator's award "deal[t] squarely with the substance of the asserted violations of Section 8(a)(5)." Finally, in declining to issue a complaint, he specifically found that the award was "not clearly repugnant to the policies or purposes of" the NLRB.

Aggrieved once again, the union appealed to the Board's General Counsel, who reversed the Regional Director's decision and instructed him to issue a complaint. The Director did so, and shortly thereafter, the companies moved for summary judgment on the basis of the arbitration award, citing the Board's policy of deference to such awards under Spielberg. In an order dated November 14, 1977, the Board denied the motion, giving only the following explanation of its decision not to defer to the award:

> The Board, having duly considered the matter, is of the opinion that Respondents [i.e., the companies] are not entitled to summary judgment * * * for the reason that the Arbitrator's Award which is alleged to be dispositive of the matter demonstrates on its face that the Arbitrator ruled in favor of respondents herein because the contract between the parties contained no provisions pertaining to the matters at issue herein, and that it precluded consideration of past practices relating to the matter. Hence, his award that the "Employers did not violate their contract with Local 2 when they adopted their present C.O.D. procedures," does not dispose of the unfair labor practice allegations of the complaint.

The Board ordered a hearing before an administrative law judge (ALJ), which took place on March 1978.

While the case was pending before the ALJ, the expiration date of the 1975 contracts approached. We were informed at oral argument that the parties returned to the bargaining table to negotiate new agreements and that the C.O.D. collection procedures were a subject of the bargaining; apparently, the union was unable to persuade the companies to change the practice developed under the 1975 contracts, which has therefore remained essentially unchanged.

In September 1979, the ALJ issued a 19-page decision in favor of the union—more than a year and a half after the hearing. The ALJ found that the companies had "made unilateral changes with respect to the terms and conditions of employment of [the] employees, and thereby refused to bargain and continue to refuse to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act." The ALJ did not directly address the reasoning or conclusion of the arbitrator, asserting only that the Board's refusal to defer to the award was binding on her as the law of the case.

By a decision and order dated June 30, 1980—nine months after the ALJ's decision and more than four and a half years after the events giving rise to the complaint—the Board affirmed the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the ALJ and adopted her recommended order, with certain modifications. The Board's remedy included a general order that the companies cease and desist from refusing to bargain with the union by making unilateral changes in working conditions. At a more concrete level, the Board also ordered the companies to "restor[e] the status quo ante to those conditions which obtained prior to November 1, 1975 with respect to delivery schedules and collections of prepayments for C.O.D. orders as they related to the working conditions of Salesmen"; to make the salesmen whole for any lost time or added expense resulting from the change in working conditions; and to rescind any disciplinary action taken against salesmen because of lost commissions or accounts. See Charmer Industries, Inc., 250 N.L.R.B. No. 31 (June 30, 1980).

One month later, the companies petitioned this court for review of the Board's order; the Board cross-applied for enforcement of the order. Local 2, however, had not been idle, filing its own petition for review of the order on July 3, 1980, in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. The union's petition sought review of the Board's failure to address—and thus its implicit denial of—the union's request for attorneys' fees as part of the remedial order. On March 31, 1981, a panel of the District of Columbia Circuit Court exercised its discretion under 28 U.S.C. § 2112(a) to transfer the union's petition to this court for disposition in conjunction with the companies' petitions. Liquor Salesmen's Union Local 2 v. NLRB, —— F.2d ——— at ——— ———, No. 80-1746 (D.C.Cir. Mar. 31, 1981).

Thus, after five years and five months, this dispute over an alleged failure to bargain in 1975 came before this court.

II. The Board's Deference Criteria

As will be seen below, the only substantive issue we find it necessary to reach in this case is whether the Board abused its discretion in declining to defer to the arbitrator's award.

In furtherance of the national labor policy goal of encouraging the voluntary settlement of industrial disputes through arbitration, the National Labor Relations Board announced in 1955 that it would defer, as a matter of discretion, to an arbitrator's award pursuant to the provisions of a collective bargaining agreement in cases in which "the proceedings appear to have been fair and regular, all parties had agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitration panel is not clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the [National Labor Relations] Act." Spielberg Manufacturing Co., supra, 112 N.L.R.B. at 1082. This policy of deference—the Spielberg doctrine—obtained Supreme Court sanction in Carey v. Westinghouse Corp., 375 U.S. 261, 270–72, 84 S.Ct. 401, 408–09, 11 L.Ed.2d 320 (1964).

Over the years, the number and nature of the criteria applied to deference decisions have changed. The concept of "clearly repugnant," for example, has proved elusive, with the Board and courts viewing it sometimes as a test of whether the arbitrator's award was "palpably wrong," see, e. g., International Harvester Co., 138 N.L.R.B. 923, 929 (1962), enf'd sub nom. Ramsey v. NLRB, 327 F.2d 784 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 1003, 84 S.Ct. 1938, 12 L.Ed.2d 1052 (1964); or not "consistent with Board law," see, e.g., Kansas City Star, Inc., 236 N.L.

R.B. 866; 869 (1978) (Member Truesdale, concurring); or "arguably * * * not inconsistent with Board policy," see NLRB v. Pincus Brothers, Inc.-Maxwell, 620 F.2d 367 (3d Cir. 1980).[2]

In addition, the Board has followed an on-again, off-again requirement that the arbitrator have "clearly decided" the statutory issues involved in the unfair labor practice charge as well as the purely contractual issues presented under the terms of the collective bargaining agreement. One of the union's principal arguments is that this case "presents a classic example of an Arbitrator's refusal to address himself to the issues raised by the unfair labor practice case." The arbitrator, the union asserts, "completely failed to pass on the statutory issue, to wit, that the salesmen can no longer enjoy the same prompt delivery for C.O.D. sales and credit sales without assuming the added burdens of a collection agent; and whether the employers by unilateral action, improperly placed such added burdens on the salesmen in violation of the statute."

On the "clearly repugnant" controversy, see generally Note, Limiting Deferral Under the Spielberg Doctrine, 67 U.Va.L.Rev. 615, 621 (1981) ("The clearly repugnant' standard appears to be more literal than actual, * * * for the Board rarely defers unless the award comports with the Board's opinion as to the proper result [footnote omitted].").

The idea that an arbitration award meriting deference must have considered and resolved statutory as well as contractual issues was elaborated in the Board's decision in Raytheon Co., 140 N.L.R.B. 883 (1963), enforcement denied on other grounds, 326 F.2d 471 (1st Cir. 1964). In Raytheon, a case involving alleged discrimination in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the NLRA, the Board implicitly added a fourth criterion to the three set forth in Spielberg: it refused to defer to an arbitration award where "the arbitrator did not, and was advised that he could not, even consider evidence that protected concerted and union activities were possible causes for the discharges" that had been the subject of the arbitration. Id. at 886. The Raytheon rule was extended in Airco Industrial Gases, 195 N.L.R.B. 676 (1972), to cases in which the arbitration award simply "gives no indication that the arbitrator ruled on the unfair labor practice issue," id. at 677, even if the award contained no express indication that the arbitrator had not considered the statutory issue. The Board went a step further in Yourga Trucking, Inc., 197 N.L.R.B. 928 (1972), holding that the party seeking deference to an arbitrator's award bore the burden of "adduc[ing] proof regarding the scope of matters presented in the arbitration proceeding." Id.

Two years later, the Board reversed itself in Electronic Reproduction Service Corp., 213 N.L.R.B. 758 (1974). Expressly overruling Airco and Yourga, the Board asserted that henceforth it would assume that an award resolved statutory as well as contractual issues "except where unusual circumstances are shown which demonstrate that there were bona fide reasons, other than a mere desire on the part of one party to try the same set of facts before two forums, which caused the failure to introduce such evidence at the arbitration proceeding." Id. at 762 (footnote omitted). In Stephenson v. NLRB, 550 F.2d 535, 539 (9th Cir. 1977), a panel of the Ninth Circuit, while acknowledging the Board's "laudable" goal, characterized Electronic Reproduction Service as "as unjustifiable extension of its deferral policy." Stephenson adopted instead the position taken by the District of Columbia Circuit Court in Banyard v. NLRB, 505 F.2d 342, 348 (D.C.Cir.1974), adhering to the requirement that the arbitrator have "clearly decided the issue on which it is later urged that the Board should give deference."

Acknowledging the criticism in Stephenson and similar decisions, the Board reversed itself once again in Suburban Motor Freight, Inc., 247 N.L.R.B. No. 2, 103 L.R.R.M. 1113 (Jan. 8, 1980), overruling Electronic Reproduction Service and returning to the standards set forth in Airco and Yourga. The Board announced that "we will no longer honor the results of an arbitration proceeding under Spielberg unless the unfair labor practice issue before the Board was both presented to and considered by the arbitrator." 103 L.R.R.M. at 1114. We assume that Suburban Motor Freight validly and accurately describes the Board's current view on this question and is applicable here.

III. Application of Deference Criteria

Against this background we turn now to the manner in which the Board applied its deference criteria. As already indicated, the union argues that the arbitrator did not "address" the unfair labor practice issues and therefore the Board properly refused to defer to the arbitration award. It is true that the arbitrator did not, in so many words, find that the companies had refused to bargain over a unilateral change in working conditions, in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5). Instead he found, as a matter of contract interpretation and in the light of an examination of past practice, that the companies' institution of new procedures after November 1, 1975, did not impose a change in rules. This determination, however, was necessarily dispositive of the statutory issue: if no change in working conditions was imposed, no duty to bargain arose, and no unfair labor practice could have been committed. Because both the contractual and statutory issues rest on the same factual determinations, the arbitrator's better position and expertise as a fact-finder strengthen the case for deference to his findings. Cf. Stephenson v. NLRB, 550 F.2d 535, 538 n.4 (9th Cir. 1977). Under these circumstances, to insist here that the arbitrator announce that his resolution of the contractual dispute is intended as a resolution of the statutory issue as well is to impose a purely formalistic requirement. Thus, we conclude that the Board's "clearly decided" criterion was met in substance in this case.

In addition, this case presents what might be regarded as a congruence of interests, in that the union's claim primarily involves an asserted right affecting the union as a whole—a "group right" to certain working conditions. It is thus not a case in which an arbitrator's award affects rights of individuals or groups not directly party to the arbitration—as, for example, when a dispute arising out of an allegedly discriminatory discharge of an individual employee is brought to arbitration. See, e.g., Banyard v. NLRB, supra; cf. Alexander v. Gardner Denver Co., 415 U.S. 36, 94 S.Ct. 1011, 39 L.Ed.2d 147 (1974) (rejecting a policy of deference to arbitration awards implicating individual statutory rights under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act).

The Spielberg criteria for deference would still not be satisfied if the result reached by the arbitrator were found to be "clearly repugnant" to the Act. In this case, however, the Board made no such determination. Indeed, as indicated earlier, see page 322 supra, the Board's Regional Director specifically found that the award was not clearly repugnant to the Act's policies or purposes, and the Board offered no persuasive justification for setting this finding aside. The Board's only rationale for declining to defer was the assertion that the arbitrator had ruled in favor of the companies "because the contract between the parties contained no provisions pertaining to the matters at issue herein, and that it precluded consideration of past practices relating to the matter." It is on this basis, therefore, that the Board's decision must be reviewed. And on this basis, we believe the decision constitutes an abuse of discretion. The Board's rationale is simply incorrect; as the excerpts from the arbitrator's decision set out above indicate, the arbitrator plainly did consider past practice relating to C.O.D. collections, concluding that the companies had not departed from past practice. The arbitrator carefully presented the evidence on which he relied in reaching this conclusion, and while there was undoubtedly evidence to the contrary as well, the underlying questions were primarily factual issues that the arbitrator was best situated to resolve. His decision, moreover, was not "clearly repugnant" to the Act, as the Board's Regional Director found in his initial decision to defer. In short, the Board in this case declined to defer to an arbitrator's award that satisfied all of the criteria the Board has set, on grounds that do not withstand even casual scrutiny.

We do not doubt the Board has wide discretion in defining the circumstances under which it will defer to an arbitration award, or indeed in determining whether it will defer under circumstances. The Board is not required by statute to defer; as we have had occasion to note before, "the Board's rules on deference, after all, are self-imposed although it has followed healthy hints from the Supreme Court." NLRB v. Horn & Hardart Co., (2d Cir. 1971) 439 F.2d 674, 679. Once the Board has announced a particular set of rules, however, some constraints necessarily arise to limit its discretion in individual cases.[3] The Board cannot lightly change the rules on a case by case basis. As we said in Horn & Hardart,

> We do not suggest that the Board can announce a policy regarding deference to arbitration and then blithely ignore it, thereby leading astray litigants who depended upon it. But it can change its mind or alter its standards for deference in some respects without necessarily engaging in conduct so blameworthy as to justify our calling it abuse of discretion. Id. See also Roadway Express, Inc. v. NLRB, 647 F.2d 415, 418–419 (text accompanying notes 4–7) (4th Cir. 1981); Hawaiian Hauling Service, Ltd. v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 674, 676 (9th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 965, 97 S.Ct. 2921, 53 L.Ed.2d 1061 (1977).

We want it to be clear that we hold no special brief for the conduct of the companies in this case, and we express no approval of their failure promptly to inform the salesmen's union of the changes being made in the 1975 drivers' contract or the companies' dilatory resistance to the union's initial request for arbitration. We are similarly unimpressed with the union's actions, since there is little room for doubt that before it finally accepted the 1975 contract, the union was aware of what had occurred in the companies' bargaining with the drivers; moreover, the union itself sought arbitration and then refused to abide by the result. In addition, it may be that reasonable persons will differ on whether the arbitrator reached the correct result. But all these concerns are secondary: the issue before us is whether we should enforce the Board's order.

[3] We are aware of the sharp differences of view expressed on this point in the opinions of Judges Rosenn and Garth in NLRB v. Pincus Brothers, Inc.-Maxwell, supra, with Judge Garth arguing that the Board is bound by Spielberg as a matter of law, and its decisions in individual cases thus reviewable under a standard of legal error. See 620 F.2d at 378–81. Judge Rosenn's view that individual determinations also remain subject to an abuse-of-discretion standard of review appears to have prevailed, however, in the Third Circuit. See NLRB v. General Warehouse Corp., 643 F.2d 965, 970 (3d Cir. 1981).

In this circuit, we have consistently reviewed individual deference decisions for abuse of discretion rather than legal error. See, e.g., NLRB v. Horn & Hardart Co., supra, 439 F.2d at 679. Cf. Lodges 700, 743, 1746, International Association of Machinists v. NLRB, 525 F.2d 237, 246 (2d Cir. 1975), and Nabisco, Inc. v. NLRB, 479 F.2d 770, 773 (2d Cir. 1973), both concerning decisions to defer to arbitration proceedings under the policy set in Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 N.L.R.B. 837 (1971).

In this case, the Board did not purport to clarify or revise its announced standards for deference. Strictly speaking, it did not even decide whether the circumstances presented here warranted an exercise of its discretion in deferring to the arbitrator's award. Instead, acting on a motion for summary judgment, it misconstrued the arbitrator's award and, relying exclusively on its misconstruction, "blithely ignored" its own standards.[4] To accept its action in this case would render the Board's—and the courts'—laboriously developed standards of deference virtually meaningless, depriving parties to collective bargaining agreements of a reasonabale expectation of finality in properly conducted arbitrations and significantly undermining the value and efficacy or arbitration as an alternative to the judical or administrative resolution of labor disputes.

Although these considerations alone provide ample support for our decision not to enforce the Board's order in this case, we must note in addition the difficulties posed by the nature of the order itself. As indicated earlier, the essential thrust of the order is that the companies bargain with Local 2 over the issue of C.O.D. collections. But as we also indicated earlier, the union and the companies did have an opportunity to bargain over the issue in the course of negotiating the agreements to replace the 1975 contracts when they expired in 1978. The parties were not able in those negotiations to devise rules on collections acceptable to both sides, so that, as we were informed at oral agrument, the practice under the 1978 contracts has remained essentially the same as under the 1975 contracts. Thus, the Board would now, in effect, give to the union the most it could possibly have hoped to obtain in bargaining—a return to the old system of collection or its compensatory equivalent—as an interim measure, while ordering bargaining that has in fact already occurred, although not with results desired by the union. We think that such an order, in so stale a dispute originally caused by the exigencies of simultaneous bargaining with two unions almost six years ago, has a distinct air of unreality about it, and we are left with the conviction that its enforcement would not serve the ends of justice of the purposes of national labor law.

Accordingly, we grant the petitions for review filed by the companies and deny the Board's cross-application for enforcement of its order.

IV. The Union's Petition

We turn finally to the union's petition for review of the Board's order insofar as the Board did not act on its request for attorneys' fees as part of the remedy sought. We see no merit in the union's argument that the companies have engaged in frivolous litigation, and we similarly see no basis for concluding that the Board abused its discretion in this connection. The petition is accordingly denied.

NLRB v. A.W. Thompson, Inc.

651 F.2d 1141 (5th Cir.), July 31, 1981

On petition for adjudication of civil contempt

Before Brown, Goldberg and Ainsworth,

1142

Ainsworth, Circuit Judge: In this, our third examination of the difficult collective-bargaining relationship between A.W. Thompson, Inc. (the employer) and Local 826 of the International Union of Operating Engineers (the union), the National Labor Relations Board petitions the court for an adjudication of civil contempt against the employer. The Board claims that the employer, by withdrawing recognition of the union after conducting a poll which showed less than majority support, violated prior orders of this court issued in NLRB v. A.W. Thompson, Inc., 449 F.2d 1333 (5th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1065, 92 S.Ct. 1497, 31 L.Ed.2d 795 (1972) ("Thompson I") and NLRB v. A.W. Thompson, Inc., 525 F.2d 870 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 818, 97 S.Ct. 63, 50 L.Ed.2d 78 (1976) ("Thompson II"). The employer claims that the poll, along with other evidence, supported a good-faith doubt as to the union's continuing majority status and thus justified withdrawal of recognition. This court referred the Board's petition to a Special Master and we now have the Master's report before us for consideration. We hold that the employer is in contempt of our prior orders and once again order the employer to bargain in good faith with the union.

[4] Although we do not reach the merits of the Board's reasoning, we note that the Board expressly rejected the ALJ's finding that the companies had "directly pressured the salesmen to collect C.O.D. payments," and relied instead on its decision in Yellow Cab Co., 229 N.L.R.B. 1329 (1977), for the conclusion that "where an employer knowingly utilizes the force of circumstances to control the conduct of its employees, the failure to control them with direct orders may become legally insignificant." The Board's order in Yellow Cab, however, was denied enforcement by the District of Columbia Circuit Court, see Local 777, Democratic Union Organizing Committee v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 862, 872–81 (D.C. Cir. 1978). The Board's cursory analysis of this point thus seems nearly as questionable as its construction of the arbitrator's award.

A.W. Thompson, Inc. is engaged in drilling oil and gas wells in the Permian Basin, a 160,000 square mile area of West Texas and New Mexico. In August 1966, Local 826 won a NLRB election and became the collective-bargaining agent for all of Thompson's nonsupervisory employees. In the fifteen years since the union's certification, the parties have signed only three, one-year collective-bargaining agreements. At the expiration of each agreement, the employer has unilaterally withdrawn recognition of the union, claiming a good-faith doubt as to the union's continuing majority support. The withdrawal of recognition after the first two agreements led to NLRB unfair labor practice orders against the employer; both orders were enforced by this court. Thompson I & II, supra. The third agreement between the union and Thompson was signed on November 30, 1977. At the same time the company was negotiating that agreement with the union, the company was also negotiating with Santa Fe International Corporation for the acquisition of all of Thompson's stock by Santa Fe. Apparently Santa Fe required that Thompson reach agreement with the union before the acquisition became final. Although the acquisition did not change Thompson's corporate identity, Santa Fe has taken control of the company's labor relations.[1]

The employer again refused to bargain with the union upon the expiration of the third agreement on November 6, 1978. The company conducted a poll of employees by secret ballot on November 20 and 21 in which a majority of the employees voted against representation by Local 826.[2] In light of the poll results, the employer withdrew recognition, claiming for the third time a doubt as to the union's continuing majority status. The doubt was based upon the poll and on several other factors similar to those rejected by this court in the 1975 case. The critical issue on appeal is whether the employer met its burden of proving a good-faith doubt as to the union's majority status. On its face, the poll of employees appears to be strong evidence of a loss of union support. The Board maintains, however, that taking the poll itself constituted an unfair labor practice and that the poll thus cannot be used to support the employer's actions.

In order for an employer unilaterally to withdraw recognition of a certified bargaining representative it must show by clear and convincing evidence that it had a good-faith doubt as to union's continuing majority support. J. Ray McDermott & Co. v. NLRB, 571 F.2d 850, 858–59 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 893, 99 S.Ct. 250, 58 L.Ed.2d 238 (1978). Moreover, the doubt cannot be a mere suspicion; it must be reasonably based on objectively verifiable evidence. Id.; NLRB v. A.W. Thompson, Inc., supra, 525 F.2d at 871. The employer cites several factors which led it to suspect that the union had lost its support: the poll of employees, the lack of employee participation in union affairs, employee turnover, failure of the union to process grievances, post notices on bulletin boards, and appoint stewards, absence of employee conversations about the union, and the change of ownership of the company. Except for the poll and the change of ownership, these are the same factors relied upon and rejected by this court in Thompson II, and we once again find them insufficient to support a good-faith doubt. These factors are also similar to ones rejected in other cases involving Permian Basin employees where this court examined the nature of the oil-drilling industry and the wide dispersion of employees in the area and concluded that what might seem like union inaction or indifference in a more compact industrial setting was not indicative of lack of union support in this setting. NLRB v. Hondo Drilling Co., 525 F.2d 864 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 818, 97 S.Ct. 63, 50 L.Ed.2d 78 (1976); NLRB v. Leatherwood Drilling Co., 513 F.2d 270 (5th Cir.), cert. denied sub. nom. Brahaney Drilling Co. v. NLRB, 423 U.S. 1016, 96 S.Ct. 449, 46 L.Ed.2d 387 (1975). Absent verifiable, objective evidence that the change in the ownership of the company's stock changed the employees' attitude about the union, the employer's claim that the ownership change supported a good-faith doubt is just the kind of "unfounded speculation" condemned in previous cases. NLRB v. A.W. Thompson, Inc., supra, 525 F.2d at 871; see also NLRB v. Burns International Security Services, Inc., 406 U.S. 272, 278–79, 92 S.Ct. 1571, 1577–78, 32 L.Ed.2d 61 (1972).

[1] Brooks Harmon, the attorney handling labor negotiations for the company prior to the acquisition, continues to be the company's chief labor relations spokesman and negotiator.

[2] Apparently there were 172 employees at the time of the poll. The company's tally showed 88 votes against representation, 72 votes in favor of representation, and 4 blank votes. Eight employees did not vote. The Board challenges the eligibility of several of the voters, the exclusion of other voters, and the methods used in conducting the poll. We do not reach those issues in deciding this appeal, however.

The only remaining basis for the employer's doubt is the poll of employees. Although the Board maintains that the poll was inherently unreliable due to procedural defects and errors in the list of eligible voters, the Board does not contend that the poll was not evidence of a loss of union support. Instead, the Board maintains that the poll itself was unlawful and could not support the employer's doubt. The company asserts that the taking and use of a poll of employees is both valid and helpful if it complies with the procedural safeguards set out by the Board in Struksnes Construction Co., 165 NLRB 1062 (1967). Struksnes is not entirely on point, however, since in that case the employer sought to poll employees about their union sentiment prior to the initial certification of the union. At that point there is no presumption that the union has majority support as there is after certification, and the burden is on the union rather than the employer to demonstrate the employees' support for the union or lack thereof. Moreover, at the pre-certification stage the congressional policy of encouraging stability of established bargaining relationships does not come into play.

In Montgomery Ward & Co., 210 NLRB 717 (1974), the Board explicitly declined to extend the Struksnes rules to post-certification situations, holding that "absent valid objective considerations justifying a belief in the Union's lack of continuing majority status, * * * the [employer] was not legally entitled to seek to undercut the continuing majority status of the Union by itself initiating a poll of employee sentiment." The Board went on to hold that to allow the employer to use the fruits of such a poll to support a withdrawal of recognition would be contrary to the purposes of the labor act. This court discussed Montgomery Ward in NLRB v. Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, Inc., 584 F.2d 720 (5th Cir. 1978). In holding that the employer had met it burden of proving a good-faith doubt the court noted:

> The Company need not have conclusive proof that a majority of employees do not support the Union. Indeed, the only way that it could have garnered such proof was by an employee poll, but that is forbidden unless the employer has "objective evidence to support a good faith doubt of majority status," the same standard used to determine the lawfulness of withdrawing recognition. (Citing Montgomery Ward)

Notwithstanding the Randle-Eastern dictum, we are not convinced that an employer may conduct an employee poll only when it has no actual need to do so, that is, when it already has sufficient objective evidence to justify withdrawal of recognition. Two other circuits, also in dicta, have implied that a noncoercive poll may be taken to gauge employee sentiment. Pioneer Inn Asociates v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 835, 840 & n.3 (9th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. North American Manufacturing Co., 563 F.2d 894, 896 (8th Cir. 1977). Neither of these cases discussed Montgomery Ward, however, and neither decided under what conditions a poll may be taken. This court has not adopted the Montgomery Ward approach and we decline to do so now if it represents, in practical effect, an outright ban on employer-sponsored polls of employee sentiments in regard to a certified union.

It is for the employees alone to decide whether they wish to be represented by a union in the first instance and to decide whether they wish to oust an incumbent union and either replace it with another union or forego union representation entirely. The national labor policy favors employee free choice in such matters. The employer, although an interested party, has a limited role in the representational choice of employees. We appreciate the Board's concern, expressed in Montgomery Ward, that polling by employers may undercut a union's majority status and may even subvert the Board's electoral processes.[3]

Nevertheless, polling can be a useful and legitimate tool when the employer's sincere doubt of the union's majority status is based on objective evidence which falls short of that needed to justify withdrawal of recognition. We hold that when an employer "has not engaged in unfair labor practices or otherwise created a coercive atmosphere,"[4] it may, after giving notice to the union, poll the employees for their union sentiment if there is other substantial, objective evidence of a loss of union support (even if that evidence is not sufficient by itself to justify withdrawal) and if the poll meets the procedural guidelines set out in Struksnes. This test, which incorporates the safeguards established by the Board in Struksnes, is a reasonable accommodation of the employer's interest in testing the union's support an the Board's interest in preventing repeated polls which themselves can be coercive. The substantial, objective evidence must show that the union has lost support. Thus, if a union wins a certification election by a slim margin, that margin itself, or other factors present at the time of certification, cannot be used as evidence of a loss of support to justify a poll. The proper test, as we have stated herein, may, in fact, prevent unfair labor practices and reduce the need for Board and court involvement in collective-bargaining disputes. Our test avoids the situation in which an employer must risk unfair labor practice charges (by withdrawing recognition) to find out whether the evidence of loss of support is sufficient to justify that withdrawal. Now, faced with such evidence, the employer can conduct a poll to determine the level of support for the union.

Thompson has not met our test in the present case, however. During the sixteen years in which the union has been the certified bargaining representative of A. W. Thompson's nonsupervisory employees, only three, one-year collective-bargaining agreements have been signed. Upon the expiration of each of the agreements, the employer has withdrawn recognition of the union and taken advantage of the drawn-out nature of Board enforcement proceedings to delay the resumption of good-faith bargaining. Twice before this court has held that Thompson's actions constitute unfair labor practices. Thompson I & II, supra. Since the employer has engaged in repeated unfair labor practices, it cannot now under such circumstances properly conduct a poll. In addition, we do not find the other evidence of loss of union support proffered by the employer to be substantial. As we noted in Thompson II, the factors cited by the company reflect the nature of the industry and the region more than any union weakness. The only new factor cited by the employer, the purchase of the corporate stock by Santa Fe, certainly tells us nothing about employee sentiment. Unless the employer can show some concrete evidence, not present at the time of initial certification, that the union has lost its majority support, it cannot conduct a poll. Nothing the employer now offers constitutes such evidence.

We therefore hold that the employer's withdrawal of recognition of the union was not justified. The withdrawal thus violates the orders of this court in Thompson I & II, supra. Since this is the third time the employer has improperly withdrawn recognition of the union we would normally have no qualms about imposing a schedule of prospective fines against the employer for future violations. However, in light of the change in the ownership of the company, and the assumption of Thompson's labor relations functions by the Santa Fe office, we do not now impose prospective fines. The imposition of such fines is an extraordinary remedy "and should be imposed only where violations have been flagrant and lesser remedies appear likely to fail." Florida Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 648 F.2d 233, 240 (5th Cir. 1981). To say the least, it is premature to assume that Santa Fe will not abide by our order and that the contempt remedy is likely to fail.

[3] As the Board stated in Struksnes, "any attempt by an employer to ascertain employee views and sympathies regarding unionism generally tends to cause fear of reprisal in the mind of the employee if he replies in favor of unionism and, therefore, tends to impinge on his Section 7 rights." 165 NLRB at 1062. That fear need not have a strong basis in fact for it to have a chilling effect on employee free choice.

It is therefore ORDERED AND ADJUDGED that the respondent, A.W. Thompson, Inc., is in civil contempt for having violated the orders of this court dated April 26, 1972 and November 2, 1976. It is ORDERED that A.W. Thompson, Inc. shall purge itself of civil contempt by:

1. Fully complying with the judgments of April 26, 1972 and November 2, 1976, and each of the provisions of the Board's orders thereby enforced;

2. Notifying the union in writing within 15 days from the entry of this order that it recognizes the union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the designated unit and that, upon request of the union, it will bargain collectively in good faith with the union as the exclusive representative of the company's employees in the designated unit until full agreement or bona fide impasse is reached; and if any understanding is reached following such bargaining, incorporating such understanding in a written agreement. In no event shall the company refuse to meet with the union at reasonable times or withdraw recognition from the union as collective bargaining representative without further order of the court;

3. Immediately posting in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees customarily are posted, for a period of sixty (60) consecutive days, copies of an appropriate notice in the form prescribed by the Board, signed by the company, which states that the company has been adjudicated in civil contempt of court for violating, resisting, disobeying, and failing and refusing to comply with the court's said judgments and that the company will take the action in purgation ordered by the court, and by maintaining such notices and a copy of the contempt adjudication in clearly legible condition throughout such posting period, and insuring that they are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material;

4. Mailing to each of its current employees and all former employees employed by the company at any time since October 1, 1978, copies of the notice and of the contempt adjudication referred to in the preceding paragraph; and reading said notice to its employees at each rig, by shift, and in the yard, by an appropriate representative of the company;

5. Paying to the Board all costs and expenditures, including counsel fees, incurred by the Board in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and final disposition of this proceeding to adjudge the company in civil contempt, and all costs relative to the Special Master, said amount, unless agreed upon by the parties, to be fixed by the court upon submission by the Board of a certified statement of costs and expenses.

ORDERED AND ADJUDGED.

NLRB v. Ely's Foods Inc., d/b/a Scotto's I.G.A.

656 F.2d 290 (8th Cir.), July 31, 1981—249 NLRB 909

On petition to enforce Board Order

FLOYD R. GIBSON, Senior Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (Board) petitions this court for enforcement of its order directing Ely's Foods to bargain with the Retail Store Employees Union and United Food and Commercial Workers International Union. Ely's Foods contests the bargaining order on the grounds that the Board's decision and the record fail to support the remedy of a bargaining order. We enforce the Board's order.

On May 29, 1980, the Board issued a decision and order declaring that Ely's Foods had violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976). The Board adopted the findings and conclusions of the administrative law judge (ALJ). The Board's decision and order and the ALJ's decision are fully reported in Ely's Foods Inc., 249 N.L.R.B. 909 (1980).

Briefly, the factual circumstances surrounding the section 8(a)(1) violations are the following. In January 1979, the unions began a joint organizing effort among the grocery clerks and meatcutters at

*The Honorable Edward J. McManus, Chief Judge, United States District Court for the Northern District of Iowa, sitting by designation.

Scotto's I.G.A. in Brookfield, Missouri. Scotto's is a moderately sized, family-run supermarket owned by Otto Ely and is the only store operated by Ely. On February 2 and 3, 1979, an employee of the supermarket presented to Ely the names of twenty-one grocery employees, out of a total of twenty-eight, who had signed cards authorizing the Retail Store Employees Union to be their bargaining agent. On February 5, the same employee advised Ely that the three meatcutters had agreed to authorize the United Food and Commercial Workers Union to be their bargaining agent.

The ALJ found that Otto Ely, upon being advised of the organizational campaign on February 2, 1979, summoned an employee into his office and interrogated her regarding her union participation and the union activities of others. The following day Ely advised a number of employees that a unionized store would result in more restrictive terms and conditions of employment and that layoffs were possible if he was going to have to pay union wages. On that same day Ely also promised two employees that he would find additional hours of work for them.

On February 6, 1979, the Retail Store Employees Union filed a petition for an election in the grocery clerk unit. The election was scheduled for February 28. On the day before the election, Ely promised an employee a wage increase "when the mess [union election] was over with." Finally, on the morning of the election, Ely threatened a tardy employee with more arduous working conditions while reprimanding him for being one hour late.

The election was held and the company won. The vote was ten for the union and sixteen against, with two votes challenged. The union filed objections to the election with the Board. The election among the meatcutters was never held. The United Food and Commercial Workers Union, however, also filed objections concerning the conduct of the company with regard to the meatcutters.

In the matter of the meatcutters' union representation, the ALJ found that Pat Burstert, in charge of the meat department, was a supervisor who committed section 8(a)(1) violations. Burstert stated at various times to the meatcutters that Ely would like to enter into a direct agreement with them and that they should pursue such negotiations, either individually or collectively, without regard to a union. Burstert indicated that the meatcutters could expect to receive substantially increased benefits if they did so. Finally, on March 9, 1979, after the grocery clerk union election, Burstert told a meatcutter that three replacements had been hired for their positions. The ALJ construed this to be a direct threat to the meatcutters "that they were to be discharged as a result of their continued union activity." Ely's Foods Inc., 249 N.L.R.B. at 914.

The ALJ and the Board found the above activities to be violations of section 8(a)(1). Ely's Foods does not contest these findings.[1] It contends instead that the bargaining order should not be enforced because neither the Board's decision nor the record contain facts sufficient to support the remedy of a bargaining order.

The Supreme Court, in NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 612, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1939, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), reviewed the policy reasons behind issuance of a bargaining order:

> [A] bargaining order is designed as much to remedy past election damage as it is to deter future misconduct. If an employer has succeeded in undermining a union's strength and destroying the laboratory conditions necessary for a fair election, he may see no need to violate a cease-and-desist order by further unlawful activity. The damage will have been done, and perhaps the only fair way to effectuate employee rights is to re-establish the conditions as they existed before the employer's unlawful campaign. [Footnotes omitted.]

Ely's Foods, however, argues that a bargaining order is not appropriate because the Board failed to engage in a specific factual analysis of the reasons why a bargaining order remedy was necessary, and there was no showing why a traditional "cease and desist" order would not suffice. See, e.g., Red Oaks Nursing Home, Inc., v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503, 508–09, (7th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., 632 F.2d 208, 215 (2d Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d 110, 119 (1st Cir. 1978). The ALJ in this case, in recommending issuance of a bargaining order, made the following findings:

[1] Ely's Foods' brief suggests that Burstert was only a "marginal supervisor." Respondent's brief at 22. We agree with the Board and the ALJ that Burstert was a supervisor within the meaning of section 2(11) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11) (1976). Burstert is in charge of the meat department. The ALJ found that Burstert sets hours for the meatcutters and exercises authority in the area of working conditions. He has also successfully recommended pay raises and reprimands. We must give deference to the Board's determination on this issue. See NLRB v. Harmon Industries, 565 F.2d 1047, 1051 (8th Cir. 1977). We conclude that Burstert exercised sufficient "independent judgment" with regard to these work functions to qualify as a supervisor within the meaning of section 2(11). See id. at 1049; cf. NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 4444 U.S. 672, 682 N.13, 100 S.Ct. 856, 862 n.13, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980) (an employee may be excluded if he has authority over any one of twelve enumerated personnel actions in section 2(11)). See generally Note, The NLRB and Supervisory Status: An Explanation of Inconsistent Results, 94 Harv.L.Rev. 1713 (1981).

> I am convinced that under applicable Board precedent the election in the Retail Clerks unit should be set aside, and I further find that a full and proper remedy requires the issuance of bargaining orders in both units as contended by the General Counsel. The numerous unfair labor practices, found above, particularly those unfair labor practices wherein Respondent, both through Otto Ely and Burstert, promised benefits to employees and threatened employees with layoff and discharge as a consequence of their selecting either Union as their collective-bargaining representative, mandate the conclusion that the possibility of erasing the effects of the aforementioned unfair labor practices by other traditional remedies, and of insuring fair elections, is slight. Under the circumstances it is clear that the desire of the employees, overwhelmingly expressed by their signatures on authorization cards, warrants the imposition of bargaining orders in each respective unit.

Ely's Foods contends that this paragraph constitutes nothing more than a perfunctory conclusion. While we agree that the specific factual findings of the Board and the ALJ with regard to the necessity of a bargaining order were perhaps less than desirable for appellate review and present only a marginal case for bypassing the preferred election procedure, we find that the complete findings of the Board, see Ely's Foods Inc., 249 N.L.R.B. at 913–14, and the record as a whole support issuance of a bargaining order in this case.

In reviewing whether a bargaining order should issue, this court must give "special respect" to the Board's determination. "[T]he Board draws on a fund of knowledge and expertise all its own, * * *." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. at 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939 n.32. The Supreme Court, in Gissel Packing Co., outlined the factors the Board should consider in the case of election violations of the type involved in this case:

> The Board's authority to issue such an order on a lesser showing of employer misconduct is appropriate, we should reemphasize, where there is also a showing that at one point the union had a majority; in such a case, of course, effectuating ascertainable employee free choice becomes as important a goal as deterring employer misbehavior. In fashioning a remedy in the exercise of its discretion, then, the Board can properly take into consideration the extensiveness of an employer's unfair practices in terms of their past effect on election conditions and the likelihood of their recurrence in the future. If the Board finds that the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election (or a fair rerun) by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order, then such an order should issue (see n.32, supra).

In examining the bargaining order in this case, we find that the unions clearly had a large majority at the time the authorization cards were signed in early February 1979. Of equal importance is the fact that the store in issue here was family-run, located in a small town. Otto Ely's actions can therefore be expected to have a pervasive effect upon his employees in a limited local labor market. These considerations support the Board's and the ALJ's conclusions that "the possibility of erasing the effects of the aforementioned unfair labor practices by other traditional remedies, and of insuring fair elections, is slight." Ely's Foods, Inc., 249 N.L.R.B. at 914.

In enforcing the Board's order, however, we reiterate the Supreme Court's admonition in Gisse Packing Co., 395 U.S. at 613, 89 S.Ct. at 1939 "There is, after all, nothing permanent in a bargaining order, and if, after the effects of the employer acts have worn off, the employees clearly desire t disavow the union, they can do so by filing a representation petition."

Enforced.

McMANUS, Chief District Judge, concurring specially: The panel determines to enforce the Board's bargaining order, having elected not to adopt the majority view of the courts of appeal with respect to the specific factual analysis required of the Board in cases such as this. NLRB v. Jamaica Towing, Inc., 602 F.2d 1100 (2d Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Appletree Chevrolet, Inc., 608 F.2d 988 (4th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d 110 (1st Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Pacific Southwest Airlines, 550 F.2d 1148 (9th Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Armcor Industries, 535 F.2d 239 (3d Cir. 1976); Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108 (7th Cir. 1973); NLRB v. American Cable Systems, Inc., 427 F.2d 446 (5th Cir. 1970). I agree with the result in the case at bar, although I feel that the better approach to these cases is that of the above circuits.

The leading Supreme Court case in this area is, of course, NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). There the court sanctioned the imposition of a bargaining order remedy under circumstances as were present here upon findings by the Board that "the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election . . . by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order." 395 U.S. at 614–615, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. In applying this language to the cases before them, the majority of the circuits requires the Board to (1) make specific findings as to the immediate and residual impact of unfair labor practices on the election process; (2) undertake a detailed analysis assessing the possibilities of holding a fair election in terms of any continuing effect of employer misconduct, the likelihood of recurring misconduct, and the potential effectiveness of traditional remedies; and (3) reconcile the issuance of the bargaining order with prior decisions in which no such order was issued. E.g. Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108, 1118 (7th Cir. 1973).

In addition to the Gissel language, these circuits have justified their approach based on their appellate responsibility to review the administrative process. As stated in NLRB v. Armcor Industries, 535 F.2d 239, 245 (3d Cir. 1976) (citations omitted):

> Requiring the [Board] to state its reasons enables the reviewing court to 'guarantee the integrity of the administrative process. . . .' It also contributes to the growth and predictability of this important area of labor law. In addition, the 'requirement that the [Board] provide analysis and findings serves as a prophylaxis against an arbitrary exercise of the [Board's] power.'

Lastly, these circuits have indicated that such requirements are consistent with the general principle that an open, free election is the preferred method of establishing a union's representative status, e.g., NLRB v. Armcor Industries, 535 F.2d 239, 244 (3d Cir. 1976), as has this circuit. Ante at 292.

I am aware of and approve the legal standard of review that requires us to give deference to the Board on these matters. But I suggest that such deference is not warranted where the Board has merely set forth a litany, reciting conclusions by rote without any factual explication. NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672, 100 S.Ct. 856 (1980) (reliance on conclusions unsupported by factual analysis precludes grant of deference to Board's expertise); see NLRB v. Pacific Southwest Airlines, 550 F.2d 1148, 1151–52 (9th Cir. 1977) (Board orders on findings should not be boilerplate); NLRB v. Kaiser Agr. Chem., Div. of Kaiser A&C Corp., 473 F.2d 374 (5th Cir. 1973) (same). However, a thorough, independent review of this record indicates that the bargaining order should be enforced. To send this case back, therefore, would be a wasted effort and delay. See Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108 (7th Cir. 1973). However, I again emphasize that the better procedure, in my view, is the majority approach outlined above.

On petition to review Board Order

Before LAY, Chief Judge, STEPHENSON, Circuit Judge, and LARSON,* Senior District Judge

Larson, Senior District Judge: This case began when an employee of F. W. Woolworth Co. (Woolworth), Eric Withers, filed an unfair labor practice charge with the National Labor Relations Board (Board) protesting his discharge by Woolworth. A Board ALJ subsequently decided that this discharge violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), and this decision was later affirmed by the Board. Woolworth filed a petition for review of the Board's decision and order with this Court and the Board followed with a cross-application for enforcement of its order.

Woolworth is a New York corporation that runs a nationwide chain of retail stores. Its merchandise is distributed to its stores from regional distribution centers, one of which is the Mid-Atlantic Distribution Center (MDAC) in Denver, Pennsylvania. MDAC has been the site of several union organizing campaigns, the most recent one in the spring of 1979. On May 25, 1979, a Board representation election was held and the employees voted against union representation.

During the 1979 campaign, Woolworth held three employee meetings on company time in the MDAC cafeteria to deliver speeches conveying its position on unionization. Employee attendance at these meeting was compulsory. No questions were allowed at these meetings although employees were told they could ask questions on the work floor after the meetings.

Eric Withers had been a vocal critic of Woolworth's failure to assign more female employees to the shipping department at MDAC. He viewed the assignment of only two female employees to the shipping department as insufficient and as representing favoritism towards male employees. After the first two employee meetings, Withers asked General Manager John Mede why there were not more women in the shipping department and was told that work assignments were a management prerogative and was asked "who put you up to this?"

The final employee meeting was begun at 2:30 p.m. on May 24. It was necessary to conclude this meeting by 3:00 p.m. in order to comply with Peerless Plywood, 107 N.L.R.B. 427, 33 L.R.R.M. 1551 (1953), which prohibits such meetings within 24 hours of a representation election. When Mede began his speech, Withers interrupted by standing and stating that he wanted to ask a question. Mede told Withers to be seated and Withers sat down for a few minutes. After a few minutes Withers again stood up and again stated that he wanted to ask a question. He was again told to sit down but instead he asked Mede if this was to be another one-sided affair where Mede would "spoon feed" the employees and do all the talking and have the employees do all the listening. This second attempt to ask a question lasted a few minutes and then Withers sat down again. Mede completed the remainder of his speech before 3:00 p.m. After the meeting, on the same day, Withers was informed that he was suspended pending an investigation. Later that day Woolworth sent a mailgram to Withers informing him that he was being discharged for insubordination. The sole basis for the termination was his alleged misconduct at the May 24 meeting.

I. Jurisdiction

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked pursuant to section 10(f) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(f), since Woolworth maintains numerous business facilities within the jurisdiction of this Court and thereby transacts business within this Circuit.[1] Although the alleged unfair labor practice occurred in Denver, Pennsylvania, within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, Woolworth has obviously chosen this Circuit in order to rely on the decision in NLRB v. Prescott Industrial Products Co., 500 F.2d 6 (8th Cir. 1974).

II. Concerted Activity

Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157,[2] grants employees the right to engage in "concerted activity" for their mutual aid and protection. Section 8(a)(1) [3] makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with an employee's exercise of this right. Woolworth argues that the activity at issue here was not concerted since Withers acted alone. Activity is concerted, however, even where only one employee is involved if the employee is enlisting the support of fellow employees. See NLRB v. Sencore, Inc., 558 F.2d 433, 434 (8th Cir. 1977). By pressing for more female employees to be assigned to the shipping department, Withers was seeking to enlist the support of at least some of his fellow employees at MDAC.

[1] Woolworth has taken advantage of the following provision in section 10(f):

> Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board * * * may obtain a review of such order in any United States court of appeals in the circuit wherein the unfair labor practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person resides or transacts business.

[2] Section 7 provides, in pertinent part:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

The Board has held, and we agree, that an employee is engaged in concerted activity when he attempts to ask questions at a captive audience meeting, convened by management of the subject of unionization, unless the questions are pursuant to a scheme or plan to disrupt the meeting. See Howell Metal Co.,———, N.L.R.B. ———, 102 L.R.R.M. 1031 (1980). Woolworth contends that the ALJ made a finding that Withers was engaged in individual, rather than concerted, activity. The finding, however, was that Withers had not taken part in a scheme or plan to disrupt the meeting.[4]

III. The Unfair Labor Practice

Where an employer discharges an employee in these circumstances, the Board must balance the employee's right to engage in concerted activity against the employer's right to maintain order and respect. This balancing permits some leeway for implusive behavior on the part of the employee. NLRB v. Thor Power Tool Co., 351 F.2d 584, 587 (7th Cir. 1965). The Board's performance of this balancing test, unless illogical or arbitrary, ought not be disturbed. Id.

Woolworth argues that the present case is controlled by NLRB v. Prescott Industrial Products Co., 500 F.2d 6 (8th Cir. 1974), where an employer delivered a captive audience speech to employees pointing out the disadvantages of unionization. At or about the end of the speech, an employee persisted in his attempt to ask a question despite requests by the employer to sit down as there was no question and answer period allowed. After the employer refused to entertain the question several times, the employee and some 20 or 25 fellow employees walked out of the meeting. The employee was subsequently discharged for insubordination.

In Prescott this Court adopted the balancing principles of Thor Power Tool and in the present case we find the Board's performance of this balancing test neither illogical nor arbitrary. Withers' behavior was implusive; he sat down after his first attempt to ask a question and did not remain standing long following his second attempt. As noted in Prescott:

> The Board apparently is enunciating a general principle that insolvent, rough, and intimidating conduct cannot serve as a basis for discharge if that conduct is carried out in connection with the assertion of protected activity under § 7 of the Act and that unless such improper conduct, including threats, intimidations and acts adverse to the operation of the employer's business in "egregious," the same must be accepted as a normal and usual incident of labor-management relationships. 500 F.2d at 11 (quoting NLRB v. Red Top, Inc., 455 F.2d 721, 728 (8th Cir. 1972)).

The conduct here certainly wasn't "egregious"; in fact, Mede was even able to complete his remarks before 3:00 p. m.

Prescott is distinguishable from the case before us in that in Prescott, the employee and others walked out of the meeting. The meeting in Prescott, and the meeting here, were held on company premises and on company time. Walking out of such a meeting, accompanied by 20 or 25 fellow employees, directly challenges management's right to maintain order and respect and tips the balance in favor of the employer. On the other hand, in Withers' case the reaction of fellow employees was negative, marked by cat calls and even profanity, urging him to sit down and shut up. Withers' interruptions were no threat to Woolworth's interest in maintaining discipline or respect. Further, Withers' inability to receive a meaningful response from Mede concerning his complaint about the assignment of female employees after the first two employee meetings tips the balance in the present case in the other direction. Woolworth's failure to provide a meaningful outlet for the exercise of Withers' right to engage in concerted activity weighs heavily against Woolworth.

[3] Section 8(a)(1) provides:

It shall be unfair labor practice for an employer * * * to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 of this title.

[4] In Prescott this Court did not reach the question of whether the activity involved was concerted or individual. See 500 F.2d at 7.

Accordingly, Woolworth's petition for review and for the setting aside of the

St. Anthony Hospital Systems v. NLRB

655 F.2d 1028 (10th Cir.), August 4, 1981—252 NLRB 50

On petition to review Board Order

LOGAN, Circuit Judge: St. Anthony Hospital Systems petitions for review of a decision and order of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB or Board) finding the hospital engaged in unfair labor practices by refusing to bargain with St. Anthony's Federation of Nurses and Health Professionals/AFT/FNHP, CFT, AFL—CIO (the union). The only issues raised on appeal are whether the Board (1) unconstitutionally asserted jurisdiction over the hospital, which is argued to be exempt under the First Amendment from governmental regulation because it is owned and operated by the Roman Catholic Church, (2) erred in ruling that a unit composed only of registered nurses is an appropriate bargaining unit under section 9(b) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 159(b), and (3) erred in holding that individuals classified as Staff Nurse I were not supervisors within the meaning of section 2(11) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11).

St. Anthony Hospital Systems (St. Anthony), consisting of a main or central building and a satellite facility, is a non-profit medical institution owned and operated by the Sisters of the Order of St. Francis, a Roman Catholic Order. In 1979 the union filed a representation petition with the NLRB, seeking certification as the exclusive bargaining representative of all nonsupervisory registered nurses employed by the hospital. Following a hearing at which St. Anthony unsuccessfully challenged the appropriateness of the requested bargaining unit, the Board's regional director issued a direction of election in the registered nurse unit. The Board denied St. Anthony's request for review. A majority of the eligible employees voted in favor of representation by the union, following which the director certified the union as the exclusive collective bargaining representative for the hospital's professional registered nurse employees. St. Anthony has obtained judicial review of the unit determination by refusing to bargain with the union. See Magnesium Casting Co. v. NLRB, 401 U.S. 137, 139, 91 S.Ct. 599, 600, 27 L.Ed.2d 735 (1971); Osteopathic Hosp. Founders Ass'n v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 633, 640 (10th Cir. 1980). in its answer to the complaint issued by the Geneal Counsel of the NLRB, St. Anthony claimed the Board's assertion of jurisdiction was unconstitutional on the ground that the hospital is a religious organization exempt from intrusive governmental regulation under the First Amendment. It also denied that the union was a proper labor organization under the NLRA, challenged the appropriateness of the unit determination, and objected to the inclusion of Staff Nurse I employees in the bargaining unit, claiming they were supervisors within the meaning of 29 U.S.C. § 152(11). The Board granted the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment, ordering St. Anthony to cease and desist from its unfair labor practices and directing it to bargain collectively with the union. The case is before this Court on St. Anthony's petition for review of the Board's order and the Board's application for enforcement. The union is present as intervenor.

The record indicates that St. Anthony failed to object to jursidiction during the representation proceeding and first asserted its First Amendment challenge to jurisdiction in the unfair labor practice proceedings before the Board. Apparently relying on section 102.67(f) of its Rules and Regulations,

29 C.F.R. § 102.67(f) (1980),[1] the Board determined St. Anthony was not entitled to litigate the constitutional issue which could have been, but was not, raised in the prior representation proceeding. In NLRB v. Peyton Fritton Stores, Inc., 336 F.2d 769, 770 (10th Cir. 1964), we held that while the statutory jurisdiction of the Board may be challenged at any time, "the facts upon which the Board determines it has jurisdiction may be challenged only upon timely exception, in the absence of which the Board's findings are not open to attack in the proceeding for enforcement." (Emphasis added.) The Board's non-relitigation rule protects the integrity of the administrative process by requiring a party to develop all arguments and present all available, relevant evidence at the representation proceeding, the first instance in which the Board exercises jurisdiction. It would indeed be a waste of time, money, and effort if an employer could remain silent on this issue throughout the representation-proceeding, refuse to bargain after certification, then ultimately defeat unionization on constitutional grounds asserted for the first time in the ensuing unfair labor practice proceeding. We affirm the Board's determination that the First Amendment issue, having been untimely raised, was not cognizable by the Board in the underlying unfair labor practice hearing. The issue is therefore not properly before this Court on St. Anthony's petition for review. See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162, 61 S.Ct. 908, 917, 85 L.Ed. 1251 (1941). Cf. St. Elizabeth Community Hosp. v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 123 (9th Cir. 1980) (First Amendment challenge to jurisdiction was timely only because raised in representation proceeding and not deferred until the enforcement proceedings).

The issues concerning whether the nurses should be a separate bargaining unit and whether those classified as Nurse I were supervisors were raised before the Regional Director and the Board in the representation proceedings and may be reviewed here. See Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 154, 61 S.Ct. 908, 913, 85 L.Ed. 1251 (1941); NLRB v. Jackson Farmers, Inc., 432 F.2d 1042 (10th cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 955, 91 S.Ct. 947, 28 L.Ed.2d 238 (1971). The Board has been granted broad discretion in determining appropriate bargaining units, and its decisions will be set aside only if shown to be arbitrary or capricious. NLRB v. Dewey Portland Cement Co., 336 F.2d 117, 119 (10th Cir. 1964). Hence, it is our function on review to determine whether the Board, when exercising the wide discretion committed to it, has stayed within the purview of the authorizing status. NLRB v. Groendyke, 372 F.2d 137, 140 (10th Cir. 1967), cert denied, 397 U.S. 935, 90 S.Ct. 944, 25 L.Ed.2d 116 (1970). In granting the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment and affirming the Regional Director's decision, the Board clearly seems to have accepted the director's reasoning, based on Mercy Hospitals of Sacramento, Inc., 217 N.L.R.B. 765 (1975), and Allegheny General Hospital, 239 N.L.R.B. 872 (1978), "that a unit restricted to registered nurses is a presumptively appropriate one," and that in the case "the presumption . . . has not been overcome by the Employer's evidence." R.Vol. V at 3244. See id. at 3311. Acknowledging NLRB v. St. Francis Hospital of Lynwood, 601 F.2d 404 (9th Cir. 1979), the Regional Director and the Board applied a rebuttable presumption that the nurse unit was appropriate. Nevertheless, we believe the opinions clearly do not go far enough in following the congressional directive. See R.Vol. V at 3244–45, 3311–12.

On the appropriate unit issue, the case at bar is identical in all significant respects to Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center v. NLRB, 653 F.2d 450 (10th Cir. 1981), in which we held the Board's application of the rebuttable presumption both impermissibly shifts the burden of persuasion and violates Congress' directive to avoid proliferation of bargaining units in the health care industry. Our holding in Presbyterian/St. Luke's Medical Center is fully applicable to this case. We hold the Board's unit determination, based on the presumption of appropriateness and a duty in the employer to overcome it, improperly relieved the General Counsel of the burden to establish that an unfair labor practice occurred. Because our holding on this issue renders the Board's order unenforceable, we find it unnecessary to address St. Anthony's remaining contention that the Board improperly included Staff Nurse I employees in the bargaining unit.

[1] 29 C.F.R. § 102.67(f) provides in pertinent part:

> "(f) * * * Failure to request review shall preclude such parties from relitigating, in any related subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding, any issue which was, or could have been, raised in the representation proceeding. Denial of a request for review shall constitute an affirmance of the regional director's action which shall also preclude relitigating any such issues in any related subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding."

(Emphasis added.)

The petition for review is granted. The cross-application for enforcement is denied. The cause is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

It is so ordered.

NLRB v. Silverman's Men's Wear, Inc.

656 F.2d. 53 (3d Cir.), August 6, 1981—250 NLRB 1388

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Adams, Rosenn, and Higginbotham, Circuit Judges

Per Curiam: The National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB" or "Board") applies for enforcement of a bargaining order issued to Silverman's Men's Wear, Inc. ("Company" or "Employer"). 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). The order [1] directs the Company to recognize and bargain with General Warehousemen and Employees' Union Local 636 ("Union") as the lawfully certified collective bargaining representative of the Company's employees at its Warrendale, Pennsylvania, warehouse and distribution center. The Company admits refusal to bargain, but defends against the unfair labor practice charge on the ground that the Board's Regional Director should have held a hearing on the Company's objections to the election which led to the Union's certification.[2] Because we believe that one of the objections necessitated a hearing, we deny enforcement.

I.

The bargaining unit at the Company's distribution warehouse in Warrendale consists of 56 employees, 26 of whom were on layoff status at the time of the election. Pursuant to a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election, members of the unit voted by secret ballot on May 31, 1979, following approximately two months of campaigning. The Union won, 29 to 23, with two challenged ballots. The employer filed objections to the election, alleging that the Union's conduct in the waning days of the campaign has substantially disrupted the atmosphere of free and fair choice in which elections should be held. Although the Company originally filed five objections, only three have been preserved for our review.

First, the Employer claimed that the Union's Secretary-Treasurer, Robert Baird, significantly misrepresented to approximately 20 employees present at a meeting on May 25, 1979, the Wage scales the Union had negotiated for its members at neighboring warehouse and distribution facilities. Second, the Company charged that at the same meeting Baird had infected the election atmosphere with religious prejudice and intolerance when he referred to Mark Silverman, a Company vice-president, as a "stingy Jew." Finally, the Employer alleged that Baird and other Union officials had engaged in unlawful electioneering on the day of election.

The Company proffered witnesses in support of its allegations. The Regional Director interviewed these witnesses and, finding the objections to have raised no "substantial and material factual issues," declined to hold a hearing. 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(d) (1880). On the basis of his investigation he recommended that the Board overrule the objections and certify the results of the election. The Board adopted that recommendation.

After the election was certified, the Union demanded that the Company bargain collectively with it concerning the terms and conditions of employment at the Warrendale facility. The Company refused and an unfair labor practice charge was filed. The Board entered summary judgment for the Union, concluding that all of the Company's claims had been fully litigated and resolved during the representation proceedings. 250 N.L.R.B. 1388 (1980). This application for enforcement followed.

[1] The Decision and Order of the Board on the unfair labor practice charge are reported, Silverman's Men's Wear, Inc., 250 N.L.R.B. 1388 (1980), but the Board's one-page Decision and Certification of representative, ilverman's Men's Wear, Inc., No. 6–RC–8448 (NLRB Feb. 20, 1980), are not.

[2] This issue is properly before us because a valid certification is a prerequisite to the existence of a duty to bargain with an elected union. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 61 S.Ct. 908,85 L.Ed 1251 (1941); Vitek Elecs., Inc. v. NLRB, 653 F.2d 785, 787–788 (3d Cir. 1981).

In order to obtain a hearing on its objections to conduct affecting the outcome of a Board-conducted representation election, > the objector's proffer of evidence must prima facie warrant setting aside the election. The proffer may not be conclusory or vague; it must point to specific events and specific people. On the other hand, an evidentiary hearing is not required when, if all the evidence proffered by the objecting party is accepted as true, no ground is produced which would warrant setting aside the election.

Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 292, 296 (3d Cir. 1981). "[C]ourts will insist on an evidentiary hearing when a party's objection raises substantial and material issues of fact." Id. (citing NLRB v. Campbell Products Department, 623 F.2d 876, 879 (3d Cir. 1980)). In the instant case, the Regional Director accepted, in support of the Company's objections, statements he obtained during interviews with proferred employees who allegedly witnessed the Union misconduct. As a court we must decide whether this profered evidence raised substantial and material factual issues, so as to require a hearing. Vitek Electronics, Inc. v. NLRB, 653 F.2d 785, at 790 (3d Cir. 1981): NLRB v. Sun Drug Co., 359 F.2d 408, 415 (3d Cir. 1966).

With respect to the first objection, alleging material misrepresentations of fact, the Regional Director compared the statements of the Company's "witnesses" with the allegations contained in the objection and concluded that the statements did not support the allegations. As to the second and third objections, unlawful appeals to religious prejudice and Union electioneering at the polls, the Regional Director, assuming the truth of both the statements of the Company-proffered employees and the allegations contained in the objections, concluded that they provided no basis in law for overturning the election.

first and third objections. As to the first the only evidence, as opposed to allegation,[3] indicates merely that the union representative, in explaining the union dues structure, stated that those few union members receiving high rates of pay, $12 to $17 per hour, did not have to pay the normal monthly dues of twice the hourly rate, but instead were charged a reduced amount. Moreover, the statement was made six days prior to the election, giving the Employer ample time to respond.[4]

The Board has held that an election will be set aside "only where there has been a misrepresentation or other similar campaign trickery, which involves a substantial departure from the truth, at a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply * * *." Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 N.L.R.B. 221, 224 (1962); see also General Knit of California, Inc., 239 N.L.R.B. 619 (1978). Given the evidence proffered, we do not believe the Regional Director erred in concluding that as a matter of law there was no substantial departure from the truth at a time which prevented the Company from making an effective reply. Because this evidence could not satisfy the Hollywood Ceramics test, no ground was produced which would warrant setting aside the election on the first objection, and therefore no hearing was required on that objection. Anchor Inns, Inc., v. NLRB, 644 F.2d at 296.

The Company relies principally on Michem, Inc., 170 N.L.R.B. 362 (1968), to support its third objecting alleging unlawful electioneering. In Michem the Board overturned an election in which a union officer stood beside the line of employees waiting to vote, engaging them in conversation. The Board established a rule against "prolonged conversation between the representatives of any party to the election and voters waiting to cast ballots," based on the premise that "[t]he final minutes before an employee casts his vote should be his own, as free from interference as possible." Id. The rule, however, has limitations. First it applies to "conversations between a party and voters while the latter are in a polling area awaiting [sic] to vote." Id. at 363 (emphasis added). Accord, Harold W. Moore, 173 N.L.R.B. 1258 (1968) (rule applies only to conversations with voters "in the polling area or in line waiting to vote"). Second, the rule "does not mean that any chance, isolated, innocuous comment or inquiry by an employer or union official to a voter will necessarily void the election. We will be guided by the maxim that 'the law does not concern itself with trifles.'" 170 N.L.R.B. at 363.

[3] The Company alleged that Baird stated that the Union had obtained hourly rates of pay of $12 to $17 for workers at two nearby distribution centers. Such a statement, if made, would be untrue, for workers at those centers make considerably less. None of the employees interviewed, however, including those proffered by the Company, remembered such an explicit statement by Baird. Rather, all the employees remembering the mention of wages at $12 to $17 hourly rates stated the figures came up only in discussion of unon dues computations. It is not contended that there are no union members making those amounts.

[4] The Employer asserts that it did not receive notice of the alleged wage misrepresentation until the morning of May 29. The election began at 3:30 p.m. on May 31. Thus, even though the Board would not allow the Employer to make election speeches on company time during the 24 hours before the election, Peerless Plywood Co., 107 N.L.R.B. 427, 429 (1953), it had all of May 29 and much of May 30 to address employees at work to correct any misrepresentation. Further, although half the workforce was on layoff, the Company could reach those employees by telephone and in fact did talk to eight or nine by that method. Yet the Company never presented any clarification of the alleged wage error, either to the employees at work or to those reached while on layoff.

The incidents which the Employer alleges constituted unlawful electioneering do not fall within the Michem prohibition. The Company charges first that Baird and another union representative campaigned among employees waiting for the commencement of the election, but the alleged campaigning took placed in the warehouse cafeteria prior to the voting, not the recreation room where the polls were located. Because the campaigning was not directed to voters in the polling area, this alleged incident does not violate Michem. The second charge is that "a minute or two before the polls were to open, two union adherents burst into the polling place exclaiming 'we are going to be observers in the election, Mr. Baird, is that okay?'" This is precisely the "chance, isolated, innocuous comment" Michem excepts from its rule against conversations. There is no indication here of last minute campaigning. The third incident alleged by the Company is that a union adherent stood near the line of workers waiting to vote, "staring" at them and telling them when it was their turn to vote. The only evidence of conversation by this "starting" employee was the exchange of pleasantries. Although, as Michem counsels, parties to elections might be wise to refrain entirely from conversing with prosective voters, Id., we conclude that this third incident also was a trifle not reached by the Michem rule.[5] In sum, we agree with the Regional Director that the evidence proffered in support of the third objection would not under Michem warrant setting aside the election, and so no hearing was required on this objection either. Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d at 296.

III.

We cannot accept, however, the Regional Director's conclusion that no hearing is necessary on the second ojection. The Company alleged that at the May 25, 1979, meeting attended by approximately 20 employees Union Secretary-Treasury Robert Baird called Company Vice-President Mark Silverman a "stingy Jew." The Regional Director assumed the truth of this allegation, but concluded that "it does not afford a sufficient basis for setting aside an election." For that reason the Regional Director refused to hold a hearing on the objection. The refusal was improper.

In Sewell Manufacturing Co., 138 N.L.R.B. 66 (1962), the Board set aside an election which the union had lost 985–331 because the employer appealed to anti-black racial prejudice in its campaign literature.[6] The employer had sent to employees a number of photographs and newspaper clippings purporting to demonstrate the friendliness of union leaders to blacks and the support the union had given to several civil rights groups. By such a linkage, the employer could exploit any anti-black animus and convert it to anti-union sentiment to defeat the organizational effort. The Board in Sewell took a position by which it clearly sought to prevent such tactics. "The Board does not intend to tolerate as 'electoral propaganda' appeals or arguments which can have no purpose except to influence the racial feelings of voters in the election." Id. at 71. This view is reflected in the test announced by the Board in Sewell:

> So long * * * as a party limits itself to truthfully setting forth another party's position on matters of racial interest and does not deliberately seek to overstress and exacerbate racial feelings by irrelevant, inflammatory appeals, we shall not set aside an election on this ground. However, the burden will be on the party

[5] The Company did not allege in the Board prodeeding that the employee was a union agent. In concluding that this incident could not as a matter of law violate Michem, we find it unnecessary, as the Board also did, to determine whether the adherent, as a member of the Union's inplant organizing committee, was a union agent. See generally Season-All Indust., Inc. v. NLRB, 654 F.2d 932 (3d Cir. 1981).

[6] A second election, which the union lost 931–345, was subsequently set aside because the employer continued the improper campaign tactics. Sewell Mfg. Co., 140 N.L.R.B. 220 (1962).

> making use of a racial message to establish that it was truthful and germane, and where there is doubt as to whether the total conduct of such party is within the described bounds, the doubt will be resolved against him.

Id. at 71–72 (emphasis in original) (footnote omitted). This rule was intended to be consistent with and in furtherance of the Board's function > to conduct elections in which the employees have the opportunity to cast their ballots for or against a labor organization > in an atmosphere conducive to the sober and informed exercise of the franchise, free not only from interference, restraint, or coercion violative of the Act, but also from other elements which prevent or impede a reasoned choice.

The Board contends that the evidence proffered here was insufficient under Sewell to warrent setting aside this election. We disagree. The general rule to be derived from Sewell, and the one that we apply, is that an effective appeal to racial or religious prejudice prima facie warrants setting aside an election. The facts of this case disclosed an utterance that falls well within the proscription of that general rule. In making a remark such as the one involved here, a party does not simply set forth another party's position on matters of racial interest. Indeed, the remark, rather than identifying any position of the Employer, can typically serve only to spotlight the minority religion of the Company' principal. Such a remark has no purpose except blatantly to exploit religious prejudices of the voters. It deliberately injects "an element which is destructive of the very purpose of an election." Id. at 71. There is no question of truth or falsity in a slur such as this. We can see no reason for the remark except to inflame and incite religious or racial tensions. Thus, the Company has alleged a remark that falls within the Sewell definition and, under the rule of that case, the burden of establishing the legitimacy of the remark shifted to the Union. Without a hearing, however, the Union was never required to meet that burden; furthermore, it was a burden that the Union clearly could not have met.[7]

On the other hand, it is not clear whether the Union could have met the separate burden of proving that Baird's remark, although nothing but a slur, was nevertheless harmless. However, in concluding that the objection was meritless prior to an evidentiary hearing, the Regional Director effectively deprived the Company of its right to a considered determination on that issue. Cf. NLRB v. Staiman Brothers, 466 F.2d 564, 567 (3d Cir. 1972). In his report certifying the election results, the Regional Director explained that Baird's remark was, in his view, "[a] single, casual reference to a party's religious or ethnic background in a campaign otherwise free of racial hostility." In the Regional Director's view, Sewell, as modified by Paula Shoe Co., 121 N.L.R.B. 673 (1958), stands for the proposition that "only a deliberate and sustained appeal to racial prejudice which seeks to overstress and exacerbate racial feelings by irrelevant, inflammatory [sic] appeals affords a sufficient basis for setting aside a Board election." (Emphasis added.) The Board, pursuing this line of reasoning, argues that the incident was isolated, and therefore did not require a hearing. We cannot add our voice to this chorus. As a matter of stare decisis, it misstates Sewell. As a matter of policy, it is similarly flawed. The remark may not have been reported, but because of its sensitive nature we hold that the Regional Director could determine the extent of its probable impact on the election only after a hearing.[8] [7] In a post hoc effort to rationalize the Regional Director's report on a ground not mentioned in that report, the Board in its brief and at argument on this appeal contended that the slur was "marginally germane." Apparently the Board's counsel was attempting to justify Baird's remark for purposes of meeting the second part of the Sewell test. However, we can reject that effort on grounds, inter alia, of its own lack of merit. If the Union leader had desired to stress the executive's parsimony, he could have referred to "stingy Silverman" or the "stingy vice-president." Instead, he allegedly resorted to a disreputable stratagem of bigots. The man's religion was not germane to the proper purposes of this election effort.

[8] We need not now speculate whether there could ever be a blatant ethnic slur, having no other purpose or possible effect than to invoke irrelevant prejudices, that could properly be treated by the Board as if it had never occurred. For it may be possible that there could be a set of circumstances in which such a remark might be said, even absent an evidentiary hearing, to have had absolutely no effect on the outcome of the election. However, this was not a case in which the slur was so obviously devoid of impact as to be rejected out of hand.

In Paula Shoe Co., the Board, without a prior hearing, rejected an objection to an election based on the union's inclusion in a handbill of a slur similar in character to the one now before us. Frankly, we find such a conclusion, reached without benefit of a hearing to determine the circumstances and likely impact of such a statement, to be inconsistent with the Board's professed position that "it does not condone appeals to prejudice," 121 N.L.R.B. at 676, and we reject it as an anomaly.[9] We note further that Paula Shoe, the only case cited by the Board in which such a result was reached without benefit of a hearing, was decided before Sewell.

When it is recognized that Sewell stripped the earlier result in Paula Shoe of any possible rationale, it becomes clear that the existing cases do not insulate Baird's remarks, as a matter of law, from attack. To the contrary, they stated a standard for legitimacy that the Union is clearly unable to meet.[10] Moreover, the allegations in the Company's objection raised a prima facie case that Baird's religious slur did impermissibly infringe on the employees' freedom of choice. Twenty employees were present when the slur was allegedly made. If three were influenced in their votes by this improper remark, the outcome of the 29–23 election could have been altered. In addition, the Employer was powerless to answer a remark of this type in the way that it could have answered the alleged misrepresentation of wages. To respond to such a racial remark would only draw attention to it and perhaps fuel any bigotry inflamed by the Union leader's appeal. Because the Union resorted to religious prejudice in a manner that may have affected a significant number of employees and that precluded an effective response by the offended party, a new election may be required.[11]

We conclude that under the law announced in Sewell, the Company's allegations, if true, would warrant a new election, assuming that the totality of circumstances surrounding Baird's remarks evinced an atmosphere in which those remarks may reasonably be expected to have had a significant impact on the employees' free exercise of choice. These factors should properly be explored at a hearing, because they constitute substantial and material factual issues necessarily arising out of the allegations made in the Company's objection. See Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d at 296. Having received the Company's allegations, it was only through a hearing that the Regional Director could determine that such circumstances were not present, for only through a hearing could the union have borne its burden of proving that the utterance was harmless. Such a course—followed already by at least some Regional Directors—is necessary if elections are to be kept free, as they should be, from appeals to racial or religious prejudice.

[9] Apparently, other Regional Directors no longer follow Paula Shoe. In two recent cases Regional Directors have scheduled hearings to review what seem to us incidents potentially less damaging to free choice than that alleged here. In American Enka Co., 231 N.L.R.B. 1335, 1342 (1977), a hearing was held on an objection alleging three black union adherents had told another black worker at her home that she had been promoted so she would become a "white folks' nigger." In Coca-Cola Bottling Co. Consol., 232 N.L.R.B. 717, 713–18 720 (1977), a hearing was held on the allegation that a supervisor told four black employees that the man who would be their shop steward if the union won did not like blacks. In the present case, on the other hand, the slur was allegedly stated in front of twenty employees and the election might have come out differently if only three votes were altered.

Although in neither American Enka nor Coca-Cola were the election results ultimately set aside on these grounds, the hearings served two important functions. First, they provided the essential facts on the alleged improper conduct and its impact. Second, they indicated clearly to parties to elections that the Board will back up with action, not just tongue clicking its position that it does not condone appeals to racial prejudice.

[10] See note 7 supra. In addition to Paula Shoe, the Board on this appeal cited several other cases purporting to support the proposition that this single remark was insufficient as a matter of law to warrant setting aside an election. Although those cases are undoubtedly viable in other factual contexts, they are inapposite here. For example, in Peerless of America, inc. v. NLRB, 576 F.2d 119, 125 (7th Cir. 1978), the union had charged the employer with past discrimination against workers on the basis of sex and nationality. Such a charge, concerning a legitimate and germane issue of importance to workers, is wholly different in character from the bald, bigoted slur alleged in this case. Similarly, in NLRB v. Bancroft Mfg. Co., 516 F.2d 436, 440–44 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 914 96 S.Ct. 1112, 47 L.Ed.2d 318 (1976), the union appeals to black pride that were found not to violate either the Sewell or Hollywood Ceramics rules, were different in character than the directly abusive remark alleged here. Moreover, in Bancroft a hearing had been held to determine the specifics and impact of the allegedly offensive conduct.

[11] We note that due to the presence of these circumstances, the probable impact of Baird's remark may well have been sufficient to warrant setting aside the election under the standard announced in Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 N.L.R.B. 221 (1962), and subsequently revived and reinstated in General Knit of California, Inc., 239 N.L.R.B. 619 (1978). That the objectionable conduct was a racial slur, not a misrepresentation, does not make the Hollywood Ceramics rule inapplicable. Both can deprive employees of the "full and complete freedom of choice in selecting a bargaining representative," Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 N.L.R.B. at 223, and can destroy the "laboratory in which an experiment may be conducted, under conditions as nearly ideal as possible, to determine the uninhibited desires of the employees." General Shoe Corp., 77 N.L.R.B. 124, 127 (1948). The Board's General Counsel recognized the relevance of the rule by arguing in the Board's brief that remark did not meet the Hollywood Ceramics standard.

VI

On the alleged facts, we hold that a hearing was necessary to ascertain whether the remark alleged in the second objection was made, and, if made, the extent to which it infected the election. Accordingly, enforcement will be denied and the proceedings remanded to the Board for a hearing on this objection only.

NLRB v. Belcor, Inc. d/b/a San Jose Care & Guidance Center

652 F.2d 856 (9th Cir.), August 7, 1981—248 NLRB 1201

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before TRASK and BOOCHEVER, Circuit Judges, and CURTIS,* DISTRICT JUDGE

BOOCHEVER, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board has petitioned for enforcement of its order that Belcor, Inc. bargain with Hospital and Institutional Workers Union, Local 250, the certified collective bargaining agent. The Board's decision and order is reported at 248 N.L.R.B. 153 (1980). The principal question concerns the property of the conduct of a union representation election. Belcor has also raised an issue regarding the Board's failure to require submission of the evidence relied upon by the regional director in rejecting objections to the conduct of the election. We find that, in the absence of submission of evidence by the regional director two issues require a hearing. Thus, the Board's petition for enforcement is denied and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

The employer, Belcor, Inc., operates a mental health care facility in San Jose, California. Local 250 represents hospital service workers. On May 30, 1979, the union and Belcor signed a stipulation for certification upon consent election.[1] The Board's regional representative conducted an election on July 6, 1979. Of 50 employees eligible to vote, 32 voted for the union, 7 against, 7 ballots were challenged and 4 employees did not vote. The challenged ballots were too small in number to affect the outcome of the election.

On July 13, 1979, Belcor filed a number of objections relating to the conduct of the election. To substantiate its claims, the company filed documentary evidence and seven affidavits.

On August 17, after an ex parte investigation, the regional director issued a report in which he recommended that the Board overrule the company's objections. As required by 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(c), the company then filed with the Board a brief and its exceptions to the regional director's report. On November 20, in an unreported decision, the Board denied the company's exceptions, adopted the regional director's report, and certified Local 250 as the employees' exclusive collective bargaining representative.

In order to obtain judicial review of the election certification, the company refused to bargain with the union. The regional director issued a complaint charging the company with an unfair labor practice under § 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (5). The company admitted its refusal to bargain and again raised its objections to the conduct of the election. The case was transferred to the Board, the Board issued a motion to show cause why the general counsel's motion for summary judgment should not be granted, and the company again raised its objections to the underlying election. In its decision and order of April 17, 1980, the Board refused to reconsider the issues raised in the representation proceeding and ordered the company to bargain with the union. The Board now seeks enforcement of that order.[2]

I. FAILURE OF THE REGIONAL DIRECTOR TO SUBMIT THE ENTIRE RECORD

*The Honorable Jesse W. Curtis, Senior District Judge for the Central District of California, sitting by designation.

In transmitting the election report to the Board, the regional director neither sent the underlying documentation gathered during the region's ex parte investigation, nor submitted any of Belcor's affidavits and other documentation. When the company filed its exceptions with the Board, however, it also filed all the documents that it had given the regional director. Therefore, when the Board issued its decision certifying the election, it had before it the regional director's report, the company's exceptions, and the evidence the company had gathered to rebut the regional director's report. This material is contained in the appellate record. Therefore, any error of the regional director in failing to transmit Belcor's evidence to the Board is harmless.

The company now argues, however, that without the evidence gathered to prepare the regional director's report, the Board was unable to ascertain whether the regional director's report was supportable, and therefore the Board could not overrule the company's exceptions. This argument missess the point.

If no objections are filed, the regional director will certify an election. 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(b). If a party does file objections, the regional director must determine whether the objections are serious enough to warrant setting the election aside. The determination may be made either on the basis of an administrative investigation, or if "substantial and material" factual disputes exist, on the basis of a hearing. 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(d). In a case where no hearing is conducted, the Board will review the regional director's report and the exceptions filed to it. If it apears that no substantial factual disputes exist, the Board will decide the legal issues presented. On the other hand, if the Board finds that there are factual disputes, the case will be remanded back to the region for a hearing. 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(f). A party contesting factual findings cannot simply state a disagreement with the regional director's report. Objections must be specific and they must be supported "by offers of proof in support of findings to the contrary." N.L.R.B. v. Kenny, 488 F.2d 774, 775 (9th Cir. 1974). Furthermore, "the Board is entitled to rely on the report of the Regional Director in the absense of specific assertions of error." Id. at 776 (quoting N.L.R.B. v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., 379 F.2d 172, 178 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 339 U.S. 958, 88 S.Ct. 338, 19 L.Ed.2d 364 (1967)).

If there is a dispute between the facts as presented in the regional director's report and the facts as presented in the exceptions, the dispute must be resolved through a hearing. Factual disputes cannot be resolved on the basis of the regional director's ex parte investigation. N.L.R.B. v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., 613 F.2d 1364, 1366–67 (5th Cir.), modified on other grounds, 618 F.2d 396 (5th Cir. 1980).

In N.L.R.B. v. North Electric Co., Plant No. 10, 644 F.2d 580, 584 (6th Cir. 1981), the Sixth Circuit discussed the appropriate appellate procedures to follow where the Board adopts the director's recommendation without the benefit of the evidence before the director. In substance, we agree with these procedures to determine whether the Board abused its discretion in denying a hearing.

Where the Board certifies the union without the benefit of either a hearing or the full record, we will construe the "well pleaded factual assertions * * * most favorably to [the excepting party]." Prestolite Wire Division v. N.L.R.B., 592 F.2d 302, 307 (6th Cir. 1979). See also Reichart Furniture Co. v. N.L.R.B., 649 F.2d 397 (6th Cir. 1981). If these factual assertions create a material issue of fact, we will remand to the Board to order a hearing. If not, we will affirm the Board's decision. In this case the only question to be resolved is whether the factual issues raised by Belcor are so substantial and material that the Board should have ordered a hearing.[3] [3] Belcor also contends that the Board's regulations require forwarding the entire record. The contents of a "record" are discussed in 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g).

> (g) The notice of hearing, motions, rulings, orders, stenographic report of the hearing, stipulations, exceptions, documentary evidence, together with the objections to the conduct of the election or conduct affecting the results of the election, any report on such objections, any report on challenged ballots, exceptions to any such report, any briefs or other legal memoranda submitted by the parties, the decision of the regional director, if any, and the record previously made as described in § 102.68, shall constitute the record in the case. Materials other than those set out above shall not be a part of the record; except that in a proceeding in which no hearing is held, a party filing exceptions to a regional director's report on objections or challenges, a request for review of a regional director's decision on objections or challenges, or any opposition thereto, may append to its submission to the Board copies of documents it has timely submitted to the regional director and which were not included in the report or decision.

The first sentence of Subsection (g) does not refer specifically to evidence the regional director might gather during an ex parte investigation. The entire first sentence might be construed as referring to the record developed during a hearing. The second sentence refers specifically to

II. ELECTION IRREGULARITIES

Belcor's burden to set aside the election is a heavy one, N.L.R.B. v. Sauk Valley Manufacturing Co., Inc., 486 F.2d 1127, 1130 (9th Cir. 1973), particularly where, as here, there has been such an overwhelming vote in favor of the union. N.L.R.B. v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., Inc., 613 F.2d 1364, 1366 (5th Cir.), modified on other grounds, 618 F.2d 396 (5th Cir. 1980). Nevertheless, applying the principles we have set forth above, two issues require further evidentiary hearing.

A. The Savair Violation

In N.L.R.B. v. Savair Manufacturing Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973), the Court held that a union could not promise waivers of initiation fees for those who signed union recognition slips before an election. The Court concluded that allowing the union to buy endorsements "paints a false portrait of employees support during [its] election campaign." 414 U.S. at 277, 94 S.Ct. at 499.

The company has introduced employee affidavits which state that Rick McGiffen, an employee active in the drive to unionize the health care facility, promised the affiants fee waivers if they would sign recognition slips prior to the election. According to the evidence, eight employees may have signed recognition slips to avoid paying initiation fees.

The Board counters this evidence with two arguments. First it maintains that in a letter to hospital employees and at two pre-election meetings, the union clearly explained its policy of collecting fees. This policy did not include fee waivers of the type condemned by Savair. The director's report states that "there can be no basis for concluding that any employee was in doubt or misled as to the [union's actual policy]." (emphasis added). This contention is not supportable in view of the employee affidavits stating that they signed recognition slips to avoid paying fees.

Second, the Board maintains that McGiffen's illegal offers cannot be attributed to the union. Misconduct which is caused by union adherents rather than by the union itself must be more serious to justify setting a election aside. N.L.R.B. v. Aaron Bros. Corp., 563 F.2d 409, 412 (9th Cir. 1977).

The undisputed evidence in this case is that McGiffen was active in the union campaign, served as an election observer, solicited union recognition slips, and distributed "local 250" writing tablets. Activities as union election observers or in campaign organization activities are ordinarily, by themselves, inadequate to prove agency status. See N.L.R.B. v. Morgan Health Care Center, Inc., 618 F.2d 127, 129 (1st Cir. 1980); Owens-Corning Fiberglass Corp., 179 N.L.R.B. 219, 223 (1969), enf'd, 435 F.2d 960 (4th Cir. 1970). Nevertheless, we conclude that the evidence might support a finding that the union either authorized or condoned McGiffen's conduct. Id.; N.L.R.B. v. Golden Age Beverage Co., 415 F.2d 26, 32 n.5 (5th Cir. 1969). It was error for the Board to resolve this issue on the basis of the unsupported assertions contained in the regional director's report.

allowing mandatory meetings of employees for campaign speeches twenty-four hours before an election. In its ban on such activity, the Board specifically exempted voluntary meetings taking place off company premises in employees' free time. 107 N.L.R.B. at 430. In support of its contention that an illegal meeting took place, Belcor has proffered a five by seven index card which refers to a meeting that was to take place at someone's home. On it is written "Mandatory Attendance." The regional director's report indicates that employees treated the meeting as an informal non-mandatory get-together to discuss the union. This is possibly true, but we can not affirm on the basis of the present record which does not include supporting documentation for the director's conclusion. Resolution of this issue also requires a hearing.

the record where there has not yet been a hearing. In that instance, by suggesting that a party challenging an election might furnish evidence to the Board when it is not included in the regional director's report, the second sentence seems to contemplate a situation where the regional director may furnish the Board with only a "report or decision." At best, the regulations are inconclusive. The Fifth Circuit has considered, without deciding, the appropriate interpretation of this regulation in Birmingham Ornamental Iron Co. v. N.L.R.B., 615 F.2d 661, 665–67 (5th Cir. 1980).

C. Coercion, Sabotage and Electioneering

In the week prior to the election, a storage shed was burned down and an office was burglarized. Belcor points to these incidents to support its contention that there was at atmosphere of fear and intimidation that made it impossible to hold a fair election. The company has failed to proffer any evidence that would link the incidents to the union, or, for that matter, to show that the incidents were even related to the election. The vandalism might just as well have been caused by a mental patient or third parties. In the absence of a showing that any employee was actually coerced or intimidated by these acts, the company's claim does not raise a material issue of fact. See N.L.R.B. v. Miramar of California, Inc., 601 F.2d 422, 424 (9th Cir. 1979) (union adherents brandishing knives did not intimidate or coerce any employee as to his vote); N.L.R.B. v. Spring Road Corp., 577 F.2d 586, 588 (9th Cir. 1978) (Rock throwing, vandalism to cars and property where union was not involved was inadequate showing to require hearing). Cf. N.L.R.B. v. Masonic Homes of California, 624 F.2d 88 (9th Cir. 1980) (the union was alleged to have made harassing phone calls and one union adherent refused to allow a female employee to close the door of her home while soliciting her vote).

In addition, Belcor points to general disorder and raucousness that took place in an area immediately outside the polling area. Rick McGiffen, the union's election observer, called out to several employees to "[c]ome in and vote." One employee asked another employee how she had voted. Other employees said everyone was voting for the union. An employee stated that "[e]verybody stared at me as I entered the voting room. It made me feel uneasy." Another employee, who was wearing a pro-union button, walked in and out of an office that was in view of the polling area. Belcor makes no effort to attribute this conduct to the union. Furthermore, conversations between union representatives and employees do not constitute a violation where they are only innocuous neutral statements. South Pacific Furniture, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 627 F.2d 173, 175 (9th Cir. 1980) (statement by union observer to "come on in and vote" not electioneering). See also N.L.R.B. v. Vista Hill Foundation, 639 F.2d 479 (9th Cir. 1980) (court sustained an order where extensive conversations took place).

The employee conduct in the health care facility's lounge might be compared to that in N.L.R.B. v. Aaron Brothers Corp., 563 F.2d 409, 412 (9th Cir. 1977), where in a room adjacent to the polling area there were "loud cat calls" and "cheering and shouting." Employees yelled "come on man, let's do it." The court rejected the company's contention that this conduct necessitated a hearing absent evidence that any employees were "intimidated or influenced" by the conduct. Belcor's showing that the conduct in the lounge made affiant Morales "uneasy" is inadequate to demonstrate that any employee was unable to exercise his or her free choice at the polls. Spring City Knitting Co. v. N.L.R.B., 647 F.2d at 1019 (1981).

Affiant Sandoval stated that the "observers [emphasis added] had a list in front of them." Union and employer agents are not allowed to keep separate lists of voters in the presence of voters at the polls. This does not apply to election observers who need the official voting list to determine who is eligible to vote. See Piggly-Wiggly #011, 168 N.L.R.B. 792, 793 (1967) ("It [is] the policy of the Board to prohibit anyone from keeping any list of persons who have voted, aside from the official eligibility list used to check off the voters as they receive their ballots"). Not surprisingly, the observers in this case did have a list. There is no suggestion that anyone other than the election observers had access to a list. The evidence in this case does not warrant a hearing on the issue.

E. Failure to Provide Ballots in Spanish

The pre-election sample ballots and instructions were printed in English. The employer never suggested before the election that Spanish language ballots should have been supplied. See N.L.R.B. v. Lowell Corrugated Container Corp., 431 F.2d 1196, 1197 (1st Cir. 1970) (employer's pre-election failure to suggest need for foreign language ballots is "compelling evidence that the proposed procedure was adequate"). Fibre Leather Manufacturing Corp., 167 N.L.R.B. 393 (1967), cited by Belcor, where the Board refused to certify an election, is not on point. In that case the Board was made aware of a potential foreign language problem prior to the election. There is no evidence that any Spanish speaking employee was actually confused about the voting procedure. This contention should not be the subject of a hearing.

F. Union Logos

The company next complains that the customary small union "bug" or logo that appears on items manufactured by union labor was imprinted on identification badges worn by election observers. Belcor's statement that this "display of * * * union insignia by the Board makes it apparent that the election must be set aside," is frivolous.

G. Misrepresentations

The company's final contention is that the union substantially misrepresented facts about the employer that impaired the election. It objects to a letter mailed to employees sixteen days before the election. The letter blames the nursing home industry for preventing a bill from passing that allegedly would have allowed a wage increase for hospital employees. This claim must also be rejected. First, the company had ample time to respond. The election was held more than two weeks after the date of the letter. See Spring Knitting Co. v. N.L.R.B., 64 F.2d at 1017 (9th Cir. 1981) (eight day interval adequate time to respond). Furthermore, the issue relates to general political issues and not specific statements of fact that might be given more credibility because of their source. See Heavenly Valley Ski Area v. N.L.R.B., 552 F.2d 269, 272 (9th Cir. 1977). Belcor has not offered any evidence that the letter deceived the employees so as to affect the election process. See El Monte Tool & Die Casting, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 633 F.2d 160, 162–63 (9th Cir. 1980). Moreover, the letter does not even relate specifically to the election, but is addressed to all union members.

The case is remanded to the Board with instructions to hold an evidentiary hearing related to the alleged Savair and Peerless Plywood violations. The Board's petition to enforce its order is accordingly denied.

NLRB v. Lighthouse for the Blind of Houston

653 F.2d 206 (5th Cir.), August 21, 1981—248 NLRB 1366

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before BROWN and GARZA, Circuit Judges, and BEER*, District Judge

BEER, District Judge: The National Labor Relations Board seeks to enforce its order of April 24, 1980, against the Lighthouse for the Blind of Houston ("Lighthouse," hereinafter). The Board's decision and order is reported at 248 NLRB 1366. Our jurisdiction arises by virtue of § 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq.

The Board concluded that the Lighthouse violated § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the NLRA by refusing to bargain with the General Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Local Union 968 affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamesters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America ("Union," hereinafter), which had been certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of a production and maintenance unit of employees in the Lighthouse's Workshop A, and by refusing to furnish to the Union relevant wage and employment information concerning such employees. In so doing, the Board rejected the Lighthouse's contentions that the Board did not have statutory jurisdiction over it; that, even if the Board had statutory jurisdiction, it would not effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction over the Lighthouse; and that the blind employees in Workshop A were not "employees" within the meaning of the NLRA. We find that the Board's order is not supported by substantial evidence and that the Lighthouse has not unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union.

Lighthouse for the Blind of Houston is a nonprofit, charitable corporation with a principal office and place of business in Houston, Texas. A 35-member board of directors presides over and directs its operation. No member of the board of directors receives compensation for his services. The largest single group of board members are ladies who have served as volunteers at the Lighthouse in the past 20 years. The rest of the board members come from a cross section of the business and civic community of Houston. In providing social and technical services to blind people in the Houston area, the Lighthouse divides its operation into five departments: social services, volunteer services, library and special services, rehabilitation and industrial. The social services division provides social work and recreational services both at the facility and at the individual's residence to assist blind persons. The volunteer services division provides volunteers to support the various operations of the Lighthouse. The Lighthouse has a library and special services division, which makes braille, large print and talking books available for the unsighted community. The rehabilitation division offers vocational training which is geared toward helping visually impaired persons adapt to their surrounding environment. The fifth department, referred to by the parties as the Industrial Division, employs blind people to manufacture a product for sale, e. g. felt-tipped pens, mops, commercial scrub brushes, disinfectants and detergents. Pursuants to contracts with the U. S. General Services Administration (GSA), many of the felt-tipped pens, as well as the detergent and the disinfectant, are supplied to federal government agencies pursuant to the Wagner O'Day Act, 41 U.S.C. § 46, et seq. (1970).

In 1977, the Industrial Division generated $4,620,000 in revenue from sales of the merchandise mentioned above. This resulted in a so-called profit of $237,000 which was then fed back into the Lighthouse's overall operation. Designation of this amount as "profit" depends, of course, on the bookkeeping methods applied. While there is serious doubt that an actual business-based "profit" was, in fact, earned, there is no doubt that the accounting methods here applied did, in fact, result in a profit figure.

The Industrial Division is divided into Workshop A and Workshop B. Workshop B employees are blind persons who, in many instances, have multiple handicaps and are, thus, unable to be fully productive. Some of these individuals have, after training and rehabilitation in Workshop B, "graduated" to Workshop A.

Workshop A employs approximately 70 individuals, 62 of whom are blind or have severe visual impairments. They perform a variety of packaging and assembling jobs; produce felt-tipped pens, mops and commercial scrub brushes; and bottle disinfectants and detergents. They also perform subcontracting work for various private companies, e. g. assembling fishing rod holders, doing grease check assembly jobs and filling notebook binders with inserts.

Workshop A employees are all paid at least the federal minimum wage for their work. At the time of the representative hearing below, wages in Workshop A ranged from $2.89 per hour to $3.25 or $3.40 per hour, the variations depending on differing levels of productivity. All the Workshop A employees are covered for workmen's compensation, unemployment insurance, hospitalization insurance, certain pension rights, and receive nine paid holidays per year. These workers also receive certain other benefits which vary according to their tenure, including vacation and sick leave.

Workshop A employees are eligible to receive merit raises based on productivity; however, merit raises are subject to recission if production subsequently drops. The progress of each of the workers in Workshop A is evaluated twice a year.

The supervisors in Workship A are, generally, former workers in Workshop A. Most of them are blind. They have limited authority to check time cards to make sure that all workers are present, dock workers who are late approve requests to leave work early or to not come in on a particular day. With regard to discipline, the Lighthouse attempts to resolve problems with its workers by counseling. If a problem can be corrected by counseling and discussion, it is. If a problem persists, it is usually referred to the general manager of the Lighthouse, who then attempts to personally resolve the problem. Failing this, the matter is referred to a workers' committee made up of workers in all departments who are elected each year by the workers themselves. This committee can make final decisions with respect to suspension or termination. In the last four years (prior to 1977), there have been three terminations authorized by this committee. This committee also meets to consider problems of the Lighthouse in general. They are kept informed as to what is projected for the future, the schedule for production, new items being worked on, the holiday situation, vacation schedules and general administration. The Lighthouse has no formal program for placement of blind workers but does attempt to place individuals in private industry on an ad hoc basis, particularly with certain employers. Over the years, there has been an average of four persons a year placed in private employment through Lighthouse-sponsored efforts. Unfortunately, experience indicates that the private sector is not very anxious to hire blind and multi-handicapped workers.

The issues presented here are whether the Board properly asserted jurisdiction over the Lighthouse and whether the Board properly determined that the blind and multi-handicapped workers in the Lighthouse's Workshop A facility are employees covered by the National Labor Relations Act.

A review of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, 29 U.S.C. § 151, et seq., and its legislative history leads to the conclusion that Congress did not intend or expect the exercise of jurisdiction by the Board over nonprofit institutions in general that do not affect commerce. NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490, 99 S.Ct. 1313, 59 L.Ed.2d 533 (1979).

It is clear from the facts cited above that the individuals who comprise Workshop A and whom the Union now seeks to represent are employees in the generic sense of the word. Those individuals work for a set number of hours a day, perform functions which are or recognized economic value and are paid for the performance of those functions. However, the fundamental relation between these individuals and the Lighthouse is different in many significant aspects from a normal employment relationship.

The focus of the Lighthouse's employment concern is upon rehabilitating its clients and providing the maximum service possible to sheltered workshop clients. For example, regular employees in a typical industrial environment are hired because they have the skill and ability to perform the work involved. Workshop clients, on the other hand, are referred to the workshop by a counselor or social worker precisely because of their inability to preform work in the competitive job market.

The disciplinary structure is not handled in the same manner as in the private industry. When infractions occur, supervisory personnel sit down with the client, talk to him, and try to find out if there was a reason for his problem. If the client cannot be helped in the area where he is working, he is moved to another area. Only if the problem is critical and cannot be handled with counseling, are harsher measures used. Disciplinary discharges are extremely rare. Furthermore, wage payments based on productivity are completely consistent with the rehabilitative purposes of the sheltered workshop. 29 U.S.C. § 214(c) specifically authorizes sheltered workshops' payment to workers to be based upon severity of handicap and productivity. Such payments do not transform a sheltered workshop into an enterprise in which decisions are governed by economic considerations, rather payments relating to productivity are an integral part of the service provided by the workshop. They foster the goal of rehabilitation by providing an incentive to employees to learn the skills and, thus, become sufficiently acclimated to a work environment to move eventually from the sheltered workshop into the competitive job market.

It is certainly true that the Lighthouse's activities are governed, to some extent, by economic considerations. They must pay sufficient attention to economics to maintain a viable entity capable of rendering necessary rehabilitation services. However, the so-called $237,000 profit made by the Lighthouse in 1977 represents only a negligible impact on commerce, in light of all the circumstances here. If it were not for the moneys received from the federal government, as well as other charitable agencies, the Lighthouse would have lost money in fiscal 1977. Further, the vast majority of the products produced at the Lighthouse go to the General Services Administration of the United States government pursuant to the Wagner O'Day Act. Under this statute, the GSA must purchase the Lighthouse products at a price fixed by a presidential committee. 41 U.S.C. §§ 46–48.

Moreover, it is undisputed in the record that the main purpose of the Lighthouse is to provide a wide range of services to blind and disabled persons in order to enhance the quality of their lives including a serious effort to provide its clients with experience which may lead to employment in the competitive job market. When the Lighthouse receives word of a job that is available in private industry, Lighthouse staff personnel are sent to the job site to assist in fully developing that job for a blind worker. Though approximately 50% of those placed in outside private industry find it necessary to return to the Lighthouse, those who return are never refused.

This unusual "employer-client" relationship centers around a corcern for the welfare of the clients. To require collective bargaining in this context is to risk intrusion into the rehabilitative process by bargaining demands which could prejudice the Lighthouse's many faceted efforts at rehabilitation.

Although the Lighthouse clients who are employed in Workshop A are arguably employees within the meaning of the Act, it will not effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction over them. Goodwill Industries of Southern California, 231 NLRB 536 (1977).

The Board's contended differentiations between Goodwill Industries, supra, and the case at bar are not, in our view, significant. The Board contends that the Lighthouse workers are paid variable wages based upon performance and productivity, and are disciplined using "normal economic and business considerations." As previously noted, the variable wage policy is designed to foster rehabilitation, and discipline procudures certainly vary from those in effect in private industry. On the whole, clients are counseled rather than disciplined, and they are rarely, if ever, discharged. In fact, the record reflects that the Lighthouse's employment policies are commensurate with its rehabilitative objective. Thus, we conclude that the Board's order is not supported by substantial evidence; that the Lighthouse has not unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union.

The Board's application for enforcement of its order is denied.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

Southern Indiana Gas and Electric Co. v. NLRB

657 F.2d 878 (7th Cir.), August 10, 1981—249 NLRB 252

On petition to set aside Board Order

Before PELL and BAUER, Circuit Judges, and WILL, Senior District Judge*

PELL, Circuit Judge: Southern Indiana Gas and Electric Company (Company) has petitioned this court pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) to set aside a final order [1] of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) which found that the Company violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA or Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5).

The Company has recognized the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 702, AFL–CIO, (Union) as the exclusive bargaining representative of its production and maintenance employees. The Union, seeking also to represent the Company's five Power Control Center's "System Supervisors" (system supervisors), petitioned the Board to direct an election among these employees. The Company opposed the election contending that these employees were (1) "supervisors" exempt from the Act's coverage under 29 U.S.C. § 152(11), and/or (2) managerial employees traditionally omitted from the Act's coverage by the Board, see NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., 416 U.S. 267, 94 S.Ct. 1757, 40 L.Ed.2d 134 (1974). A Regional Director of the Board held an evidentiary hearing, concluded that these employees were not supervisory or managerial personnel, and directed an election.[2] The union prevailed and was certified as the system supervisors' exclusive bargaining representative.

The Company refused to bargain with respect to these employees. The Union thereupon filed an unfair labor practice charge on October 29, 1979. The Board's Regional Director issued a complaint and the General Counsel moved for summary judgment which the Board granted. The Board found the Company in violation of Sections 8(a)(1) and (5) [3] of the NLRA and ordered it to bargain with the Union regarding the system supervisors.

The Company continued to refuse to bargain and filed this petition to review and set aside the Board's order. The Board has cross-applied for enforcement pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(e).

The Company's Operations

The Company provides electrical utility service [4] to residential, industrial, and commercial customers over a 751-mile network of high voltage lines in an eight-county area around Vanderburgh County, Indiana. The Company operates a total of seventeen generating units eight of which are dual-fueled with oil and gas, eight are coal-fired, while the remaining unit operates on natural gas. Four of the generating units at the Warwick Generating Complex are jointly owned by the Company and the Aluminum Company of America Generating Company (Alcoa). The Company interconnects with six other utilities at seven interchange points which enables the Company to buy or sell power with these utilities.

The Power Control Center (Center), located apart from the Company's other facilities, monitors the generation and transmission of power for the entire system to ensure the supply of a safe and reliable energy source in the most economical manner. The Center, which operates 24 hours per day, seven days a week, is staffed by the Chief system supervisor, Claude Hunt, five system supervisors, and one clerk. Hunt works the daytime shift and is present during five of the twenty-one weekly shifts. At other times the system supervisors work alone although they generally can get in touch with Hunt, James Van Meter, the Director of Power Production and Procurement, or Norman Wagner, the Vice-President of Operations, if problems arise.

The Role of the System Supervisors

System Supervisors monitor the entire system through electronic measuring devices which enable them to supervise the production and transmission of power, the receipt of purchased power, and the distribution of sold power. They prepare load forecasts daily to predict the amount of power necessary to maintain the system. Factors such as temperature forecasts, customers' additional power requests, and the estimated capability of each generating unit are considered. Because these plans are only predictions, they are subject to frequent modification by system supervisors to adjust to actual capability and load requirements. Actual need may differ from projected need due to changes within the system such as the loss of equipment or interchanges, or due to unanticipated power demand.

If a power shortage develops, system supervisors can exercise a variety of options. They may direct control operators at any of the various generating plants to increase production, and can even start up the more expensive gas-operated turbine if necessary.[5] If no generation is available, the supervisors have authority to instruct Alcoa to curtail added power use from the jointly owned plant. These lines remain down until system supervisors authorize Alcoa to bring them back up. Finally, supervisors may decide to purchase power from other utilities. They can commit the Company financially on an instantaneous basis. When purchasing emergency power, system supervisors rarely have time to contact their superiors. Likewise, if the system's generation exceeds present demand for current, the supervisors must curtail generation or sell the excess power.

(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title;

(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title.

[4] Although the Company also produces and distributes gas, the parties have stipulated that only electrical operations are relevant here because the system supervisors have no connection with the gas operations.

[5] Because the cost of operating the gas turbine is higher, a decision to implement its use is considered a major decision. It is true, as the Board points out, that approval by or notification of Hunt or one of his superiors is generally desirable when a system supervisor makes this decision. The Board, however, would have us believe that the supervisors cannot implement such a decision under any circumstances without prior approval. The testimony of James Van Meter, the Director of Power Production and Procurement, belies that representation:

> Q: Now, with respect to putting on the gas turbine and taking it off, isn't it correct that most of the time the system supervisor must contact the chief, yourself, or Mr. Wagner in order to do that except in an emergency, to protect the system?
> A: * * * [J]ust like any major decision that any of us make due to the cost of that, he reviews that with Mr. Hunt, who will inform me definitely about our need for this. But, that would be no different than me making the decision. I would certainly inform Mr. Wagner of that decision, too.

(Emphasis added.) As discussed hereinafter, the chain of command is always subject to subversion in the event of an emergency, particularly when superiors are not available.

Naturally, Hunt and his superiors have input into major decisions resulting from the modification of a load forecast when they are available. The system supervisors, however, frequently operate the Center alone. Time pressures can prohibit them from clearing their decisions with their superiors. James Van Meter testified at a Board hearing regarding the authority possessed by system supervisors:

> Q: * * * Do they [system supervisors] have the right to modify or alter that plan [load forecast] during the course of the day depending upon what the realities of the loads are?
> A: I would venture to say that there are very few days that go by that the plan isn't altered, and that's true not only of the day shift, but also of the night shift where the supervisors are alone. There are some modifications that must be made to every plant [sic] due to unforeseen circumstances that come up as a result of generating or buying electricity.
> Q: And that can occur at any time during any of the shifts?
> A: That can occur at any time.
> Q: Do they supervise that judgment independently of any orders?
> A: They have the right and responsibility to exercise that independently of anything to protect our system.

Beyond power generation and procurement, the system supervisors are also responsible for power transmission. They regulate power flow throughout the system by remote control of transmission substations. System supervisors also oversee maintenance and repair work. They possess the sole authority to order a piece of equipment to be taken out of service or to prohibit its removal. Such a decision requires a detailed consideration of factors such as the overall condition of the system and the likelihood that any particular order may overload other lines. Repair work requires switching which is the diversion and rerouting of power to isolate the line or equipment requiring repair.

Ordinary switching necessitates the preparation of a switching schedule detailing instructions to be carried out by field personnel. These schedules are prepared by the Chief system supervisor or by system supervisors. In nonemergency situations, every schedule prepared by a system supervisor is checked by a second system supervisor or by the Chief supervisor, and by the field operations personnel who requested the repairs. Field supervisors dispatch crews to affected sites. When the crew is positioned in the field and ready to accept orders from the system supervisor at the Center, a field employee talks to a system supervisor by mobile radio. Field employees generally have copies of the switching schedules to assist them in following the system supervisor's radioed instructions.

System supervisors also prepare switching schedules in emergency situations which might occur due to a storm or accident. Unless the emergency occurs during the daytime shift, these schedules usually are not reviewed by anyone. In an emergency situation, the field personnel dispatched to the site have no copies of the switching schedule. The system supervisors are totally responsible to direct people in the field. They radio step-by-step instructions to the field employees, direct them to remain where they are, or instruct them to move to another location. Although system supervisors do not themselves reprimand field personnel, they do report misconduct.

Other duties of the system supervisors include recording data, preparing reports required by the Federal Power Commission and other agencies, and maintaining a written log of problems that arise.

At the hearing, one system supervisor denied ever being invited to management meetings.[6] Van Meter, however, testified that system supervisors are invited to some management meetings and training sessions. He stated that attendance is mandatory, but was unsure whether all of the supervisors actually did attend or whether any disciplinary action was taken against those who failed to attend.

Standard of Review

The Board is accorded substantial discretion when determining whether an employee is exempt from the Act due to managerial status, see NLRB v. Yeshiva Univ., 444 U.S. 672, 691, 100 S.Ct. 856, 867, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1908), or supervisory rank, Ameri- can Diversified Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 640 F.2d 893, 894 (7th Cir. 1981). Consequently, Board findings will be upheld as long as they are supported by substantial evidence. See, e. g., Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 487–88 71 S.Ct. 456, 463–65, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); American Diversified Foods, Inc., supra. The substantial evidence standard requires this court to review the entire record, including that evidence which detracts from the Board's decision, even though evidence supporting the Board's conclusions, viewed by itself, might seem "substantial." If the record, considered in its entirety, "clearly precludes the Board's decision from being justified by a fair estimate of the worth of the testimony of witnesses or its informed judgment on matters within its special competence," the Board's decision must be set aside. Universal Camera, 340 U.S. at 490, 71 S.Ct. at 466, quoted in NLRB v. Adam & Eve Cosmetics, Inc., 567 F.2d 723, 727 (7th Cir. 1977).

Supervisory Status

Supervisors are excluded from the Act's coverage by 29 U.S.C. § 152(3). Section 152(11) defines a supervisor as > * * * any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

We find the Board's conclusion that system supervisors are not supervisors within the meaning of the statute unsupported by substantial evidence.[7] Upon a review of the entire record, we are convinced that these supervisors possess the authority responsibly to direct other employees. Because § 152(11) must be read in the disjunctive, supervisory status is proven if the evidence establishes the presence of any one of the criteria listed.[8] See, e. g., American Diversified Foods, supra, 640 F.2d at 896; Adam & Eve Cosmetics, supra, 567 F.2d at 727.

The Board concluded that system supervisors were not supervisors in the statutory sense for several reasons. It noted, for example, that the supervisors are located in facilities separate from, and function within a different employment hierarchy than, the generating station operators or the switching personnel whom they allegedly direct. It is true that the Power Control Center staff, generating station personnel, and repair crews do operate independently of one another to the extent that each is separately housed and each has its own immediate chain of command. It is also true, as the Board indicates, that system supervisors do not assign particular employees to perform switching operations. Rather, they contact a foreman in the field who assigns individuals to report to the locations specified by the system supervisors. The Board further emphasizes the fact that while supervisors can design switching schedules which require overtime, they cannot designate the particular employee who will perform the overtime work. In its brief on appeal, the Board characterizes contacts between system supervisors and other employees as mere cooperative endeavors in which system supervisors routinely impart technical expertise to other employees in the form of requests, not orders.

These factors alone, however, will not deprive the employees of supervisory status if the record as a whole indicates that they do responsibly direct other employees. Upon strikingly similar facts, the Ninth Circuit in Arizona Public Service Co. v.

[7] The Company's alternate contention, that the managerial exemption from the Act applies in this case, rests largely on the system supervisors' ability to bind the Company financially without prior approval in emergencies. While the court in Arizona Public Service Co. v. NLRB, 453 F.2d 228, 233 n.10 (9th Cir. 1971), considered such power to be an indicator of supervisory status, the Board treated such authority as evidence of managerial status in Central Maine Power Co., 151 NLRB 42, 44–46 (1965). Electrical utility employees whose purchases have been deemed "routine," however, have not been accorded managerial status. Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 1151, 1158 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 831, 91 S.Ct. 63, 27 L.Ed.2d 62 (1970); Connecticut Light and Power Co., 121 NLRB 768, 770 (1958). We recognize that system supervisors' authority independently to commit the Company's credit in this case quite possibly exceeds that previously considered "routine." We need not decide, however, whether this purchasing function would establish an independent basis for exemption from the Act as either a supervisory or managerial responsibility because we find system supervisors' directions to field employees sufficient to establish supervisory status.

[8] Although the Company does not allege that system supervisors discipline field employees, evidence established that they do report misconduct to field supervisors. However, we do not decide whether system supervisors thereby possessed the power "effectively to recommend" discipline.

NLRB, 453 F.2d 288 (9th Cir. 1971), ruled that an electrical utility's employees, whose duties and responsibilities were analogous to those of the system supervisors in the case at bar, were in fact statutory supervisors. That court rejected many of the arguments advanced here by reasoning that "[t]he effective exercise of authority is nonetheless supervisory though it is passed on through another supervisory employee. Nor is it less supervisory power because it is couched in non-demanding terms." Id. at 233 (citation and footnote omitted). See Maine Yankee Atomic Power Co. v. NLRB, 624 F.2d 347, 362 (1st Cir. 1980). System supervisors do direct other employees. Van Meter testified that they give instructions to generating operators to increase or decrease power. System supervisor Cook testified that he had the responsibility to direct individual switchmen in the field. The system supervisor's job description stipulates that they have "the authority to direct crews to assure safe and adequate power production." The fact that system supervisors do not exercise complete authority over these employees does not mean that they do not direct them. Nor does the cooperative spirit in which the work is performed deprive the supervisors of supervisory status.

The Board further contends that to the extent the system supervisors do direct other employees, their instructions are nonetheless routine and require little discretion or independent judgment. The Board found, for example, that "with regard to the switching operation, * * * there's no showing that would support an inference that there is a large significant discretion available to the system supervisors in the manner in which they divert live current from areas to be worked on by production and maintenance employees." Section 152(11) does condition the supervisory exemption upon the exercise of one of the enumerated duties in a nonroutine manner and explicitly "requires the use of independent judgment." See, e. g., Adam & Eve Cosmetics, supra, 567 F.2d at 747; Westinghouse Electric Corp. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 1151, 1156 (7th Cir. 1970). We find the Board's conclusion that this condition was not satisfied, however, to be unsupported by the record.

The Board virtually ignored the scope of the system supervisor's authority in emergency situations. If an emergency arises which requires switching during Hunt's absence, a system supervisor must design an emergency schedule and, as with routine switching, give field employees step-by-step instructions by radio. In emergencies, field employees do not possess a copy of the switching instructions and therefore are totally dependent upon the system supervisors to guide them safely through their work, and to release them when the task is completed. As James Gordon, Director of Electric Operations, testified:

> Under emergency switching procedures, the responsibility is up to the system supervisor to totally direct people in the field, to get equipment out of service. Under emergencies, a line fault, if that line has to be broken down and sectionalized, it's his responsibility to direct people to the location where the work needs to be done.
> He also quite often does call a district manager and ask him to assign so many people that can perform the switching under his direction.

While the Board emphasizes that switching schedules are usually double-checked, it disregards the fact that schedules generally are not checked by anyone in emergency situations unless the emergency occurs during the day shift when Hunt is present.

Although the record does reveal one occasion when Hunt reported in during an emergency when he was not on shift, this does not undermine the supervisor's authority to act wholly without guidance when a superior is not available. The Company's position description, for example, states that:

> The major challenge to this position is the ability to handle effectively necessary spontaneous action and decisions required in emergencies. The incumbent works within the framework of Company policies and practices. He must have approval for power transmitting but can take measures necessary to assure power supply and protect system in time of emergency or absence of Supervisor, Chief System.

Gordon testified that "[o]n an emergency basis, [the system supervisor] has to be knowledgeable enough to be able to sit down and make up a [switching] schedule on pretty short notice. He is there by himself, so he has to make those decisions." The system supervisors here are like those in Arizona Public Service, supra, 453 F.2d at 232, who were held to be "more than simple supervisors of machines. They effectively direct field operations during emergencies and after hours."

The Board minimizes the system supervisors' role in emergencies, presumably because emergencies are infrequent. Yet, it is well settled that it is the existence of supervisory authority, not the frequency of its use, which determines supervisory status under § 152(11). American Diversified Foods, supra, 640 F.2d at 896; Arizona Public Service, supra, 453 F.2d at 230; Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers Int'l Union v. NLRB, 455 F.2d 237, 244 (D.C.Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 1039, 92 S.Ct. 713, 30 L.Ed.2d 730 (1972); Ohio Power Co. v. NLRB, 176 F.2d 385, 388 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 899, 70 S.Ct. 249, 94 L.Ed. 553 (1949); Graves Trucking, Inc., 246 N.L.R.B. No. 52 (1979).

The Union, as intervenor-respondent, contends that system supervisors' discretion in switching operations is severely limited by the existence of switching guidelines. Gordon, however, testified that existing guidelines ensure "that the proper paperwork is done, the proper people are informed and that someone does not get out of line," but that "the actual step-by-step procedures are determined by the system supervisor based on his knowledge of the system. * * *" Although some routine switching schedules are additionally available, there was no evidence to indicate that they cover every potential contingency or that they are actually used by the supervisors. Each switching situation is unique and each switching schedule "will vary with whatever line section or piece of equipment that you want to get out of service," Gordon testified. In NLRB v. Detroit Edison Co., 537 F.2d 239 (6th Cir. 1976), a factually similar case, the court rejected the argument advanced here. The court reasoned that while specific written instructions covered a number of situations confronted by the system supervisors in that case, there was no evidence to show either that those guidelines covered every possible situation which might arise, or that the employees could not depart from the instructions if they decided that another course of action was more advantageous. See Maine Yankee, supra, 624 F.2d at 362 ("[E]ven were we to assume that written guidelines could somewhere be found to cover virtually every eventuality, we do not think that this would demonstrate that independent judgment is not exercised."). We find the existence of written guidelines regarding switching operations insufficient to deprive the system supervisors of supervisory status.[9]

The employer buttresses its position by advancing the argument that unless the system supervisors are considered supervisors, the Company's electrical system is operated without any supervision during certain hours every day and in emergencies. The Board seeks to rebut this argument by pointing out that certain superiors generally are on-call, and that during one emergency Hunt returned to work. The Board ignores the fact that system supervisors are responsible for the complete operation of the Company's electrical system. The fact that they may consult with superiors in emergencies if time permits, or that they may advise superiors of actions taken, should not obscure the fact that they can do virtually anything necessary to protect the system. The record does not support the contention that system supervisors never take discretionary action without consulting superiors. Emergency switching schedules, for instance, are rarely reviewed by anyone unless the emergency occurs during the day shift. Purchases of emergency power can and do occur without prior approval.

The Company's expectation that supervisors will advise one of their superiors of decisions taken independently does not eliminate their authority to take independent action when necessary. As James Van Meter testified regarding the system supervisor's decision to start up the more expensive gas turbine:

> [J]ust like any major decision that any of us make due to the cost of that, he reviews that with Mr. Hunt, who will inform me definitely about our need for this. But, that would be no different than me making the decision. I would certainly inform Mr. Wagner [Vice-President of Operations] of that decision too.

[9] As Company employees, the system supervisors are also necessarily circumscribed to some degree by the existence of general Company policy. The Company's job description for system supervisors, for example, states that these employees work within Company policies and practices, and that they should perform their duties with the goal of economy, efficiency, and safe power production. This very same document, however, authorizes the system supervisors to take whatever measures they deem necessary to assure power supply and to protect the system in emergencies. Moreover, it is axiomatic that all employees, including top management, work within the framework of Company policy and practices. All Company employees are, or should be, necessarily interested in producing power cheaply and safely.

> I want to say, that doesn't mean that [the system supervisor] doesn't make the deci-

Neither the Company's expectation that system supervisors will inform a superior of actions taken in emergencies, nor the very infrequency of emergency situations, detracts from the supervisory status of these employees. Maine Yankee, supra, 624 F.2d at 364; Detroit Edison, supra, 537 F.2d at 244. Emergency decisions made by lower level supervisory personnel are eventually passed up through the management hierarchy in almost every business. Detroit Edison, id. There is no guarantee that a superior will be available for consultation after hours, or in every emergency, even assuming that time factors would permit such contact. Especially in light of this, if these employees are not supervisors, then the Company's entire electrical system operates without any supervision in the evenings, on weekends, and in emergencies. Arizona Public Service, supra, 453 F.2d at 231–32 n.7. Cf. American Diversified Foods, supra, 640 F.2d at 896 (fact that shift managers are generally highest ranking employees in store provided one indicator of supervisory status).

The Board's decision fails to mention the Company's own determination of the system supervisor's status. The Company has the right to define jobs within its own hierarchy and, therefore, to grant supervisory status to employees provided that the actual job duties reflect the designation.[10] The Company's designation of the position as supervisory, while not itself determinative, is certainly a significant factor in ascertaining employee status. Maine Yankee, 624 F.2d at 365; Arizona Public Service, 453 F.2d at 231. The job description in this case stipulates that system supervisors have authority to direct switching crews and to take unsupervised emergency measures when necessary. The description specifies that the "major challenge" of the job is "the ability to handle effectively necessary spontaneous actions and decisions required in emergencies." It also acknowledges that the employees' impact on purchasing and power control has an "unmeasurable" effect upon Company revenue and capital. The Board does not assert that the job description is a mere pretense by not fairly reflecting the actual duties of system supervisors. Thus, the Board should have accorded some weight to the job description. Maine Yankee, 624 F.2d at 364–65; West Penn Power Co. v. NLRB, 337, F.2d 993, 997–98 (3d Cir. 1964).

Finally, we acknowledge two minor factors which, aggregated with the evidence supporting supervisory status detailed above, buttress our determination that the Board's conclusion was not based upon substantial evidence. Initially, we note the contested state of the evidence regarding employee participation in management meetings. The Board found that system supervisors did not attend any management meetings. One witness, however, stated that system supervisors were in fact invited to some management meetings. The sole system supervisor who testified stated that he was never invited to management meetings. Yet he also testified, at another point, that he had in fact made a reservation for the annual management meeting dinner, but failed to attend for personal reasons. See note 6, supra, and accompanying text. While seizing upon the supervisor's denial that he never attended management meetings, the Board gave no weight to Company testimony that system supervisors were invited to meetings. In Maine Yankee, 624 F.2d at 365, however, the court cited the Company's invitation "to attend so-called management meetings" as one factor supporting supervisory status. The Board oversimplified the dispute in this case when it credited a portion of the contradictory testimony of the only system supervisor who testified[11] and disregarded the Company's testimony on the subject. Secondly, the Board failed to give any weight to the fact that system supervisors are salaried employees ineligible for overtime pay. Again, while this factor, standing alone, may not be overly significant, it does merit some weight when considered with the rest of the evidence supporting supervisory status. Maine Yankee, 624 F.2d at 365.

[10] In Maine Yankee, supra, 624 F.2d at 349 n.4, the First Circuit reasoned that the employer's designation of the employees as supervisory was a reasonable effort to exclusively identify them with the interests of the employer. The company's interest in allying those employees exclusively with management was compelling because the employees bore substantial responsibility which, if not conscientiously carried out, could result in an accident exposing the company to significant liability.

In the present case, the electric utility employer's potential liability in the event of a malfunction is not comparable to that of the nuclear facility in Maine Yankee. Nonetheless, the principle is applicable. In each case, the employees possess the potential to assert a significant economic impact on the employer. A system supervisor's failure to make the most advantageous decision could, for example, result in a power blackout or in higher energy production costs due to the unnecessary use of an expensive source of power. System supervisors also possess the authority to commit the Company financially on an instantaneous basis when buying power from interconnected utilities. Given these potential economic impacts, it is not unreasonable for the Company to designate the system supervisor's position as supervisory since the Company certainly has an interest in ensuring that the system supervisors are exclusively identified with management.

We consider Maine Yankee, Detroit Edison, and Arizona Public Service, to be controlling cases on the issue of supervisory status as applied to these facts. As the Board points out, these cases are not wholly identical factually. Nonetheless, we find the Board's attempts to distinguish them unpersuasive.

The Board contends that the system supervisors in Arizona Public Service possessed a substantially greater degree of independent authority than the employees in this case. The Board highlights the Ninth Circuit's determinations that the employees in Arizona Public Service chose which linemen would work, when, and where and that the supervisors ignored the chain of command in an emergency. 453 F.2d at 232–33. By contrast, the Board argues, the employees in this case do not choose which individual will perform the work, they merely coordinate switching operations, and they allegedly follow the chain of command even in emergencies. A thorough comparison of the cases indicates that these asserted distinctions reflect only semantic differences.

While we cannot review the record upon which the Ninth Circuit based its decision, we have examined the Board's findings in that case. The Board's Decision and Direction of Election, 182 N.L.R.B. 505 (1970),[12] indicates that the supervisors there worked within an overall framework virtually identical to that in the instant case. In that case, the Board found that the system supervisors "[n]ormally * * * dispatch crews of servicemen to trouble spots by orders issued to station managers or foremen, although in remote areas or in emergency situations there may also be direct contact with crewmembers." Id. at 506 (emphasis added). Employees "may also direct generating plants to increase or decrease power generation.* * * This is ordinarily done by contacting station managers or foremen at such plants." Id. Furthermore, the Board in that case found that the system supervisors > normally transmit their instructions to * * * [supervisors in the field], who in turn provide specific local supervision to field employees. * * * Direct contacts with field employees * * * appear to be limited and almost always by telephone, and even then often occur only after the field employees have been ordered by their immediate supervisors to communicate with the [system supervisors] in order to clarify general directions already received from them. Furthermore, orders give directly to field employees * * * are normally in the form of routine directives to perform certain known mechanical functions.

Id. (emphasis added).

The day-to-day operations in the case at bar are similar, and, if anything, reflect greater independence and direction since the system supervisors here maintain communications with and direct switching personnel in the field even in routine situations.

Upon review, the Ninth Circuit in Arizona Public Service primarily focused upon the system supervisors' authority in emergency situations or after hours, a subject largely ignored by the Board. We find that the authority possessed by system supervisors in emergency situations in the instant case does not differ substantially from that exercised by the employees in Arizona Public Service. As detailed above, system supervisors can and do bypass the chain of command in emergencies when no prior is available for consultation, or when time simply does not permit the delay inherent in clearing an instantaneous decision with a superior. Similarly, in Arizona Public Service, the court noted that the employees discussed courses of action with their superiors when "there is no immediate threat to life or property and a superior is available. * * *" 453 F.2d at 232.

The Board advances a similar contention regarding the employees in Detroit Edison. In that case, the court found that the functions performed by the company's system supervisors were virtually identical to those performed by the system supervisors in Arizona Public Service, 537 F.2d at 242. The Board points out that in Detroit Edison the system supervisors issued "literally thousands of instructions to field personnel." Id. at 243. The Board, however, does not show that the situation in the instant case is any different. System supervisors here direct switching personnel in the field in every switching operation—routine and emergency. They also instruct generating operators to increase or decrease production. Although apparently no one has counted the precise number of such directives which have ever issued, the record implies that it is clearly a substantial number, surely approaching, and quite possibly surpassing, "literally thousands."

Second, the Board contends that employee responsibilities in Detroit Edison differed from those at hand because evidence in that case showed that system supervisors "take over" any operator who ordinarily would be controlled by a local supervisor anytime the situation warrants. 537 F.2d at 243. In the case at bar, system supervisors similarly "take over" switchment in the field particularly in emergencies by guiding them through the switching operation, directing them to new locations when necessary, and releasing them when finished. That the system supervisors do not initially assign the particular individual who will perform the switching operation is immaterial. The supervisors nevertheless directly instruct the employee. Both routine and emergency switching schedules originate in the Power Control Center. Field supervisors dispatch the switchmen, but do not themselves formulate the switching procedure. Finally, contrary to the Board's assertion, higher officials do not always handle emergency situations. The record reflects only one instance in which the Chief system supervisor returned after hours during an emergency. The record also indicates that system supervisors possess authority to take independent actions when necessary to protect the system.

Finally, the Board distinguished Maine Yankee in oral argument by emphasizing that in that case the Shift Operating Supervisor (SOS) had authority to direct one other employee also stationed in the control room, and two others (by telephone) stationed elsewhere in the plant. The fact that the court found that the SOS directed both sets of employees indicates that presence of the employees subject to direction in the same immediate area as the supervisor is not required. The Board asserts that, in the case at bar, the employees do not report directly to the supervisors as was the case in Maine Yankee. Although the Board is correct, Arizona Power and Detroit Edison so illustrate that supervisors can responsibly direct other employees even when those employees routinely report to someone else.

The Board prefers to analogize the SOS in Maine Yankee to the Chief system supervisor in this case. The comparison quickly disintegrates, however, because the Board concedes that a plant shift superintendent, the SOS's superior, was always present at the plant (though not always in the control room) on every shift, thus rendering the SOS the second ranking employee on every shift. 624 F.2d at 351, 352. Although at any moment, the plant superintendent might have been traveling between parts of the plant and therefore momentarily beyond contact, the fact remained that the superintendent was always on the premises. This contrasts starkly with the situation in the instant case where the system supervisors operate wholly on their own in evenings and on weekends. Although superiors may be accessible by telephone, their absence from the plant necessarily renders them somewhat less accessible than a superior stationed within the very same plant. Yet the court in Maine Yankee found significance in the possible momentary inaccessibility of the plant superintendent because the evidence "established that in the event of an emergency, the SOS's clear responsibility includes the taking, on his own initative, of the proper corrective measures where prior consultation with the plant shift superintendent is not possible." Id. at 363.

Cases cited by the Board in its brief on appeal which might arguably mandate a different result are inapposite. In Exxon Pipeline Co. v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 704, 706 (5th Cir. 1979), for example, employees monitoring oil flow in pipelines notified field personnel when problems arose but, unlike the present case, they had "no further authority or responsibility to direct the field personnel in the manner of performing their remedial duties." In Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers Int'l Union v. NLRB, 445 F.2d 237, 242 (D.C. Cir. 1971), Cert. denied, 404 U.S. 1039, 92 S. Ct. 713, 30 L.Ed.2d 730 (1972), helium plant operators were specifically instructed to contact the plant manager in any emergency "rather than to exercise 'independent judgment.' " By contrast, system supervisors in the case at bar are explicitly admonished to take any necessary measures to protect the system in emergencies anytime supervisors are unavailable or time pressures forbid consultation.

In its decision the Board cites prior NLRB decisions[13] ruling that electrical utility dispatchers (which the Board finds, without discussion, to be "obviously analogous" to system supervisors) were neither supervisory nor managerial personnel. Arizona Public Service Co., 182 N.L.R.B. 505 (1970), enf. denied 453 F.2d 228 (9th Cir. 1971), and West Penn Power Co., 139 N.L.R.B. 810 (1962), enf. denied 337 F.2d 993 (3d Cir. 1964), however, undermine the Board's conclusion here since enforcement was ultimately denied in both cases. The system supervisors' responsibility actually to direct employees in the field is significantly broader than authority of the dispatchers in Western Colorado Power Co., 190 N.L.R.B. 564, 566 (1971), who could "effect the assignment of other employees only remotely by calling for a line crew at an outlying station in emergency situations." Similarly, this case is unlike Connecticut Light and Power Co., 121 N.L.R.B. 768 (1958), in which the Board denied both supervisory and managerial status to an electrical utility's load dispatchers. On the surface, the dispatchers' responsibilities seen somewhat analogous to many of the duties performed by system supervisors, but the opinion contains too little detail to ascertain the actual amount of authority possessed by the dispatchers. The Board accorded substantial significance to the existence of "detailed written rules" which, it found, abrogated the dispatchers' independence. Id. at 770. To the extent that these regulations were so detailed and binding as to prohibit any exercise of independent judgment, Conneticut Light and Power differs from the case at bar in a crucial respect. To the extent, however, that the Board may have mischaracterized rules which this and other circuits consider mere written guidelines[14] allowing independent discretion, the Board's view clearly is contrary to the law as it exists today. For the same reason, this case is also unlike Boston Gas. Co., 136 N.L.R.B. 219, 223 (1962), in which action taken by dispatchers in emergency situations required some inital discretion, but essentially "involve[d] certain predetermined procedures varying in each case only in a degree corresponding to the extent of the emergency." Finally, in Baltimore Gas and Electric Co., 138 N.L.R.B. 270, 277 (1962), in which action taken by dispatchers in emergency situations required some inital discretion, but essentially "involve[d] certain predetermined procedures varying in each case only in a degree corresponding to the extent of the emergency." Finally, in Baltimore Gas and Electric Co., 138 N.L.R.B. 270, 277 (1962), the Board granted supervisory status to chief and senior load dispatches, but denied that status to the remaining load dispatchers. Chief and senior dispatchers forecasted and scheduled electric loads as do the system supervisors in the case at bar. The Board shed no further light upon dispatchers' responsibilities except to note that the lower level dispatchers worked under the immediate supervision of, or performed their duties according to explict written directions left by, the senior dispatcher. 138 N.L.R.B. at 277. Consequently, we cannot conclude that the duties of lower level dispatchers and system supervisors are identical, or that the responsibilities of chief or senior dispatchers and system supervisors differ significantly.[15]

For the reasons stated herein, the Company's petition to set aside the Board's order is granted and the Board's cross-application for enforcement is denied.

Petition To Set Aside Granted; Enforcment Denied.

[13] While Board decisions merit respectful consideration as authority, we do note that the orders cited by the Board involving electrical utility dispatchers which have been reviewed by the courts have been denied enforcement.

[14] The courts have rejected the argument that written guidelines preclude independent judgment where the evidence does not show (1) that they cover any situation which might arise, and (2) that employees cannot depart from the guidelines even when they conclude that another course of action would be more appropriate. Maine Yankee, 624 F.2d at 362; Detroit Edison, 537 F.2d at 243.

[15] We find it unnecessary to discuss Idaho Power Co., 126 N.L.R.B. 547, 551–52 (1960), cited by the Board in the instant case, because Idaho Power discussed dispatchers only in relation to their alleged managerial status, an issue which we decline to resolve in the context of the present case.

NLRB v. Delchamps, Inc.

On petition to enforce Board Order

653 F.2d 225 (5th Cir.), August 14, 1981; rehearing and rehearing on banc denied October 7, 1981—244 NLRB 366

Before KRAVITCH and THOMAS A. CLARK Circuit Judges, and LYNNE,* District Judge

LYNNE District Judge: Pursuant to the provisions of 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) has petitioned this Court for enforcement of its order reported at 244 NLRB No. 51 (August 20, 1979), directed against respondent, Delchamps, Inc.

Vigorously resisting the enforcement of such order, respondent insists that the Board's findings of fact which undergird its legal conclusion that Delchamps violated 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) are unsupported by substantial evidence in the record.

It bears repeating that our duty to canvass "the whole record" in assessing the substantiality of the evidence supporting the Board's order is demanding indeed. As explicated in Universal Camera Corp. v. Labor Board, 340 U.S. 474, 487–8, 71 S.Ct. 456, 463–4, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951):

> Whether or not it was ever permissible for courts to determine the substantiality of evidence supporting a Labor Board decision merely on the basis of evidence which in and of itself justified it, without taking into account contradictory evidence or evidence from which conflicting inferences could be drawn, the new legislation definitely precludes such a theory of review and bars its practice. The substantiality of evidence must take into account whatever in the record fairly detracts from its weight.
> To be sure, the requirement for canvassing "the whole record" in order to ascertain substantiality does not furnish a calculus of value by which a reviewing court can assess the evidence. Nor was it intended to negative the function of the Labor Board as one of those agencies presumably rquipped or informed by experience to deal with a specialized field of knowledge, whose findings within that field carry the authority of an expertness which courts do not possess and therefore must respect. Nor does it mean that even as to matters not requiring expertise a court may displace the Board's choice between two fairly conflicting views, even though the court would justifiably have made a different choice had the matter been before it de novo.

Agreeing with the findings and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ), the Board concluded that Delchamps violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) by engaging in the following subtle practices, inter alia, to discourage unionization of its work force:

(1) Delchamps threatened employees with loss of employment in the event of unionization, and threatened not to sign a contract if its employees joined the union;

(2) It coercively interrogated employees concerning union activities and sympathies, and restricted employee movement within its stores because of union activity, and

(3) It created among its employees the impression of surveillance of union activities.

Having canvassed the whole record, we find that there is substantial evidence, albeit forcefully contested, from which the Board could have found the foregoing violations.

Respondent contends that the finding of coercion was infected by error committed by the ALJ in excluding proffered evidence regarding the friendly relationship between its assistant manager, Rejczyk, and some of its employees. We disagree, The existence of friendship between a manager and an employee is only one factor to be considered in determining whether the manager's questions are coercive. Both Board and the Courts must weigh the totality of circumstances surrounding the interrogation. Federal-Mogul v. NLRB, 566 F.2d 1245, 1249 (5th Cir. 1978). Moreover, Ms. Rejczyk did not question employees in a friendly and informal manner. She sought out particular employees to question and recorded their responses in writing.

Additionally, respondent insists that the ALJ erred in excluding documents relating to the alleged unfair labor practices of the union. This contention is without merit. The document concerned involved unfair labor practice charges against the union which were dissmissed by the General Counsel. Federal-Mogul, supra.

More troublesome is the Board's conclusion, in rejecting the contrary determination of the ALJ, that the pre-election luncheon and dinner meetings conducted by respondent violated Section 8(a)(1). Substantial evidence in the record supports the Board's finding that, except for the June 15 meeting on the day preceding the election, respondent permitted employees of its several stores who were not on duty to clock in and receive pay for attendance upon these meetings at which free meals were served. While some union supporters attended these meetings, the more active and vocal of their number were excluded.

While an employer may exclude union supporters from meetings held during work hours at which it expresses its opposition to unionization, Mueller Brass Co., 220 NLRB 1127 (1975), enforcement denied, 544 F.2d 815 (5th Cir.1977), and its conduct in providing free meals to employees during non-working hours at campaign meetings does not, per se, constitute interference with an election, Northern States Beef, Inc., 226 NLRB 365 (1976), Ohmite Manufacturing Company, 111 NLRB 888 (1955), we are constrained to agree with the Board that the combination of these two tactics, to which is added the payment of wages to some, but not all, of its employees for attendance at meeting during their scheduled off-hours constitutes a violation of the Act.

Turning to the remedy proposed by the ALJ and adopted by the Board, we are reminded that the Board has broad discretion in fashioning appropriate remedial measures and its decision must be given "special respect", NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 609, 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct 1918, 1937, 1939, n.32, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), and "considerable weight", Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. N.L.R.B., 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed 1568 (1943). Its order should not be altered by the court unless it is a "patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act." Id.

We readily agree that the cease and desist order was clearly appropriate, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c). The affirmative requirement that a "Notice of Employees" be posted at all seventeen of respondent's stores within the loosely described Mobile metropolitan area causes us some pause. Strenuously objecting to the wide-spread posting requirement, respondent insists that the record reveals that the unfair labor practice findings made by the Board implicated only the manager and assistant manager of its store in Fairhope, Alabama (No. 34), the assistant manager of Store No. 46 in Mobile, and one employee of Store No. 45 in Spanish Fort. Therefore, respondent submits that the requirement of posting at the remaining fourteen stores is an unduly excessive and harsh remedy.

The strong surface appeal of this argument is undercut by the findings of the ALJ that since the unfair labor practices affected more than one of respondent's stores in the seventeen store bargaining unit in Mobile and Baldwin Counties, and because of the "close association" between that group of stores, the ends of the Act would best be achieved by requiring it to post such notices at all seventeen stores. This finding is supported by substantial evidence, both direct and inferential, in the record. Indeed, the "close association" which precipitated this affirmative remedy is the logical result of the intermingling of the employees of most of respondent's stores at the luncheon and dinner meetings.

ENFORCED.

Alaska Statebank v. NLRB

653 F.2d 1285 (9th Cir.), August 17, 1981—250 NLRB 1384

On petition to review Board Order

Before WRIGHT and HUG, Circuit Judges, and EAST,* District Judge

1286

EAST, District Judge: Alaska Statebank (employer) petitions for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) directing the employer to bargain with the union elected by the employees at the employer's Kenai branch bank. 250 NLRB No. 179. The employer challenges the finding of the Board that eligible employees at the Kenai branch alone constitute an appropriate bargaining unit, contending that the only appropriate unit is one composed of employees at all of its branches and head office. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order.

*Honorable William East, Senior United States District Judge for the District of Oregon, sitting by designation.

The employer bank has a head office in Anchorage and nine branch offices: four in Anchorage, three in Fairbanks, one in Unalaska (Dutch Harbor), and the one in Kenai involved here. Fifteen of the employer's approximately 168 employees work at the Kenai branch. The Kenai branch is 150 miles from Anchorage, 526 from Fairbanks and over 850 miles from Dutch Harbor. There is little employee interchange between the various branches. Although conditions of employment such as wages, hours, and benefits are uniform throughout the bank, each branch manager independently hires, fires, promotes and disciplines branch employees, albeit subject to head office subsequent oversight and general approval.

On October 15, 1979, the United Food & Commercial Workers Union Local 1496 filed a representation petition with the Board, seeking certification as the bargaining representative of the Kenai branch employees. On November 15, 1979, the Regional Director issued his decision that the employees at the branch bank constituted an appropriate bargaining unit under Section 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C. § 159. An election was held; the employer refused to bargain with the elected union, and the Regional Director issued a complaint charging the employer with unfair labor practices in refusing to bargain. After the Board affirmed the findings and conclusions of the Regional Director, this appeal ensued.

The Act itself provides little guidance to the Board in determining what an appropriate bargaining unit shall be. When the Act does give instruction, it does so in relation to the rights of employees.[1] Assuring employees of the free exercise of their rights is the paramount criterion in determining what will be the bargaining unit.

The Board's judgment as to what bargaining unit will serve this purpose will rarely be disturbed on appeal. The unit selected need only be an appropriate one; it need not be the only appropriate one or even the optimal unit. Beck Corp. v. NLRB, 590 F.2d 290 (9th Cir. 1978). "Because this is an area where special expertise is needed, the Board has exceptionally broad discretion in determining an appropriate unit * * * . Unless clear arbitrary or capricious, the board's legal conclusion—that the unit is appropriate or inappropriate—will be credited on appeal." Pacific Southwest Airlines v. NLRB, 587 F.2d 1032, 1037 (9th Cir. 1978).

Employers have generally fought a losing battle with the Board in arguing for employer-wide instead of single location bargaining units. Instead the Board has adopted, in the retail sales, industrial, insurance, and banking industries, a presumption that a single store, plant, office or branch is an appropriate unit. This presumption has generally received approval by the courts. See, e.g., NLRB v. Lerner Stores Corp., 506 F.2d 706 (9th Cir. 1974) (retail stores); Spring City Knitting Co. v. NLRB, 647 F.2d 1011 (9th Cir. 1981) (industrial); State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 411 F.2d 356 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 832, 90 S.Ct. 87, 24 L.Ed.2d 83 (1969) (insurance); Banco Credito y Ahorro Ponceno v. NLRB, 390 F.2d 110 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 832, 89 S.Ct. 101,21 L.Ed.2d 102 (1968) (banking).

The Courts of Appeals for two Circuits have considered the multi- versus single-plant unit issue in bank cases. The First Circuit, in Banco Credito, enforced a designation of a single branch as an appropriate unit with facts similar to those in the present case. As here, there was considerable centralization of banking operations and a centralized determination of labor relations policy, with branch employees working under a bank-wide classification system with uniform salaries, hours, and fringe benefits. Services were also centrally administered, with central check clearing, etc. The court held that the factors of supervision by the branch managers over employees on a day-to-day basis, geographic dispersion (the branch office was 40 miles from the head office, and 16 miles from another branch), and the lack of employee interchange (of 206 transfers in the previous 2½ years, only two involved the branch), justified the Board's designation of a single branch unit.

[1] Section 9(b), 29 U.S.C. § 159(b), provides:

> The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this Act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof * * * .

(Emphasis added.) These rights are given in Section 7, 29 U.S.C. § 157:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities * * *

The Sixth Circuit, on the other hand, has held that the Board abused its discretion in designating a single branch bank as a unit. Wayne Oakland Bank v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 666 (6th Cir. 1972). Instead of disagreeing with the rationale of Banco Credito, however, the court distinguished that case on two factors: geographic proximity (all branches in Wayne Oakland were within 25 miles of the main office) and substantial employee interchange, which the court felt would create friction and chaos in labor relations were one branch to unionize while others did not.

This court has already approved the single-location unit presumption in the retail sales field. In NLRB v. Lerner Stores Corp., 506 F.2d 706, we enforced an order by the Board that designated a single store, out of 400 stores nationwide, as a bargaining unit. The employer argued that a unit composed of all seven San Francisco area stores was the only appropriate one. This court stated that one of the ways the single-store presumption can be overcome is by evidence that the single store "lacks 'meaningful identity as a self-contained economic unit.'" Id. at 708. In deciding that the single store was an identifiable economic unit, we focused on the amount of employee interchange between the Bay Area stores, concluding that a 10% exchange between stores over a five-year period was an insufficient amount to preclude a single-store unit. We further stated that centralized control over labor policies will not preclude a single-store bargaining unit. Id.

We find no reason why the banking industry should be excepted from the single-location unit presumption already adopted for the retail sales field. As the Board has stated, this would only "deny employees in the expected industry the same rights enjoyed by employees in other industries." Wyandotte Savings Bank, 245 NLRB No. 120 (1979).

Applying the factors used in Lerner, we cannot find that a bank-wide unit is the only appropriate one. The Kenai branch is geographically isolated, local managers retain control over day-to-day employee relations, and there is no significant amount of employee interchange between the branches. Distance between the branches frustrates effective union activities, since employees would be greatly inconvenienced if not prohibited in attending union meetings hundreds of miles away. Differences in cost of living at the different branch locations might also hinder collective bargaining.

Given these geographic conditions, the employer has not met its burden of showing that the designated unit is an inappropriate one for the purposes of collective bargaining. Employees at the Kenai branch comprise an indentifiable and autonomous unit, and the Board did not abuse its discretion in designating them as a bargaining unit. We, therefore, deny the employer's petition for review and grant enforcement of the Board's order.

ENFORCED.

The Berry School v. NLRB

653 F.2d 966 (5th Cir.), August 17, 1981—239 NLRB 1160

On petition to review Board Order

Before GEWIN,* RONEY and HATCHETT Circuit Judges

RONEY, Circuit Judge: this case is before the Court on petition for review and cross-application for enforcement of an order of the National Labor Relations Board finding The Berry Schools committed an unfair labor practice by granting only a substandard salary increase to Dr. N. Gordon Carper for the 1977-78 Academic year. Because there is insufficient evidence in the record to support the Board's finding that the action was in retaliation for Carper's protected concerted activity, we set aside the Board's order and deny enforcement.

Briefly stated, the facts are these. Dr. Carper joined the faculty of Berry College in 1965 as Assistant Professor of History and Chairman of the Social Science Department. He was subsequently promoted to full professor, awarded tenure and named one of four Dana Professors, a distinguished chair. In March 1975 Carper attended an informal meeting of approximately forty faculty members to discuss salary increases. This group, termed the "Concerned Forty," appointed Carper chairman of an ad hoc committee to investigate the possible advantages of collective bargaining for the faculty. The committee met twice but never made a report. After being made aware of these activities, the President of Berry College, Dr. John R. Bertrand, gave a speech before the faculty and staff explaining why he believed collective bargaining was inappropriate at Berry. He referred in his speech to a "small power bloc" allegedly maneuvering to gain control over the faculty. Shortly thereafter Carper was replaced as chairman of the Social Science Department and the faculty member who has organized the Concerned Forty meeting, Dr. Joyce Jackson, was denied promotion to full professorship.

*This case is being decided by a quorum due to the death of Judge Gewin on May 15, 1981. 28 U.S.C. § 46(d).

Initially, The Berry Schools was charged with violating section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C.A. § 158(a)(1), for demoting Carper and failing to promote Dr. Jackson. The Board ruled that Carper, as department chairman, was not protected by the Act because he exercised supervisory powers, but that failure to promote Jackson was in reprisal for her attempts to engage in protected activity. The Berry Schools, 234 N.L.R.B. No. 145. In The Berry Schools v. NLRB, 627 F.2d 692 (5th Cir. 1980) (Brerry I), this Court affirmed the Board's ruling as to Carper but reversed the finding of an unfair labor practice as to Jackson because there were legitimate reasons for not promoting her and President Bertrand had decided not to promote her several months before she engaged in protected activity.

After he was removed as department chairman, Carper continued to speak out regarding certain administration practices. In particular, during faculty meetings in January and February of 1977, he advocated a ten percent salary increase for all faculty and renewal of a sabbatical program. These suggestions were overwhelmingly endorsed by the faculty.

Friction developed between Carper and his replacement as department chairman, Dr. Robert Geisel. As part of the salary review process Geisel was required to evaluate each member of his department at the beginning of each year, based on his previous year's performance. In January 1977, Geisel rated Carper as "below average," the lowest possible ranking. The Associate Dean for Arts and Sciences, Dr. Barbara Abels, also was to make an independent evaluation of each professor in Geisel's department. She too rated Carper as below average. these evaluations were sent to the Vice President and Dean of Academic Affairs, Dr. Doyle Mathis. Although Mathis could add his own evaluation if he disagreed with the prior two, he did not make an independent evaluation of Carper. Mathis then met with two other administrators, the Director of Management and Planning and the Controller, to determine tentative salary increases for each faculty member. The tentative increases were submitted to President Bertrand, who approved a $700 increase for Carper without question. The $700 represented a 3.35 percent increase for Carper. The average percentage increase for all continuing faculty for 1977–78 was 6.21 percent.

While the decision of this Court in Berry I was pending, the instant action was initiated charging that Carper's failure to get a larger salary increase was motivated by unlawful animus. Although the Administration Law Judge (ALJ) concluded there was insufficient evidence in the record to show that Carper had been discriminated against because of his protected activity, the Board reversed.

Section 8(a)(1) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of rights" protected by the Act. An employer's denial of part or all of an employee's salary increase for engaging in protected activity is a violation of section 8(a)(1). See NLRB v. Dothan Eagle, Inc, 434 F.2d 93, 97–99 (5th Cir 1970).

The Board's ruling that an unfair labor practice has been committed must be sustained by the Court if it is supported by substantial evidence in the record:

> If the Board's decision is based upon such relevant evidence as might be accepted as adequate by a reasonable person, we are not at liberty to deny enforcement merely because the evidence may also reasonably support other conclusions or because we might have reached a different conclusion had the matter come before this Court de novo. NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S.

> 254, 88 S.Ct. 988, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968); NLRB v. O. A. Fuller Super Markets, Inc., 374 F.2d 197 (5th Cir. 1967); NLRB v. Camco, Inc., 369 F.2d 125 (5th Cir. 1966). Although the scope of our review is thus limited, we may deny enforcement of an order of the Board if, after full review of the record, we are unable conscientiously to conclude that the evidence supporting the Board's decision is substantial. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. [474] at 488, 71 S.Ct. 456 [95 L.Ed. 456] [(1951)]; NLRB v. O. A. Fuller Super Markets, Inc., 374 F.2d at 200.

NLRB v. Mueller Brass Co., 509 F.2d 704, 706–07 (5th Cir. 1975). Moreover, where the Board has reversed a decision of the ALJ finding no unlawful behavior, the Court has an obligation to examine the evidence and findings of the Board more critically then if the two were in agreement. NLRB v. Florida Medical Center, Inc., 576 F.2d 666, 674 (5th Cir. 1978).

Carper's substandard salary increase could properly result from his poor evaluation. The ALJ found, and the Board did not dispute, that Carper was not discriminated against in comparison with other professors who received a below average evaluation. Of the ten professors so rated, only one received a salary increase of more than $700 ($850 or 4.4 percent) and four received no raise at all (one contract was not renewed).

The Board, however, decided the poor evaluation was illegally motivated, a conclusion based on timing. Prior to 1976, Carper had consistently been rated as above average ("excellent" or "good to excellent" on the scale used in previous years). The Board found that Carper continued to perform as an outstanding professor during 1975 and 1976 and should have been rated as above average. In light of its finding that Carper was engaged in protected activity at the time and that Berry College had expressed animus toward such activity, the Board determined that a prima facie case of discrimination could be inferred. The Board discredited Berry College's stated reasons for rating Carper below average. It is this determination of the Board that is unsupported by the record. The General Counsel failed to show the stated reasons were pretextual and therefore failed to sustain its burden of proving by substantial evidence that the substandard salary increase was unlawfully motivated. See Federal-Mogul Corp. v. NLRB, 6 F.2d 1245, 1259 (5th Cir. 1978); Frosty Morn Meats, Inc. v. NLRB, 296 F.2d 617 (5th Cir. 1961).

The department chairman, Dr. Geisel, testified he evaluated Carper as below average in 1977 because of what he perceived as Carper's hostile and uncooperative attitude toward him and within the department generally after his 1975 demotion. Geisel stated that in making evaluations he gave heavy weight to the teaching performance of the faculty member and that he considered "relations with the college, duties within a department, advising, and of course, class activities themselves" particularly important. Geisel cited numerous examples of Carper's alleged poor attitude after he was replaced as department chairman: refusing to give up the chairman's office; failing to return departmental forms on time; making derogatory statements about recently hired department members; submitting a grade for a student he was not assigned to supervise; not following department rules concerning the handling of student evaluation forms; not keeping scheduled office hours; complaining about teaching an 8:00 a. m. class; intimidating student advisees; using class time to criticize The Berry College administration; and changing class times without following the proper procedures. Geisel also testified he could not recall a single member of the department who had not complained to him about Carper's attitude. The magnitude of Geisel's dissatisfaction with Carper was evidenced by the fact he recommended that Carper not be continued in his position, although he noted that Carper held tenure.

Carper testified regarding many of these problems. The ALJ sided with Carper in most instances and concluded that Geisel had not acted objectively in evaluating Carper as below average. Nevertheless, the ALJ found that Geisel believed the problems to be real and that his evaluation was made in good faith based upon such belief and not upon Carper's protected activity. The Board deferred to this finding of the ALJ, which was amply supported by the record (regardless of who was right or wrong as between Geisel and Carper). It nonetheless found an unfair labor practice because each of the other administrators involved in the evaluation process accepted the subpar evaluation without question.

The ALJ drew no specific conclusions regarding Associate Dean Abels' evaluation of Carper. Abels testified that her 1977 evaluations were based on the ratings given by the department chairman, a disire to achieve uniformity between departments, and her own independent knowledge of the faculty member. Since she was new in her position, Abels said she gave rather heavy weight to the department chairman's evaluation, making a different evaluation only if she had reason to believe the chairman was wrong. Thus, she gave eight evaluations exactly the same as Dr. Geisel and gave only one professor a different (and higher) evaluation.

With regard to Dr. Carper, Abels mentioned four factors from her personal knowledge which led her to believe Geisel's below average evaluation was appropriate: (1) Carper's workload was among the lowest of the fulltime faculty in his department; (2) he changed the meeting time for some of his classes; (3) he complained bitterly about being required to teach an 8:00 a.m. class; and (4) from her exposure to informal student conversations, she felt student feeling toward Carper's teaching in 1976 was not particularly good.

The Board failed to consider this last stated reason and discounted the other three as not supported by the record. The Board found that Carper's workload was actually above average and that Geisel had approved the one documented class change. It further found Carper had reason to complain about teaching the 8:00 a.m. class and that the College had acted unreasonably in this regard.

It is unnecessary for the Court to scrutinize in detail the Board's findings as to what actually occurred. It is sufficient to say the testimony was conflicting with regard to Carper's workload and his request for time changes and the Board was entitled to draw the conclusions it did. Regardless of what was true in fact, however, the Board did not find, nor could it on the record, that Abels did not in good faith believe the stated reasons to be true. She testified the records showed that Carper taught the absolute minimum number of required hours in 1976. No documentary evidence was offered to dispute this testimony. Although Carper stated his workload in fact was rather heavy because of the number of upper level preparations, Abels was not questioned about this.

Whether or not Geisel eventually approved Carper's request for a class change, it is clear from the record that a confrontation had occurred and that Geisel believed Carper had acted improperly. Again, there is no record evidence from which the Board could conclude that Abels did not reasonably believe the incident occurred.

Finally, in rejecting Abels' testimony regarding the 8:00 a.m. class the Board stated, "[a]s to his 'complaining bitterly' about teaching an 8:00 a.m. class, the Administrative Law Judge found, and we agree, that Dr. Carper had reason to argue against the setting of that class for that time and that the administration should have understood his concerns." The Board's analysis completely misses the mark. Whether the school acted unreasonably or made a bad managerial decision in requiring Carper to teach the course at 8:00 a.m. is totally beside the point. The only relevant question is whether Abels in good faith based her evaluation on the belief that Carper's complaints were unfounded. As this Court has often stated,

> The Board's error is the frequent one in which the existence of the reasons stated by the employer as the basis for the [unfavorable action] is evaluated in terms of its reasonableness.* * * But as we have so often said: management is for management. Neither Board nor Court can second-guess it or give it gentle guidance by over-the-shoulder supervision. Management can [take unfavorable action] for good cause, or bad cause or no cause at all. It has, as the master of its own business affairs, complete freedom with but one specified definite qualification: it may not [take unfavorable action] when the real motivating purpose is to do that which Section 8(a)[(1)] forbids.

Florida Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 587 F.2d 735, 745 (5th Cir. 1979), (quoting NLRB v. McGahey, 233 F.2d 406, 413 (5th Cir. 1956)).

After a thorough review of the record, we cannot find sufficient evidence to permit the Board to conclude that Abels' evaluation was illegally motivated. Although some of Abels' stated reasons may not have been true in fact, there is simply no evidence from which to infer that she did not believe them to be accurate. Abels herself did not express any animus toward the exercise of protected rights and it would be pure speculation to say her evaluation was based on Carper's protected activity. An unlawful purpose is not lightly to be inferred. "Mere suspicions of unlawful motivation are not sufficient to constitute substantial evidence." Federal-Mogul Corp., 566 F.2d at 1259.

The Court is not unaware of the difficulty of proving pretext. In the context of this case, however, where it is clear that problems existed between Geisel and Carper, and where there is no other evidence showing the administrators did not or could not in good faith have believed the problems to be real, this showing alone is insufficient to rebut the College's explanation for the evaluation.

Although the Board discredited certain justifications offered by the other administrators for Carper's below average evaluation, these individuals were primarily involved in setting the actual salaries and not in determining or reviewing the evaluations received. Dean Mathis was the only administrator other than Abels and Geisel who could add his own evaluation. His testimony as to why he did not make an independent evaluation of Carper was credible and this failure alone is insufficient to support a finding of unlawful motivation.

Thus, the only support in the record for finding an unfair labor practice is the College's knowledge of Carper's protected activity and its biased attitude. General bias, however, without any specific evidence that Carper's substandard salary increase was unlawfully motivated, cannot support a finding of an unfair labor practice. "An unlawful motivation * * * cannot be based solely on the general bias or anti-union attitude of the employer, whether proved or conceded, but must be established by other facts in each individual case." Florida Steel Corp., 587 F.2d at 744. See NLRB v. Speed Queen, 469 F.2d 189, 194 (8th Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Dan River Mills, Inc., 274 F.2d 381, 384 (5th Cir. 1960). The decision of the department chairman and the associate dean to evaluate Carper as below average may not have been a good or reasonable one, but so long as it was not in retaliation for protected activity the Board had no jurisdiction to question it. As suggested in Berry I, the courts and the Board should be loathe to intrude into the internal affairs of a college or university, particularly in regard to its academic judgments, absent a clear showing that an unlawful practice has occurred. 627 F.2d at 706. Without substantial evidence in the record as a whole from which the Board could reasonably infer a causal connection between Berry College's anti-organizational attitude and Carper's substandard evaluation and salary increase, see Mueller Brass Co., 509 F.2d at 711, we decline to enforce the Board's order.

ORDER SET ASIDE; ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

NLRB v. Blake Construction Co., Inc., and its alter ego, M & S Building Supplies, Inc.

663 F.2d 272 (D.C. Cir.) August 17, 1981—245 NLRB 630

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before MCGOWAN, WILKEY and WALD, Circuit Judges

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge WALD

WALD, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) seeks enforcement of its Order[1] against Blake Construction Co., Inc., and M & S Building Supplies, Inc. (referred to individually as Blake and M & S, and collectively as the Company). We grant the application except for paragraphs 1(c), 2(b) and 2(d) of the order insofar as they are premised on the Company's violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. (the Act) through failure to extend to its non-union employees the benefits of an existing collective bargaining agreement and through refusal to deal with the Union as the representative of these non-union employees. As explained more fully below we decline to enforce these portions of the order because we find that these violations were neither alleged in the complaint issued by the Board General Counsel nor fully and fairly litigated in the ensuing proceedings.

I. BACKGROUND

The record depicts grave violations of the Act which, with the exception discussed below, the Company concedes on this appeal. The following facts are undisputed.

[1] 245 NLRB No. 76 (Sept. 28, 1979), the Board's order also appears at J.A. 17-22 ("J.A.——" refers to pages in the Joint Appendix filed in conjunction with this appeal).

Blake, a District of Columbia corporation, is a general contractor engaged in the construction of buildings. Blake owned and operated a yard and warehouse located at 5700 Columbia Park Road, Landover, Maryland until February 1978.

M & S is also a District of Columbia corporation established in 1974 to purchase and resell construction materials, equipment and supplies. M & S and Blake have the same corporate headquarters at 1120 Connecticut Avenue, N.W., the same principal stockholders and the same corporate officers. Prior to February 1978 M & S sold building materials and provided a tire fill service at a warehouse located at 5710 Columbia Park Road, Landover, Maryland immediately adjacent to the Blake yard and warehouse described above.

Blake was a member of the Construction Contractor's Council, Inc. (3-C's), a multi-employer bargaining unit. As such Blake was subject to a collective bargaining agreement (the contract) entered into by the 3-C's and Local 639 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters (the Union) which was in effect from August 1, 1975 to April 30, 1978.

In July 1977 a Blake employee called the Union and complained that although not a Union member, as an employee of Blake he should be covered by the contract and receive the prevailing wages provided therein.[2] At this time only seven out of a fluctuating work force of 40–70 Blake employees belonged to the Union.[3] In response to this call a Union representative[4] visited Blake's Columbia Park yard and warehouse. There he spoke to between eight and ten employees who were not members of the Union. Since these non-union employees performed work that fell within the job classifications covered by the contract, and in light of the fact that the contract contained a Union security clause,[5] the Union representative attempted unsuccessfully to ascertain from a supervisor at Blake why the Union security provision had not been enforced.[6]

On August 31, 1977 the Union official met again with the Blake supervisor at the Columbia Park site in the presence of two employees who had applied for Union membership and had paid the Union initiation fee. At this meeting the Union requested that the two employees be paid the wage specified in the contract. The Company refused but indicated it would be willing to negotiate a separate contract for these two men.

Subsequently the Union shop steward actively solicited for Union memberships among Blake employees and obtained approximately thirty-two signed Union authorization cards. The Union then sought to have the Company pay these recruits the prevailing contract rate. The Company refused.

On February 17, 1978, Blake and M & S entered into a contract providing that, as of February 18, 1978, M & S—which previously had only one part-time employee—would thereafter furnish all personnel for the operation of Blake's Columbia Park Road business and for the operation of all Blake

[3] Blake considered the contract binding only as to these seven employees and maintains that the Union shared Blake's interpretation of the contract. Given our resolution of this case it is unnecessary for us to determine either the accuracy of this assertion or its potential legal significance. However, by way of background it is noteworthy that the Union did not show an active interest in Blake's non-union employees until mid-1977 when a new slate of Union officers was elected. The Union contends, nevertheless, that the contract applied to all of the Blake's employees and that it did not waive its right to represent them.

[5] Article One of the contract stated that all employees covered by the contract were to become members of the Union within thirty-one days after their employment and were to retain their membership during the period of contract coverage. GCX-3 at 3–4. Article One also obligated the Company, upon written notice from the Union, to discharge any employee covered by the contract who failed to become a Union member. Id.

[6] At no time prior to mid-1977 did the Union enforce this Union security provision by demanding discharge of an employee for not joining the Union. Nor did the Union press any grievances on behalf of any non-union employee of Blake or request that Blake pay the contract wages to any employee who had not either joined the Union or signed a Union membership application.

trucks transporting materials and supplies."[7] Pursuant to this contract Company representatives informed Blake's Columbia Park Road employees that Blake was no longer in the trucking and warehousing business, but that instead M & S would now engage in these activities. The employees were also informed that Blake was laying them off, but that M & S was simultaneously offering them jobs, beginning on February 20, 1978, the following Monday. Each Blake employee would be required to sign a new employment application and a new W-4 form.

At a meeting on February 17, 1980, work applications for M & S were distributed to and signed by Blake's non-union employees. At M & S these employees received the same rate of pay they had been paid by Blake.

At a separate meeting that day the six Union employees then working at Blake[8] were told that their wages at M & S would be lower than their current rate of pay under the contract. The shop steward promptly reported the layoff and new terms of employment offered by M & S to the Union. On the following work day, a Union representative visited Company representatives at the Columbia Park Road site. The Company confirmed at that time that it would no longer honor the contract. When the Union representative tried to learn the new rate of pay for Union employees he was told that it was none of his business and that the Company would henceforth be dealing with the Union employees on an individual basis.

A Company representative then met individually with the six Union employees and negotiated their rate of pay at M & S.[9] These rates varied with the individual but in all cases the wages were substantially less than those received at Blake under the contract.[10] One of the six employees, the Union shop steward, refused to work at a reduced rate of pay and left the Company.[11]

Following the transfer of Blake's operations to M & S, employees performed the same functions at the same work site as they always had. They punched the same time clock, worked the same hours, and received their work instructions from the same supervisory staff. For example, the former yard superintendent at Blake became the warehouse manager of M & S. He testified that in his new capacity he did essentially what he had always done, namely supervise "the organization of the warehouse, and the distribution of the material, equipment, and supplies kept at the Landover yard location." Tr. 78. The employees continued to drive trucks with "Blake" insignia on them to the same building sites. The telephone and mail service at M & S remained the same as at Blake. The operations of both M & S and Blake continued to be supervised from the joint headquarters of both companies at 1120 Connecticut Avenue. In sum, as the Company states, > from the viewpoint of M & S's employees, the ownership, management, business purpose, operation, equipment, customers, and supervision of M & S after February 20, 1978 was substantially [7] GCX-9. The contract required Blake to reimburse M&S on a weekly basis for the costs of providing these services and to pay M&S a monthly fee of 10 percent of these expenditure. Id.

[8] At this time only six of Blake's employees, all truck drivers, were members of the Union and paid wages specified in the contract. A sev- enth Union member left Blake on January 12, 1978 and is not involved in this appeal.

[9] The tone of these "negotiations" is suggested by one employee's unrefuted account of his meeting with the Company representative, the details of which were corroborated by the Company representative Tr 112. ("Tr. —— refers to the transcript of the hearing held before the ALJ.) According to this employee, who was then making $8.50/hour, the Company representative said:

> I'm saying you till last. * * * I ain't going to mess around with you. I'm going to tell you what I got. * * * I got six dollars and a quarter with insurance and a week's vacation. I got six dollars and seventy-five cents with nothing.

Tr. 425. The employee replied "No, I can't go with that" and quit. Id.

[10] The first Union employee to meet with the Company representative had been a Blake employee since 1961. At Blake he earned $8.30/hour when he drove a stake bed truck and $8.50/hour when he drove a tractor-trailer. He initially refused an offer of $6.25/hour but accepted an offer of $7.00/hour. The second Union employee had been with Blake since 1962. Although he was earning $8.50/hour he was offered $7.00/ hour without benefits or $6.25/hour "with everything" which included benefits such as hospitalization, one day off and a week vacation pay. He accepted the $6.25/hour with benefits. The third Union employee had been with Blake since 1967. His wages varied between $8.30/hour and $8.50/hour. He was initially offered $6.50/hour which he refused. When offered $6.76/hour without benefits and $6.25/hour with benefits he ac- cepted the former. The fourth Union employee who had worked with Blade since 1970 earned $7.50/hour and was offered $6.50/hour with benefits and $6.75/hour without. He accepted the offer of $6.76/hour. The fifth and last Union employee to accept the lower wages accepted an offer of $5.00/hour with benefits. The record does not show his prior wage rate.

identical to Blake's prior to that date * * * except for the absence of [the] shop steward * * * and the lower wages of the other five union employees, there was little if any, change between the employment conditions existing prior to February 17 and those prevailing February 20 and thereafter.[12]

The Union filed charges against the Company[13] and the Board General Counsel issued a complaint.[14] The complaint alleged that the Company discriminated against seven named Union members and that the events of February 17 and 20, 1978 were in violation of sections 8(a) (1), (3), and (5) of the Act.[15] However, the parties agree that the complaint, unlike the Union's original charge, did not include a specific allegation that the Company violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by failing to apply its contract with the Union to employees in the contractual unit or by failing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the representative of all of the employees in the unit, other than the seven named Union employees.[16]

Following a hearing, an Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ") ruled that Blake and M & S were alter egos and that both comprised a single employer.[17] The ALJ also determined that the Union "has been and is now the exclusive bargaining representative of all employees of Blake and/or M & S whose jobs are enumerated in the contract. * * *"[18] The ALJ concluded: that the Company violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act by imposing condition upon all employees, i.e., a requirement to complete new employment applications, because of the Union's demand that Respondent honor the terms of the contract with respect to all employees;[19] that the Company violated sections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by constructively discharging the Union shop steward and by laying off and rehiring at reduced pay the five other employees who were Union members; and that the Company violated section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to honor the terms of the contract, by transferring unit work from Blake to M & S, without consultation with the Union, by unilaterally negotiating with, and by reducing the wages of unit employees in violation of the contract, and by failing to give notice to and bargain with the Union about Blake's plan to go out of business and to lay off its employees.

The Board affirmed the ALJ's decision and issued his recommended order with one modification.[20] The Board's order required the Company to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found by the ALJ, including as specified in paragraph 1(c) "[r]efusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in an appropriate unit consisting of [the job classifications enumerated in the Contract]."[21] Paragraph 1(e) further required the Company to cease and desist from "[i]n any other manner" interfering, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights under section 7 of the Act. (emphasis supplied).

[12] Company's Brief at 8 quoting in part the Administrative Law Judge's Decision at 6, J.A. at 6 (June 8, 1979).

[13] The Union filed a charge against Blake on January 19, 1978, GCX-1-A, before the transfer of operations from Blake to M & S. This charge alleged that Blake had violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (5) on or about August 1, 1977, and continuing since that date, by unilaterally changing the terms of the contract and refusing to pay the contract rate to its employees reprented by the Union and by refusing to bargain with the union about such matters.

After the transfer of operations the Union amended the charge on February 27, 1978. GCX-1-C. The amended charge reiterated the allegation of the original charge and added an allegation that on or about February 17, 1978 Blake had "terminated the employment of all of its employees because of their membership in and activities on behalf of the Union.

On March 14, 1978 the Union filed a second amended charge. GCX-1-E. This charge added M & S as a charged party but was otherwise identical to the first amended charge.

> § 8(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7

Section 7 of the Act, to which section 8(a)(1) refers, provides that:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all such activities * * *

[16] Board's Reply Brief at 2: Company's Brief at 9-10, 14-19. The allegation of the Union's January 19, 1978 charge, see note 13 supra, did not become part of the complaint. The complaint does, however, allege that the Company violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5):

> Since on or about February 17, 1978 the Company has failed and refused and continues to fail and refuse to bargain in good faith with the Union and has instead engaged in a course of conduct designed to undermine the representative status of the Union by [certain specified acts].

[18] Id. at 10-11. J.A. at 10-11 See note 2 supra.

[19] The Complaint also alleged that certain conversations between Company supervisors and employees "in or about January 1978" [sic] violated section 8(a)(1). GCX-1G at 3, paragraph 7 (a) & (b). The ALJ dismissed these allegations for lack of evidence. J.A. at 10. At several points in the ALJ's decision and the Board's Order the language is ambiguous as to whether it refers only to the six union employees, only the non-union employees, or both the union and non-union employees. The present controversy concerns the application of the ALJ's findings and remedies to non-union employees.

The affirmative relief ordered by the Board required the Company to remedy the harms suffered by the six Union member employees. In addition, paragraph 2(b) required the Company to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of all the employees who are in the unit consisting of the job classifications specified in the contract. Paragraph 2(d) required the Company to apply the contract retroactively to the employees of Blake and M & S and make them whole for any losses suffered as a result of the failure to apply the contract to them.

The present application for enforcement of the Board's order followed.

II. ANALYSIS

The Company concedes that there is substantial evidence in the record to prove that M & S is an alter ego of Blake, and that the Company's actions of February 17 and 20,

279

1978 constituted an unlawful unilateral change in the working conditions of the six Union member employees.[22] The Company opposes enforcement of paragraphs 1(c), 2(b) and 2(d) of the Board's order, described above, because it contends they are based on violations of the Act which were neither alleged in the General Counsel's complaint nor litigated before the ALJ. The Company also objects to the Board language of paragraph 1(e) which prohibits violations "in any other manner" as improperly subjecting it to contempt for any subsequent infringement of employees' rights under section 7 of the Act.

A. Paragraph 1(c), 2(b) & 2(d) of the Board's Order

1. The Due Process Issue

The Company contests the propriety of the finding that it violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to apply the terms of the contract to all of its employees in the unit or to recognize the Union as the representative of all of those employees. Its main assertion is that it was denied due process since such violations were neither alleged in the complaint nor litigated at the hearing. Since we agree with that contention, we do not reach the Company's alternative argument that the challenged findings are not supported by substantial evidence.

The applicable law is clearcut. Both the Administrative Procedure Act[23] and the Board's own rules[24] require that the complaint inform the Company of the violations asserted. The Board may not make findings or order remedies on violations not charged in the General Counsel's complaint or litigated in the subsequent hearing. E.g. General Teamsters & Allied Workers Union No. 992 v. NLRB, 427 F.2d 582, 588 (D.C.Cir.1970); United Packinghouse, Food & Allied Workers Int'l Union v. NLRB, 416 F.2d 1126, 1134 n.12 (D.C.Cir.1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 903, 90 S.Ct. 216, 24 L.Ed.2d 179.[25] Even where the record contains evidence supporting a remedial order, the court will not grant enforcement in the absence of either a supporting allegation in the complaint or a meaningful opportunity to litigate the underlying issue in the hearing itself. E.g. United Packinghouse, supra; Montgomery Ward & Co., supra.

[20] Note 1 supra. Because the ALJ failed to include a unit description in his recommended order, referring therein only to the "appropriate unit," the Board modified paragraphs 1(c) and 2(b) of the ALJ's recommended order to make it clear that those portions of the order applied to all employees working for the Company within the job classifications listed in the contract, see note supra. Id. at 3 n.4, J.A. at 19 n.4. In all other respects the Board affirmed the ALJ's decision.

Here we have a situation in which the Union filed charges with the Board containing allegations which, if proved, could lead to a finding that the Company violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) by failing or refusing to apply the contract to its non-union employees and refusing to deal with the Union on behalf of the non-union employees. But these allegations were not carried over and specifically placed in the complaint subsequently issued by the Board's General Counsel. Nevertheless, the ALJ's decision and the Board's order were based in part on the 8(a)(1) and (5) violations not in the complaint.

The Board argues that the variation between the General Counsel's complaint and the eventual findings of unfair labor practices is permissible because the Company actually was aware that the 8(a)(1) and (5) violations were in issue in the hearing and had ample opportunity to present its defense. NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333, 349–51, 58 S.Ct. 904, 912–13, 82 L.Ed. 1381 (1938). The Board relies on the principle that "a material isue which has been fairly tried by the 280 parties may be decided by the Board regardless of whether it has been specifically pleaded." NLRB v. Thompson Transport Co., 421 F.2d 154, 155 (10th Cir. 1970) (cases cited); United Packinghouse, Food & Allied Workers Int'l Union, AFL–CIO v. NLRB, 416 F.2d 1126, 1134 n.12 (D.C.Cir.1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 903, 90 S.Ct. 216, 24 L.Ed.2d 179; Electri-Flex Co. v. NLRB, 427 F.2d 582, 588 (D.C.Cir.1970). In support of its positon the Board notes that the General Counsel's complaint contained a definition of the bargaining unit encompassing all employees in the job classifications described in the contract; and it also included general allegations of section 8(a)(1) and (5) violations based on conduct which affected all of the Company's employees. From these inclusions, the Board seems to maintain that the complaint was sufficient to apprise the Company that the hearing and remedial order would not be limited to Company actions involving only the six Union employees. However, the heart of the Board's argument is that the hearing record itself demonstrates that the Company's attorney fully understood that the Company's responsibilities toward all employees with job descriptions within the unit were at issue and that he had an adequate opportunity to, and in fact, did, present the Company's defense to such charges.

However, after carefully reviewing the transcript of the several day hearing, we conclude that the record does not support the Board's position. At no point in the hearing do we find a clear statement from the counsel for the General Counsel (General Counsel) to the Company or the ALJ that the Company was on trial for its failure to apply the contract to non-union employees and to deal with the Union as their representative. On the contrary, we garner both from what the General Counsel did say on several occasions and from what, on other occasions, inexplicably, he did not say, that, notwithstanding any possible ambiguity in the complaint, he was not pursuing the 8(a)(1) and (5) violations now challenged by the Company.

The General Counsel never, so far as we can tell, indicated to the Company, much less affirmatively attempted to show, that the Company's actions toward its non-union employees comprised a central element of its case. The vast bulk of the testimony of Board witnesses went toward proof of the alter ego relationship between Blake and M & S. In that context, the limited evidence relating to the non-union employees was incidental to the main thrust of the Board's case that there was continuity of operations between Blake and M & S and that the changeover was merely a device to avoid meeting Union demands.[26] The Company [26] Only three of Blake's non-union employees testified briefly as to the continuity of their duties and pay before and after the Company changeover. This testimony clearly was part of the General Counsel's main alter ego case.

The only possible indication of another purpose for their testimony came during the direct examination of the first witness. The Company Counsel objected to the relevance of questioning the witness about a conversation with a Company supervisor that might show an 8(a)(1) violation not alleged in the complaint. Tr. 370, 372. The General Counsel represented that he was "not prepared to say it constituted an 8(a)(1) violation," but that the conversation was nevertheless relevant. He did not, however, state for what purpose the conversation was relevant but merely that he would establish relevance through later witnesses with testimony about "all of the employees who are not in the Union signing cards." Tr. 370–72. When pressed by Company Counsel he conceded. "I'll state right now that I'm not going to amend the complaint to include an 8(1). * * * I don't believe it's appropriate to be alleged as 8(1)." Tr. 372. And at another point in the hearing he represented that non-union employees were "not subject to this complaint as 8(3)'s" but only "subject to the complaint in terms of being hired by M & S Company. * * *" Tr. 105. Whatever they mean, these exchanges were altogether too ellip-counsel objected repeatedly that testimony about the pay rates and working conditions of non-union employees was irrelevant since the complaint only addressed the named Union employees and that the coverage of the contract, and the scope of the unit were not questions properly before the ALJ.[27] The General Counsel responded each time either that the objected to testimony about non-union employees was merely "background," or relevant to the "chain of events" in its alter ego case, or not offered for the truth of the matter asserted.[28] Invariably, the objection was overruled on the basis of such assertions and the testimony admitted for the limited purpose stated. At other times the General Counsel merely responded to the Company Counsel's objection with silence.[29] Not once, however, did the General Counsel forthrightly take issue with the Company Counsel's statement of the limited nature of the proceeding or explicitly state that he was in fact seeking a finding of the Company's liability for the 8(a)(1) and (5) violations challenged here.[30] We believe that affording such notice during the proceeding was a minimal obligation especially in light of the General Counsel's failure to specifically plead such violations in the complaint after the Union had included them in its original charges filed with the Board.

We can only speculate whether the confusing series of passes that counsel on both 282 sides made regarding non-union employees stemmed from a genuine failure to communicate their assumptions to one another, or from a misbegotten tactical strategy on the General Counsel's part to play a cat-and-mouse game. But on the existing record we cannot see how the Company could be held to have actual knowledge that it was being charged directly with failure to apply the contract to non-union employees or to deal with the Union as their representative. Hence it would not be fair now to order enforcement of an order based on such charges. Cf. NLRB v. Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., 304 U.S. 333, 350, 58 S.Ct. 904, 912, 82 L.Ed. 1381 (1938) (due process claim rejected when "at no time during the hearings was tical to establish that the Company understood that the purpose of the three non-union witnesses was to prove the unlawfulness of the Company's actions toward its non-union employees.

The only other evidence in the record concerning non-union employees was expressly admitted only as "background" to show "a chain of events, that the Union was on notice as to a certain situation" and not for the "truth" of the Contract's application to specified employees. Tr. 330-32, 381-83. Indeed, the comparatively few and brief references to non-union employees in a 556 page transcript in itself tends to refute the notion that the subject of their rights under the Contract, an issue of greater potential economic consequence to the Company than the six Union members' treatment, was thoroughly litigated.

> General Counsel: * * * Some time in July of 1977, the business agent for the [Union] received a call from an employee working for Blake Construction, complaining, among other things, that he was not being paid union scale.
> Company Counsel: Your Honor, I am going to interrupt and object here. There is nothing in the Complaint concerning a failure to pay Union scale, and I don't think Counsel for the General Counsel has a right to prejudice the Court with remarks that aren't encompassed in any allegation of the Complaint.
> ALJ: Well * * * this is not a jury trial, so please let [General Counsel] make an opening statement uninterrupted, irrespective of whether or not it contains relevant or irrelevant information.

Tr. 23-24. Similar objections were raised throughout the hearing. For example,

> General Counsel: Did you speak to all the other employees on the 17th as well, other employees of Blake?
> Company Counsel: Objection; there are no other employees named in the Complaint.
> ALJ: Which employees are you referring to?
> General Counsel: Other employees who were not in the Union who were working for Blake.
> Company Counsel: They're not the subject of this Complaint, Your Honor. There are seven named people.
> General Counsel: They are not subject to this Complaint as 8(3)'s. They are subject to the Complaint in terms of being hired by M & S Company, from M & S to Blake.
> ALJ: All right, overruled.

Tr. 105. And for example,

> Company Counsel: Objection as to the statement "employees not in a Union." If we're interested in continuity of employment, then what employees did, and whether or not they were in union, is irrelevant.
> ALJ: Objection overruled.

Tr. 108. See also Tr. 106, 163-64, 330-332, 335-36, 379-82. The Company reiterated its position in its brief to the ALJ: "[The Union] treated its agreement with Blake as covering seven named employees and no others * * * General Counsel made no allegation that the terms of any contract were breached as to coverage for any but the named seven." Company's brief dated October 6, 1978 at 9-10, J.A. at 40-41.

[29] E.g. Tr. 23, 108, 158-59, 163-64.

[30] The General Counsel persistently failed to correct or clarify the Company Counsel's and the ALJ's understanding of the scope of the lawsuit. See, e.g., colloquy at 158-59. See also Tr. 410-416 (General Counsel argued that grievance of non-union member for Union's failure to represent was irrelevant, Tr. 416) (General Counsel does not take issue with Company Counsel statement that "this Complaint doesn't go to any of the nonunion people," Tr. 412); and see General Counsel's Post-Hearing Brief filed October 6, 1978, at 13 J.A. at 58 ("the question of appropriate unit is relevant only to the extent that it established a predicate for Blake's subsequent unfair labor practices").

there any misunderstanding as to what was the basis of the Board's complaint").

Nor can we agree with the Board that the Company actually litigated its available defenses to the 8(a)(1) and (5) violations so as to justify enforcing the challenged portions of the order.[31] Indeed, when the Company Counsel sought to probe the Union's own behavior toward the non-union employees, he was cut off by the ALJ upon the General Counsel's objection that it was unnecessary to explore this subject.[32]

We surmise from the hearing transcript there was little doubt as to the nature of the underlying dispute. When the formerly moribund Union began to aggressively solicit new members and to seek to represent their interests with the Company, the Company sought to limit the application of the existing contract to existing Union members or to avoid it altogether by resort to a corporate shell game. Nevertheless, no matter how reprehensible the Company's conduct, it does not excuse the Board or its General Counsel from a duty to assure that a charged party is given adequate notice of all the alleged violations of the Act and that these violations are litigated before sanctions are imposed. Elemental procedural due process prevents this court from granting enforcement of remedies that go beyond the scope of the complaint and are directed toward violations of the Act not noticed or actually tried before the ALJ or the Board.

2. The Waiver Issue

The Board in its reply brief asserts a threshold argument that the Company is barred by section 10(e) of the Act from raising its due process claim on appeal because it failed to do so before the Board. Section 10(e) of the Act provides in pertinent part:

> No objection that has not been urged before the Board, its member, agent, or agency shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances.

29 U.S.C § 160(e). In addition, the Board's rules provide that "[a]ny exception to a ruling, finding, conclusion, or recommendation which is not specifically urged shall be deemed to have been waived," 29 C.F.R. 102.46(b), and "[n]o matter not included

[31] The Company represents that had it been squarely presented with 8(a)(1) and (5) charges it could have defended on a number of grounds including: (1) that the charge was untimely; (2) that a prior oral or written addendum to the contract altered the scope of the unit at Blake; (3) that the scope of the unit had been altered by actions of the parties from that specified in the contract; (4) that the Union had waived its right to enforce the contract or had acquiesced in some unit other than the one described in the contract. Company's Brief at 29. We, of course, do not pass on whether any of these defenses were available or whether the Company would have succeeded if they had been asserted. But we do note that although there is some evidence related to these defenses on the record it is apparent that they were not pursued with even a modicum of the vigor displayed on behalf of the Company in other less potentially vital areas. See e. g., regarding the defense of waiver: (Tr. 373, 400–01, 427–29, the Union's failure to enforce the contract's Union security provision); (Tr. 373–74, 427, 430, the Union's failure to file any grievance on behalf of nonmembers, line of question opposed as irrelevant by General Counsel); (Tr. 407–12, 414, 417; Union's filing of grievance only on behalf of the Union member employees, line of questioning opposed as irrelevant by General Counsel and cut off by ALJ); regarding the defense of agreement or acquiescence to a new unit: (Tr. 433–36, RX3, prior refusal by Company to include non-union employees under the contract unchallenged by Union, line of question successfully opposed by General Counsel) ("RX—" refers to the Company's exhibits).

[32] General Counsel: Objection, Your Honor.

> I'm going to object to this line of questioning. What transpired in '76 has nothing to do with the Complaint. What a prior Union administration may have done with respect to Blake has nothing to do with the Complaint. It's all of course Pre 10(b) as well. I don't think it has any bearing at all on the matters at issue.
> ALJ: [D]o you want to reply to that?
> Company Counsel: Yes, I do, Your Honor. First, the contract which General Counsel offered into evidence predates the current administration. Secondly, General Counsel has stated, in arguing before you yesterday as to the relevancy of the '78 sign-up, that that somehow or other triggered the change from Blake to M&S. I want to show that the very same thing happened in '76, therefore people signing cards don't trigger subcontractors. And I want to show that the administrations, both administrations, both the current one and the old one, how they viewed the collective bargaining agreement, or what the collective bargaining agreement was.
> General Counsel: Well, as to [Company Counsel's] argument, first, it sounds as if he's trying to erect some kind of habit argument; the fact that Blake may have been a good guy in 1976, of course, cannot be shown with respect to whether they were a good guy in '78. As I say, this has absolutely no bearing on what may or may not have happened in '76, to the Complaint at issue here, which is what took place on February 17th, and thereafter.
> ALJ: All right, objection sustained.
> Company Counsel: Do I take it then that Your Honor is ruling that I cannot go into how the parties treated the collective bargaining agreement, or what they thought the collective bargaining agreement was, prior to July of 1977?
> ALJ: Right, I think your cross-examination goes beyond those areas covered by direct. Tr. 432–34. (Emphasis supplied.) Upon an appeal of this ruling, J.A. at 23, the Board directed the hearing to be reopened to "permit [the Company] to cross-examine the witness with respect to the administration of the Contract in 1976." Board Order dated August 1, 1978, J.A. at 27. At a hearing held pursuant to this order on September 7, 1978, Company Counsel elicited that the witness had spoken with counsel for the Union and elected not to question the witness further. Tr. 559–60.

in exceptions or cross-exceptions may thereafter be urged before the Board, or in further proceeding." 29 C.F.R. § 102.46(h). In short, the Board ironically says that even if if did not provide the Company with notice or an opportunity to litigate every violation found against the Company, the Board itself must have notice and an opportunity in the first instance to consider any resulting challenge to the fairness of its decision.[33]

In fact, the Company did take exception to the ALJ's finding that the Company violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act and to the ALJ's related conclusions of law and remedial measures. However, the Company did not expressly assert due process objections to the way the hearing was conducted. For example, the Company characterized most of the ALJ's findings as "misstatements" and excepted to the ALJ's conclusions of law as "based on misstatements of facts, mistaken premises, suppositions, hearsay, and misapplication of law." Respondent's Exceptions, supra, 29–30. But in its brief in support of its exceptions, J.A. 74–87, the Company Counsel did argue, inter alia, that the 8(a)(1) and (5) violations were not supported by substantial evidence because there was no proof of a contract covering all employees, J.A. 74–75; and although it did not specifically raise the due process issue, it stated that the General Counsel had not included an allegation in the complaint "that the terms of any contract were breached as to coverage for any but the named seven [Union employees]." J.A. at 85. It also objected specifically to the ALJ's refusal to allow questioning as to "how the parties treated the contract." J.A. 77.

The Board argues that these objections are too vague to satisfy the requirements of section 10(e). See Marshall Field & Company v. NLRB, 318 U.S. 255, 63, S.Ct. 585, 586, 87 L.Ed. 744 (1943); NLRB v. Seven- 284 Up Bottling Company, 344 U.S. 344, 350, 73 S.Ct. 287, 290, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953).

We disagree because we think the Company's brief accompanying its exceptions to the ALJ's decision, and in particular the above-quoted language about the scope of the complaint, the lack of proof as to what the contract provided as well as the ALJ's refusal to allow cross-examination on the subject were adequate to apprise the Board that the Company intended to press the question now presented and thus there was no waiver of the right to argue the due process issue before this court. May Department Stores Co. v. NLRB, 326 U.S. 376, 386–87 n.5, 66 S.Ct. 203, 209–10 n.5, 90 L.Ed. 145 (1945). While the Company's objections are no paragon of precision or detail, the specific exceptions to the 8(a)(1) and (5) findings and the argument that these findings were not supported by evidence and that no notice was given in the complaint as to such violations are considerably more focused and quite different from the general pro forma objections found to be impermissibly vague in other cases relied on by the Board. See, e.g., Marshall Field, supra, (only objection was examiner erred "in making each and every recommendation"); Seven-Up, supra (only objection was the remedy was "contrary to, and unsupported by the evidence and contrary to law").[34]

[33] Of course we respect the policy underlying section 10(e) reflected in the "general rule that courts should not topple over administrative decisions unless the administrative body not only has erred but has erred against objections made at the time appropriate under its practice." United States v. L.A. Tucker Truck Lines, Inc., 344 U.S. 33, 37, 73 S.Ct. 67, 69, 97 L.Ed. 54 (1952); NLRB v. Ochoa Fertilizer Corp., 368 U.S. 318, 322, 82 S.Ct. 344, 347, 7 L.Ed.2d 312 (1961).

[34] NLRB v. United Shoe Machinery Corp., 445 F.2d 633, 634 (1st Cir. 1971) (objection to Board decision in its entirety as "contrary to constitutional principles of due process" was "too broad to call attention to the narrow point raised * * * or to suggest that this was [the] point"); see also Singer Co. v. NLRB, 429 F.2d 172, 180–81 (8th Cir. 1970) (objection to "The Recommended Order in its entirety * * * as said recommended order is against the preponderance of the evidence and the law").

There are additional reasons for reaching the Company's substantial due process claim. Failure to object at the Board level does not invariably deprive a court of the ability to decide that the hearing was fundamentally flawed for lack of procedural fairness. NLRB v. Local Union No. 25, IBEW, 586 F.2d 959 (2d Cir. 1978) (party took exception below to a specific finding, but on different grounds than urged an appeal, and the Board is not prejudiced thereby); accord ILGWU, AFL–CIO v. Kobritz, 192 F.2d 8 (1st Cir. 1951) (due process objection "obviously without merit" not raised with the Board is barred by section 10(e)).

In sum, it goes against the grain to uphold a finding of a violation not charged in the complaint, never acknowledged in the hearing, and objected to in some detail before the Board simply because the magic phrase "due process" was not used in the objection. We do not think section 10(e) requires such a triumph of technical pleading over fundamental fairness.

B. Paragraph 1(e) of the Board's Order

Finally, paragraph 1(e) of the Board's order prohibits the Company from:

> In any other manner interfering with, restraining or coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, to form, join, or assist [the Union], or any other labor organization, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, to engage in concerted activities for the purposes of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, or to refrain from any and all such activities.

J.A. at 13 (emphasis supplied). The Company contends that this portion of the order is too broad and that it impermissibly subjects the Company to contempt proceedings for any future violation of its employees' rights under the Act.

The Board has wide latitude to exercise its remedial powers under the Act. Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 215–17, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405–06, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964); NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346–47, 73 S.Ct. 287, 288–89, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953); Phelps-Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 194, 61 S.Ct. 845, 852, 85 L.Ed. 1271 (1941); Int'l Ass'n of Machinists v. NLRB, 311 U.S. 72, 82, 61 S.Ct. 83, 89, 85 L.Ed. 50 (1940). However, there are limits to the remedies the Board may issue based on the nature and extent of the violations it finds:

> [T]he authority conferred on the Board to restrain the practice which it has found the employer to have committed is not an authority to restrain generally all other unlawful practices which it has neither found to have been pursued nor persuasively to be related to the proven unlawful conduct.

NLRB v. Express Publishing Co., 312 U.S. 426, 433–34, 61 S.Ct. 693, 698, 85 L.Ed. 930 (1941). The Supreme Court has held that an isolated violation of the Act > does not justify an injunction broadly to obey the statute and thus subject the defendant to contempt proceedings if he shall at any time in the future commit some new violation unlike and unrelated to that with which he was originally charged.

Id. at 435–36, 61 S.Ct. at 699.[35] In contrast, substantial evidence of a "generalized scheme" to violate the Act will support such broad relief. San Francisco Local Joint Executive Board of Culinary Workers v. NLRB, 501 F.2d 794, 802 (D.C.Cir.1974).

Both the Company and the Board agree on the test to be applied in this case:

> [s]uch an order is warranted only when a respondent is shown to have a proclivity to violate the Act, or has engaged in such egregious or widespread misconduct as to demonstrate a general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights.

Cir. 1980) (court raised issue of indispensable party sua sponte notwithstanding section 10(e) in interests of equity).

While deference is certainly due the laudatory objective of section 10(e) to give the Board the first opportunity to resolve "on the merits" questions urged on review of its orders. Marshall Field, supra, 318 U.S. at 256, 63 S.Ct. at 586, courts are and should be reluctant to enforce orders that emanate from proceedings conducted contrary to the clear requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act and devoid of basic due process guarantees unless there has been a deliberate bypass of the Board's rules. Here the Company's exception to the sufficiency of the evidence underlying the ALJ's 8(a)(1) and (5) findings gave the Board a chance to reconsider the merits of the ALJ's decision. In doing so, the Board could not have examined, even cursorily, the ALJ's findings without discovering in the transcript the ongoing swords-crossing exercise between counsel as to the relevance of evidence about non-union employees. See May Department Stores, supra.

general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights." J.A. at 19 n.3. We agree that the facts of this case are flagrant enough to support the Board's expansive remedial provision.

The Company's actions in refusing to talk to the Union about contract pay rates for its new members, culminating in a dramatic, albeit transparent, turnover of all company activities to an alter ego, solely to abrogate its obligations under the Act unquestionably rise to the level of "a general disregard for the employees' fundamental statutory rights." This maneuver was exacerbated by the deplorable techniques used in the individual bargaining with the Union employees to drastically lower their current rates of pay: confronting the employees with the Solomonic dilemma of choosing between lower take home pay or slightly higher take home pay which was still appreciably less than the employees' current rates of pay and did not include necessary benefits. The Company's conduct in this regard and the lengths to which it went to perpetuate that conduct are reminiscent more of the pre-National Labor Relations Act era of industrial warfare than of the later Twentieth Century. The mere fact that the Company has no prior record of NLRB violations does not, in itself, dissipate the egregiousness of the conduct involved in this proceeding. Cf. NLBR v. Beth-Israel Hospital, 554 F.2d 477 (1st Cir. 1977), aff'd, 437 U.S. 483, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978) (non-profit hospital's concern about deleterious effects on patients of organizational conduct was reasonable, and although hospital failed to justify its no solicitation, no distribution rule as it related to some parts of the hospital (cafeteria and coffee shops) it could not be reasonably inferred from a single violation of this character that the hospital had a proclivity knowingly to violate the Act, thus justifying a broad order).[36]

We find, therefore, that paragraph 1(e) is warranted and conclude that the Company's opposition to its enforcement is without merit.

Electric Machinery Company v. NLRB

653 F.2d 958 (5th Cir.), August 17, 1981—243 NLRB 239

On petition to review Board Order

Before Vance, Frank M. Johnson, Jr. and Thomas A. Clark, Circuit Judges

Thomas A. Clark, Circuit Judge: Petitioner, Electric Machinery Company, seeks review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board in which the Board held that petitioner violated Section 8(a)(5) and, derivatively, Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(5) and (1),[1] by unilaterally changing mandatory terms and conditions of employment and by bargaining directly with employees rather than bargaining with the union's elected representatives. The Board also found that petitioner violated Sections 8(a)(3) and (1) (29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(3) and (1)),[2] by constructively discharging eighteen employees. Respondent has filed a crosspetition for enforcement. We affirm the Board's determination that petitioner violated Section 8(a)(5), and we reverse the determination that petitioner violated Section 8(a)(3).

I. The Facts.

The facts are largely undisputed. The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 915, AFL-CIO ("union") has represented

Electric Machinery's (the "company") wiring electricians since 1954. During the past 12 years the company has been represented at bargaining sessions by the West Coast Chapter of the National Electrical Contractor's Association ("NECA") which represents electrical contractors who have authorized NECA to bargain on their behalf. At the time of the events which give rise to this suit, the union and the company were parties to a NECA-Union contract effective from December 1, 1976, to November 30, 1977. On June 30, 1977, Electric Machinery revoked NECA's authority to bargain on its behalf and on August 30, 1977, gave timely notice that it intended to terminate the contract on its scheduled expiration date.[3]

The union contended that both the NECA revocation and the notice to terminate were improper, basing their contention upon Article I, Section 2(c), of the collective bargaining agreement which provided that "[t]he existing provisions of the agreement shall remain in full force and effect until a conclusion is reached in the matter of proposed changes." Consequently, the union took no immediate action to commence collective bargaining despite a September 16, 1977, letter from the company which invited it to do so.

On November 17, 1977, Electric Machinery sent the union's business manager, Joseph Cain, a second letter in which the company put forth the specific proposals for terms and conditions of employment which 961 the company desired to initiate upon expiration of the NECA agreement. It was the company's contention that the high union wage scale, and the accompanying holiday, travel, vacation, and pension benefits, had placed the company in a position of competitive disadvantage and, consequently, that the company was finding it impossible to submit bids that were competitive with other electrical subcontractors. The November 17 letter concluded that "[i]n the event that we have not heard from you or in the event that your union does not make a meaningful offer on or before November 30, 1977, it is our intent to put these wages and working conditions into effect on December 1, 1977."

The union responded to the proposals by requesting a November 22, 1977, meeting. This meeting, which lasted approximately three hours, was the first bargaining session which occurred between the parties and was attended by Electric Machinery's president, Jaime Jurado, the local business manager, Cain, and a representative from the International, John Ericksen. Although the parties did not arrive at any specific agreement, Ericksen nevertheless accompanied Jurado back to the company's offices where the men discussed the competitive bidding problem in greater depth with Electric's estimator. At the conclusion of their discussion, and after preliminary examination of the company's financial records, Ericksen remarked to Jurado that he agreed that some changes in terms and conditions would be necessary in order for the company to become competitive with other area subcontractors.

After the November 22 meeting, Jurado directed counsel to prepare a "Memorandum of Agreement" in advance of the meeting scheduled for the next week, November 28. The agreement stated, among other things, that the parties would acknowledge that the NECA agreement would have no binding effect after November 30, 1977, but that "[t]he company, of its own volition * * * will continue to pay wages and provide terms and conditions of employment identical to those provided by the contract for a period of (30) days from November 30, 1977." The memorandum further stated that "the parties agree that such action does not constitute an extension of the expired agreement." The memorandum itself contained no specific contract proposals.

Sometime during the week between November 22 and November 28, counsel for the union met with Electric Machinery's employees and discussed the management's November 17 proposals for changed terms and conditions of employment. During this meeting, the union members were specifically directed to remain on the job while negotiations continued, and were assured that their union membership would not be penalized or disciplined by the union for continuing work, even if it meant working without a contract until an agreement could be reached.

On November 28, at the outset of the bargaining session, Jurado presented Cain with the prepared "Memorandum of Agreement" and asked him to sign. When Cain refused, Jurado became angry and threatened to walk out of the negotiations. The Administrative Law Judge found that Jurado attempted to induce Cain to sign the memorandum "by indicating he would be willing to agree for six months at thirty day intervals to abide by the terms of the expiring contract while negotiations continued." Cain, however, informed Jurado that he would not sign "because he felt respondent was contractually obligated to abide by the expiring contract while negotiations continued." The bargaining session broke up immediately thereafter, when Jurado stated that he would go directly to the employees and request that they accept the contract modifications which had been outlined in the November 17 letter to the union. On his way out, Ericksen requested that Jurado leave a copy of the memorandum so that the union could consider it further.

[3] Article I, § 2(a) of the collective bargaining agreement provides: "Either party desiring to change or terminate this agreement must notify the other in writing at least 90 days prior to the anniversary date."

The following day, November 29, Jurado began visiting job sites to meet with employees. He handed out copies of the company's November 17 letter which contained the company's proposals for a new contract and, according to testimony, "practically begged" the employees to stay on with the company and work under the new conditions. Jurado further told the employees they should "contact their foremen if they were not going to stay with [the company]." (R. 32)

Victor Moore, a journeyman electrician, immediately informed Jurado that he could not accept the company's offer and "was going to quit." He, and another employee, Dennis Field, left at the end of the day On December 1, the company proceeded to implement all of the proposals set out in its November 17 letter to the union, and on December 5, sixteen more employees left their jobs.[4] On December 30 the company signed a new letter of assent designating NECA as its bargaining agent and automatically making it a party to the new NECA-union collective bargaining agreement. Immediately thereafter, a majority of the employees returned to work.

II. Discussion.

At the outset, we acknowledge that the court of appeals must affirm the National Labor Relations Board if there is "substantial evidence" to support the Board's conclusions. Nevertheless, "Congress has merely made it clear that a reviewing court is not barred from setting aside a Board decision when it cannot conscientiously find that the evidence supporting that decision is substantial, when viewed in the light that the record in its entirety furnishes, including the body of evidence opposed to the Board's view." Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 465, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

In the instant case, the Administrative Law Judge found that the company had violated Section 8(a)(5) and derivatively, Section 8(a)(1) by unilaterally changing mandatory terms and conditions of employment on December 1, 1977, before having bargained to impasse. Additionally, the ALJ found that, by personally urging its employees to work under the new conditions, the respondent engaged in direct bargaining with individual employees in violation of Sections 8(a)(5) and 8(a)(1). The Board affirmed with respect to both 8(a)(5) violations and we affirm.

It is well-settled that an employer has a duty to consult and negotiate with the union before changing terms and conditions of employment, and violates Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by instituting unilateral changes before negotiations have been given a fair chance to succeed. NLRB v. Datz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962). Here the company admits that it unilaterally changed wages and benefits on December 1, but defends its action on the grounds that negotiations with the union were at an impasse and, alternatively, that even if negotiations were not at an impasse, the company had a "reasonable belief" that an impasse had been reached, and therefore was justified in taking unilateral action.

We cannot agree that the company's contentions are supported by the law or the record. In NLRB v. Katz the Supreme Court stated:

> Clearly, the duty [to bargain] thus defined may be violated without a general failure of subjec-

While the employer urges strenuously its defense of impasse, we do not consider 963 this to be an impasse case. In NLRB v. Big Three Industries, Inc., 497 F.2d 43 (5th Cir. 1974), we stated:

> "Impasse" within the meaning of the federal labor laws presupposes a reasonable effort at good faith bargaining which, despite noble intentions, does not conclude in an agreement between the parties. NLRB v. Palomar Corporation, 5 Cir. 1972, 465 F.2d 731, 735. Here the company failed to fulfill this necessary precondition to impasse.

Id. at 48. Impasse is a deadlock in negotiations and presupposes negotiations. The employer in its brief cites a Board opinion in Hi-Way Billboards, Inc., 206 NLRB 22 (1973), enf, den. sub nom. NLRB v. Hi-Way Billboards, Inc., 500 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1974), which provides the following definition of impasse:

> A genuine impasse is synonymous with a deadlock; the parties have discussed a subject or subjects in good faith, and despite their best efforts to achieve agreement with respect to such, neither party is willing to move from its respective position.

In the present case negotiations had barely begun, the first negotiating session being November 22, 1977. There was a second meeting on November 28 which did not result in any bargaining when the union refused to sign the "Memorandum of Agreement" proposed by the employer. The next day the employer, through its chief executive officer, visited the employees, delivering to them a copy of his November 17 letter to the union outlining proposed contract modifications, which included reductions in wages. As previously noted, the contract expired November 30. The employer points out that the union had been tardy in responding to the employer's notification that the contract would have to be modified so that the company could be more competitive. While the record does reflect this tardiness on the part of the union, it at no time refused to bargain nor did it waive its right to bargain. We note also that the union advised its members to continue working after the expiration of the contract on November 30 while the parties negotiated.

On the record before us there appears no reason which impelled the employer unilaterally to change the wage schedule, institute a company hospitalization plan rather than the union plan, and eliminate the pension plan and other fringe benefits, including vacation fund payments and travel time. The facts do not begin to support a defense of impasse because, as we have previously pointed out, bargaining had only just begun.[5] The fact that the union refus-

[5] The Fifth Circuit has discussed the subject of impasse in many cases, and we will now make reference to some of them. These cases all differ on their facts. Most acknowledge that the subject of impasse is a difficult one and must take into consideration a myriad of circumstances, such as the background of the relationship between the parties, their willingness to negotiate, the number of bargaining sessions, the degree to which the parties are making legitimate efforts to move toward an agreement as contrasted to sham negotiations which merely consume time, whether the company produces financial information when requested by the union (if the employer is seeking to reduce wages and in some instances when an increase in wages is being negotiated), and the good or bad faith of the parties if such can be determined from the facts, which cannot always be done.

In NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., 275 F.2d 229 (5th Cir. 1960), our circuit held that "generally speaking, the freedom to grant a unilateral wage increase 'is limited to cases where there has been a bona fide but unsuccessful attempt to reach an agreement with the union, or where the union bears the guilt for having broken off relations.' NLRB v. Andrew Jergens Co., 9 Cir., 1949, 175 F.2d 130, 136, cert. denied, 338 U.S. 827, 70 S.Ct. 76, 94 L.Ed. 503."

NLRB v. Tex-Tan, Inc., 318 F.2d 472 (5th Cir. 1963), involved a unilateral wage increase instead of reduction which was approved by this court. The unilateral wage changes were made in March-April, 1960. The opinion indicates that between April, 1959, and June 8, 1960, twenty-nine bargaining sessions were held, and the court notes further in its note 19 that the union early expressed the wish that the wage increases be instituted without awaiting final, total contract agreement.

NLRB v. Celotex Corp., 364 F.2d 552 (5th Cir. 1966), sustained a § 8(a)(5) violation in that an impasse did not exist. The company wanted certain contract revisions which would reduce compensation, making the claim that it wanted to remain competitive. At the same time the company refused to furnish financial information respecting its condition, and this court held that such refusal which led to an impasse did not constitute a valid impasse and thus sustained the Board's finding of a violation.

The case of A. H. Belo Corp. v. NLRB, 411 F.2d 959 (5th Cir. 1969), is sometimes cited as an impasse case. Under a rather complicated factual situation, our court sustained the Board's finding that a unilateral increase ed to sign the "Memorandum of Agreement" presented to it by the company on November 28 was no reason to make the change. All that agreement proposed to do was to continue the existing agreement for thirty days. The company could have continued to pay wages and benefits as it had been doing, and the workers could have continued in the employment without a contract. The only other imaginable reason would be that the contract terminated on November 30. We held in NLRB v. SAC Construction Company, Inc., 603 f.2d 1155 (5th Cir. 1979), that:

> The duty to refrain from making unilateral changes in those employment conditions subject to mandatory bargaining after termination of an existing contract derived from the employer's statutory duty to bargain collectively, because such changes are tantamount to a refusal to negotiate. Hinson v. NLRB, 428 F.2d 133, 137 (8th Cir. 1970); see NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962).

Id. at 1156–57. Therefore, we concluded that the employer instituted unilateral changes which constituted a refusal to bargain collectively with the representatives of its employees in violation of 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5).

We next turn to the Board's finding that Jurado violated Section 8(a)(5) by bargaining directly with employees on November 29. The evidence is undisputed that Jurado personally met with employees and attempted to persuade them to accept the proposed contract terms, and appellant has not contended in its brief that this conduct was not violative of Section 8(a)(5). Therefore, we affirm.

The remaining violation which we must consider is whether the eighteen employees who left work between November 29 and December 5, 1977, were constructively discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) or whether, as appellant contends, the eighteen employees were either "voluntary quits" or "strikers." The Administrative Law Judge found that the company had not violated Section 8(a)(3) because the "General Counsel has failed to show that Respondent altered the wages * * * to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." The Board reversed the Administrative Law Judge based upon its reading of Superior Sprinkler, Inc., 227 NLRB 204 (1976). Having reviewed the record, and upon consideration of this court's recent decision, sitting en banc, in NLRB v. Haberman Construction Co., 641 F.2d 351 (5th Cir. 1981), we agree with the Administrative Law Judge, and we reverse the Board's finding that Electric Machinery constructively discharged eighteen employees.

Section 8(a)(3) states that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." Consequently, as this court stated in Haberman, supra:

> There are two elements to a constructive discharge * * *. First, the employer's conduct must have created working conditions so intolerable that an employee is forced to resign. Second, the employer must have acted "to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization" within the meaning of section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

NLRB v. Haberman, 641 F.2d at 358.

Appelle contends that this court should infer anti-union animus simply by virtue of the fact that the employer unilaterally changed mandatory terms and conditions of employment, thereby placing the in vacation benefits without notice to the union was a violation of the Act, but that a wage increase during negotiations to a certain group of employees was not unlawful where the company had given the union notice of the proposed change. In another part of the opinion our court sustained the Board's finding that the company had exhibited an attitude of bad faith and lack of sincere desire to reach an agreement, thus failing in its duty to bargain in good faith. The complexities of that case hardly qualify it as a typical impasse case.

NLRB v. Palomar Corp., 465 F.2d 731 (5th Cir. 1972), is a case extremely close on its facts to the present Electric Machinery Company case. The collective bargaining agreement expired September 30, 1970. There were three bargaining meetings on September 9, September 30, and October 11, 1970. The employer reduced the wage rates on October 1, 1970, and had given notice to the union that this would be done. Our court in that opinion held that there existed no legally cognizable impasse.

The case of Winn-Dixie Stores, Inc. v. NLRB, 567 F.2d 1343 (5th Cir. 1978), modified on petition for rehearing, 575 F.2d 1107, involved certain unilateral changes by the employer during contract negotiations, some of which our court found to constitute violations. The company did not defend a wage increase, which was given after notice to the union, on the ground of impasse, but defended on the ground that it notified the union that had an excessive turnover of employees and had to grant the wage increase to meet this problem. Our court approved the company reason for the wage increase.

This note is not intended to review exhaustively the cases in the circuit but is done for the purpose of pointing out some of the authorities and their divergent reasons for finding violations in some cases and not in others.

employees in a position where they were, in fact, forced to abandon rights guaranteed under the Act. The Board relies upon Superior Sprinkler, supra, for this contention, quoting that opinion:

> [The employer] unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union and thus * * * offered its employees the choice of accepting the employer's unlawful repudiation of its statutory bargaining obligations and working under unlawfully imposed conditions of employment or quitting their employment.

Superior Sprinkler, 227 NLRB at 210.

While we do consider the question of constructive discharge to be close, we do not consider Superior Sprinkler to be dispositive for two reasons. First, the facts in the instant case are distinguishable from the facts in Superior; second, to consider the present case as presenting a § 8(a)(3) violation, where the conduct was not inherently destructive of important employee rights, would approach eliminating the requirement of proving anti-union animus entirely.

We begin our analysis, as we did in Haberman, supra, with the Supreme Court decision in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1798, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967). In Great Dane, the court concluded that motivation to discourage union membership was indispensable to a Section 8(a)(3) violation unless the employer's conduct fell within the category of " 'inherently destructive' of important employee rights," in which case "no proof of an anti-union motivation" would be required. Id. at 1798. Based on Great Dane, therefore, the General Counsel has the burden of establishing either that Electric Machinery's conduct was so egregious as to be "inherently destructive of important employee rights." or that Electric Machinery acted with the intent to discourage union membership.

In Superior Sprinklers, 227 NLRB 207 (1976), the Board successfully brought the complained of activity within the inherently destructive category by demonstrating facts from which the Board could reasonably infer that the employer had refused to bargain with the intention to discourage union membership. Not only had the employer instituted unilateral changes in mandatory terms and conditions prior to impasse, but the employer had accompanied his actions with express declarations that he would no longer negotiate and that he intended to operate "open shop."

The facts in the instant case do not lead to the same inferences. At the time that Jurado committed the section 8(a)(5) violation, the Administrative Law Judge found that "Jurado was not threatening to immediately create a non-union company * * *." Furthermore, the record yields considerable testimony that the employees were informed by their own union officers to remain on the job even if the parties had not yet arrived at an agreement when the contract expired because the union and the company were still negotiating. Significantly, these reassurances occurred even after the November 28 meeting where Jurado had left the bargaining session. Finally, Jurado himself testified that, while discussing the contract with individual employees, he urged them to stay on until the union and the company could arrive at some agreement. None of these facts supports an inference that the company acted with anti-union animus.

In discussing what types of conduct justify such an inference, this court in Haberman emphasized especially conduct that "directly and unambiguously penalizes or deters protected activity." NLRB v. Haberman, 611 F.2d at 359. The court referred to Portland Willamette Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 1331 (9th Cir. 1976), as presenting such an instance of inherently destructive activity. There, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals concluded that inherently destructive activity was that which has "far reaching effects which would hinder future bargaining * * * [including] permanent discharge for participation in union activities, [and] granting of superseniority to strike breakers." Id. at 1334. None of these is present in the instant case, and we therefore cannot conclude that Electric Machinery's conduct was so egregious as to eliminate the General Counsel's burden of proving anti-union animus. Electric Machinery took no action which would permanently jeopardize future union status and, in fact, three weeks after committing the unfair labor practices discussed above, the company rejoined NECA.

In sharp contract to Superior Sprinkler, the "Memorandum of Agreement" which Jurado proposed evidenced a desire to bargain with the union in good faith. Although Electric Machinery was not contractually bound to follow the terms of the NECA agreement, having given the union timely notice of its intention to terminate in accordance with Article I, § 2(a), of the collective bargaining agreement, the company was nevertheless willing to abide by the contract for thirty-day intervals lasting up to six months, provided negotiations were proceeding in good faith.[6]

In light of this evidence of good faith, the court finds it impossible to infer anti-union animus. Where, as here, the refusal to bargain caused no permanent future impairment of union rights, the employer brought forward a convincing business justification for his actions, and the employees were encouraged to continue working until the union and the company reached agreement, we see no factual basis from which we can infer anti-union motive. Consequently, we conclude that the employees were not constructively discharged.

ENFORCEMENT AFFIRMED in part.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED in part.

[6] We are not persuaded by the union's contention that, even after the contract termination date, the company was bound to abide by the contract, based upon the union's interpretation of Article I, § 2(c), because that provision refers solely to "changes" in the agreement and not "termination." Article I, § 2(c) provides:

> The existing provisions of the agreement shall remain in full force and effect until a conclusion is reached in the matter of proposed changes (emphasis added).

653 F.2d 1322 (9th Cir.), August 17, 1981—249 NLRB 961

On petition to review Board Order

Before MERRILL, ADAMS* AND SNEED, Circuit Judges

1323

ADAMS, Circuit Judge: This case is before the Court on the petition of the MGM Grand Hotel, Reno, Nevada, hereinafter the "Hotel," to review an order of the NLRB issued against it on May 30, 1980,[1] The Board has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order.

The Hotel is a Nevada corporation engaged in the operation of a hotel and casino in Reno. It commenced business operations on May 3, 1978. All individuals hired by the Hotel received a copy of the employee's "Handbook" as well as a separate document entitled "General Rules." The Hotel's "no solicitation policy," as outlined in the Handbook, stated as follows:

> Solicitation by anyone for funds, membership in organizations or clubs, or dis> tribution of any literature for any purpose, is strictly forbidden on company property. The circulation of petitions of any kind is similarly forbidden. This includes employees and nonemployees.

The original "General Rules" also contained the following language: "Circulation of petitions of any kind for solicitation of employees for any purposes other than the United Way is not permitted." On May 6, the Hotel issued a revised set of General Rules to all current employees. These revised rules were distributed to employees hired thereafter. Although the employees' Handbook was revised after the Hotel opened, the original Handbook continued to be distributed to newly hired employees until the first part of August and the revised Handbook was not distributed until November.

On June 13, Andrew Csonka was hired by the Hotel's Maintenance Department as a "Welder-Engineer" at a rate of $52 for an eight-hour shift. Csonka's initial job was to examine new equipment and set up the welding shop. Thereafter, Csonka was the engineer primarily responsible for maintenance-type welding and fabrication, which occupied 90.95% of his working time.

In late June the Union began an organizing campaign among the Hotel's engineering employees. Csonka signed an authorization card and played an active role in assisting the Union, talking with several employees about unionization and distributing authorization cards. On August 18 the Union filed a petition with the NLRB seeking certification as an exclusive bargaining representative with the Hotel's Maintenance Department employees. During the period between the filing of this petition and the representative election, which was held on August 6, the Hotel conducted a number of meetings with Maintenance Department employees to discuss the upcoming election. Supervisors Williams and Kelly distributed anti-Union campaign literature and engaged in discussions with various Union members regarding the merits of the Union's cause. From that discussion Williams and Kelly evaluated each employee's probable adherence or lack thereof and reported the results to top-level management.

*Honorable Arlin M. Adams, United States Court of Appeal for the Third Circuit, sitting by designation.

In the latter part of August supervisor Williams approached James Corbett, a maintenance engineer, and asked him "what * * * (he thought) of the Union." When Corbett replied that he did not know and had not thought about it, Williams stated, "You know, if the Union comes in here, you guys are going to probably have to take an examination to check to see your qualifications and * * * that's going to bring down a lot of changes, and a lot of people are going to be going out the door." About a week later, Williams called Corbett aside from a group of employees and asked him whether Charlie Green or any other employee had "been talking to (him) about the Union." Williams further asked whether Corbett had "been down to any of the Union meetings." Finally, during approximately the same period, when Williams encountered Corbett and another engineer on their way to a job, Williams asked Corbett "what * * * (they were) doing together." Corbett replied that they were "going to a job." Whereupon Williams stated, "Well, I am giving you fair warning. You guys aren't supposed to be caught together. Two guys together, that's no good." When Corbett repeated that they were merely on their way to a job, Williams replied, "if Administrative Director of Engineering Helmut (Herbrechtsmeier) catches you, you're going to hear about it."

About a month before the election the Hotel conducted a meeting for all day shift personnel in the Maintenance Department. At this meeting Williams instructed employees that they were not to "talk to each other * * * in between jobs." Further, upon completion of their jobs, employees were to return to the Engineering Department for another work order and then to proceed alone to their next assignment.

On September 10, Csonka spoke with supervisor Williams about the Union. During the course of the conversation Csonka expressed an interest in going to school. Williams informed Csonka that the Hotel at times "catered to people who were going to school," but that "if the union came in" there would be no chance of that happening in the future. Around September 21, Williams mentioned to Csonka that he (Williams) had been "jumped on by Herbrechtsmeier for permitting Csonka and another employee to walk "through the halls together on the way to their job." Williams warned Csonka that maintenance engineers should avoid contact even while "going to or from a (two-man) job" or even "to or from lunch."

During he same time period, prior to the election, Williams engaged in additional conversations concerning the Union with unit employees Paul Magrini and Thomas Hansen. Williams invited Magrini into the back of a pickup truck for a private discussion, and then asked whether Magrini was planning to vote for the Union. When Magrini stated that he "hadn't made up his mind," Williams suggested that perhaps Magrini "could better negotiate for himself, rather than with a Union." Similarly, Williams asked Hansen "what (he) thought about the Union," and stated that the Union would take (Hansen's) money. Williams also told Hansen "not to walk with anybody or talk to anybody about the Union."

At an assembly of Maintenance Department employees on October 2—four days before the election—the Hotel announced a substantial wage increase for the maintenance engineers and other employees in the bargaining unit. Concurrent with the wage adjustment, the Hotel established a new classification system which designated each maintenance engineer as either in Group I or Group II. For employees in Group I the new rate of pay ranged from $64–$76 for an 8 hour shift; for Group II engineers the wages per shift ranged from $50–$64. Twenty-three of the maintenance engineers in the bargaining unit were classified as Group I and received wage increases in varying amounts.

A secret ballot election was held on October 7, 1978, and the Union was defeated. After the election, at a meeting with Williams, Herbrechtsmeier and Engineering Manager James Sauder, Csonka was advised of his classification as a Group II maintenance engineer and that he would not be receiving a wage increase. When Csonka expressed his disagreement with this action by the Hotel and asked Sauder for an explanation, Sauder stated that to be in Group I an employee "has to know all different aspects of the engineering field" and "has to be able to handle" whatever work is required. Thus, as Sauder explained to Csonka, Group I engineers must be able to perform carpentry, upholstery, and boiler room work and to know how to paint and how to be a plumber. Csonka replied that in that case no one working at the Hotel "was qualified to be a Group I engineer." Csonka was then told that he would be given the opportunity to "go on different jobs * * * throughout the hotel" to broaden his experience. Following this meeting, Csonka had a conversation regarding his classification with his immediate supervisor Ralph Kelly. Kelly agreed that Csonka's classification should have been Group I.

Several months later, in mid-April 1979, Supervisor Bill Ferris informed Csonka "that he was working on moving Csonka up to a Group I engineer but * * * was having some problems." Ferris mentioned that "there was spot open on the swing shift," and that if Csonka took it he would be able to learn "different aspects of the engineering field" and "move up rapidly." Csonka accepted the swing shift position. On June 13, 1979, Csonka received his yearly evaluation and was granted a wage increase from $58 to $64 per 8-hour shift. He has never been informed whether his raise carried with it an upgrade to the level of Group I engineer.

The Board found that the Hotel violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by (a) interrogating and threating employees, (b) by suggesting that employees could negotiate more favorably without the assistance of the Union, (c) by maintaining invalid rules prohibiting employee communication, and (d) by granting a wage increase so as to affect the election results. The Board also found that the Hotel violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discriminating against Csonka because of his Union activities. The Board ordered the Hotel to cease and desist from unfair labor practices and from interfering in any other manner with the exercise of employees' rights under Section 7 of the Act. Affirmatively, the Board's order requires the Company to make Csonka whole for any loss of pay suffered as a result of any discrimination against him and to promote him retroactively with all attendant privileges and benefits, to the classification of Group I maintenance engineer. The Board's order also directs the Hotel to post appropriate notices.

The standard to be applied when reviewing findings of the NLRB is whether there is substantial evidence in the record to support the findings. Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). On the basis of this standard, we conclude that there was sufficient evidence in the record to support the Board's findings in all respects except as to the wage increase. The decision to increase the wages was necessitated by economic factors, the most notable being the intense competition for qualified employees in the competitive Reno labor market. The Hotel's President, Barry Brunet, testified in detail concerning the need for the wage increase. As he explained, the Hotel's inauguration was followed by the opening of several other hotels and casinos in the area, causing a severe labor shortage. The labor market became "tighter" as the other hotels began operating and MGM had extreme competition for an effective labor force. In addition, the Hotel suffered heavy employee turnover.

Mr. Brunet's testimony was substantiated at all important points. Personnel Director Ostrovsky reconfirmed that the problem in recruiting and retaining qualified employees constituted a crisis situation in the months prior to the wage increase. On the basis of computer surveys and interviews with departing employees, Ostrovsky concluded that the Hotel's compensation system was unsatisfactory in two respects. First, the Hotel's merit system gave department managers great discretion in setting the wage rates of individual employees and resulted in substantial disparities between employees of different departments. Second, Ostrovsky concluded that the Hotel's wages were inadequate to attract and retain experienced and qualified employees. Although the hearing examiner believed that the Hotel had solved its problems with respect to attracting and retaining maintenance engineers and having a satisfactory and stable work crew at the time of the wage increase, the evidence was inconsistent with this conclusion. Herbrechtsmeier testified that in the months prior to the wage increase the Hotel had difficulty recruiting qualified maintenance personnel. The Hotel was the largest building in Reno and had the most sophisticated equipment. Consequently it required a large number of highly-skilled maintenance engineers. A sufficient number was unavailable locally and the high cost of housing deterred prospective employees from readily moving into the Reno area. Engineering Manager Sauder also corroborated Ostrovsky and Herbrechtsmeier on this point. He testified that the Hotel had a difficult time finding maintenance engineers who were experienced with respect to boilers, plant operation, commercial refrigeration and high voltage electricity.

The ALJ placed great emphasis on a campaign leaflet that had been distributed during the course of the election campaign. It showed wages and benefits at the MGM Hotel in comparison with four other Reno employers. But it in no way purported to be a comprehensive survey. It did not compare the Hotel's wages and benefits with similar employers whose maintenance employees may have been represented by other unions or by no union at all. Nor was there any indication in the record that the Hotel's wages were sufficiently high to attract qualified employees from the other establishments. The general rule is that where an increase in benefits results from a corporate-wide decision and is implemented corporate-wide in a normal business fashion, election results will not be set aside. Northrop Telecomm, Inc., 233 NLRB 1104, 1105 (1977). Accord, Delchamps. Inc. v. NLRB, 588 F.2d 476 at 480–81 (5th Cir. 1979); Louisburg Sportswear Co. v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 380 at 384 (4th cir. 1972).

Pre-election increases in wages have been considered lawful where the change serves to establish or maintain parity with wages provided to employees in other facilities of the employer. See, e.g., Schulte's IGA Foodliner, 241 NLRB 1332 (1979). Such corporate-wide increases have been held to indicate that the employer's conduct was not calculated to influence the impending election. Here the wage increase affected 1200 employees, only 49 of whom were in the bargaining unit in question. The increase resulted from a corporate-wide decision which was implemented in a normal business fashion. In no way did the ALJ dispute the evidence to this effect. The increase was based on a comprehensive study of the Hotel's wage rates and compensation policies that were instituted many months before the election.

Aware that the wage adjustments had potential legal ramifications with reference to the pending election, President Brunet discussed the situation with legal counsel. Ultimately the Hotel determined to do what it would do in the absence of an election—and granted the wage increase effective at the beginning of the next pay period after the final decision to give the increase had been made.

In short, a fair review of the evidence establishes that the wage increase resulted from a corporate-wide decision that was implemented in a normal business fashion. The Board failed to consider the evidence on the subject in its entirety, and therefore erroneously concluded that the wage increase of the bargaining unit employees was improper.

C.

The petition for review by the MGM Grand Hotel-Reno is denied except for that portion dealing with the wage increase. A judgment will be entered enforcing the Board's order aside from that portion of the order dealing with the wage increase.

David D. Sutherland, d/b/a Maaco Auto Painting and Body Work v. NLRB

656 F.2d 359 (8th Cir.), August 17, 1981

On petition to adjudge in civil contempt

Before Heaney, Stephenson and McMillian, Circuit Judges

Upon motion of the National Labor Relations Board, David D. Sutherland, d/b/a Maaco Auto Painting and Body Work, is found in civil contempt for having failed and refused to comply with the judgment of this Court entered on April 21, 1981, 646 F.2d 1273, in that he has failed to offer reinstatement to Donald Rubino, failed to post notices and failed to pay Court costs. There being no genuine issue as to any material fact, the National Labor Relations Board is entitled to a civil contempt adjudication as a matter of law.

It is, therefore, ordered that David D. Sutherland, his agents, successors and assigns, purge themselves of civil contempt by:

a. Conducting himself in all respects consistent with the April 21, 1981, judgment of this Court and the provisions of the Board's order thereby enforced.

b. Immediately offering Donald Rubino full reinstatement to his former position or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority and other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and making him whole for any losses suffered by reason of Sutherland's failure and refusal to reinstate him, said amount, unless agreed upon, to be computed by the Board in a supplemental proceeding, subject to review by this Court.

c. Preserving and, upon request, making available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all books and records necessary to determine the amount of back pay due, and to monitor compliance.

d. Immediately posting the notice required to be posted by the Board's June 16, 1980, order as enforced by the Court in the manner set forth therein.

e. Immediately paying the Board Court costs in the amount of $75.78.

f. Immediately posting in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees customarily are posted, for a period of sixty (60) consecutive days, an appropriate notice, in the form prescribed by the Board, signed by Sutherland, which states that Sutherland has been adjudicated in civil contempt of Court for disobeying and failing and refusing to comply with the judgment of this Court and that he will take the action in purgation ordered by the Court, a copy of the purgation order being posted alongside, and by maintaining such notices and adjudication in clearly legible condition throughout such posting period, and assuring that they are not altered, defaced or covered by any other material.

g. Filing a sworn statement with the Clerk of this Court and mailing a copy thereof to the Director the Board's Eighteenth Region within ten (10) days after the entry of the order of adjudication, and again at the end of the posting period, showing what steps have been taken by Sutherland to comply with the Court's directives, and making such further reports as the Court may require.

h. Reimbursing the Board for all costs and expenditures, including reasonable counsel fees, incurred by the Board in the investigation, preparation, presentation and final disposition of this proceeding.

The Board is directed to renew its motion to assess a fine against Sutherland if Sutherland fails to comply with this order within five (5) days of the date the order is served on him.

Central Freight Lines, Inc. v. NLRB

653 F.2d 1023 (5th Cir.), August 21, 1981—250 NLRB 435

On petition to review Board Order

MARKEY, Chief Judge: Central Freight Lines, Inc. (Company) peititions to review, and the National Labor Relations Board (board) cross-petitions to enforce, the board's order of July 7, 1980. The board found that Company engaged in a number of acts violating Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), and discharged Thomas Sessions for Union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. We modify.

1025

Introduction

Nine witnesses testified at a hearing before an administrative law judge (ALJ) on May 30 and 31, 1979. Sharp conflicts in testimony make crucial in this case the ALJ's evaluation of the demeanor and credibility of witnesses. The board, in a 2–1 decision, affirmed the ALJ's findings of violations of Section 8(a)(1) and reversed the ALJ's finding of no violation of Section 8(a)(3). Our review is limited to a determination of whether the findings of the board majority are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Section 10(e) of the Act. N. L. R. B. v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835, 843 (5th Cir. 1978).

I.

Section 8(a)(1)

A. Supervisory Status of Martin

The finding that Martin was not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act is supported by substantial evidence. His duties were merely routine, requiring no independent judgment.

It is apparent from Martin's testimony that he had none of the powers listed in Section 2(11) as indicia of supervisory status, such as power to hire, fire, or discipline employees, powers exercised here by Maritn's superior, the dock foreman. Martin's duties consisted of: (1) determining the size and destination of outbound shipments; (2) determining the available space in trailers; and (3) loading the trailers himself or with help from other dockmen. His only exercise of judgment was in distributing dockmen among available trailers for loading. As the ALJ said: "If a trailer fills up, then another trailer is loaded".

Like other dock employees, Martin spent most of his time engaged in manual labor, and was paid only 5 cent per hour more than the others.

Contrary to Company's assertion, the board was not required to defer to conclusory testimony of others (Domino and Anderpont) that Martin's duties were identifical to those of supervisor Anderpoint. The board properly accepted the view of the ALJ, who observed the demeanor of the witnesses. As stated by the ALJ:

> I found Martin's description of the work which he had actually performed for the [Company], and Martin's description of his own duties and authority to be more reliable than the testimony offered by others.

B. Due Process

Company asked for dismissal of these proceedings, arguing that an investigatory interview of Martin denied at due process because examiner Brown took an affidavit from "supervisor" Martin, treating him as an employee, without contacting Company's attorney.

Because we uphold the finding that Martin was not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11), it follows that there was no impropriety in the investigation, and the ex post facto administrative inquiry into the investigation occasioned by Company's motion to quash the complaints is irrelevant to the outcome of this litigation.

C. Domino-Martin Conversation

Substantial evidence supports the finding that Domino told Martin in October, 1978, to refrain from participating in Union activities and to "remain neutral". Martin having been an employee with a full Section 7 right to participate in Union activities, not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11), we affirm the board's finding that Company is liable for an unfair labor practice under Section 8(a)(1) because of Domino's instruction to Martin.

D. The Barthell Affidavit

Over Company's objection, General Counsel introduced at trial the Barthell affidavit, concerning a conversation between Domino and Barthell in, August, 1978.

Barthell, a former Company employee, was deceased at the time of trial.

In admitting the affidavit, the ALJ relied on Fed.R.Evid. 804(b)(5), the residual exception to the hearsay rule. For that Rule to apply, however, an extra-judicial statement must have circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness equivalent to those listed in the Rule at 804(b)(1)–(4): former testimony, belief of impending death, statement against interest, and personal or family history.

There is no evidence that Barthell had a belief in impending death. Nor is there evidence that the Barthell affidavit had any equivalent guaranty of trustworthiness of any kind. Indeed, it was written by examiner Brown and merely signed by Barthell. As stated in Workman v. Cleveland-Cliffs Iron Co., 68 F.R.D. 562, 565 (N.D.Ohio 1975): "The Court is well aware of the subtle shifts in meaning that can occur when one's statement is recorded by another."

Unless application of Rule 804(b)(5) be limited to circumstances evidencing a clear basis of trustworthiness, exceptions to the rule against hearsay could swallow the rule. Because there were no such circumstances here, the board erred as a matter of law in relying on the Barthell affidavit to support a finding that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) because of a Domino-Barthell conversation. Paragraph 1(b) of the board's order depends entirely, and paragraph 1(c) thereof depends in part, on the Barthell affidavit. The former must therefore be deleted and the latter amended.

E. Solicitation Policy

Paragraph 7(g) of the complaint alleges that Domino "orally announced and enforced at [Company's] plant a no-solicitation rule which prohibited the employees from soliciting for the Union on the [Company's] premises at any time". However, the testimony of Sessions, witness for the General Counsel, does not support that allegation. According to Sessions, Domino held a meeting on the dock in mid-November, 1978, saying "I would prefer that [solicitation] be contained to your lunch breaks, your coffee breaks and before and after work. I don't want to see it any more on this dock during company work hours." Consistent with Sessions' testimony, Domino testified that the rule was not a blanket prohibition of solicitation for Union on Company premises.

Hence the board's position that the rule was too broad is unsupported in the record. Company's no-solicitation rule, being restricted to work areas and work time, was valid on its face. Republic Aviation Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 324 U.S. 793, 803 n. 10, 65 S.Ct. 982, 988 n. 10, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945); Custom Recovery v. N.L.R.B., 597 F.2d 1041, 1044 (5th Cir. 1979).

The board says there were sports pools and a flower fund box, with no Company rule prohibiting them. It contrasts those activities with a rule forbidding union solicitation. There is, however, no evidence that the sports pool and flower fund activities had a potential for interference with work substantially equivalent to that of union solicitations. Moreover, the complaint charged the Company with promulgating an overboard rule prohibiting solicitation "at any time", not with failure to prohibit other activities. As indicated the record fails to support the charge in the complaint.

That the no-solicitation rule was announced coincidentally with a union organizational effort does not alone taint its adoption with a discriminatory purpose. If such rules are to be established, the time of an organizational effort is the logical time for their announcement. TRW, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 393 F.2d 771, 774 (6th Cir. 1968).

Because the solicitation rule did not constitute the violation charged, paragraphs 1(e) and 2(a) of the board's order must be deleted.

F. Remaining Board Determinations Under Section 8(a)(1)

Substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the remaining Section 8(a)(1) violation determinations based on:

1027

(1) Domino's interrogation of Crumpler in Domino's office in August, 1978; (2) Domino's interrogation of Sessions in Domino's office in August and in November, 1978; and (3) Anderpont's interrogation of Saurage on the dock in August, 1978.

II.

Sessions' Discharge

Sessions, a truck driver and a leader in the union's organizational effort, incurred three chargeable traffic accidents in four months. Pursuant to its policy of discharging drivers after three chargeable accidents in 12 months, the Company discharged Sessions.

Notwithstanding Sessions' driving record, the board majority found that Company violated Section 8(a)(3) by discharging him because of union activities. We cannot agree.

We review the board's findings, but where its findings conflict with those of the ALJ, the record, including the ALJ's report, must be subjected to particular scrutiny. Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, 496, 71 S.Ct. 456, 468, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). N.L.R.B. v. Florida Medical Center, Inc., 576 F.2d 666, 674 (5th Cir. 1978).

The record supports the ALJ's findings that: (1) Company established a stricter enforcement policy toward accidents when Domino became terminal manager in February, 1977; and (2) Domino announced the new policy to employees at a meeting in January, 1978, months before Union appeared on the scene. Company drivers including Sessions, knew the policy. There is no evidence of disparate treatment, Sessions being the first and only driver to violate the three-accident rule after Domino announced the new policy. That others had not been discharged for accidents before Domino's announcement is of no moment. Similarly, that other drivers were not discharged, following the announcement, is of no moment when, as here, those drivers had incurred less than three accidents subsequent to the advent of the new policy.

In finding a violation, the board majority thus speculated that Company had a discretionary motive in discharging Sessions and usurped Company's prerogative to enforce strictly its accident policy. Hence paragraphs 1(f), 2(b), and 2(c) of the board's order must be deleted.

Conclusion

We modify the board's order,* deleting paragraphs 1(b), 1(e), 1(f), 2(a), 2(b), and 2(c), and amending paragraph 1(c) to read: "Creating the impression of surveillance of its employees' Union activities by telling an employee that his truck had been observed outside a Union meeting." We expect that the board will appropriately amend the "Notice to Employees" to be posted at Company's Beaumont plant.

MODIFIED, AND AS MODIFIED, ENFORCED.

*The board added paragraphs 1(f), 2(b), and 2(c) to the ALJ's order. We have designated the resultant combination "the board's order".

Vicksburg Hospital, Inc. v. NLRB

653 F.2d 1070 (5th Cir.), August 21, 1981—251 NLRB 6

On petition to review Board Order

Before REAVLEY, RANDALL and SAM D. JOHNSON, Circuit Judge

REAVLEY, Circuit Judge: Vicksburg Hospital, Inc. has petitioned this court for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board finding it guilty of unfair labor practices in refusing to bargain with the union certified by the Board to represent its empoyees. The Board has cross applied for enforcement of its order. We grant the request for enforcement.

I. The Background Facts

Petitoner is a non-profit hospital engaged in the delivery of health care services in Vicksburg, Mississippi. On September 10, 1979, Local Union 1964 of the United States Brotherhood of Carpenters & Joiners of America, AFL–CIO petitioned the Board for certification as the exclusive barganing agent for a unit composed of Vicksburg Hospital's nonprofessional service, maintenance, and technical empolyees, excluding business office clerical employees, supervisors, and professional employees.[1] The hospital took the position that the proposed unit of all service, maintenance and technical employees was overbroad and urged that four separate units consisting of service and maintenance employees, technical employees, business office and clerical employees, and professional employees would be appropriate. After a hearing, the regional director issued a decision and direction of election, finding that the unit of service, maintenance and technical employees was appropriate for collective bargaining. The hospital filed a timely request for review of the regional director's decision, which was denied by the Board. An election was subsequently conducted among the employees in the unit. From the 230 employees who were eligible to vote, 148 votes were cast in favor of the union, and 66 votes were cast against it. Fifteen ballots were challenged, which was an insufficient number to affect the election.

Vicksburg Hospital filed objections to the election, contending that the union offered economic inducements to employees who supported it by waiving initiation fees, that it misrepresented to employees various conditions of employment and their rights in the event of strikes, and that it misrepresented the Government's role in the election by leading employees to believe that the Board supported the union in the election. Thereafter, the regional director issued a supplemental decision and certification of representation in which he overruled the objections to the election, denied the hospital's request for an evidentiary hearing, and certified the union as the exclusive bargaining representative for the employees in the unit. The hospital applied to the Board for review of the regional director's supplemental decision and for reconsideration of the previous ruling on the appropriateness of the unit. The Board denied the application for review on April 2, 1980.

[1] The parties stipulated that registered nurses would be considered professional employees and, thus, would not be included in either broad unit of service, maintenance and technical employees or a separate unit of technical employees.

The hospital refused to bargain with the union in order to challenge its certification as bargaining representative on the grounds that the bargaining unit of service, maintenance and technical employees was inappropriate and that conduct by the union had destroyed the "laboratory conditions" for a free election. A complaint was issued against the hospital, alleging a refusal to bargain in violation of §§ 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(5) and (1). In answering the complaint, the hospital admitted the refusal to bargain, but denied it had committed an unfair labor practice, contending that the bargaining unit was inappropriate and that the union had engaged in impermissible conduct prior to the election. The general counsel filed a motion for summary judgment with the Board.

On August 11, 1980, the Board issued its decision and order granting summary judgment in favor of the general counsel and against Vicksburg Hospital.[2] The Board determined that the issues raised by the hospital had been previously decided and resolved against it in the underlying representation case and that the hospital had not presented any newly discovered evidence or made a showing of special circumstances requiring a reexamination of the Board's rulings in the representation case. The Board, therefore, determined that there were no material issues of fact to be litigated in the unfair labor practice proceeding and, accordingly, held that the hospital had violated §§ 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by its refusal to bargain with the certified representative of the employees in the unit found appropriate. The Board's order requires the hospital to bargain with the union as the exclusive representative of all employees in the appropriate unit and to embody any understanding reached in a signed agreement.

II. Appropriateness of the Bargaining Unit

Section 9(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 159(b), directs the Board to "decide in each case * * *, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the right guaranteed by this Act, the unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining * * *." In making this determination, "[t]he Board is not by statute required to choose the most appropriate bargaining unit, only to select a unit appropriate under the circumstances." NLRB v. Southern Metal Service, Inc., 606 F.2d 512, 514 (5th Cir. 1979) (emphasis in original). Moreover, "[t]o set aside a Board certified unit, the employer must establish that the designated unit is clearly not apropriate. A showing that some other unit would be appropriate is insufficient, for a choice among appropriate units is within the discretion of the Board." *NLRB v. J.C. 606 F.2d at 514.

Despite the limited nature of judicial review available in such a case, Vicksburg Hospital argues that the Board's determination of an appropriate bargaining unit consisting of all service, maintenance and technical employees was arbitrary, capricious and an abuse of discretion because it was inconsistent with the Board's prior decisional rulings dealing with health care institutions. Specifically the hospital objects to the inclusion of technical employees (predominantly licensed practical nurses) in the same bargaining unit with service and maintenance employees. In support of its position the hospital cites Barnert Memorial Hospital Center, 217 NLRB 775, 89 LRRM 1083 (1975), in which the Board indicated that, in reference to heralth health care institutions, it would not normally compel the inclusion of technical employees in the same bargaining unit with service and maintenance employees.[3] Accord, Jewish Hospital of Cincinnati, 223 NLRB 614, 91 LRRM 1499 (1976).

[2] The Board's decision is reported at 251 NLRB No. 3 (1980).

The hospital argues that the regional director, in his decision on an appropriate bargaining unit, relied solely on the traditional "community of interest" criteria, see NLRB v. J.C. Penney Co., 559 F.2d at 375, and failed to articulate a satisfactory reason for deviating from the Board's established policy of "not normally compel[ling] in inclusion of technical employees in a unit composed of service and maintenance employees." Jewish Hospital of Cincinnati, 223 NLRB at ——, 91 LRRM at 1505. Although not citing Barnert or expressly stating why he was disregarding the Board's policy of not normally including technical employees in the same unit the service and maintenance employees, the regional director indicated that "[w]hen technical employees share a substantial community of interest with service and maintenance employees a combined service, maintenance and technical employees unit is an appropriate unit." In support of this conclusion, the regional director cited Appalachian Regional Hospitals, Inc., 223 NLRB 542, 96 LRRM 1528 (1977); National G. South, Inc., d/b/a Memorial Medical, 230 NLRB 976, 95 LRRM 1478 (1977); and Mount Airy Foundation d/b/a Mount Airy Psychiatric Center, 217 NLRB 802, 89 LRRM 1067 (1975). In each of these cases, the Board found a combined unit of service, maintenance and technical employees to be appropriate. Moreover, the Barnert decision was cited and discussed in Mount Airy, 217 NLRB at —— n.2, 89 LRRM at 1068 n.2. We conclude, therefore, that the regional director was well aware of the Board's policy of not normally including technical employees in the same unit with service and maintenance employees, as was the Board when it denied the hospital's request for review of the regional director's decision, and that he, and the Board by denying the request for review, consciously determined that a combined unit of service, maintenance and technical employees would be appropriate under the circumstances of this case.

The hospital contended that technical employees should constitute a separate bargaining unit because their specialized skills, training, education and job requirements establish separate and distinct community of interests not shared by service and maintenance employees. The regional director found, however, that "many of the employees whom the Employer would place in a separate technical unit work in close association with and share common supervision with employees it would place in the service and maintenance unit." [4] He also found that the hospital's service and maintenance employees shared integrated job functions with, and have substantial and frequent contact with, those employees the hospital would place in a separate technical unit.[5] Given these findings,[6] we cannot say

[3] In Barnert, the Board stated:

"In the health care field, as illustrated by those employees we find are technical employees below [i. e. licensed practical nurses, operating room technicians, X-ray technicians, EKG and EEG technicians, respiratory care technicians, orthopedic technicians, and the like], we find continuing reason to approve separate units of technical employees. Thus, the kinds of employees we would include in the technical unit are those whose specialized training, skills, education and job requirements establish a community of interest not shared by other service and maintenance employees. This separate community of interest is frequently evidenced by the fact that such employees are certified, registered, or licensed. However, we also find employees may not meet such standards without having been certified, registered, or licensed, and if they do, we shall include them in the technical unit."

217 NLRB at ——, 89 LRRM at 1086.

[4] For example, the regional director noted that "in the radiology department, the Employer would place the radiologic technologist and radiologic technicians in a technical unit but would place the radiology receptionist in the service and maintenance unit. The radiology receptionist works in the same area with, and has day-to-day contact with, other radiology department employees including the technologists and the radiologist. The receptionist is also under the immediate supervision of the chief technologist. Similarly, in the department of pathology laboratory, the Employer would include the histologic technician and lab technicians in a technical employee unit but would place the pathology secretary in a service and maintenance unit. The record reveals that the pathology secretary works in a day-to-day contact with the laboratory employees and is directly supervised by the pathologist. The record also establishes that relatively low-skill histologic technicians (no college or technical school education requirement, one year on the job training) work side-by-side with the more highly skilled medical lab technicians (who possess a minimum of 2 years training, an associate degree, and 6 months training in a supervised laboratory)."

that the Board's decision on a combined service, maintenance and technical employees' unit as being appropriate was inconsistent with its prior decisional rulings in the health care field. See Appalachian Regional Hospitals, 233 NLRB at ——, 96 LRRM at 1529; Memorial Medical, 230 NLRB at ——, 95 LRRM at 1481. Instead, we conclude that the Board determined the "commonality of interest" between the hospital's technical employees and its service and maintenance employees was sufficiently so pervasive as to override the separate and distinct community of interest among technical employees flowing from their training, education, skills, and certification, registration or licensing. See Barnert, 217 NLRB at —— n.26, 89 LRRM at 1087 n.26.

Although the hospital has shown that a bargaining unit consisting of its technical employees would be appropriate, it has failed to establish that the combined unit of service, maintenance and technical employees is clearly not appropriate. Since we cannot conclude that the Board's decision, determining that the unit of service, maintenance and technical employees was appropriate, was made in an arbitrary or capricious manner, we must, therefore, defer to the Board's discretion.[7] Moreover, in finding that a single unit of service, maintenance and technical employees was appropriate, the regional director and the Board were mindful of the congressional mandate against undue proliferation of bargaining units in the health care industry. See Allegheny General Hospital, 239 NLRB ——, 100 LRRM 1030 (1978).

III. The Objections to the Election

The hospital raised three objections as a basis for invalidating the election in which the union won the right to represent its service, maintenance and technical employees: (1) that the union offered to waive initiation fees for employees who supported it: (2) that the union misrepresented to employees the nature of unfair labor practice strikes and their rights in the event of an economic strike; and (3) that the union led employees to believe that the Board supported it in the election. After reviewing the evidence submitted by the hospital in support of its contentions, the regional director, without conducting a hearing, issued a decision in which he determined that the objections were unfounded. The Board denied review of the regional director's decision.

"The Board has wide discretion in determining whether an election has been fairly conducted, and its decisions warrant special respect on review." NLRB v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., Inc., 613 F.2d 1364, 1365 (5th Cir.), modified, 618 F.2d 396 (5th Cir. 1980). In order to gain the right to a new election, the hospital "has the entire burden of 1) offering 'specific evidence of specific events from or about specific people,' and 2) showing that these objectionable activities, 'when considered as a whole, either tended to or did influence the outcome of the election.'" NLRB v. Klingler Electric Corp.,

[5] In his decision, the regional director stated: "The record shows that nurses aides and orderlies, as well as all nursing personnel, perform the Employer's simple housekeeping work such as changing of bed linens and assisting patients to their rooms. The record further reflects that the nursing personnel perform such work to the same extent as orderlies and aides. The record also establishes that nurses aides work along with and can, through on the job training, become surgical technicians. The record shows that the admissions clerk (who is assigned to an office job) is in day-to-day contact and works together with nurses in the patient care areas throughout the hospital. Similarly, the radiology receptionist has day-to-day contact with radiology technicians, patients, nurses aides, and LPNs. As an example of common supervision of a large number of technical and non-technical employees, the record reflects that both the 50 LPNs, whom the Employer contends are technical employees, and the 55 nurses aides, whom both parties agree are service and maintenance employees, are under the supervision of the Head Nurse. When asked at the hearing about the frequency of daily contact among its employees, the Employer's Executive Director and Hospital Administrator testified that 'We're a small institution and there's always contact between employees.' The record shows that every employee at the Employer's hospital shares the same employee benefit programs, the same eating and restroom facilities, and the same parking facilities (except for supervisors)."

[7] The hospital also challenged the Board's determination of the bargaining unit because the regional director stated that the parties were in agreement that a number of specific job classifications should be included in any bargaining unit found appropriate, and that this statement was contrary to the evidence. The hospital's contention that the certification of the union is invalid because the regional director misstated the parties' positions is totally without merit. While the regional director erroneously stated at one place in his decision and direction of election that the employer and union agreed on the inclusion of relevant employee classifications "in any unit or units found appropriate," he did, in fact recognize that the parties only disagreed as to which of the employees are "properly includable in a service and maintenance unit, which are properly includable in a technical employee unit, or whether all belong in a broad service, maintenance, and the technical employees unit." Since the regional director's decision dealt specifically with whether there should be separate units or a combined unit, it is clear that his erroneous statement had no impact on the ultimate decision and is harmless error

—— F.2d ——, —— (5th Cir. 1980) (citing Claxton Manufacturing, 613 F.2d at 1366). Establishing that the objectionable activities "either tended to or did influence the outcome of the election" is especially difficult where, as in the Vicksburg Hospital election, the union won by a wide margin.[8] Klingler Electric, —— F.2d at —— (citing NLRB v. Sumter Plywood Corp., 535 F.2d 917, 924 (5th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1092, 97 S.Ct. 1105, 51 L.Ed.2d 538 (1977)).

Although the Board has broad discretion in determining the fairness of employee elections, "this discretion is not unlimited. Due process requires the Board to grant 'a [post-election] hearing to a losing party who has supplied prima facie evidence raising substantial and material issues that would warrant setting the election aside.'" Claxton Manufacturing, 613 F.2d at 1365 (quoting Gulf Coast Automotive Warehouse Co. v. NLRB, 588 F.2d 1096, 1100 (5th Cir. 1979)) (brackets in original). Since we conclude that the evidence supplied by the hospital in support of its objections[9] was not sufficient, in and of itself, to warrant setting aside the election, the sole issue is whether the hospital presented prima facie evidence of election misconduct on the part of the union that would require the Board to grant the hospital a post-election hearing in which to prove its charges.

A. Waiver of Initiation Fees

A union's offer to waive its initiation fees for those employees who sign authorization cards before an election is a basis for setting aside the ensuing election. NLRB v. Savair Manufacturing Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973). However, a union's offer to waive its initiation fees is permissible provided the waiver applies equally to all employees, whether they sign union membership cards before the election or afterwards. NLRB v. Con-Pac, Inc., 509 F.2d 270, 272–73 (5th Cir. 1975).

In elaborating on the Savair doctrine, the Board has held that an ambiguous offer by the union to waive initiation fee, i.e. one which is "subject to a reasonable interpretation by the employees that they can avoid initiation fees by joining the Union prior to the election," California State Automobile Association, 314 NLRB 223, ——, 87 LRRM 1305, 1306 (1974), will constitute objectionable conduct warranting the setting aside of an ensuing election. Id.; The Coleman Co., Inc., 212 NLRB 927, 87 LRRM 1004 (1974); Inland Shoe Manufactuting Co., 11 NLRB 724, 86 LRRM 1498 (1974). The hospital argues that it presented evidence in support of its post-election objections showing that the union made an ambiguous offer to waive initiation fees so as to constitute an unlawful inducement under Savair. Among this evidence, the hospital produced affidavits of three employees and a pamphlet distributed by the union to the employees the day before the election.

The affidavit of employee "A" stated that he attended a meeting held by the union sometime in November of 1979 (the month preceding the electin) and "at this meeting Curtis [the union representative] told us that if the union won the election we would not have to pay an initiation fee. This is all he said about it and there weren't no more questions about that." The affidavit of employee "B" indicated that she had attended a meeting conducted by the union approximately one month before the election. This employee stated:

> "Curtis also told me that the hospital did not have a union and if I joined now you do not have to pay any initiation fee because we do not have a union to join right now and if we get in on the ground floor we don't pay any initiation fees. Once the union come in you would have to pay the initiation fee if you join. When he told me this Curtis was speaking loud enough so everyone at the meeting could hear him say it."

The affidavit of employee "C," which was submitted by the hospital in support of its objections,[10] indicates that the employee had a conversation with the union representative about three weeks before the election. The affidavit states:

> "Curtis told me that one of the things that was being said was that we would have to pay an initiation fee and that was wrong because we

[8] Out of 230 eligible voters, the union received 148 votes in its favor, and 66 votes were cast against it.

[9] See 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(a)

[10] This affidavit was not included in the record forwarded to this court. A portion of the affidavit was, however, quoted by the regional director in his supplemental decision, and the hospital has not challenged its accuracy before the Board or this court.

would not have to pay an initiation fee but that we would have ot pay dues. He said that we would not be required to pay an initiation fee because we don't make as much money as a carpenter."

The pamphlet received by the employees the day before the election states:

> "Subject to your majority vote and 'certification' issued by the N.L.R.B.—an agency of the federal government—WE GUARANTEE TO YOU:
> 5. You will have opportunity to join UBC without payment of initiation fees!"

In his supplemental decision, the regional director fully addressed the hospital's contention that the statements by the union representative, as related by the three bargaining unit employees, and the "guarantee" contained in the pamphlet were ambiguous and could have created the notion in the employees' minds that they had to join the union before the election in order for the initiation fees to be waived. The regional director noted that both employees "A" and "C" stated that the union representative had told them they would not have to pay an initiation fee. No conditions were attached to the waiver of initiation fees in the union representative's statements to these employees. With respect to the "guarantee," the regional director noted that it was not limited to any select group of employees, e.g., those who supported the union prior to the election, but was made in general to the entire unit of employees. He further noted that the pamphlet, in addition to the statement "you will have opportunity to join [the union] without payment of initiation fees," indicated that "membership will be on a voluntary basis [and that] [i]f you are not satisfied with the benefits and representation, you are not obligated to join the union." Therefore, we conclude, as did the regional director, that the only potentially ambiguous offer to waive initiation fees, presented by the hospital, was contained in the affidavit of employee "B".

Assuming that the statement offering to waive initiation fees for employees who "join right now" or "get in on the ground floor" was ambiguous and objectionable under Savair, the regional director concluded that the affidavits of employees "A" and "C" demonstrate that the scope of the union's waiver was sufficiently clarified to employees to render the colloquialisms "join right now" and "get in on the ground floor" unobjectionable. See Evans Rotork, Inc., 242 NLRB No. 176, 101 LRRM 1333 (1979). The regional director also noted the contradictory nature of employee "B's" statement and concluded that it would be entirely unreasonable for an employee to have interpreted the phrases "join right now" and "get in on the ground floor" in a manner that would be objectionable under Savair because employee "B" stated that, in the same conversation, the union representative told her there was no union to join at the time. Because we find the regional director's decision to be "reasonable and based on substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole, our inquiry is at an end."[11] Klingler Electric, —— F.2d at ——. Moreover, we conclude that the hospital has completely failed in its burden to show that the offer to waive initiation fees, as recounted by employee "B", either had the tendency to or actually did influence the outcome of the election, which the union won by a wide margin.[12] See Claxton Manufacturing, 613 F.2d at 1366, 1370–71. We hold, therefore, that the hospital was not entitled to a post-election hearing on the waiver of initiation fees issue because it failed to present prima facie proof of facts sufficient to invalidate the election under Savair.

[11] The hospital argues that in his decision, the regional director relied on statements from Curtis (the union's representative) that were obtained during the regional director's ex parte investigation. In support of its argument, the hospital notes that the regional director quotes extensively from Curtis' ex parte statement regarding the union's policy on waiver of initiation fees and that portions of Curtis' statement seemingly conflict with affidavits supplied by the hospital. Hence, the hospital contends that the regional director made credibility determinations between Curtis' statement and the affidavits supplied by it. While we agree that "[i]f there is any credibility issue on a point sufficient to invalidate the election, a hearing is required," Klingler Electric, —— F.2d at —— (citing Claxton Manufacturing, 613 F.2d at 1366–67), it is clear from the regional director's decision that he relied solely on the "guarantee" in the pamphlet, the affidavits of employees "A" and "C," and the internal inconsistency of employee "B's" affidavit.

[12] This conclusion is inescapable in view of the fact that the hospital had either adequately responded to, or perhaps precipitated, the waiver of initiation fees issue. In its campaign literature, distributed to the employees near the end of November 1979, the hospital noted that the union's bylaws required a $200 initiation fee. In addressing the employees in this literature, the hospital asserted that

> "[u]nion salesmen may try to tell you that you can get in 'free' if you join up right away. WATCH OUT FOR THIS BARGAIN! Once the union organizers get control over you, they can find lots of ways to make you pay and pay and pay whether you like it or not."

B. The Asserted Misrepresentations

An election will be set aside "only where there has been a misrepresentation which involves a substantial departure from the truth, at a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply, so that the misrepresentation, whether deliberate or not, may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the election." Hollywood Ceramics, 140 NLRB 221, 224, 51 LRRM 1600, 1601 (1962), Quoted in General Knit of California, 239 NLRB 619, ——, 99 LRRM 1687, 1688 (1978) (emphasis added); see also NLRB v. Bancroft Manufacturing Co., 516 F.2d 436, 443 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 914, 96 St. Ct. 1112, 47 L.Ed.2d 318 (1976).

The hospital contends that the union made material misrepresentations regarding strikes. In support of its allegations, it presented employee affidavits which showed that the union's representative misrepresented the nature of unfair labor practice and economic strikes.[13] The regional director concluded, however, that these misrepresentations were sufficiently rebutted by the hospital through a speech made by its administrator and by a letter to the employees.[14] In his supplemental decision, the regional director wrote:

> "Accordingly, the undersigned finds that in the speech delivered December 3, 1979, the Employer dwelt at length with respect to pay and benefits during an economic strike. In its December 3, 1979 letter to its employees * * * the Employer emphasized in paragraph 4 that 'the people who were out because of these strikes drew no wages from their employer. They lost money every day the strike lasted.' "

Because the hospital had ample opportunity to, and did on several occasions, reply to the union's misrepresentations, the regional director concluded that the misrepresentations did not warrant setting aside the election. We agree.

The hospital also contends that the union created the false impression that the Board supported it in the election. In support of this allegation, the hospital relies on a leaflet circulated by the union as well as a letter from and a statement by the union representative. The leaflet is headed by the caption: "STAND UP FOR YOUR RIGHTS. IT'S YOUR RIGHT TO HAVE A UNION." The leaflet then depicts a figure of Uncle Sam standing behind a man wearing a button bearing the word "Union," with a caption underneath reading, "REMEMBER UNCLE SAM STANDS BEHIND YOU." The leaflet also shows another figure of Uncle Sam pointing a finger, with the caption underneath reading, "Here's The Law," accompanied by an arrow directing the reader to the reverse side. The reverse side of the leaflet states in large, bold letters, "YOUR RIGHT TO JOIN THE UNION IS PROTECTED BY THE U.S. GOVERNMENT"; then portions of the National Labor Relations Act are set forth with explanations of what the Act's provisions mean.

Conduct by a union which creates the impression that the United States Government encourages employees to organize and join the union constitutes a sufficient basis to warrant setting aside an election. See Tyler Pipe Industries, Inc., 447 F.2d 1136 (5th Cir. 1971) (where the election was set aside because the union distributed a handbill stating "* * * the United States Government STRONGLY URGES employees to organize * * *"). In this case, however, the role of the government was not misrepresented by the leaflet. As noted in the regional director's supplemental decision, the thrust of the leaflet is to explain the meaning of the employees' rights under §§ 7 and 8(a) of the National Labor Relations Act. We agree with the regional director's conclusion that the leaflet did not exceed the bounds of permissible campaign propaganda because it did not suggest that the government encourages employees to organize, nor did it suggest that the government endorses the union. Instead, the leaflet merely conveyed that the government protects the right to join a union.

The hospital also asserts that a verbal statement by the union representative created a false impression that the Board had endorsed the union in the election. This verbal statement was recounted in an employee's affidavit:

[13] Curtis (the union representative) distorted the distinctions between unfair labor practice and economic strikes by asserting to employees assembled at a union meeting that, if employees went on strike to protest the hospital's failure to agree to what the employees considered reasonable terms the employees could go out on an unfair labor practice strike. The thrust of Curtis' remarks was that any time employees went on strike to force an employer to agree to economic demands, the strike would be an unfair labor practice strike and that, upon return from such a strike, the hospital would have to give employees back pay for the time they were off. This is not the law. See, e.g., National Fresh Fruit & Vegetable Co. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1331, 1337 (5th Cir. 1978).

[14] The administrator's affidavit and the letter were submitted by the hospital in support of its objections.

> "[The union representative] got into the meeting that [the hospital administrator] had for employees at the hospital where he stated that [the administrator] said if the union comes in the slate will be wiped clean and start afresh, this is a lie, he cannot take any benefits away from you employees. He said he is backed up by the National Labor Relations Board."

In his supplemental decision, the regional director stated:

> "The evidence disclose[d] that the Employer made employees aware that benefits can be bargained away during the course of collective bargaining while the [union] made them aware that the Employer cannot unilaterally take away benefits presently enjoyed by the employees. The undersigned therefore concludes and finds the statements made with respect to benefits amount to mere campaign puffery and do not exceed the bounds of permissible campaign propaganda."

We agree. We also conclude that the leaflet and the union representative's statements taken together do not create the impression of endorsement of the union by the Board.

The hospital also points to a letter sent by the union to the hospital administrator, complaining about an employee who made anti-union remarks in the emergency room. The letter complained about the hospital's failure to enforce a no-solicitation rule and asserted that "your refusal to treat all employees fairly and equally in the adminstration of hospital rules and policies has resulted in a violation of the National Labor Relations Act." A copy of the letter was mailed to the Board. Because the hospital neither alleged nor showed that the union made the employees aware of the letter, we are unable to find that the letter created any possible impression of Board sponsorship for the union.

We conclude that no post-election hearing was required for the alleged union misrepresentations because the regional director assumed the truth of the allegations raised by the hospital's evidence and found those facts insufficient to warrant setting aside the election. See Klingler Electric, —— F.2d at ——.

Vicksburg Hospital's petition for review is DENIED, and the request of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order is GRANTED.

C.H. Heist Corporation V. NLRB

657 F.2d 178 (7th Cir.), August 24, 1981; rehearing denied November 24, 1981–250 NLRB 1400

On petition for review and cross petition for enforcement of Board Order

Before SPRECHER and CUDAHY, Circuit Judge, and EAST,* District Judge

EAST, District Judge. The Heist Corporation (Company) dismissed an employee, Michael Mitchell (Mitchell), who had been a union steward prior to and during a wildcat strike by certain employees of the Company. The Administrative Law Judge (ALJ), following a union charge of unfair labor practice against the Company, found that the Company's dismissal of Mitchell violated § 8(a)(3) and (1)[1] of the National Labor Relations Act, and ordered Mitchell's reinstatement with back pay. The Board, by a two-to-one majority, adopted without comment the findings and decision of the ALJ. 250 NLRB No. 185.

The Company seeks review of the Board's decision, and the Board cross-appeals for enforcement. We note jurisdiction under 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) and grant enforcement FACTS:

A rather extensive delineation of the pertinent facts is necessary in order to reach a proper disposition of the parties' contentions.

Mitchell went to work for the Company, which owns several plants, in 1976 and became a union steward in 1978. He filed numerous employee grievances during his tenure as a steward, but was no more active than previous stewards. Although Mitchell had locked horns with the Company's area representative, William Sheehan, on occasion, the ALJ found no lingering hostility from those incidents at the time of the strike.

---

[1] 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) and (1).

In Febuaury of 1979, Sheehan posted on the bulletin board new seniority lists reclassifying and essentially demoting six plant employees in accordance with the Company's interpretation of the recently concluded collective bargaining agreement. Late that night an employee telephoned Mitchell at his home and informed him that several employees wanted to obtain from Mitchell a list of employee telephone numbers so that they could ascertain the feelings of the plant employees concerning the demotions. In response to a question, Mitchell indicated that he did not know the union's position on the matter because he had not yet conferred with the union's business agent, and urged the employees to do nothing until the union has been consulted. The employees insisted upon receiving the phone numbers, and Mitchell agreed to supply them. Shortly thereafter, the employees arrived at Mitchell's home and informed him they wanted to organize a "show of strength." Mitchell advised them, instead, to utilize the contractual grievance procedures. They persisted and Mitchell permitted them to phone the other plant employees from his home because, he told them, he "wanted to be in on it" and wanted "to know what was going on."

The next morning some 20 employees gathered at the plant to confront Sheehan. Sheehan called Mitchell into his office and told him that he would not meet with the employees unless they designated their assemblage as a "union meeting." Mitchell delivered that message to the workers, who agreed to the condition. Sheehan then appeared and Mitchell and several other employees presented their grievance. Sheehan responded that the demotion decision had been made at a higher level in the Company, and that it could not be changed at the plant level.

The next day several employees organized a meeting of the Company's workers for the purpose of conducting a strike vote. Mitchell attended the meeting, and when he was asked to state his views on the strike vote, urged the employees not to strike but to instead allow the union to handle the matter through the contractual grievance procedure. He also said that, at the least, the employees should obtain legal counsel before taking action on their own.

The employees voted to strike and, unaccompanied by Mitchell, went to the plant and set up a picket line. Later that night Mitchell went to the plant upon the request of a striking employee who told him that several employees and the police were already there. At the plant, Mitchell explained to an inquiring Sheehan that the employees had voted to strike.

The police, after turning down a Company foreman's request that they arrest Mitchell requested Mitchell to move the employees off the Company property. Mitchell complied.

The workers picketed the plant for two and a half days until the Company obtained an injunction ordering them back to work. Mitchell was present on the picket line "on and off" for about eight hours a day. During the strike, the Company and the union both communicated with the picketers through Mitchell. Mitchell received three calls from the union during the strike, and delivered the union's messages that the strike was illegal, in violation of the contract, and not sanctioned by the union. Mitchell also told the strikers that the union wanted them to go back to work and that they should go back to work so that they would not discharged. They refused.

Mitchell and all of the picketers were requested individually by the Company to return to work, and they all refused. Mitchell delivered the same request to the picketers on behalf of the Company, and it was again refused.

At no time during the course of the strike did Mitchell urge the employees to remain on strike. Instead, he urged the employees to return to work or, at the least, seek legal counsel.

Immediately preceding and during the course of the strike, Mitchell was in telephone contact with union stewards in other company plants in which the same reclassification/demotion policy had been instituted. The stewards discussed the situations in their respective plants, but Mitchell at no time requested the stewards or the employees they represented to strike or othewise support the walkout at his plant.

On the last day of the strike, after being informed that the Company would seek an injunction, Mitchell and several employees visited an attorney. When the Company obtained the injunction late that day, an employee informed Sheehan that the employees, on the advice of counsel, were ready to return to work. The next day Mitchell informed Sheehan that he was ready to return. Thereafter, the Company informed the employees that it did not condone the strike and would conduct an investigation. Mitchell then resigned as union steward.

The Company interviewed only Mitchell about the strike and declined another employee's offer to answer questions. When Sheehan asked a plant supervisor if he thought Mitchell had led the walkout, the supervisor responded that he did not think so. Twelve days after the strike ended, Mitchell was discharged by Sheehan and vice-president Heist.

After the Mitchell discharge, Heist met with the unit employees and informed them, according to one of the employees, that "nobody else would be condemned for their actions during the strike but Mike Mitchell was fired because he was the man that held the position of union steward at that time, and he had to get rid of somebody, that Mike held the position." At that point, an employee stated that "it wasn't right" because Mitchell had not been the leade of the strike. Heist responded, stating that that made no difference because Mitchell held the "position" and, therefore, he was the one that had to be fired.

ISSUE ON REVIEW:

The sole issue presented by the parties on this appeal is:

> Whether the discharge of an employee who participated in an illegal work stoppage constitutes a violation of section 8(a) (3) and (1), where the discharge is based solely upon the fact that the employee was the union steward, and where the employee participated only reluctantly in the strike and attempted to dissuade the employees from striking.

We answer in the affirmative.

DISCUSSION:

At the time of the strike and Mitchell's discharge, the union and the Company were parties to an industry-wide collective bargaining agreement which contained, inter alia, the following provisions:

> Article VIII. Stewards
> Section 1. The Union shall have the right to appoint one chief shop steward * * * [who] shall be [an employee] covered by this Agreement * * *
> Section 2. The stewards duties shall consist of seeing that all terms and conditions of the Agreement are being complied with * * *
> * * * * *
> Article XXI Dispute/Grievance Procedure:
> Section 5. There shall be no strike or lockout, slowdown, interference, or work interruption on any job over any grievance of dispute while it is being processed through this grievance procedure, and until the said procedure has been exhausted. If any employees engage in any such activity, they may be disciplined by management without recourse except to establish that they actually participated in or were a part of such activity [emphasis supplied] * * *.

The Board, through the adoption of the ALJ's finding, concluded that by disciplining only Mitchell out of the 25 strikers, not because of his actions as an employee or his role in the strike, but solely because he was a union official, the Company violated sections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.[2]

The Company contends nevertheless that it could lawfully discharge Mitchell even if he was only a mere participant in the strike. This argument principally relies upon two cases: Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979), and Gould Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, Moran v. Gould Corp., ––– U.S. –––, 101 S.Ct. 247, 66 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980).

Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. involved a wildcat strike at a public utility in violation of a collective bargaining agreement provision that the employees would "not be called upon or permitted to cease or abstain from the continuous performance of the duties pertaining to the positions held by them * * *." 599 F.2d at 228. The employees went out on strike and were joined by five union officials who left work falsely claiming that they were ill. That afternoon three of the striking officials joined in an effort to end the strike. The next morning all the strikers returned to work.

[2] Section 8(a)(3) prohibits employers from "discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *."

The Electric Company, by suspending the union officials for from one to three days, disciplined them more harshly than the rank and file employees, who received only written warnings. This court, in denying enforcement of the Board's order, first noted that where the employer's discriminatory conduct is "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of anti-union motivation is needed to establish a § 8(a)(3) violation. NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 33, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1797, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967). On the other hand, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight," anti-union motivation must be proved. Id. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797–98.

The Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. court found that there was no evidence of anti-union motivation, and thus the question was whether the suspensions were inherently destructive of important employee rights.[3] The court noted that "[t]he more severe punishment was not based merely on the officials' status but upon their breach of the higher responsibility that accompanies that status, a breach that makes their misconduct more serious than that of the rank-and-file," 599 F.2d at 230. The court found that, until recently, the Board had recognized that the higher responsibilities of union officials justify disciplining them more severely for particpation in unprotected activity, and that the Board had erred in rejecting that position in Precision Casting Co., 233 NLRB No. 35 (1977) and Gould Corp., 237 NLRB No. 125 (1978).

The Third Circuit followed suit in denying enforcement of the Board's order in Gould Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728. That case involved a union steward who was singled out for disciplinary discharge out of fifty striking employees. The court found, however, that he was not fired solely because he was a steward, but because he "participated in an illegal strike and failed to perform his contractual obligation to take positive steps to halt that work stoppage." 612 F.2d at 733. The collective bargaining agreement there specifically required union officers to publicly disavow illegal work stoppages and to order the members to return to work.

In the instant case, there appears to be no finding that the discharge had anti-union motivation, and thus the issue is whether the discharge was "inherently destructive" of employee rights. If the discharge was "not based merely on the officials' status but upon their breach of the higher responsibility that accompanies that status," Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., 599 F.2d at 230, then it is not inherently destructive of employee rights.

The Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. decision did not define exactly what that "higher responsibility" is or from whence it arises. The Board here contends that Mitchell met any higher responsibilities incident to his union office by attempting to dissuade the employees from striking both before and throughout the strike, and by his actions as mediator between the employees, the Company, and the union. The Board contends that the "higher responsibility" should not include an obligation to cross a picket line which is honored by the vast majority of the employees, because crossing the line would cause the steward to lose both credibility and the ability and opportunity to mediate a resolution of the strike. Conversely, the Company contends, rather unrealistically, that if the steward crossed the line, the strike might end.

The collective bargaining provision in Gould Inc., quoted above, were quite specific and would alone be sufficient to impose a higher responsibility upon the union officials to end the strike. In Indiana & Michigan Electric Co., however, the contractual provisions were less specific, reciting only that the employees' services were essential to the operation of a public utility, and that the employees would not be "called upon or permitted" to strike.

The contractual basis for the union steward's "higher responsibility" in this case is even more tenuous than in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. Here, besides the no strike clause, the contract contained only one other relevant provision which imposed upon the stewards the duty to "seeing that all terms and conditions of this Agreement are being complied with."

The Board contends that Mitchell met his obligations under this provision by attempting to dissuade the employees from striking, and that the provision did not impose upon him a "higher responsibility" to cross the picket line. By contrast, only three of the five union officials in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. attempted to persuade the employees to stop the strike, and they did so only belatedly.

[3] We emphasize the inherently less destructive suspensions in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. from the discharge in the present case.

The Board's argument is persuasive. While Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. noted that a union steward's mere "presence" among illegal strikers may provide "active approval and encouragement," 599 F.2d at 231 n.9, no such conclusion can be drawn in this case as Steward Mitchell repeatedly attempted to dissuade the strikers, not belatedly, but throughout the strike. In the absence of a clear contractual provision requiring Mitchell to cross the picket line, his efforts were sufficient, if not the most effective possible, to satisfy his obligation to see that the no strike clause was complied with.

We will not construe Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. so broadly as to permit the Company's action here. Mitchell did just about everything possible to end a strike which he had tried to prevent, except to cross the picket line. To have taken that extra step would have been suicidal to his union stewardship and his capacity to enforce any provision of the bargaining contract.

The Company stated that Mitchell was fired not because he was thought to be a leader of the strike, but solely because he was the union steward. On the facts of this case, we find that the Company's action was "inherently destructive" of Mitchell's right to hold union office.

The evidentiary record clearly supports the findings of fact of the ALJ and the Board, and we approve the Board's conclusions of law.

The Company's petition for review is denied, and the Board's order is enforced.

ENFORCED.

Monongahela Power Company v. NLRB

657 F.2d 608 (4th Cir.), August 24, 1981—248 NLRB 69

On petition to review and cross petition for enforcement of Board Order

Before BUTZNER and HALL, Circuit Judges, and ERWIN,* District Judge

ERWIN, District Judge: Monongahela Power Company (the Company) petitions this court to review an order of the National Labor Relations Board issued on September 30, 1980. The Board has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order. The Company has refused to bargain with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (the Union) on the grounds that (1) the bargaining unit certified by the Board is improper, because it includes control room foremen (CRF's) who are "supervisors" within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11) (1976); and (2) the election was tainted by a number of misrepresentations and should therefore be set aside. We agree with the Company that CRF's are "supervisors" within the meaning of the Act and deny enforcement of the Board's order on that basis.

On May 21, 1979, the Union filed a petition with the Board seeking a certification election in a unit composed of virtually all of the Company's employees at its Fort Martin plant in Maidsville, West Virginia. The proposed unit included five individuals employed as CRF's. The Company opposed the inclusion of CRF's in the bargaining unit, and a representation hearing was held on June 15, 1979 to resolve the issue. On July 3, 1979, the Regional Director issued his decision finding that CRF's were employees and should be included in the bargaining unit and directing that an election be held. The Company filed for review of the Regional Director's decision on July 13, and the Board denied the request on July 25 on the basis that there were no substantial issues raised which warranted review.

An election was held at the Fort Martin Power Station on August 3, 1979 and was won by the Union by a vote of 58–56 with one challenged ballot. On August 10, 1979, the Company filed timely objections to the conduct of the election, alleging that the Union, through its officers, agents, and representatives, had made material misrepresentations regarding wages, benefits, and other conditions of employment at the Company.[1] The Regional Director conducted an investigation and on November 20, 1979 issued a Supplemental Decision and Certification of Representative completely over-ruling the objections and certifying the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative. The Company's subsequent request for review was denied by the Board.

On April 24, 1980, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Company, based on its refusal to bargain. A Complaint and Notice of Hearing was filed by the Board on May 16, 1980. The Board subsequently moved for summary judgment on the ground that the issues raised by the Company in its answer to the complaint had been previously decided in the representation proceeding. The motion was granted, the Board concluding that the Company had refused to bargain with the Union in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. The Board then issued the order which is before this court.

The facts on which the Regional Director based his decision concerning the CRF's were adduced at the representation hearing before Hearing Officer Thomas M. Stefanaco. The only witness at the hearing was Raymond S. Hackett, manager of the Fort Martin Power Station, who appeared on behalf of the Company. The following summary of facts is based on that testimony.

Monongahela Power Company is a wholly owned subsidiary of Allegheny Power Systems, Inc. and operates as a public utility engaged in the generation and transmission of electricity at various locations in West Virginia and Ohio. The Fort Martin Power Station produces electricity through the use of coal-fired boilers which run two steam driven generating units. These units generate approximately 1100 megawatts of electric power. The facility is composed of three departments, each of which is headed by a superintendent who reports directly to the plant manager. Approximately 138 people are employed at the plant.

The Operations Department bears the responsibility for actually running the generating units. The department personnel include the superintendent, four shift supervisors, five control room foremen, eight maintenance men, a station lubricator, and fifteen operators classified A, B, and C. Also included are a coal supervisor, a coal foreman, and twenty-one coal operators.

There are four main crews in the Operations Department, and each is scheduled to work an eight-hour shift, five days a week. In addition, there is a fifth crew—the relief crew—which covers one regular eight-hour shift per week and is available as relief for any of the other regular crews. The relief crew works an otherwise normal forty-hour week doing special assignments under the direction of a shift supervisor. The crews are assigned work shifts such that the plant operates twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week. Every ten days, each crew rotates to a different eight-hour shift—day, afternoon/evening, and night. The plant manager and the operations superintendent normally work the day shift, Monday through Friday, but both are available twenty-four hours a day in case of an emergency.

A typical operations crew consists of a shift supervisor, one CRF, two maintenance men, and three operators, A, B, and C. The CRF, operators, and maintenance men all report directly to the shift supervisor, who in turn reports to the operations superintendent. The CRF's work exclusively in the control room while the operators work on the plant floor, watching the equipment and communicating by telephone or over the public address system with the CRF.

The station is run from the control room which is located in the center of the plant close to the two generating units. The control room contains computer printout terminals, pressure and heat gauges, television monitors, and other information equipment which serve as indicators of the status of the plant's machinery. The CRF is in charge of the control room and is often the only employee there. From the control room, the CRF monitors the operation of the power generating units, the coal handling system, the plant's security system, and the startup and shutdown of machinery. He reports directly to the shift supervisor and does not generally leave the control room unless relieved by another employee.

The plant is almost completely automated, and its daily operation is governed to some extent by use to which the Union put its membership dues; (4) the rights of employees who choose not to join the Union; (5) the events surrounding the 1979 contract negotiations at one of the Company's organized facilities; (6) the employee relations of other employers; and (7) implications that the Company had engaged in unfair labor practices against Union supporters.

written procedures and guidelines. Its machinery can, however, be run manually. The CRF and the operators have access to manufacturers' guidelines for the operation of plant machinery and the Company's guidelines for handling the startup and shutdown procedures and emergency situations. There also exist established limitations for steam pressure, heat, and the like, of which the CRF is aware and which are monitored from the control room. The CRF generally follows established procedures whenever the equipment reaches or exceeds its prescribed limit. In situations where no predetermined procedure exists, the CRF uses his own judgment.[2]

During a startup procedure, the CRF coordinates the operators and maintenance men as they perform their tasks. The startup is a complex procedure, and therefore, the plant manager always tries to be in the control room to assist the CRF. The CRF is likewise responsible for coordination of the shutdown procedures.

The monitoring and handling of emergency situations is a crucial job responsibility for the CRF. When an alarm is heard from one of the monitors in the control room, the CRF is expected to react quickly, evaluate the problem, and determine the appropriate response, which is usually one of the established procedures. Sometimes the CRF can alleviate or resolve the problem by operating the affected machinery from the control room. Often he must call an operator who will deal with the problem from the plant floor. The CRF may instruct the operator in what procedure to follow; if he cannot determine the nature of the problem from the control room, the operator must analyze the problem himself and report back to him. An experienced operator may make the necessary corrections before reporting back to the CRF. The CRF and the operators remain in close communication by telephone as the CRF utilizes the control room monitors to ascertain whether a particular problem is being satisfactorily resolved.

Some emergencies require decisive action to avoid total shutdown. In those situations, the shift supervisor and plant manager report to the control room to assist the CRF. Often the emergency requires an instantaneous response, and the CRF must make a decision and take decisive action without waiting for the shift supervisor to arrive. On those occasions, the shift supervisor will then be advised of whatever action was taken by the CRF. CRF's spend twenty to twenty-five percent of their day responding to emergency problems.

All employees at the plant, including CRF's are salaried. CRF's earn between seven percent less than shift supervisors and fifteen to twenty percent more than the operators. All employees receive the same basic benefits, including vacation, hospitalization, group life, retirement, sick pay, and leave of absence. CRF's are exempt employees, however, as are other management personnel, and receive additional benefits such as travel insurance and jury pay above their normal salary. Because they are required to be in the control room at all times, CRF's are allowed to work on scheduled holidays and use that time to add on to their vacations, a flexibility which is not allowed nonexempt employees. CRF's do not attend the weekly supervisors' meetings; they do, however, attend the annual supervisors' dinner and have attended training conferences which were not open to other employees. CRF's have the authority to talk with employees about minor disciplinary problems. In addition to directing operations employees, CRF's train them as relief CRF's or as new employees. CRF's can have employees stay past their normal shift times.

Discussion

We are well aware of the demonstrated expertise of the Board in resolving questions of this nature, and that as a general rule, the Board's findings are to be accepted if they are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed.2d 456 (1951). We are not barred, however, from setting aside a Board decision when we cannot "conscientiously find that the evidence supporting that decision is substantial, when viewed in the light that the record in its entirety furnishes, including the body of evidence opposed to the Board's view." 340 U.S. at 488, 71 S.Ct. at 464.

[2] The CRF's were responsible for writing a checklist for shutdowns and startups of equipment.

The Regional Director found that CRF's are not supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11) (1976). That section provides that:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

It is well established that this section is to be read in the disjunctive, so that an individual possessing any of the above-enumerated powers is considered a "supervisor" for purposes of the Act. NLRB v. Pilot Freight Carriers, Inc., 558 F.2d 205, 207 (4th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 1011, 98 S.Ct. 723, 54 L.Ed.2d 754 (1978); NLRB v. Metropolitan Petroleum Co., 506 F.2d 616, 618 (1st Cir. 1974); NLRB v. Brown Specialty Co., 436 F.2d 372, 375 (7th Cir. 1971).

In holding that CRF's are not supervisors, the Regional Director concluded that because the participation of the CRF's in decisions concerning hiring, evaluations, promotion, or discharge of employees was only occasional and usually involved the participation of the shift supervisor or station manager, those functions were insufficient to impart supervisory status. With respect to the responsibility of CRF's to give directions to operators or maintenance employees, the Regional Director concluded that these directions are "based upon their greater skills and experience, are dictated by written procedural and operating guidelines, and do not involve the exercise of independent judgment."[3]

We agree with the Board's conclusion that CRF's do not exercise the requisite authority with regard to hiring, discharge, transfer, promotion, recall, discipline, or adjustment of grievances of other employees and so are not supervisors within the meaning of the initial part of Section 2(11). CRF's are generally unaware of whose applications are on file. Neither do they significantly affect the transfer of employees. The normal procedure is for the plant manager to solicit opinions from all who know about an employee's work before reaching a decision as to transfer. CRF's do not figure prominently in the discharge of employees.

Routine personnel matters are handled by the shift supervisors. This includes the preparation of work assignment schedules, vacations, and timecards, resolving grievances, and preparing employee evaluations. The CRF is involved to a limited extent, generally handling those duties which have been delegated to him by the shift supervisor. Although this task appears in his job description, there is no evidence that the CRF's have resolved employee grievances. Their role in employee discipline also appears to be minor.

Mindful that the powers in Section 2(11) are to be read in the disjunctive, we are of the opinion that there exists sufficient evidence in the record to demonstrate that CRF's "responsibly direct" other employees and in doing so utilize the requisite "independent judgment."

That the CRF "directs" other employees is readily apparent from the record and further is exemplified by his job description, which provides generally that he "direct and participate in activities required to achieve safe, economical, and reliable operation of all electrical, mechanical, and steam generating power production equipment."[4]

[4] Joint Appendix, p. 140. The other "typical duties" of a CRF include:

a. Direct and participate in the operation of power station boilers, turbines, generators, condensers, switchboards, substations, and related auxiliary equipment during an assigned shift.

b. Direct and participate in placing equipment in service, removing equipment from service, releasing equipment for maintenance, and switching any electrical equipment at the station.

c. Direct and participate in the testing of equipment.

d. Direct and participate in the preparation of records of all operations and changes to the equipment during the shift and prepare or check all station daily operating reports.

e. Contact power control centers regarding station capacity, system conditions, planned and forced outages, load changes, switching and voltage schedule unusual or emergency conditions, and other operating requirements and problems.

f. Keep informed of company labor policies and endeavor to settle minor complaints and misunderstandings.

g. Plan and schedule delegated phases of operating work at the station, and develop work schedules for the assignment of operators needed to man the equipment according to capacity requested by power control personnel and the cleaning, oiling, and inspecting of station equipment to conform with load conditions.

h. Report unusual or emergency operating conditions which affect plant capacity and reliability.

i. Perform special studies and investigations.

The question is whether that direction is "responsible" within the meaning of Section 2(11).

"Responsibility" is defined as being "answerable for the discharge of a duty or obligation. Responsibility includes judgment, skill, ability, capacity, and is implied by power." Ohio Power Company v. NLRB, 176 F.2d 385, 387 (6th Cir. 1949), cert. denied, 338 U.S. 899, 70 S.Ct. 249, 94 L.Ed. 553 (1949). The CRF is in charge of the control room and therefore the entire operation of the plant. It is his expertise and judgment on which other employees, including his superiors, rely. This is illustrated by the evidence adduced at the representation hearing.

Plant Manager Hackett stated at the representation hearing that CRF's are considered by him to be supervisors, and they have been told that they are supervisors. They are considered to be the immediate supervisors of Operators A, B, and C on a particular shift. Mr. Hackett testified that the CRF's have "constant interaction" with these individuals.[5] CRF's do not normally direct the activities of the maintenance men but have the authority to put them to work when and where needed.[6]

There is no dispute that the CRF is responsible for coordinating the activities of the operators and maintenance men during startup and shutdown. In emergency situations, he is to analyze and resolve difficulties which arise from the operation of the machinery. After doing so, he often tells operators what procedures they should then follow in dealing with those difficulties. The CRF can determine whether a problem has been satisfactorily resolved by observing the monitors. Emergencies may arise which allow no time to wait until a shift superintendent arrives; the CRF moves first and advises his superiors later. We think this illustrates that the CRF "responsibly directs" other employees.

In arriving at this conclusion, we find a recent decision to be particularly persuasive. In Marine Yankee Atomic Power Co. v. NLRB, 624 F.2d 347 (1st Cir. 1980), the court analyzed the supervisory status of "shift operating supervisors" (SOS's), who were in charge of the control room of a nuclear power plant. The functions, duties, and responsibilities of the SOS in Maine Yankee are quite similar to those of the CRF in this case.

In holding that the SOS is not a supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11), the Board in Maine Yankee discounted the significance of the SOS's authority to direct other shift employees in such the same way as the Regional Director in the instant case discounted the Fort Martin CRF's functions of directing plant operators in the startup and shutdown of equipment or in emergency situations. The Board ruled that the SOS did not possess supervisory authority, because the occasions on which directions were given to other employees were of a "'routine and repetitious nature,' involving little use of independent judgment," as evidenced by the existence of pre-established operating procedures which were followed on most occasions. 624 F.2d at 362.

The court rejected the Board's contention that the exercise of authority by the SOS was of a routine and repetitive nature. It found that an employee such as the SOS, who must coordinate the activities of several other employees to ensure the smooth operation of delicate machinery, necessarily exercises a significant degree of independent judgment. We find that reasoning applicable here. As the duties of the SOS and the CRF are so similar, we find the following language to be particularly persuasive:

> The SOS's duties include ensuring that numerous gauges are accurately monitored, responding efficiently and appropriately to the many warning signals and alarms should they become activated, and seeing that any one or more of the plant's some 60–70 systems are properly placed in and out of service on the many occasions when that is necessary. These tasks at times involve his coordinating the efforts of the three other operators and making decisions among them as to the correct action to take whenever there is any question. And, while the Maine Yankee facility is semi-automated and there are many safety backups, the possibility of operator error is not merely theoretical * * * such error could cause damage to the plant * * *. We are at a loss to

In addition, the court in Maine Yankee found the role of the SOS during an emergency to be further evidence of his supervisory status. In emergencies, the SOS, like the CRF in this case, was responsible for taking the necessary action when consultation with his shift superintendent was impossible. That the SOS would be expected to inform his superior of an emergency would not strip him of his authority and duty to act. 624 F.2d at 364. The same is true of this case. The CFR can and often does act on his own authority if an emergency situation requires it.[7]

In analogizing the duties of the CRF to those of the SOS in Maine Yankee, we are well aware that the records in these two cases are not identical. The Maine Yankee record was developed from the testimony of several witnesses, some of whom worked in the disputed category. In addition, the job description for the SOS was much more explicit than the one we have here. Neither do we make any attempt to equate the seriousness of an error at Fort Martin Power Station with an error at a nuclear power plant. This does not, however, lessen the importance of the CRF at the Fort Martin plant. Given the responsibility placed on him, he must be a skilled employee. However, we do not find from the record before us that he is merely an automaton who does little than "supervise the use of sophisticated machines." Arizona Public Service Co. v. NLRB, 453 F.2d 228, 231 (9th Cir. 1971). He is a supervisor, with responsibility for himself and others, and was therefore improperly included in the bargaining unit as an employee.

Our decision that CRF's are supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) means that the bargaining unit delineated by the Union was improper, and the election should be set aside. For that reason, we need not reach the Company's contentions regarding election misrepresentations. If required to consider the Company's arguments on the record before us, we would hold them to be without merit and affirm the Board.

Accordingly, the Company's petition for review is granted and the Board's application for enforcement of its order is denied.

TRW, Incorporated v. NLRB

654 F.2d 307 (5th Cir.), August 24, 1981; rehearing denied in part September 24, 1981—245 NLRB 1158

On petition to review Board Order

Before BROWN, GEWIN* and POLITZ, Circuit Judges

POLITZ, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board found that TRW, Inc., violated §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and 158(a)(3), during and immediately after a campaign to organize its Corpus Christi, Texas plant. We conclude that the Board's findings are not supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole and, accordingly, deny enforcement of the Board's order.

TRW manufactures and distributes electronic equipment nationwide. The company employs approximately 200 persons at its resistor plant in Corpus Christi. In mid-March of 1978, the International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, AFL-CIO-CLC (Union) began an organizing campaign, at the Corpus Christi plant. Meetings were held, union cards were signed and pro-union activities commenced. By the middle of

Q. What kind of emergencies arise at the plant?

A. Well, we lose pieces of equipment.

Q. What do you mean, "lose"? They don't work?

A. That's right. We got the worst mills in the world, they're ball-type mills. You break a ball and the mill has to be taken out of service right now. It quits performing and if you are not able to deliver fuel to the boiler you have to get the load down, get that mill out of service. The controlling foreman has to do all this. There is no time to wait for someone to come help him. Usually he gets help after it's all over.

Q. If he doesn't do it, what happens?

A. Well, you could lose the whole unit. If you don't get the thing back to the level that you can handle it with the equipment still in service, then the whole works goes right down the tubes.

Q. So, circumstances dictate that he take decisive action or else the whole plant will not function at all?

A. He has to make a judgment, make it quick and do something. That's correct.

*Due to his death on May 15, 1981, Judge Gewin did not participate in this decision; the case is being decided by a quorum, 28 U.S.C. § 46(d).

April TRW became aware of the campaign and communicated its opposition to the employees. On April 28, the Union successfully petitioned for an election. The election was held on July 19 and resulted in union certification on that date.

Subsequent to the election, the Union filed several unfair labor practice charges against TRW claiming violations of §§ 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the National Labor Relations Act. All violations were predicated on events involving two employees, Henry Miranda and Rosie Garza. The ALJ found that TRW had violated §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) by disciplining Garza and Miranda (Miranda was suspended twice and Garza was discharged), and that TRW had violated § 8(a)(1) by interrogating, threatening, and coercing them. The Board basically adopted the ALJ's findings and conclusions, modifying the broad cease-and desist language in the recommended order and substituting a different notice.

The Board's determination will be sustained if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); Delco-Remy Div., General Motors Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 1295 (5th Cir. 1979). Recognizing the Board's expertise in labor law, we will defer to plausible inferences it draws from the evidence, even if we might reach a contrary result were we deciding the case *de novo. In assessing the substantiality of the evidence, however, we must consider not only those facts that support the Board's decision, but also those facts and inferences that militate against it. Universal Camera, 340 U.S. 487–88, 71 S.Ct. 463–65.

Section 8(a)(3) Violations

The Board found that the reasons advanced by the company for the discharge of Garza—excessive absenteeism—and the suspensions of Miranda—poor work performance—were pretextual, concluding that the real motive for the company's actions was retaliation for their pro-union activities. We conclude that this finding is not supported by substantial evidence.

In a § 8(a)(3) discharge or suspension case, once the employer has articulated a legitimate business reason for his action the burden is upon the general counsel to present substantial evidence that anti-union animus was the "moving cause" of the disciplinary measures. Federal-Mogul Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 566 F.2d 1245 (5th Cir. 1978); Frosty Morn Meats, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 296 F.2d 617 (5th Cir. 1961). In Florida Steel Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 587 F.2d 735 (5th Cir. 1979), we further clarified the extent of the general counsel's responsibility as being not simply to present some evidence of improper motive, but to find an "affirmative and persuasive reason why the employer rejected the good cause and chose an illegal one." Id. at 742 (quoting from Clothing Workers, Midwest Regional Joint Board v. N.L.R.B., 564 F.2d 434, 440 (D.C. Cir. 1977)).

Miranda was employed as a resistor processor on January 25, 1978. From the outset his performance was less than exemplary. The ALJ found Miranda was "not a good employee," and characterized him as "a somewhat intractable and arrogant employee who could be and probably was given to intemperate outburst under criticism." The ALJ also found:

> the undisputed evidence shows that Miranda encountered difficulties with superiors over his work performance at least one month before his first brush with the Union. Supervisors Ponce and Casey Eidukonis both testified at some length about difficulties they had with Miranda in the first week of his employment, and the problems they encountered in placing him in a job which he could perform to their satisfaction.

Miranda received a written evaluation on February 25 that ranked him "marginal" in a number of categories, particularly in the area of "attitude." One supervisor noted that Miranda did not pay sufficient attention to the quality of his work, lacked a sense of urgency, and disliked criticism.

There was other evidence of Miranda's difficulty in achieving satisfactory job performance. Entries were made in his personnel file on March 20, April 5, and April 14, 1978, reflecting a continuation of negligent or careless working habits and noting that he spent too much time talking, thereby disrupting the work of others. On April 3, Miranda was counselled by one of his supervisors and warned that he would be discharged if he did not show improvement. Due to his unsatisfactory performance in the resistor division, he was transferred to the shipping department.

Miranda was suspended on two occasions. The first occurred on June 13 when he was ordered by his supervisor, Eidukonis, to return to his regular work station from an area where he had been temporarily located due to repairs. In returning, Miranda began to move a chair taken without permission from the supervisor's office and was ordered by his supervisor to stop. Miranda did not stop, and when accused of disobeying this order insisted that he had not heard the supervisor. The controversy was presented to John Allen, a higher level supervisor, who investigated this incident and suspended Miranda.[1]

Recognizing the dissatisfaction with Miranda's performance, but apparently believing that he could become a productive employee, Allen directed Miranda's immediate supervisors to prepare a specific work schedule, listing tasks to be accomplished and the time allowed for completion. Miranda was assigned the job of inventorying the finished reels in the shipping area. He failed to perform the outlined tasks and committed what the supervisor considered egregious errors in performing the inventory. On June 20, because of these failures, Miranda was suspended for three days.

Garza's employment problems arose out of her attendance record. She had previously been employed by TRW from February to November 1977, during which time she had attendance problems. She was rehired on March 9, 1978 and immediately resumed her lax attitude. In April she was absent four times, once in May, four times in June and five times in July. Garza was aware of the company attendance policy which considered excessive more than two absences in one month. The ALJ found that Garza was aware of this policy and that she had been cautioned orally and in writing, including warnings that if she persisted she would be terminated. On the morning of July 26, 1978, when she failed timely to report for the fifth time in July, she was informed by her supervisor that if she did not work that day "there was nothing they could do for her." She did not appear for work and was discharged. The ALJ found:

> The evidence shows that Garza had a poor employment record, that she had received a verbal and a written warning, and that in that month of July, she had already been absent a number of times, which was considered excessive by [TRW's] standards.

In the face of this evidence, the Board found that the reasons given by the company for Garza's discharge and Miranda's suspensions were pretextual[2] and that the real reason was anti-union animus. The record does not sustain these conclusions of the Board.

To sustain a finding that a discharge is pretextual, there must be no legitimate business reason advanced by the company. The very nature of a "pretext" is a false or sham reason. When the employer advances a legitimate reason for the discharge, and it is not shown that this reason is untrue, the case cannot be characterized as a pretext case but must be considered a "dual-motive" case.[3] To hold otherwise would permit avoidance of the application of the "moving-cause" analysis which we have consistently held to be the law. The mere characterization of an employer's action as pretextual does not satisfy the responsibility of fully weighing all reasonable bases for that action. Whether an action is truly pretextual is a finding of fact, but it is a finding of ultimate fact which is subject to our plenary review. See Thompson v. Leland Police Dept., 633 F.2d 1111 (5th Cir. 1980).

[1] The ALJ considered this a three day suspension. The record reflects a suspension for one full day and a portion of a second.

[2] The ALJ found Miranda's suspension to be pretextual but apparently found that Garza's discharge involved both proper and improper motives. The ALJ then proceeded to analyze the case as a dual-motivation case and found that there was an improper discharge. It is not clear from the record, however, what test the ALJ employed to arrive at the result. He uses language from the now discredited "in part" test, from the "but for" test and from the "motivating cause" test.

> So finding, I conclude, that but for the Kendrick incident, Garza would not have been discharged. The Respondent's dominant motivation thus, being, at least in part, unlawful, I find that Garza's discharge was a violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

The Board changed this finding of the ALJ concluding that Garza's discharge was "pretextual."

Were we to assume arguendo that the Board could properly engage in the analysis of the evidence as it did, the conclusions reached are not supported by substantial evidence. The employer assigned valid reasons for the suspensions and discharge. These reasons were not shown to be untrue.

If by pretextual the Board meant that the reasons were legitimate but the moving cause was anti-union animus, such a finding would also lack the support of substantial evidence. There are no facts establishing that the motivating cause for Miranda's suspensions and Garza's discharge was anti-union prejudice. Such facts could only be inferred. But as we have observed, an unlawful purpose is not to be lightly inferred. N.L.R.B. v. Federal Pacific Electric Co., 441 F.2d 765 (5th Cir. 1971); Federal Mogul Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 566 F.2d 1245 (5th Cir. 1978). Suspicion, conjecture and theoretical speculation register no weight on the substantial evidence scale. Florida Steel Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 587 F.2d 735, 742 (5th Cir. 1979); N.L.R.B. v. O.A. Fuller Super Markets, Inc., 374 F.2d 197 (5th Cir. 1967).

To allow the Board to draw such inferences would place on the employer the burden to disprove the existence of an unlawful motivation, a burden that the employer is not required to bear.

> The employer does not enter the fray with the burden of explanation. With discharge of employees a normal, * * * legitimate exercise of the prerogative of free management in a free society, the fact of discharge creates no presumption * * *. In the choice between lawful and unlawful motives, the record taken as a whole must present a substantial basis of believable evidence pointing toward the unlawful one.

N.L.R.B. v. McGahey, 233 F.2d 406, 413 (5th Cir. 1956) (citations omitted) (emphasis added). See also N.L.R.B. v. Varo, Inc., 425 F.2d 293, 301 (5th Cir. 1970).

We are not persuaded that either Garza's discharge or Miranda's suspensions were in retaliation for, or part of an effort to inhibit, their union activities. The overwhelming weight of evidence supports the opposite conclusion: that the moving cause for the suspension of Miranda was his poor attitude and work performance and that Garza was discharged for her poor attendance record. As we stated in N.L.R.B. v. Mueller Brass Co., 509 F.2d 704, 711 (5th Cir. 1975):

> If the specific employee happens not only to break a Company regulation but also to evince a pro-Union sentiment, that coincidence alone is not sufficient to destroy the just cause for his discharge or suspension.

We decline to allow an employee, whose work or attitude is unacceptable, to draw a protective mantle around himself by espousing the union cause; Congress did not intend §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) to provide a shield for the incompetent or job security for the unworthy. This is especially true in cases such as that of Miranda and Garza where the failings which led to the disciplinary actions surfaced before the company became aware of union activities. The Board's findings that TRW violated § 8(a)(3) in suspending Miranda and terminating Garza cannot be sustained.

Section 8(a)(1) Violations

Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act makes it unlawful for an employer to "interfere with, restrain, or coerce" employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed under § 7 of the Act. The Board found several § 8(a)(1) violations in the present case, all of which can be grouped into two categories—threats and coercive interrogations. As with the § 8(a)(3) charges, we find that the Board's determinations are not supported by substantial evidence.

A. Threats

It is well settled that a threat of reprisal for union activity is a violation of the Act. N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). On the other hand, so long as an employer does not threaten an employee with reprial for union activity the employer is free to communicate to his employees any of his general views about unionism or any of his specific views about a particular union. Id. at 618, 89 S.Ct. at 1942. Further, in determining whether a statement is an impermissible threat we recognize that language used by the parties involved in a union representation compaign must not be isolated nor analyzed in a vacuum, but must be considered in light of the circumstances existing when such language was spoken. N.L.R.B. v. Big Three Industrial Gas & Equipment Co., 441 F.2d 774, 777 (5th Cir. 1971).

The Board found that certain statements made by supervisor Eidukonis to Miranda were impermissible threats. The first occurred on July 19, the date of the union election, when Eidukonis told Miranda, "All along I've told you that there's no money here and that we ain't going to negotiate with the IUE or any other union." Miranda replied that the day was not over, and that Eidukonis' comment would not keep them from trying. A few days after the election, Eidukonis informed Miranda that he, Eidukonis, was a better union buster than La Mountain.[4] The third incident occurred when Eidukonis approached Miranda at his work station and told him that they should get out the picket signs; they were going to have a strike.

While these comments may be abrasive and hostile, they do not rise to the level of a threat when viewed in the context of the totality of the surrounding circumstances. Furthermore, there is no evidence indicating that any of the stantements contained a threat of reprisal against Miranda for engaging in protected activity. The statements were merely open-ended predictions, "puffing," boasts, and expressions of opinion.

The Board also concluded that supervisor Ponce's statement to Miranda that he "needed to get some union hospitalization insurance" because he "was going to lose an arm or a leg," was also an impermissible threat. This statement, in isolation or in another context, could be an 8(a)(1) violation. But in the context presented here, we find no 8(a)(1) violation. Ponce and Miranda shared a reciprocal animosity; they regularly exchanged insults and threats of bodily harm.[5] This ill-will was noted by the ALJ.[6] On the basis of these facts we cannot sustain the Board's findings that Ponce's statement was a threat of reprisal for engaging in union activity. Instead, it was merely one statement in a chain reflecting the continuing hostility between the two men.

B. The Interrogations

Interviews or interrogations of employees are not illegal per se. N.L.R.B. v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 339 F.2d 498 (5th Cir. 1964). an employer with a legitimate cause to inquire may interrogate employees on matters which relate to their § 7 rights without incurring § 8(a)(1) liability. N.L.R.B. v. Ambox, Inc., 357 F.2d 138 (5th Cir. 1966). An interrogation becomes illegal when the "works themselves or the context in which they are used * * * suggest an element of coercion or interference." Id. Delco-Remy Div., General Motors Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 1295, 1309 (5th Cir. 1979). To determine whether an interrogation tends to be coercive, we examine: (1) the history of the employer's attitude toward its employees; (2) the type of information sought or related; (3) the company rank of the questioner; (4) the place and manner of the conversation; (5) the truthfulness of the employee's responses; (6) whether the employer had a valid purpose in obtaining the information; (7) if so, whether this purpose was communicated to the employee; and (8) whether the employer assures employees that no reprisals will be taken if they support the union.[7] These factors, however, are not exhaustive and the result of their application is not always conclusive; they are simply reliable guidelines. As we noted in Sturgis Newport Bus. Forms, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 563 F.2d 1252, 1256 (5th Cir. 1977):

> proper evaluation of the evidence goes beyond examining a list of factors and then comparing the number that favor the employer to the number that favor the union.

Thus, while these criteria must be applied in each case, a determination of whether the interrogation tends to be coercive rests on a consideration of the eight factors in light of the total circumstances of the case. See N.L.R.B. v. Kaiser Agricultural Chemicals, 473 F.2d 374 (5th Cir. 1973).

[4] Fran La Mountain was a staff employee of TRW from California, who was brought into the Corpus Christi plant during the union campaign. He gave several talks to employees and helped to organize the company's election efforts.

[5] For example, on one occasion, Miranda told Ponce that the Union was going to "get" Ponce. On another occasion, Miranda threatened Ponce by stating that he [Miranda] "has a baseball bat for guys like him [Ponce]." Likewise, Ponce would make statements such as the one now under consideration and insult Miranda by calling him a "union worm" and a "pain in the ass."

[6] In commenting on the evidence, the ALJ stated:

> There was additional, conflicting testimony about threats to take out a "peace bond" between Ponce and Miranda; talk about a near miss with an automobile in the Company parking lot; and allegations concerning Miranda's cursing and impudence toward Ponce.

[7] These criteria were originally enumerated by the Second Circuit in Bourne v. N.L.R.B., 332 F.2d 47 (2d Cir. 1964). They were adopted and augmented by us in N.L.R.B. V. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d 803 (5th Cir.) cert. denied, 382 U.S. 926, 86 S.Ct. 313, 15 L.Ed.2d 339 (1965), and have been consistently employed since that time. See, e.g., Delco-Remy Div., General Motors Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 1295 (1979); N.L.R.B. v. Aero Corp. 581 F.2d 511 (5th Cir. 1978).

In the present case, the Board determined that supervisor Eidukonis engaged in an unlawful coercive interrogation on two occasions. The first occurred after Miranda began wearing a union button identifying him as a member of the in-plant committee. Eidukonis asked him what the button was and Miranda told him. Two days later, Eidukonis approached Miranda at his work station and asked Miranda if he knew anything about the union. Miranda replied that he couldn't talk about the union on company time, but Eidukonis said, "Come on, you can talk to me." Miranda again declined to talk and Eidukonis asked Miranda if he was a paid union plant.

The Board also concluded that an interview between Garza and the attorney for TRW was a coercive interrogation. On July 21, the attorney was at the plant gathering evidence for employer objections to the NLRB election. Garza, like several other employees, was asked to report to a company conference room to meet with the attorney to discuss alleged imporper union monetary reimbursement to employees, in the form of refunds for union T-shirts. Initially, Garza cooperated and discussed an incident relevant to the T-shirt question. The attorney then drafted a statement and asked Garza to sign it. She refused. The attorney prepared a second and a third statement. Garza refused to sign the second and when presented with the third Garza said she was embarrassed about being called out of her department and was concerned about how her participation might look to her fellow employees. The attorney purportedly said: "Embarrassing is when I'm going to subpoena you—I'm going to go and pull you out of [the] carbon department and take you to court, and then you'll have to testify, then that's embarrassment." At that point the attorney told

Garza to leave and that he did not like union people.[8]

We initially note that nowhere in the Board's opinion, or in the ALJ's Findings and Conclusions, is there any indication that the Bourne criteria were applied. We again state, the Bourne test is the proper analysis to be applied in these instances.

With regard to the Miranda conversations, there is little doubt that these discussions were not coercive.[9] We also find that the interview of Garza was not coercive, although we are of the opinion that such an interview borders on being unethical conduct on the part of the attorney. Nonetheless, when the Bourne criteria are applied, and the interview is considered in light of all the surrounding circumstances, we do not find it to be a violation of § 8(a)(1).

The employer had a legitimate reason to interview Garza. Additionally, the attorney was not a member of TRW's management. Coupled with the fact that the interview took place in a conference room with another employee present, these circumstances tend to negate a finding of coercion since they mitigate the element of fear that attaches to an interview by a high-level company official in a formal office setting. Moreover, Garza's responses were truthful, and her lack of fear of any reprisal by the company was manifested in her refusal to sign the three statements proffered to her. Further, Garza was not singled out; the record establishes that other employees were interviewed as well. Although the interview did approach the level of impermissible coercion when the attorney stated that he would subpoena Garza if she did not cooperate,[10] we find that the interview, although perilously close, did not reach the level of an unlawful interrogation.

We conclude that the Board's findings that TRW violated §§ 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(1) of the Act are not supported by substantial evidence. Enforcement of the Board's order is DENIED.

[8] There is conflicting testimony in the record concerning how the attorney worded this statement. The ALJ found that the attorney said "get the hell out of here." Although Garza first testified to this, on cross-examination she admitted that no profanity was used.

[9] Application to the Bourne criteria yields the following results: (1) The record is silent as to the history of TRW's attitude toward its employees; (2) The information sought was very general such as "do you know anything about the union"; (3) Eidukonis is a low level supervisor; (4) The conversations were held at Miranda's work area; (5) Miranda gave truthful responses; (6) The employer had a valid purpose in obtaining information about the activities of unions in the plant; (7) That purpose is self-evident; (8) There were no assurances against reprisal, but none were necessary given the informal manner of the interrogation and the general nature of the questions.

[10] Our conclusion is bolstered by the fact that the attorney was not making an inaccurate statement. The company would have the lawful right to subpoena Garza as a witness if it were to formally challenge the election results.

Hammermill Paper Company v. NLRB

658 F.2d 155 (3d Cir.), August 26, 1981; rehearing denied November 2, 1981; certiorari denied April 18, 1983—252 NLRB 1236

On petition to review Board Order

156

ROSENN, Circuit Judge: This case presents the question whether the National Labor Relations Board should have deferred to, or concurred in, an arbitrator's decision permitting the disciplinary suspension of Thomas Stritzinger, a union steward. Hammermill Paper Company (Hammermill) admittedly enhanced Stritzinger's punishment for his failure, as a union steward, to take affirmative steps to defuse an illegal work stoppage. Although upholding, in part, the enhancement of his punishment, the arbitrator found that Stritzinger had no contractual duty under the circumstances to take such affirmative steps. On September 30, 1980, the Board ordered Hammermill to make Stritzinger whole for the loss of pay he suffered by reason of discrimination in violation in section 8(a)(1) & (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) & (3) (1976). 252 N.L.R.B. No. 172, 105 L.R.R.M. 1409. Hammermill petitioned this court for review, and the Board cross-applied for enforcement under 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) & (f). We enforce the order of the Board and deny the petition for review.

I.

On the bitterly cold night of February 18, 1979, near Erie, Pennsylvania, nine employees of Hammermill, including Stritzinger, were called upon by their supervisors to build and tend a fire under a frozen "jackladder." They refused. Two of the nine, John Hughes and Paul Gallagher, having no record of prior disciplinary problems at the company, were suspended for two weeks without pay. Six of the nine, each having once previously been reprimanded for an unrelated, unexplained absence from work, were discharged. The ninth man, Stritzinger, despite a "clean" personnel record, was discharged on the ground that he had failed "to take affirmative action as a Union Representative in the face of a concerted action" in violation of the collective bargaining agreement.[1]

The nine employees, believing their refusal to build or tend the fire was justified on grounds of either safety or job jurisdiction, and also believing that Hammermill had improperly enhanced the punishments of the seven fired employees, grieved the discipline to arbitration.

The arbitrator held that the employees had acted improperly in refusing to build and maintain the fire. The arbitrator believed "that the evidence justifies the finding that the men acted in an egregiously improper manner" and that they deserved disciplinary action but not discharge. Although he concluded that the seven dischargees should be returned to work, he also held that they did not deserve any backpay.

> In this case, I feel that to award backpay to these employees would be interpreted as a reward for their activity on the night in question. It was not conduct which ought to be rewarded. It was conduct that ought to be condemned in the most stringent of terms. Their return to work is based, in part, on the procedural defects in the method used to discharge them, and in part on the fact that the disparity meted out to the employees involved is just too great and not justified by their prior records. Accordingly, in light of all the testimony and evidence, the conclusion will be that the seven employees should be returned to work without backpay. The arbitrator will not disturb the two weeks suspension given to the two employees.

The effect of this award was to reduce the penalties of the seven fired employees to a suspension of approximately five months.

Although it might have been argued that Hammermill's impulse to enhance the punishment of the "recidivists" was, to some degree, justifiable,[2] the

[1] By letter Hammermill notified Stritzinger that:

> As a result of your refusal to perform the work assignment given to you by your Foreman and the General Foreman on February 18, 1979, specifically, to prepare materials for a fire at the Woodroom Jackladder, and, additionally, your failure to take affirmative action as a Union Representative in the face of a concerted action in the violation of Article IV, para. (a), your employment with Hammermill Paper Company is terminated.

[2] The arbitrator did not find the prior reprimands an insufficient ground for enhancing the punishment by adding an extra 4½ months of arbitrator's award revealed that there was no such justification in Stritzinger's case, outside of a belief that the two-week suspension was an overly lenient punishment for any of the men. The arbitrator found that "[t]here was no reason to single Stritzinger out for differential disciplinary action on the grounds of his stewardship." This finding followed from the arbitrator's interpretation of the labor contract. Under it, he found that although Stritzinger was among those employed on the night of the incident, "[a] steward's jurisdiction is confined to a particular shift, seniority, group, and department. [But o]n the evening in question, Stritzinger was not the steward. He was not so regarded."

Thus, the arbitrator apparently concluded that while the employer had no case for treating Stritzinger more harshly than the other eight men, he believed that a 5-month suspension without backpay was not an inappropriate penalty for any of the men. For this reason, the arbitrator held that the employer did not have just cause to fire Stritzinger and he directed reinstatement, but without backpay. The NLRB's General Counsel apparently disagreed with the denial of backpay and subsequently issued a complaint charging that Stritzinger's discipline had constituted a violation of § 8(a)(3), and requesting the Board to order backpay.

Before the Board, Hammermill attempted to prove that Stritzinger's punishment was justified not on the grounds originally asserted by Hammermill (viz., Stritzinger's failure as steward to affirmatively halt the unauthorized refusal), but on the alternate ground that Stritzinger had instigated or led the refusal.[3] However, the ALJ, like the arbitrator, rejected Hammermill's evidence.[4] The AJL declined to defer to the arbitral award itself, however. He held that because the disparity between the sanctions imposed on Stritzinger and the two other men with "clean" records stemmed from Stritzinger's stewardship, Stritzinger's discharge violated § 8(a)(3). Thus, he found that the arbitrator's failure to award Stritzinger back pay was contrary to Board policy.

A panel of the Board, by a 2–1 vote, adopted the ALJ's rulings, findings and conclusions. According to the Board, the arbitrator had "disregarded" the evidence and the Act and had "found that [Hammermill's] treatment of Stritzinger was unrelated to his union affilitation * * *." (Emphasis added.) Therefore the Board found that the arbitrator had "rejected * * * material evidence which was admitted, unchallenged, and formed a primary basis for Stritzinger's discharge and the unfair labor practices alleged." Moreover, even assuming that the arbirator's reinstatement of Stritzinger did represent an accommodation of NLRA policies, the Board held that by not ordering backpay, the arbitrator had rendered an award incompatible with the Board's established policy of restoring the status quo ante wherever possible.

II.

The statutory issue before the Board in this case was not whether Hammermill had just cause to suspend Stritzinger for five months without pay. Rather, the unfair labor practice issue went to the legality, under the National Labor Relation Act (NLRA), of Hammermill's admitted motive (and clearly the "but for" cause)[5] for enhancing Stritsuspension. Thus, the arbitrator's award might arguably have been read as finding that the added suspension period was justified by the prior reprimands.

[3] Even under the Board's view of § 8(a)(3), and clearly under the Third Circuit's view, such instigation would have been grounds for differential punishment of a union steward. E.g., Midwest Precision Castings Co., 244 N.L.R.B. No. 63, 102 L.R.R.M. 1074 (Aug. 24, 1979). However, Board precedents indicated that absent instigation by Stritzinger, Hammermill's stated reason for discharge would not have passed muster under § 8(a)(3). E.g., Precision Castings Co., 223 N.L.R.B. 183 (1977). See also Westinghouse Elec. Corp., 243 N.L.R.B. 306, 312 n.32 (1979), enforced mem, sub nom. International Union of Elec., Radio & Mach. Workers v. NLRB, No. 79–1707 (D.C. Cir. Dec. 5, 1980), cert. denied, —U.S.—, 101 S.Ct. 3122, 69 L.Ed.2d 980 (1981). Courts of appeals, on the other hand, have taken a view more favorable to employers. As of the date the Board's order was entered, the rule of Precision Castings has been rejected by the Third and Seventh Circuits. Gould, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, —U.S.—, 101 S.Ct. 247, 66 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980); Indiana & Mich. Elec. Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979). Since that time, the Eighth Circuit seems to have followed the Third and Seventh. See NLRB v. Armour-Dial, Inc., 638 F.2d 51, 55 (8th Cir. 1981). See Part III infra.

[4] Said the ALJ: "I credit the three employee witnesses, of course, and I find Stritzinger did not provoke, or in any way cause or encourage the other eight men to strike."

Said the arbitrator: "[T]here is no evidence before me to indicate that Stritzinger was the ring leader on the evening in question. In that sense, the company's basis of differentiation fails."

Finally, at oral argument before this court, Hammermill's counsel all but conceded the issue: "I think that the so-called leadership issue is really a red herring and I will concede it may be one that we fished for a bit."

[5] There is ample evidence to support the finding that Hammermill's post hoc assertion as to its reason for dismissing Stritzinger—that he allegedly instigated the illegal action—was, at best, unfounded. See note 4 supra. Consequently, we see no basis for rejecting that finding, which zinger's punishment beyond the two week suspension meted out to the others who, like Stritzinger, had no prior record of disciplinary problems.[6] That motive was found by the arbitrator to have no logical or contractual basis. If, as stated by the Board, that motive together with its practical effect, violated section 8(a)(3), then it follows that the objective existence of just cause for Stritzinger's punishment failed to negate the illegality of Hammermill's enhancement of the admittedly lenient punishment. "Despite the concurrent existence of a justifiable cause for discharge, the employer violates the act if anti-union animus was the 'real motive.' " Edgewood Nursing Center, Inc., v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 363, 368 (3d Cir. 1978).[7]

In NLRB v. General Warehouse Corp., 643 F.2d 965 (3d Cir. 1981), we held that it was no abuse of discretion for the Board to reverse the outcome of an arbitral decision that upheld, as a contractual matter, the discharge of an employee, absent "some evidence that the statutory issue has actually been decided." Id. at 969 (emphasis added); see also id. at 975 n.6 (Aldisert, J., dissenting). In that case an employee, Coon, was allegedly discharged for excessive absenteeism, but suspected that the real reason for his discharge was his vehement opposition to the employer on various collective bargaining issues. Coon grieved his discharge to arbitration, raising the issue whether the discharge was actually in retaliation for his concerted union activities. 643 F.2d at 974 n.3 (Aldisert, J., dissenting). However, the arbitrator made no findings on the employer's motive for discharge. Instead, the arbitrator held simply that, in an objective sense, there had been ample just cause for the termination.

Coon then raised the issue of discrimination under § 8(a)(3) before the Board. The Board refused to defer to the arbitrator's award and found that the discharge was discriminatory under § 8(a)(3). This court enforced the Board's order. In doing so, we declined to hold (as the Board had held) that the arbitrator's award had been "clearly repugnant" to the purposes and policies of the NLRA, thus avoiding the question whether the Board was required to defer under NLRB v. Pincus Brothers, Inc.,-Maxwell, 620 F.2d 367 (3d Cir. 1980). Instead, we chose to adopt the rule, developed in a line of cases beginning with Monsanto Chemical Co., 130 N.L.R.B. 1097 (1961), that had expanded upon the three criteria for arbitral deferral originally adopted by the Board in Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080 (1955), and embellished in International Harvester Co., 138 N.L.R.B. 923 (1962), enforced sub nom. Ramsey v. NLRB, 327 F.2d 784 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 1003, 84 S.Ct. 1938, 12 L.Ed.2d 1052 (1964).[8] was reached by both the ALJ and the arbiartor. We proceed, then, on the assumption that Hammermill fired Stritzinger for the reasons stated in its letter of discharge. See note 1 supra.

[6] Because reinstatement without backpay failed to eliminate the disparity between Hammermill's treatment of Stritzinger, on the one hand, and Hughes and Galliagher, on the other, the unfair labor practice issue plainly survived the arbitral award of reinstatement. The issue to which we refer is, of course, not whether the arbitrator's decision to reinstate Stritzinger without backpay was itself an unfair labor practice, but rather whether Stritzinger's 4½-month layoff without pay was the enduring consequence of the initial illegal discharge. Thus we cannot agree with the dissent when it suggests that, given the reduction of the discharge sanction to a 5-month suspension prior to any proceedings before the Board, compliance with the reinstatement award necessarily insulated Hammermill's conduct from further scrutiny under the NLRA.

> the proceedings appear to have fair and regular, all parties had agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitration panel is not clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. In these circumstances we believe that the desirable objective of encouraging the voluntary settlement of labor disputes will best be served by our recognition of the arbitrators' award.

The Board restated its Spielberg rule as follows:

> If complete effectuation of the Federal policy is to be achieved, we firmly believe that the Board, which is entrusted with the administration of one of the many facets of national labor policy, should give hospitable acceptance to the arbitral process as "part and parcel of the collective bargaining process itself," and voluntarily withhold its undoubted authority to adjudicate alleged unfair labor practice charges involving the same subject matter, unless it clearly appears that the arbitration proceedings were tainted by fraud, collusion, unfairness, or serious procedural irregularities or that the award was clearly repugnant to the puposes and policies of the Act.

landmark Spielberg test.[10] However, central to them all is a notion that where the propriety of employee discipline is upheld under the terms of a collective bargaining agreement, the Board need not reject a complaint under § 8(a)(3), based on the same discipline, unless there is some indication that in deciding the contract issue, the arbitrator had also decided the questions necessary to the resolution of the statutory inquiry.

Pincus Brothers provides an example of a case in which such an indication was present. There, we dealt with a dismissal precipitated by an employee's distribution of a leaflet. Both the arbitrator and Board treated the dismissal on this ground. The only question was whether dismissal for distribution that particular leaflet was permissible under the law of the shop and the NLRA. By finding that the leafletting was justifiable grounds for dismissal, the arbitrator at least arguably concluded that the leafletting was unprotected both by the NLRA and the "law of the shop." For this reason the Board did not, and could not have, upset the arbitral decision simply by applying the rule grounded in Monsanto.

As Pincus illustrates, the employer's motives for disciplinary action will themselves often be ambiguous. At arbitration the employer and the employee will each attempt to convince the arbitrator that the "real" reasons for discipline were, or were not, justified under the "law of the shop," which may, as in Pincus, encompass congruent statutory and contractual issues. Thus, when the arbitrator finds that the employer had "just cause" to discipline the employee, his award is typically at least "susceptible" to the interpretation that "there is no causal connection of any anti-union bias and the loss of the job." Edgewood Nursing Center, Inc. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d at 368. Because the absence of such a causal connection would remove the 8(a)(3) taint from the employer's acts, the Board may then be obliged to defer to the award under the standard of Douglas Aircraft Co. v. NLRB, 609 F.2d 352 (9th Cir. 1979), specifically approved by this court in Pincus: "If the reasoning behind an award is susceptible of two interpretations, one permissible and one impermissible, it is simply not true that the award was 'clearly repugnant' to the Act." 609 F.2d at 354.

An arbitrator's award may also evince resolution of unfair labor practice issues when the collective bargaining agreement, whose terms it is the arbitrator's duty to construe, expressly prohibits discriminatory discharges based on union activity. See, e.g., Gulf States Asphalt Co., 200 N.L.R.B. 938, 939 n.11, 940 n.12 (1972); Airco Industrial Gases—Pacific, 195 N.L.R.B. 676, 677 (Member Kennedy, dissenting).

On the other hand, the Board has determined that where a disciplined employee fails even to raise the unfair labor practice issue in the arbitral proceeding, subsequent Board inquiry into that issue will not be limited by an arbitral award favorable to the employer. Suburban Motor Freight, Inc., 247 N.L.R.B. No. 2, 103 L.R.R.M 1113 (Jan. 8, 1980). But failure to raise the statutory issue before the arbitrator is not a sine qua non for refusal to defer even assuming compliance with the three Speilberg criteria. Though the discharged employee may vigorously argue the issue of anti-union discrimination to the arbitrator, it is not unheard-of for an arbitrator to specifically disclaim any intent to decide the issue of discriminatory motive, and base an award solely on the existence of objective grounds for discipline. Monsanto Chemical was such a case. There, having heard evidence and arguments on the unfair labor practice issues, the arbitrator stated:

> "I have given a good deal of thought to the dilemma which arises out of the dual jurisdiction over the essence of the unfair labor practice charges. Because the NLRB has exclusive jurisdiction in the event of a conflict, and because I believe the case can be decided on other grounds, I have chosen to ignore for purposes of decision the allegations herein contained that Till's Union activities played a part in his discharge."

It is thus inevitable that the ground upon which the arbitrator acts be subjected to some scrutiny before the Board or a court can conclude that the award disposes of the statutory issue raised before the Board. After all, the Board defers not because the arbitrator could have reached and decided unfair labor practice issues in a grievance arbitration, but because in the very process of deciding the contractual issue, the arbitrator may necessarily dispose of the question whether the employee's legitimate rights under § 7 of the NLRA were interfered with impermissibly, within the meaning of § 8(a).[11] Thus in a case where the statutory issue—viz., the identity of the "but for" cause for discipline—and the contractual issue—viz., the existence or nonexistence of an objective justification for discipline—are evidently separate and distinct, and it clearly appears that only the latter has been treated by the arbitrator, the rationale for deferral necessarily evaporates. In General Warehouse, for instance, there was a dispute over the impetus for Coon's dismissal, but the arbitrator's finding of "objective" just cause seemed to indicate to us that the statutory issue of motive had been completely pretermitted by the arbitrator. Today, we hold that because the arbitrator definitely declined to decide the statutory issue lurking in Stritzinger's grievance, the Board committed no abuse of discretion in undertaking a de novo review of that issue.

Because it is clear that many of the factual and contractual issues bearing on the unfair labor practice issue were, in this case, presented to the arbitrator, and because he wrote an opinion acknowledging his complete familiarity with the relevant evidence, it is especially important here that we hew faithfully to the rule set forth in General Warehouse, viz, that the Board defer to the arbitral decision given "some evidence that the statutory issue has been decided."[12] We believe that this case, however, calls for a Board decision on the merits because here, even more than in General Warehouse, we are abundantly assured that the arbitrator, although presented with evidence of the motive for discipline, specifically and clearly declined to reach the question whether that motive was statutorily proscribed.

As a preliminary matter, we note that the collective bargaining agreement governing the arbitrator's award apparently contained no anti-discrimination clause, thus raising some question whether the arbitrator was even authorized to set aside discipline for which objective "just cause" existed.[13]

Secondly, it is undisputed that the arbitration case was litigated not as a case involving anti-union discrimination under § 8(a)(3), but solely as a just cause matter. The legal standard embodied in § 8(a)(3) was neither discussed nor even raised by the parties to that proceeding.

Finally, and most importantly, in the present case there is only one explanation for the enhancement of Stritzinger's punishment—his status as a union official. The arbitrator specifically found that Hammermill's motive for enhancing Stritzinger's punishment was the motive explained in Hammermill's letter. And the arbitrator also specifically found that the explanation for the discipline had no contractual basis. Thus his award could not have been construed as a finding that the collective bargaining agreement had heightened Stritzinger's responsibilities as union steward, so as to affect the balance of policies embodied in § 7 of the NLRA, and thereby the determination of discrimination under § 8(a)(3). Rather, the arbitrator refused to order backpay on the ground that Stritzinger's misconduct warranted, in an objective sense, five months of suspension, far more than he would have suffered had he not been a union steward. Although the first of these alternate holdings would have spoken to an unfair labor practice issue, the latter would not.

[11] It is for this reason that the Board overruled its much-criticized decision in Electronic Reprod. Serv. Corp., 213 N.L.R.B. 758 (1974), which had held that whether or not statutory issues had been raised, the Board would defer to arbitral awards absent "unusual circumstances * * * which caused the failure to introduce * * * evidence [of statutorily proscribed discrimination] at the arbitration proceeding." Id. at 762 (footnote omitted).

In the view of one commentator, and subsequently a majority of the Board, > [t]he inference to be drawn from [Electronic Reproduction] is that although the contract and statutory issues are different, the union's interests may not coincide with the individuals', and the statutory issue was in no way litigated or determined, the Board will deprive these individual employees of their statutory rights under the guise of deferring to and encouraging arbitration. One's mind would need to be very fertile, indeed, to conjure up a more shocking sacrifice of individual rights on the altar of institutionalism. Schatzki, Majority Rule, Exclusive Representation, and the Interests of Individual Workers: Should Exclusivity be Abolished? 123 U.Pa.L. Rev. 897, 909 n.32 (1975), quoted in Suburban Motor Freight, Inc., 247 N.L.R.B. No. 2, 103 L.R.R.M. at 114 (emphasis added).

[12] Cf. Bloom v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 1015, 1020 (D.C.Cir. 1979) ("The key * * * is the evidence presented to the arbitration panel.").

> [T]he directive of the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia [in Banyard v. NLRB, 505 F.2d 342 (1974),] that deference is an abuse of discretion unless the arbitrator's decision is congruent to the Board's, both as to issues and disposition, will effectively destroy the use of arbitral resources to resolve overlapping questions of contractual and statutory breach; the temptation will be very great indeed for the party losing before the arbitrator to try the case again before the Board.

R. Gorman, Basic Text on Labor Law 742 (1976).

[13] Of course, the rationale for deferral is undercut if he was not so authorized, since the arbitrator "has no general authority to invoke public laws that conflict with the bargain between the parties." Barrentine v. Arkansas-Best Freight Sys., Inc., 4347, 4351, — U.S. —, —, 101 S.Ct. 1437, 1446, 67 L.Ed.2d 641 (1981) (quoting Alexander v. Gardner-Denver Co., 415 U.S. 36, 53, 94 S.Ct. 1011, 1022, 39 L.Ed.2d 147 (1974)) (emphasis added).

In our view, the arbitrator's decision came close to stating the sort of "handsoff" approach to the statutory issue that was displayed by the arbitrators in Monsanto Chemical and Kalamazoo Typographical Union. There was no question, even in the arbitrator's mind, as to what motive prompted Hammermill to discipline Stritzinger more severely than Hughes or Gallagher. Nor was there any question that the actual motive was not valid under the collective bargaining agreement. Thus it cannot plausibly be argued that the arbitrator was concerned about Hammermill's motive, or that his decision to uphold Stritzinger's enhanced level of punishment somehow constituted a finding that Hammermill's motive was legitimate. As Hammermill's counsel before the arbitrator explained to this court at oral argument, the arbitration case "was dealt with solely as a just cause matter." We conclude, therefore, that the Board acted correctly in undertaking a de novo review of the statutory issues raised in the complaint issued on behalf of Stritzinger.

III.

We now turn to the question whether the Board erred in concluding that the disparity of treatment between Stritzinger, on the one hand, and Hughes and Gallagher, on the other, constituted discrimination prohibited by § 8(a)(1) & (3).[14]

> [O]nce it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him.

NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1798, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967) (emphasis in original); accord, e.g., United Dairy Farmers Cooperative Association v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 1054, 1061 (3d Cir. 1980). We believe that Hammermill's discrimination against Stritzinger could readily have had an adverse affect on employee rights. The mere office thus became a burden, unilaterally imposed by the employer, even under circumstances where the office carried no extra burden under the terms of the contract. The holding of union office, after all, is the essence of protected union activities;[15] union status may not, without more, be treated by employe.rs as an open invitation for sanctions. All other things being equal, the marginal effect of this burden would be to "discourage members from holding union office" and thus "no doubt have an inherently adverse effect on employee rights." Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227, 230 (7th Cir. 1979).

Secondly, we hold that where an employer offers a contractually unsupportable explanation for imposing more severe sanctions on a union offical than it imposes upon an ordinary member for similar misconduct, it has failed to establish, as required by Great Dane, that it was motivated by a legitimate objective. In this case, the employer initially assigned only one reason for its disparate treatment of Stritzinger, a justification found by the arbitrator to be unacceptable under the collective bargaining agreement and in the general factual context of this case. We see no reason for reviewing that finding at this stage. Reconsideration of the contract issue seems particularly inappropriate here, because of all the forums in which this case has been heard, including this court, the arbitration proceeding was the one most suitable—and the one bargained for—to determine the meaning of the collective bargaining agreement in this respect. United Steelworkers of America v. Enterprise Wheel & Car Corp., 363 U.S. 593, 599, 80 S.Ct. 1358, 1362, 4 L.Ed.2d 1424 (1960). See generally Ludwig Honold Manufacturing Co. v. Fletcher, 405 F.2d 1123 (3d Cir. 1969).

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title [section 7 of the NLRA];

(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employement or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *

Thus we have not the slightest doubt that the employer's decision to enhance Stritzinger's punishment, without a legitimate business reason, and based solely on his union office, constituted a violation of § 8(a)(3). Ironically, however, we reach a result consistent with the majority of the Board panel, even though the panel relied on precedent overruled by this court's decision in Gould, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728 (3rd Cir. 1979), cert, denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S. Ct. 247, 66 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980). We do not, however, mean to express any lack of support for our decision in Gould and its underlying reliance on the reasoning of Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979).

Gould established that where a collective bargaining agreement explicitly requires union officers and representatives to use every reasonable effort to terminate an unauthorized "work stoppage," an employer may single out for disciplinary discharge a union steward who fails to take affirmative steps to terminate that work stoppage. Gould, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d at 730 & n.3. Gould is not, of course, directly applicable here because Stritzinger had no such contractual duty, and the arbitrator so found. Somewhat closer to this case, but still tangential, is Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979), the decision from which Gould adopted its reasoning. Indiana also permitted an employer to discipline union stewards more severely than rank-and-file members for participating in unauthorized refusals to work, because participation in the unlawful strike by the stewards constituted not only a violation of their duties as employees, but a repudiation of their responsibilities as union officials. 599 F.2d at 230. However, the contract in Indiana was somewhat less emphatic, and less specific, in spelling out the duties of union officers than was the contract in Gould. In Gould, the contract required that

> [i]n the event of an illegal, unauthorized or uncondoned strike, work stoppage, interruption or impeding of work, the Local and International Union and its officers shall immediately take positive and evident steps to have those involved cease such activity. These steps shall involve the following:

> Within not more than twenty-four (24) hours after the occurrence of any such unauthorized action, the Union, its officers and representatives shall publicly disavow same by posting a notice on the bulletin boards throughout the plant. The Union, its officers and representatives shall immediately order its members to return to work, notwithstanding the existence of any wild-cat picket line. The Union, its officers and representatives shall refuse to aid or assist in any way such unauthorized action.
> The Union, its officers and representatives, will in good faith, use every reasonable effort to terminate such unauthorized action.

612 F.2d at 730 n.3. In Indiana, on the other hand, the contract, in general language, merely stated.

> that the employees covered by this Agreement * * * will not be called upon or permitted to cease or abstain from the continuous performance of the duties pertaining to the positions held by them * * *.

599 F.2d at 228. In a case where no anti-union motive is shown, held Judge Tone, disparate punishment of union officials covered by such an agreement could not be considered "inherently destructive" of important employee rights. Id. at 232.

Indiana thus suggests a short step beyond Gould. It allows a court to find that an employee's status as a union official carriers responsibilities to take affirmative steps to prevent unlawful work stoppages, even absent the emphatic and unmistakably clear language of individual duty in Gould. Both parties now before us seemed to urge at oral argument that we take this progression to its limit; they urge us to read in Indiana a rule allowing employers to single out for harsher punishment union officials who merely participate in illegal strikes regardless of the language in their collective bargaining agreement.[16] Of course, such an extension would foster the unacceptable result that employers and unions could no longer agree upon the responsibilities under the contract of union officials. Instead, an inflexible approach would be compelled in every case, regardless of the particular circumstances. Not only do we reject that approach as unsound, but we also note that the factual context in which Indiana arose would forbid us from reading it as anything more than a determination that, within the context of the labor agreement there at issue, the actions of the union stewards violated duties with which the rank-and-file were not burdened.

Given that the "status" of union stewardship, without more, is not a criterion upon which discipline is warranted, 599 F.2d at 230, then whether responsibility does, or does not, accompany the status of union stewardship is a conclusion that must be reached by construing the contract, rather than a condition dictated purely by operation of law. The decision in Indiana was tied to contract language that imposed a higher duty on union stewards than the duty imposed on Stritzinger by the labor contract in this case. Here, the contract stated only that "[t]he Union agrees that there will be no strikes, slowdowns, or work stoppages." In Indiana, on the other hand, the agreement specifically noted that the services to be provided were essential to the operation of a public utility, "and to the welfare of a public dependent thereon." Thus the contract, "in consideration" of this strong public interest, provided that employees "will not be called upon or permitted to cease or abstain from the continuous performance of their jobs." 599 F.2d at 228 (emphasis supplied). By use of this language, the contract implicitly differentiated between two tiers of union membership—those who could engage in strike activity, and those who could wield the additional power to promote or deter strike activity by others—and imposed higher duties on members of the latter tier. Even arguing strictly from the face of the contract in this case, it would thus be technically consistent to conclude that Stritzinger's punishment here penalized the exercise of a protected right, while the differential punishments in Indiana did not. But we have more to go on, here, than the mere face of the contract. In this case the arbitrator made specific findings that negated the inference that any "higher responsibilities" accompanied Stritzinger's status as a union steward.[17]

Thus, the result we reach is not at all inconsistent with Gould and Indiana. Nor do we see any need to reconsider our decision in Gould. The Board argues vigorously on this appeal that it is improper to allow an employer to enforce the special antistrike obligations of union officials through the sanction of discharge. It argues that the breach of such an obligation is an internal union matter and that "a major policy of the Act is to 'insulate employees' jobs from their organizational rights' and to permit them to be 'good, bad or indifferent members * * * without imperiling their livelihood.'" Brief for the NLRB 17 (quoting Radio Officers' Union v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 17, 40, 74 S.Ct. 323, 335, 98 L.Ed. 455 (1954)). Because we have already determined that Stritzinger violated no special anti-strike obligation as union official, it is unnecessary, in the strict sense, for us to reiterate here our view of how an employer may enforce that obligation. However, we caution the Board that insofar as Gould holds that an employer may use discipline as a means of enforcing the individual duties of union officials, we continue to adhere to that precedent.[18]

IV.

Having concluded that the arbitrator clearly failed to decide the statutory issue in this case, and that therefore the Board did not abuse its discretion in failing to defer, we express no opinion whether the arbitrator's award was or was not, in any sense, "clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act."[19] The Board's order will be enforced insofar as it requires the employer to treat Stritzinger, Hughes, and Gallagher on an equal basis. The petition for review will be denied.

[16] For instance, the Board's counsel asserted that were this court to follow the rationale of Indiana, we could not enforce the order under review.

[17] For this reason, we express no view as to how we would have interpreted Stritzinger's contractual duty had we been asked to interpret the bare words of the contract, lacking the arbitral interpretation bargained for by the parties to the agreement.

[18] The Board would also have this court overrule Gould on the ground that Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v. Reis,—U.S.—, 101 S.Ct. 1836, 68 L.Ed.2d 248 (1981) expresses a determination by the Supreme Court that Congress did not intend to allow employers to obtain money damages against individual employees who violate their collective bargaining agreements.

This argument is meritless. In Complete Auto, the Court acknowledged that Congress approved of disciplinary discharges of employees who violated collective bargaining agreements. Id.—U.S. at— & n.16, 101 S.Ct. at 1844 & n.16. A fortiori, an employer's disciplinary suspension of a contract violator is protected under the NLRA. Therefore Gould, a case in which an employee was fired for violating his individual duties under the contract, is perfectly consistent with Complete Auto.

A. LEON HIGGINBOTHAM, JR., Circuit Judge, concurring: I agree fully with the majority's conclusion that the Board's application for enforcement should be granted and the Hammermill Paper Company's petition for review denied. I also concur with the majority's reasoning on the appropriateness of the Board's refusal to defer to an arbitration award where the arbitrator did not decide the unfair labor practice issue. I write separately only to express my views on the issue of whether an employer commits an unfair labor practice when it disciplines a union officer more severely than rank-and-file workers similarly situated.

I.

The Hammermill Paper Company employs four "tour crews" of maintenance mechanics at its Erie, Pennsylvania mill. Thomas Stritzinger was a ten-year employee at the mill and the union steward for Tour Crew D. On the night in question, Stritzinger had agreed to work to work the Tour Crew A shift as a substitute for a fellow employee. He was not serving as a steward when the work stoppage occurred. All of the negotiations over whether Tour Crew A would build the fire transpired between the mill foreman and the union steward for Tour Crew A. Yet, when the company sent out its disciplinary notices, Stritzinger was informed that he been fired. Of the remaining members of Tour Crew A, six who had participated in an earlier work stoppage were also fired and two who had clean records were suspended for two weeks. Stritzinger had a clean record prior to the work stoppage at issue but was fired all the same because he was a union steward at the mill. The contract between the company and the union contained a no-strike clause but did not impose an explicit duty on union officers and stewards to end any illegal work stoppages.

A. The Third Circuit's Decision in Gould, Inc. v. NLRB

In Gould, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728, 730 (3d Cir. 1979), we considered "whether it was an unfair labor practice for the employer to single out for disciplinary charge a union steward who participated with a number of rank-and-file union members in an illegal work stoppage where the steward failed to discharge his contractual obligation to take steps to terminate that work stoppage." There the collective bargaining agreement contained a no-strike clause as well as a company authorization to discipline or discharge employees who participated in illegal work stoppages. The contract further provided that:

> In the event of an illegal unauthorized or uncondoned strike, work stoppage, interruption or impeding of work, the Local and International Union and its officers shall immediately take positive and evident steps to have those involved cease such activity. These steps shall involve the following:
> > Within not more than twenty-four (24) hours after the occurrence of any such unauthorized action, the Union, its officers and representatives shall publicly disavow same by posting a notice on the bulletin boards throughout the plant. The Union, its officers and representatives shall immediately order its members to return to work, notwithstanding the existence

[19] We have not been presented with any evidence that, after reinstating Stritzinger, the arbitrator went on to decide the surviving statutory question arising out of the remaining disparity between the treatment of Stritzinger, on the one hand, and Huges and Gallagher, on the other. See Part II supra. Had we been presented with such evidence, it is perhaps arguable that, as the dissent suggests, we could have gone on to find that the arbitrator's failure to award backpay would not have been "clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies" of the Act's remedial provision which directs the Board to order such affirmative action "as will effectuate the policies of" the NLRA. 29 U.S.C. § 160(c) (1976). Cf. Ohio Ferro-Alloys Corp., 209 N.L.R.B. 577 n.2, 583 (1974) (discharged employee properly reinstated without backpay, but the Board declines to decide whether the "but for" cause of discharge was lawful or unlawful). But see Cessna Aircraft Co., 220 N.L.R.B. 873, 875 (1975) (arbitrator's award of reinstatement without backpay "is repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act"). See generally Sea-Land Serv., Inc., 240 N.L.R.B. 1146, 1147 n.4 (1979). However, the rule in General Warehouse obviates the need for an inquiry into this last question (apparently a novel one in this circuit) for, as we have found, it is quite plain that the arbitrator did not even address, much less decide, the question whether the disparity between Stritzinger's and Hughes's and Gallagher's treatment constituted a violation of § 8(a)(3) of the Act.

> of any wild-cat picket line. The Union, its officers and representatives shall refuse to aid or assist in any way such unauthorized action.
> The Union, its officers and representatives, will in good faith, use every reasonable effort to terminate such unauthorized action.

Id. at 730-31. The court concluded that, since the contract gave the employer the power to fire illegal strikers and imposed an affirmative duty on union officers to attempt, in good faith, to end the strike, the employer did not commit an unfair labor practice by discharging a union steward who breached his contractual duties. Id. at 733.

I believe that this court's opinion in Gould was far too expansive and ladened with dicta which stated precepts far beyond the unique facts of that case, but Gould is the rule of our circuit unless and until it is changed by the full court sitting en banc. I question the Gould court's reliance on the Seventh Circuit's decision in Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979).

In Indiana & Michigan Electric, a union steward was discharged under a collective bargaining agreement much less specific than Gould in the duty it imposed upon union officials. The court found no unfair labor practice because:

> Differentiating between union officers and rank-and-file in meting out discipline for participating in a clearly illegal strike did not penalize or deter the exercise of any protected employee right. We believe the employer was entitled to take into account the union officials' greater responsibility and hence greater fault, and that the resulting different treatment of union officials could not be reasonably considered inherently destructive of important employee rights.

Id. at 232 (footnote omitted). Insofar as the Seventh Circuit based its conclusion on the theory that a union steward's status conveyed rights and responsibilities, not specifically enumerated in the contract, which justfied more severe discipline, I would reject its decision completely. The Board in its brief in the present case argues convincingly that:

> Shop stewards may receive certain special treatment to accommodate their role in processing grievances. Thus, contracts frequently provide that stewards get time off with pay for grievance handling (as in the contract in this case, A. 202a) or extra protection against layoffs ("super-seniority"). See Bureau of National Affairs, Basic Patterns in Union Contracts, at 36–37 (8th ed. 1975). However, such special treatment is statutorily permitted only to the extent that it reflects the union's "legitimate and substantial" need for having the grievance-handling function performed in the plant, and is incorporated in the parties' agreement. See NLRB v. Milk Drivers & Dairy Employees, Local 338, 531 F.2d 1162, 1165–1167 (2d Cir. 1976); Teamsters Local 20 v. NLRB, 610 F.2d 991, 994–995 (D.C.Cir. 1979); Paintsmiths, Inc. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 1326, 1330–1331 (8th Cir. 1980). The special benefits are thus confined to a legitimate and agreed-upon need; they clearly do not justify exposing the stewards to a countervailing set of obligations unilaterally devised and enforced by the employer. But see, Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227, 231, n.10 (7th Cir. 1979), and Co. Br. p. 25.

Brief for the NLRB at 10 n.5 (emphasis added).

Therefore, I would limit the rule in Gould to cases where the collective bargaining agreement is as precise in its obligations as it was in Gould and the employee in question is serving in an official capacity at the time of the incident. Stritzinger's discharge constitutes an unfair labor practice in my view under both circumstances. The collective bargaining agreement imposed no affirmative duty on a union steward and Stritzinger was not functioning as a steward for Tour Crew A.

ADAMS, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I respectfully dissent.

It is conceded that on the night of February 18, 1979, nine employees of the Hammermill Paper Company improperly refused to proceed with an operation that would have permitted the production at the plant to go forward. There is no doubt, either, that there was no real safety concern motivating the actions of the employees. As a result of the costly and unjustified interruption in production, Hammermill imposed discipline on the employees: It discharged six of the employees who had received a previous warning, and suspended for two weeks the employees who had a "clean" record. As for Thomas Stritzinger, who was a union steward in the plant, but not on the operation in question, it imposed a discharge penalty. Stritzinger also had a "clean" record.

All the employees who were discharged, including Stritzinger, filed a grievance, and the matter was assigned to an arbitrator. After hearing the witnesses and carefully reviewing the record, the arbitrator stated:

> We are left then with the matter of the appropriate penalties. I believe that the evidence justifies the finding that the men acted in an egregiously improper manner, that they refused to perform work tasks assigned to them, that whatever their concern for safety, it was at best premature, that they should have proceeded to do the tasks assigned to them. The simple reasons for their compliance rests on the needs for industrial production upon which their well-being and continued livelihood depends. The needs of ordinary production requires that supervision must be given the authority to make assignments. If there had come a time when safety hazards were involved, there would have been ample time for them to make their stand and to refuse to do the work assigned to them on the grounds of safety. Their failure to perform work was the type of conduct that deserves disciplinary action but in light of the total situation it does not deserve discharge.
> * * * In this case, I feel that to award backpay to these employees would be interpreted as a reward for their activity on the night in question. It was not conduct which ought to be rewarded. It was conduct that ought to be condemned in the most stringent of terms. Their return to work is based, in part, on the procedural defects in the method used to discharge them, and in part on the fact that the disparity meted out to the employees involved is just too great and not justified by their prior records. Accordingly, in light of all the testimony and evidence, the conclusion will be that the seven employees should be returned to work without backpay. * * *

Despite these determinations by the arbitrator, an expert in dealing with employer-employee matters, the NLRB filed an unfair labor charge against Hammermill, on the ground that not to give Stritzinger five months backpay would constitute a violation of 8(a)(3).

Although Stritzinger had already been reinstated as an employee of Hammermill in accordance with the arbitrator's award, the ALJ declared that the "case should not be dismissed in deference to the Arbitrator's decision, because the failure to compensate Stritzinger is contrary to Board law." The ALJ ordered that Hammermill pay five months backpay to Stritzinger. The National Labor Relations Board affirmed the ALJ, and filed a petition seeking enforcement of the backpay order.

In Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080 (1955), the Board set forth its standards for deferring to arbitrators' awards. It stated that it would defer to an arbitrator's award if: (1) the proceedings have been fair and regular; (2) the parties agreed to be bound; and (3) the decision was not "clearly repugnant" to the purposes and policies of the Act. Spielberg, 112 N.L.R.B. at 1082.

There is no question that the proceedings before the arbitrator here were "fair and regular" and that the parties to the arbitration "agreed to the bound." The principle question is whether the decision of the arbitrator in delclining to awarding backpay to Stritzinger was "clearly repugnant" to the purposes and policies of the Act. Since there is a clear finding that Stritzinger acted "in an egregiously improper manner" in refusing to perform work tasks assigned to him, I believe that the decision of the arbitrator in declining to pay Stritzinger five months wages for the time he was not working is not "clearly repugnant" to the Act. The Act itself does not require any backpay. Section 10(e). And certainly a decision not to pay backpay to one who has been laid-off after participating in a blatant interruption with production is not inconsistent with the purposes and policies of the Act.

As explained in International Harvester Co., 138 N.L.R.B. 923 (1962), the source of the Board's deferral policy is rooted in both congressional and Supreme Court pronouncements:

> If complete effectuation of the Federal policy is to be achieved, we firmly believe that the Board, which is entrusted with the administration of one of the many facets of national labor policy, should give hospitable acceptance to the > arbitral process as "part and parcel of the collective bargaining process itself," and voluntarily withhold its undoubted authority to adjudicate alleged unfair labor practice charges involving the same subject matter, unless it clearly apears that the arbitration proceedings were tainted by fraud, collusion, unfairness, or serious procedural irregularities or that the award was clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act.

Id. at 926-27 (footnote omitted).

As this Court declared in N.L.R.B. v. Pincus Bros., Inc.-Maxwell, 620 F.2d 367 (3rd Cir. 1980):

> Based on the Board's Spielberg doctrine, congressional action, and judicial decisions of the Supreme Court as well as this circuit, we conclude that it is an abuse of discretion for the Board to refuse to defer to an arbitration award where the findings of the arbitrator may arguably be characterized as not inconsistent with Board policy. In other words, "[i]f the reasoning behind an award is susceptible to two interpretations, one permissible and one impermissible, it is simply not true that the award was 'clearly repugant' to the Act." Douglas Aircraft Co. v. NLRB, 609 F.2d 352, 354 (9th Cir. 1979).

Since it is clear to me that the reasoning behind the arbitrator's award is susceptible to the interpretation that his decision not to grant backpay was a judgment by him that it would not be salutary to reward monetarily an employee who had "egregiously" interfered with production, I believe the Board should have deferred to that decision.[1]

Accordingly, I would not enforce the Board's order in this respect.

[1] The only decision by the employer that was the subject of the proceeding before the NLRB was the discharge of Stritzinger when other emloyees with "clean" records were merely suspended. The employer did not order a discrete penalty of no backpay for Stritzinger, it simply discharged him. Since Stritzinger was reinstated before the NLRB proceeding, it is clear that it is the arbitrator's decision that Stritzinger not receive backpay that is the target of the Board's order. Since the atrbitrator's decision is not, itself, an unfair labor practice, this would be an additional reason why the Board should have deferred to it.

Industrial Personnel Corp. v. NLRB

The B.F. Goodrich Company v. NLRB

657 F.2d 226 (8th Cir.), August 26, 1981; rehearing and rehearing en banc denied October 5, 1981; certiorari denied January 11, 1982—250 NLRB 1139

LARSON, Senior District Judge. Petitioners Industrial Personnel Corp. (IPC) and the B.F. Goodrich Company (Goodrich) ask this Court to review and set aside a decision and order of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) entered July 28, 1980, holding that IPC and Goodrich are joint employers and that, as a result, IPC and Goodrich's refusal to bargain with the General Drivers and Helpers Local Union 823 (Union) on a joint-employer basis constituted a violation of section 8(a)(1) and section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5).[1] The Board has cross-applied for enforcement of its order. We deny the petition to set aside the Order and grant its enforcement.

IPC supplies various transportation services for companies throughout the country. Goodrich primarily manufacturers tires, chemicals, and engineered products. To facilitate delivery of its products in the area of Tulsa, Oklahoma, Goodrich contracted with IPC to provide it with drivers for its trucking operation. In a nutshell, the agreement provides that IPC will hire drivers and handle most labor relations, while Goodrich will oversee the day-to-day operations of informing the drivers of their destinations and routes. Goodrich leases the trucks. Through its involvement, Goodrich complies with the Interstate Commerce Commission regulations that allow it to be classified as a "private carrier." Goodrich reimburses IPC for all of its expenses plus its service charges.

When the arrangement began in 1978, there was an existing contract between the Union and IPC.

[1] Section 8(a) provides in pertinent part:

> It shall be unfair labor practice for an employer—
> (1) to interfere with, restrain or coerce employers in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 of this title;
> (5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees.

Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157, grants employees the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing.

In August of 1979 the Union filed a representation petition seeking certification as the collective bargaining representative of drivers employed by both companies as joint employers. The companies opposed the petition on the basis of the existing contract and the fact that IPC was the sole employer. In October of 1979 the Board's Acting Regional Director found that IPC and Goodrich were joint employers. In December, after an election, the Union was certified as the bargaining representative for drivers employed by the joint employers.

Subsequently the companies refused to bargain and the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge in February of 1980. The Board's General Counsel issued a complaint in March; the answer alleged that the companies were not joint employers. The Board granted its General Counsel's motion for summary judgment in July of 1980. A cease and desist order was issued at the same time. The companies appealed to this Court.

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked pursuant to Section 10(f) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(f).[2] Although the alleged unfair labor practice occurred in Tulsa, Oklahoma within the jurisdiction of the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit, IPC and Goodrich have obviously chosen this circuit in order to rely on the decision in Pulitzer Publishing Co. v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 1275 (8th Cir. 1980).

The Eighth Circuit recently reiterated its test to determine whether a union's joint employer claim is valid. The test applied was > whether the total relationship of two nominally separate businesses reveals: "(1) some functional interrelation of operations, (2) centralized control of labor relations, (3) common management, and (4) common ownership or financial control. While none of these factors, separately viewed, have been held controlling, stress has normally been laid upon the first three factors which reveal functional integration with particular reference to whether there is centralized control of labor relations."

Miscellaneous Drivers Local 610 v. NLRB, 624 F.2d 831, 833 (8th Cir. 1980) (per curiam) quoting Pulitzer Publishing Co. v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 1275, 1279 (8th Cir. 1980).

Pulitzer involved a reversal of a Board finding that a publisher and delivery company were joint employers. The facts are quite similar to the present case. There was a contractual relationship resulting in some functional interrelation of operations. The publisher determined where deliveries were made, the trucks bore the publisher's logo, and the contract was a cost-plus one. On the other hand, the deliverer hired and managed the employees, exercised day-to-day control, paid for insurance and owned the trucks.

Local 610 involved the affirmance of a Board finding that a funeral home and a service which provided drivers and vehicles to the home and to others were not joint employers. The home obtained services by calling the driver service. The driver service then dispatched the driver and vehicle to the location specified by the home. The service hired employees, paid them, and billed the home a flat amount for driver and vehicle.

A third recent Eighth Circuit case, Russom v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 558 F.2d 439 (8th Cir. 1977), is also factually similar to the present case. There this Court affirmed a district court finding that Sears and an appliance repair service company were not joint employers. All of the service company's business was with Sears, Sears did the training, the employees wore Sears uniforms and received employee discounts at Sears. The contract was cost-plus. The companies, however, were not interlocking; the service company was in total control of wages and working conditions, hired and fired employees, paid for insurance and owned and operated its own trucks and equipment. Although Sears may have made some suggestions concerning operations, the service company made its own decisions. It should also be pointed out that although the Court determined whether the two companies were co-employers, the issue being determined was whether Sears was bound under the contract signed between the service company and the union. The service company had gone out of business and its employees were absorbed by Sears—without their negotiated pension rights. So this was not a decision in the same posture as the present case and Pulitzer.

[2] IPC and Goodrich have taken advantage of the following provision in § 10(f).

> Any person aggrieved by a final order of the Board * * * may obtain a review of such order in any United States court of appeals in the circuit wherein the unfair labor practice in question was alleged to have been engaged in or wherein such person resides or transacts business.

At oral argument this Court was made aware of the Ninth Circuit's recent decision in Kaylor v. Crown Zellerbach, Inc., 643 F.2d 1362 (9th Cir. 1981). There the Ninth Circuit affirmed a district court finding on summary judgment that appellants had shown insufficient facts to hold Crown liable under a joint employer theory. Crown ran an in-house trucking operation to ship its goods around San Francisco Bay area and contracted with various companies to supply it with drivers for its trucking operation. Crown had full control over the dispatch, routing, and use of its trucks and the hours of service of the drivers. Nevertheless, we agree with the Board that, due to the circumstance that the joint employer question in Kaylor was disposed of by summary judgment, the full factual basis for the Ninth Circuit's decision cannot be ascertained. Therefore, comparisons with the present case are questionable. Even if the facts were identical, this Court is not bound by the Ninth Circuit's decision. Kaylor, like Russom, was in a slightly different posture than the present case and Pulitzer. At issue in Kaylor was whether Crown had breached a contractual duty to employ the drivers of the various driver supply companies that had previously contracted with Crown. In the present case and in Pulitzer, the issue was whether Goodrich and Pulitzer were required to bargain with their drivers' unions.

In at least one previous case, Ace-Alkire Freight Lines v. NLRB, 431 F.2d 280 (8th Cir. 1970), this Court has affirmed the Board's finding that two companies engaged in the trucking business were joint employers. One company was a common carrier and the other leased trucks to the carrier. The lessor interviewed prospective employees, sent possibilities on to the carrier, and paid the wages. The carrier set age and experience requirements, reserved the right to reject drivers, dispatched drivers, and monitored their logs.

The standard to be applied in this appeal of a finding of fact by an administrative agency is whether the Board's finding that the companies are joint employers is supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole. See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 487–88, 71 S.Ct. 456, 463–64, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). With this standard in mind, and the test adopted by this Circuit to determine whether a joint employer relationship exists, we reach the following conclusions. To a significant degree, there is functional interrelation of operations between the two companies; IPC hires the drivers and Goodrich determines the conditions of employment. While IPC interviews, hires, disciplines, pays, and discharges employees, Goodrich controls the day-to-day operations of the trucking group. Goodrich determines the destination of the drivers and what routes they take. Drivers are required to call their location in to Goodrich each day, and their logs are sent to Goodrich.

Although there seems to be little centralized control of labor relations—IPC does most of it—Goodrich may on occasion get into this area due to its control over day-to-day operations. The Board found that since Goodrich has such control over day-to-day operations, it will inevitably handle labor problems. Extensive work rules are set out in an operating manual issued to drivers by Goodrich. Goodrich reserved a right to reject employees that do not comport with Department of Transportation (DOT) regulations and DOT requires Goodrich to annually review each driver's record to determine whether that driver meets minimum requirements for safe driving. While IPC sets the drivers' wages, Goodrich reimburses IPC and presumably has some control over those wages since it can rescind the IPC-Goodrich contract on thirty days' notice. Finally, although the control of labor relations is one factor to be considered, it is not controlling in and of itself.

Reviewing the factors as a whole, it is our feeling that there is significant functional interrelation of operations between the two companies. This is the factor largely relied upon by the Board. While IPC controls the direct labor relations, Goodrich's control of working conditions will inevitably involve it in labor relations. As a result, we think that the two companies should be compelled to bargain as joint employers.[3]

Pulitzer can be distinguished from the present case on several different grounds. First, in Pulitzer the delivery service exerted much more daily control over the employees than IPC did in this case. The delivery service in Pulitzer maintained its own facility where its drivers punched in and picked up their trucks. Assistant managers employed by the delivery service directed the drivers' routes and procedures according to a "run sheet" received from the Pulitzer dispatcher. In Pulitzer, if the drivers encountered any difficulty during the course of delivery, they were to report to the delivery service's assistant managers. In the present case, drivers are supposed to call Goodrich. Another distinguishing factor between the two cases involves the ownership of trucks. The fact that the delivery service in Pulitzer owned its own trucks and paid its own liability and property damage insurance supported its contention that it should be treated as a separate rather than a joint employer. In our case, Goodrich leases trucks from Ryder Rental and insures them itself; IPC merely provides drivers.

Accordingly, Goodrich's and IPC's petition for review and for the setting aside of the Board's decision are denied and the Board's order is enforced.

NLRB v. The American Can Company; United Steelworkers of America, and Local 5490 of the United Steelworkers of America

658 F.2d 746 (10th Cir.), August 31, 1981—244 NLRB 736

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before DOYLE, MCKAY and SEYMOUR, Circuit Judges

WILLIAM E. DOYLE, Circuit Judge. The National Labor Relations Board has petitioned this court pursuant to § 10(e), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq. The Board seeks enforcement of an order entered against the respondents, American Can Company, United Steel Workers of America (hereinafter called the "the International Union") and Local 5490 on August 30, 1979.

The order finds that application of a superseniority clause to certain Union officers was unlawful. It directed the respondents to take remedial action. The employer, American Can Company, the International Union and the Local object to this order and take the position in this appeal that it should be denied enforcement.

The Company, a national operation, had one of its plants in Denver, Colorado until December 5, 1979. Aluminum cans were manufactured and sold there.

Beginning in 1966, the employees at the Denver plant were covered by a collective bargaining agreement between the Company and the International Union. The particular agreement in this case covered a term from February 15, 1974 to February 28, 1977. Local 5490 represented the production and maintenance employees at the Denver plant; the membership averaged about 40 persons.

The agreement contained a general rule that layoffs and recalls from layoffs would be in accordance with employee seniority.

Thus, those with the longest continuous service were the last to be laid off and the first to be recalled. However, another clause in the agreement contained the provision that is particularly applicable here, that of superseniority. It reads as follows:

> Super-Seniority
> 11.12 At each location covered by this agreement, super-seniority shall apply to a total of not more than ten local union officers and grievance committeemen who, notwithstanding their positions on the seniority roster, shall have preferential seniority in case of layoff or recall, provided there is work available which they can perform. The employees to whom super-seniority will apply will be designated to the company in writing. [R. 204]

In September of 1975, in accordance with the above provision, the Local Union submitted a list of ten union officials for whom it claimed superseniority. In October, 1975, the Company informed the Union that it would cease production at the Denver plant in early December. As is usual in this kind of situation, the International Union removed all of the officers of the Local, and appointed a staff representative, Wayne Anzick, as administrator of Local 5490. On December 1, 1975, again in conformity with normal procedure, Anzick reappointed all of the officers of Local 5490. Soon thereafter, on December 5, 1975, the Company laid off all but eleven employees who were retained to assist in closing down the plant. Two of these, C. E. Bugh and D. R. Howard, were retained on the basis of superseniority. On January 5, 1976, two employees, W. S. Miller and S. Schneider, were recalled on the basis of superseniority. Following general layoffs in February, the only employee on the job was C. A. Burton. On March 3, 1976, the Company confirmed with Anzick that superseniority was still claimed for Union officers. On May 20, 1976, Local 5490 was dissolved. Anzick notified the Company of this fact and indicated that superseniority was no longer claimed for union officers on May 26, 1976. On May 25, 1976 [1] Howard was recalled on the basis of superseniority, and worked until laid off on September 2, 1976.

The recalls and retentions which are at issue here are those having to do with Schneider and Howard. The exercise of superseniority as to Bugh and Miller is unchallenged. This is apparently because both men were grievance committeemen and also served as stewards. Retention of a third employee, C. Thompson, was originally challenged, but the parties now apparently agree that Thompson was retained on the basis of specific job qualifications. All other employees recalled or retained had sufficient seniority so that they would have been recalled or retained without regard to superseniority. The parties all agree that but for the application of superseniority to Howard and Schneider, other employees with longer service would have been retained or recalled.

Howard was a trustee of Local 5490, while Schneider served as a guard. The Union constitution describes their respective duties as follows:

> Duties of Guards. It shall be the duty of the Guards to take charge of the door and see that no one enters who is not entitled to do so.
> Duties of Trustees. It shall be the duty of the Trustees to have charge of the hall and all property of the Local Union, subject to the direction of the Local Union, and perform such other duties as the Local Union may require. [R.542]

At the hearing before the Administrative Law Judge no evidence was presented regarding the duties that were actually performed by Schneider. There was testimony by Charles Burton, former President of Local 5490, that Howard served as Chairman of the Health and Safety Committee, in addition to his duties as Trustee. Burton testified that Howard continued to raise safety problems with the Company up until his final termination in September of 1976.

The Administrative Law Judge and at least one member of the Board found this testimony irrelevant on the grounds that superseniority was available only to grievance committeemen and union officers. It is not disputed that Howard was accorded superseniority on the basis of his position as trustee, and not as a result of his activity on the Health and Safety Committee.

History and Background

Charges were filed against all the respondents by two former employees, S.H. Egan and D.R. Egan, who were members of Local 5490 before its demise. On the basis of these charges, the NLRB issued complaints against all of the respondents charging that the Union had violated § 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act [2] and that the Company had violated the § 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[3] Following a hearing held in May of 1977, the Administrative Law Judge recommended, on November 4, 1977, that the Board should order remedial action.

The Board issued two opinions. The first of these was issued April 5, 1978, 235 NLRB 704. This was a two to one decision. Chairman Fanning and Member Truesdale found that respondents had not violated the NLRA, and dismissed the complaint. The majority held superseniority accorded union officers to be presumptively lawful, and found that the General Counsel had not produced sufficient evidence to overcome that presumption. Member Penello dissented, indicating that in his view superseniority is presumptively unlawful when extended to union officers, and had been invalidly applied in this case.

[1] The Administrative Law Judge found that Howard was recalled on April 25, 1976. [R. 641]. No explanation appears in the record for the Board's use of the May, 1976 date. It should also be noted that some of the facts set forth above are not included in the Board's opinions, but were extracted from the Administrative Law Judge's opinion. R. 636, et seq.

[3] 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (3).

On May 2, 1978, the Egans petitioned this court for a review of the Board's decision. Thereafter, the Board moved for permission to withdraw the record in order to reconsider its decision. This motion was granted October 23, 1978. On August 30, 1979, the Board issued a Supplemental Decision and Order, 244 NLRB No. 78. There three Board members found that the respondents had violated the NLRA and ordered remedial action; two members dissented. The Board then petitioned this court for enforcement of its order. We conclude that the action of the Board should be affirmed and that the order should be enforced.

Statement of the Problem

The question presented in this review is whether the grant of superseniority to Howard and Schneider impermissibly interfered with the rights of other American Can Company employees to refrain from union activities or by discrimination in a term of employment impermissibly encouraged participation in union activities.

Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157, requires that the employee shall have the right to refrain from any or all union activities. Section 8 of the NLRA prohibits certain types of employer conduct. It reads, in part:

> (a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—
> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 157 of this title;
> (3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * * 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (3).

Section 8(a)(3) goes on to make an exception allowing a union and an employer, in a collective bargaining agreement, to require employees to maintain union membership as a condition of employment. This statute states that only payment of dues and initiation fees may be required as a condition of membership in a union. Section 8(b) prohibits restraints or coercion of employees by unions in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 157 of the general title. Subsection (2) provides that it is an unfair labor practice for a union to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection (a)(3). 29 U.S.C. §158(b)(1)(A) and (2).

The encouragement or discouragement prohibited by Section 8 is not limited to incentives or disincentives to union membership. Rather, it includes encouragement or discouragement of participation in union activities. Radio Officers, Union v. N.L.R.B., 347 U.S. 17, 74 S.Ct. 323, 98 L.Ed.2d 455 (1954). Thus the question boils down to whether the grant of superseniority to Howard and Schneider interfered with the rights of American Can Company employees to refrain from union activities, or by discrimination impermissibly encouraged participation in union activities.

Is the Board's Order Enforceable?

The American Can Company's argument is that the court should deny enforcement of the Board's order on the ground that the order is based on conflicting rationales. The order itself recognizes that "the Board members have widely divergent views on [these issues]." It characterizes the decision and order as being based upon "aggregate majority." It cannot be denied that there is a remarkable division in viewpoints on the Board with respect to the issue before us.

Chairman Fanning and Member Truesdale, in the original (three member) decision, expressed their view that superseniority clauses are presumptively lawful when applied to union officers regarding layoff and recall. Their suggestion is that the General Counsel may be able to overcome this presumption of validity if it can be shown that the union officers involved contribute nothing to the ability of the union to represent unit members effectively and efficiently. Their rationale is that the descriptions of the duties of guards and trustees in the Union constitution were insufficient evidence to overcome the presumption.

In the second opinion, Chairman Fanning and Member Truesdale clarified their position. 244 NLRB No. 78. They do not believe that the hope of attaining a position in the Union which carries with it the "remote and contingent" benefits of superseniority would encourage employees to be active or good union members. Superseniority benefits, they say, only encourage employees to agree to serve as officers or stewards; such encouragement they regard as lawful because all employees benefit from services rendered by officers and stewards. See also, Chairman Fanning's dissent in a similar Dairylea Cooperative, Inc., 219 NLRB 656 (1976), enforced sub non. N.L.R.B. v. Milk Drivers & Dairy Employees Local 338, 531 F.2d 1162 (2d Cir. 1976).

Members Jenkins and Penello filed a separate concurrence in support of the Board's second order. In their view, any provision of superseniority to union officers is presumptively invalid. They argue that superseniority is to be accorded to union officials whose activities facilitate employee rights and whose presence on the job is required for proper performance of those functions. Thus, superseniority is justifiable only to ensure continued presence of stewards on the job, because they handle grievances as they arise and generally administer collective bargaining agreements. In the view of Jenkins and Penello, union officers can generally perform their functions relating to administration and representation of employee interests without being present on the job. Thus, they would allow superseniority for union officers only if the union can show that their presence is necessary in the grievance settlement process. They do not consider their presence to be ordinarily necessary.

Member Murphy cast the third vote in support of the Board's final order in the case. In her view, superseniority may be lawfully extended to union officers whose functions relate in general to furthering the bargaining relationship. Her argument is that such clauses are presumptively lawful, and that, therefore, the General Counsel bears the initial burden of demonstrating that a superseniority clause is invalid as applied to particular union officials. Member Murphy has also concurred in Union Carbide Corp., Chemical and Plastics Operations Division, 228 NLRB 1152 (1977), United Electrical Radio & Machine Workers of America, Local 623 (Limpco Manufacturing, Inc.) 230 NLRB 406, 408 fn. 12 (1977), aff'd sub nom. D'Amico v. N.L.R.B., 582 F.2d 820 (3d Cir. 1978). In this particular case, Member Murphy found that the descriptions of the duties of the trustees and guards in the Union constitution indicated that those officers have no duties which relate to furtherance of the bargaining relationship. Consequently, the burden shifted to the Union to demonstrate that such officers do, in fact, perform functions sufficient to justify superseniority privileges. In the absence of any such evidence in the case before her, she concluded that the respondents had violated the Act.

It is true that there are a variety of views held by the members of the Board. The present case is not the first in which the Board's order has been based on an "aggregate majority" of views. See e.g., Limpco Manufacturing, Inc., supra; Otis Elevator Co., 231 NLRB 1128 (1977). The Company here argues that this conflict among the Board members renders the order in this case unenforceable. The General Counsel has suggested the contrary view that the Board members really differ only as to burdens of proof, and that the ultimate issue in each case is whether superseniority is justified.

We are unable to agree with the General Counsel's characterization of the Board's views. Rather, it appears that two Board members would approve virtually all superseniority clauses based on their view that this type of encouragement of union service is desirable and permitted by the NLRA. Two of the Board members would allow the practice only for persons who perform steward-like functions, their view being that superseniority is discriminatory and violates the Act unless justified by clear business purposes. One other Board member would allow superseniority for those whose functions "in general" further the bargaining relationship. This is based on her view that the union needs to maintain an effective presence on the job justifies superseniority for such persons. These views represent a conflict on more than proper allocation of the burden of proof. At issue is the scope that can and should be allowed to superseniority provisions under the Act. We do not, however, accept the Company's argument that this conflict in views renders the Board's order in this case unenforceable.

Sections 10(e) and (f) of the NLRA grant the courts of appeals of the United States jurisdiction to review orders of the NLRB. The Courts are empowered to make and enter a decree enforcing, modifying and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part, the order of the Board. However, in reviewing Board orders, "[t]he findings of the Board with respect to questions of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole shall be conclusive."

The Supreme Court in Beth Israel Hospital v. N.L.R.B., 437 U.S. 483, 500–501, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2473, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978), had occasion to expound general standards applicable to review of Board orders. The Supreme Court pointed out that it is the Board on which Congress conferred the authority to develop and apply fundamental national labor policy. It is to the Board that Congress entrusted the task of "applying the Act's general prohibitory language in light of the infinite combinations of events which might be charged as violative of its terms." The Court further said that if the Board is to accomplish the task which Congress set for it, it necessarily has to have the authority to formulate rules to fill the interstices of the broad statutory provisions. Ultimately, the problem is to balance the conflicting legitimate interests. The function of striking that balance to effectuate national labor policy is often difficult and delicate, but it is the responsibility which Congress gave to the Board, subject to limited judicial review. N.L.R.B. v. Truck Drivers, 353 U.S. 87, 96, 77 S.Ct. 643, 647, 1 L.Ed.2d 676 (1957). The role of the judiciary is narrow; a Board order is reviewed for consistency with the Act and for rationality, but if it satisfies these criteria, the Board's application of the rule, if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, is to be enforced. See also N.L.R.B. v. Iron Workers, 434 U.S. 335, 350, 98 S.Ct. 651, 660. 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978); N.L.R.B. v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 266–267, 95 S.Ct. 959, 968, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975); N.L.R.B. v. Okla-Inn, 488 F.2d 498 (10th Cir. 1973); U.S. Soil Conditioning v. N.L.R.B., 606 F.2d 940 (10th Cir. 1979).

In the case at bar, there is no lack of clarity in the Board's opinion. Indeed, the Board members have made their views plain in three separate opinions. The members' reasoning and the resulting "aggregate majority" are clear. It would do no good to remand for clarification. It would only further delay the resolution of this case.

To our knowledge there is no decision which holds that the lack of a majority rationale renders the Board's orders unenforceable. To rule that an order is for this reason unenforceable would be contrary not only to sound jurisprudence, but common sense as well. Resolving disputes is one of the most important functions of a legal system, and to hold that all agency decisions must be based on a majority agreement and may not rest on alternative rationales for a result agreed to by a majority, would seriously hamper the decision-making process. Hopefully, a court would never permit enforceability of its orders to depend upon all of the judges of a multijudge court giving opinions which jibe one with the other. Similarly, such a rule would not be justified as to NLRB orders.

It would be nice, of course, if the Board members' views provided us with a majority rationale in this case. Within limits which we believe to be established by the NLRA, the treatment of superseniority clauses is an appropriate area for the operation of the Board's special expertise in balancing conflicting interests, so as to effectuate national labor policy. Thus, had a majority of the Board members agreed upon a "defensible construction" of the Act, we would defer to that judgment. N.L.R.B. v. Iron Workers, supra, at 350, 98 S.Ct. at 660. There nevertheless remains a responsibility on this court to follow the statute and the Supreme Court decisions, and in so doing to enforce, modify or deny enforcement of the Board's judgment or decree. Although the court's function is limited, there is a role for it to play in defining the legal standards established by the NLRA. N.L.R.B. v. Brown, 380 U.S. 278, 85 S.Ct. 980, 13 L.Ed.2d 839 (1965); Allied Chemical & Alkali Workers of America v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 92 S.Ct. 383, 30 L.Ed 2d. 341 (1971). In light of the conflict of views on the Board, we are not required to adopt one particular viewpoint, and although we hesitate to add still another viewpoint to those that have already been expressed, we will proceed to expound a decision in accordance with the governing act of Congress.

Analysis of the Problem in Consideration of the Decisions

The Supreme Court has had occasion to explain the Act's prohibition of encouragement or discouragement of union membership, and in that regard has made the following statement:

> The policy of the Act is to insulate employees' jobs from their organizational rights. Thus §§ 8(a)(3) and 8(b)(2) were designed to allow employees to freely exercise their right to join unions, be good, bad, or indifferent members, or abstain from joining any union without imperiling their livelihood. The only limitation Congress has chosen to impose on this right is specified in the proviso to § 8(a)(3) which authorizes employers to enter into certain union security contracts, * * * Congress intended to prevent utilization of union security agreements for any purpose other than to compel payment of union dues and fees. * * * No other discrimination aimed at encouraging employees to join, retain membership, or stay in good standing in a union is condoned. Radio Officers' Union v. N.L.R.B., supra, 347 U.S. at 40-42, 74 S.Ct. at 335-336.

The Supreme Court has held also that "union membership" for the purposes of § 8(a)(3) includes "discrimination to discourage participation in union activities as well as to discourage adhesion to union membership. Similar principles govern the interpretation of union membership where encouragement is alleged." Radio Officers' Union v. N.L.R.B., supra, at 40, 74 S.Ct. at 335.

In one of the three cases dealt with in the Radio Officers' Union opinion, the Supreme Court found that a loss of seniority requested by a union and enforced by an employer as punishment for failure to pay union dues on time constituted discrimination to encourage union membership. The Court held that at least in the absence of a valid union security clause in a collective bargaining agreement, such discrimination violated the employee's right "to join in or abstain from union activities, without thereby affecting his job." 347 U.S. at 42, 74 S.Ct at 336.

Not every action which encourages or discourages union membership is illegal. A possibility exists that such actions can be shown to be justified. Radio Officers' Union, supra, at 44, 74 S.Ct. at 337; American Shipbuilding Co. v. N.L.R.B., 380 U.S. 300, 85 S.Ct. 955, 13 L.Ed.2d 855 (1965); N.L.R.B. v. Brown, supra. There need not be proof of specific intent to discriminate; proof of presumed intent is enough. Radio Officers', supra, 347 U.S. at 45-49, 74 S.Ct. at 338-340. There need not be proof of an actual encouraging or discouraging effect on the employee. Id. 48-52, 74 S.Ct. 339-342. The decision in N.L.R.B. v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 227-228, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1144-1145, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963), recognized that proof of a discriminatory intent can be sufficient proof of invalidity of an otherwise ambiguous act.

In sum, the Supreme Court has set forth the following principles, in the case of N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 338 U.S. 26, 34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1797-98, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967);

> First, if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of an antiunion motivation is needed and the Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations. Second, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight", an antiunion motivation must be proved to sustain the charge if the employer has come forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct. Thus, in either situation, once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him. (Emphasis in original.)

The above principles are said to be of controlling importance. In determining whether a particular discriminatory practice can be justified by legitimate objectives, or whether such practice should be regarded as illegal in spite of such justification, the competing interests represented by business objectives and employee rights have to be weighed. N.L.R.B. v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra, U.S. at 229, 87 S.Ct. at 1145.

The Supreme Court has not decided a case similar to the present one. However, seniority rights have been recognized as an important part of employment. See Radio Officers' Union v. N.L.R.B., supra, and N.L.R.B. v. Erie Resistor Corp., supra. In the latter case, the Board's determination that a grant of superseniority to strike replacements and strikers who returned to work was inherently discriminatory and in violation of the Act was upheld by the Court. Also, in Patterson v. Tulsa Local No. 513, 446 F.2d 205 (10th cir. 1971), cert denied 405 U.S. 976, 92 S.Ct. 1202, 31 L.Ed.2d 251 (1972), we held that a seniority clause allowing motion picture machine operators to "bump" less senior operators from their jobs violated §§ 8(b)(1)(A) and (b)(2).

The Supreme Court in Aeronautical Industrial District Lodge 727 v. Campbell, 337 U.S. 521, 69 S.Ct. 1287, 93 L.Ed. 1513 (1949), consider a clause granting superseniority to union chairmen. Under 50 U.S.C. § 308, World War II veterans returning to work following the war were entitled to return to prior jobs with seniority rights unaffected by their absence due to service in the armed forces. Three veterans challenged the application of a superseniority clause to union chairmen during a layoff. They asserted that the superseniority clause violated their rights under 50 U.S.C. § 308 by causing the retention of union chairmen with less service seniority than the veterans. The Court said:

> One of the safeguards insisted upon by the union for the effective functioning of collective bargaining is continuity in office for its shop stewards or union chairmen. To that end provision is made, as it was here, against laying them off merely on the basis of temporal seniority. Because they are union chairmen they are not regarded as merely individual members of the union; they are in a special position in relation to collective bargaining for the benefit of the whole union. To retain them as such is not an encroachment on the seniority system but a due regard of union interests which embrace the system of seniority rights. 337 U.S. at 527, 69 S.Ct. at 1290.

The Court also stated: "Because a labor agreement assumes the proper adjustment of grievances at their source, the union chairman play a very important role in the whole process of collective bargaining. Therefore it is deemed highly desirable that union chairmen have the authority and skill which are derived from continuity in office." 337 U.S. at 528, 69 S.Ct. at 1290–91. The holding was that veterans, like other employees, were subject to superseniority clauses. The Court did not consider the issue of the validity of superseniority clauses under the NLRA.

The NLRA has considered the validity of superseniority clauses several times recently. The first of these cases was Dairylea Cooperative, Inc., supra. In that case the then Chairman Murphy and Members Jenkins, Penello and Kennedy found a clause giving stewards top seniority for all purposes to be presumptively unlawful. The Board stated that the Act prohibits linkage of union activities to job benefits; generally, a union must maintain its own organization without subsidy from employees. The Board recognized superseniority clauses limited to layoff and recall of stewards as "well-established" and proper, because effective administration of bargaining agreements is facilitated by the continued presence of stewards on the job. Member Fanning dissented, stating that in his view stewards may lawfully be granted broad superseniority under the Act.

The Second Circuit affirmed the Dairylea decision and recognized the general policy in the Act of insulating employees' jobs from union activities. The court held that it is reasonable to infer that superseniority benefits encourage union activity. A union can prevail in such a case if a legitimate and substantial business justification is demonstrated, but the desire to encourage employees to serve as stewards is not a sufficient justification. N.L.R.B. v. Milk Drivers & Dairy Employees Local 338, supra. See also N.L.R.B. v. Local 443, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, 600 F.2d 411 (2d Cir. 1979). N.L.R.B. v. Auto Warehousers, Inc., 571 F.2d 860 (5th Cir. 1978) suggests a contrary view.

The Board in subsequent decisions has reiterated the view that superseniority clauses which go beyond layoff and recall for stewards must be justified by the Union. Union Carbide Corp., Chemical & Plastics Operations Div., supra; Chauffeurs, Teamsters and Helpers Local Union No. 633, 230 NLRB 81 (1977), enforced without opinion 578 F.2d 441 (D.C.Cir.1978); Connecticut Limousine Service, 235 NLRB 1350 (1978), aff'd. in part sub nom. Teamsters Local 20 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America v. N.L.R.B., 610 F.2d 991 (D.C.Cir.1979).

The Board has addressed the validity of superseniority for union officers, also. In Limpco Manufacturing, Inc., supra, the Board upheld the validity of a superseniority clause as applied to a union recording secretary. In that case it was said:

> [W]e do not consider that administration of the collective-bargaining agreement is limited solely > to grievance processing or other "steward-like" duties performed at the workplace. What is at stake is the effective and efficient representation of employees by their collective-bargaining representatives. Certainly, the representational activities carried out by union officials involved in the administration of the collective-bargaining agreement on behalf of employees extend beyond the narrow confines of grievance processing. These encompass at the very least a functioning local to assert the presence of the union on the job. * * * [O]nce it has been initially established that the official responsibilities of the union officer in question bear a direct relationship to the effective and efficient representation of unit employees, then this officer is entitled to the benefit of the same presumption afforded to union stewards. 230 NLRB at 407, 408.

The language in Limpco is not unclear, but notwithstanding that, the decision rests on a conflict of views. Member Murphy concurred in the opinion, but made clear that she would find job retention clauses for union officers presumptively lawful. 230 NLRB at 408, fn. 12. Member Murphy, therefore, would not place an initial burden on the union to demonstrate a relationship between an officer's duties and unit representation. Chairman Fanning indicates continuing adherence to the view that superseniority clauses should be allowed broad applicability. 230 NLRB at 407, fn. 5. Members Jenkins and Penello dissented, again expressing the view that superseniority should be permitted only for those officials whose persence on the job is necessary for grievance settlement.

The Limpco decision was affirmed sub nom., D'Amico v. N.L.R.B., 582 F.2d 820 (3d Cir. 1978). The view of the Third Circuit was that the neutrality required by §8 of the NLRA is not absolute, but has to be read in light of the § 7 right to bargain collectively. The court found that the burden ought to be on the union to show substantial justification for the application of superseniority to an officer whose official duties as described in the Union constitution do not involve the collective bargaining process. The court accepted justification based on a showing of "official responsibilities"—"officially assigned responsibilities which helped to implement the collective bargaining agreement in a meaningful way." "Any less rigid interpretation * * * would leave substantial room to dilute the statutory neutrality principle without the requisite collective bargaining notification." 582 F.2d at 825. Cf., Otis Elevator Co., supra.

We are mindful that superseniority clauses discriminate with regard to tenure or term of employment. Employees who receive superseniority obtain a benefit in the nature of patronage which is not afforded to others. Where superseniority is provided to persons holding a union office, such clauses encourage participation in union activities. At the very least, these clauses encourage service in union offices by rewarding such service with privileges. Perhaps such clauses encourage employees to be active in the union. We do not agree with Member Fanning's view that superseniority clauses only become important to an employee after he has been asked to serve in a union office, but have no impact on the employee's decision to participate in union activities.

The conflict here is not so inherently destructive of important employee rights that it should be held to be unlawful in spite of legitimate justification. But where the conduct is such that an employee's rights could have been adversely affected, the burden is on the responsible party to come forward with proof of justification for the conduct. N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra, 388 U.S. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797–98. The Board seems to regard these clauses as presumptively valid when limited to layoff and recall of stewards. We need not pass on the propriety of that approach or viewpoint. See Aeronautical Industrial District Lodge 727 v. Campbell, supra. As to union officers, we read the Board's opinions as holding that the union bears an initial burden of demonstrating that officers awarded superseniority have duties which relate directly to the effective and efficient functioning of the bargaining unit.

We are satisfied that superseniority clauses are discriminatory and do "adversely affect employees' rights to some extent." N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., supra, at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1798. In the light of the Act's clear prohibition of discrimination and the Supreme Court's cases, it is our conclusion that those who are responsible for invoking or applying a superseniority clause to union officers must initially prove a legitimate and substantial purpose. The exact proof which will be sufficient has to depend on the surrounding circumstances of each case. The responsibility for development of such rules as may be appropriate in this area ought be left to the Board. We do say that in D'Amico v. N.L.R.B., supra, it is the Third Circuit's opinion that as a minimum the Act requires that the official duties and responsibilities of an officer who receives superseniority must help to implement the collective bargaining agreement in a meaninful way. We agree that a less demanding standard certainly would not satisfy the requirement that discrimination must be justified by legitimate and substantial business purposes.

In the light of the standards mentioned, there is no problem in concluding that the application of superseniority to Howard and Schneider was unlawful. The duties of guards and trustees at set forth in the Union constitution do not contribute in any meaningful way to the implementation of a bargaining agreement. Howard's responsibilities on the Health and Safety Committee were separate and independent of his status as a union officer; these duties were not officially assigned to him as a union officer. The justification for his receiving superseniority benefits stands or falls on the basis on which it was given, his role as a union trustee. We conclude that as to both Howard and Schneider no substantial justification for the application of superseniority has been established, and therefore, the Board's conclusion that the respondents here violated the Act should be, and is affirmed.

Analysis of the Remedy

We finally consider the contention of the Company and the Unions as to the validity of the Board's order. The order directs that the Union and the Company cease and desist from invoking and permitting the invocation of superseniority "for other than a reasonable number of local union officers whose duties involve the administration of the agreement or the processing of grievances * * *."

The Company and the Unions are further ordered to make whole any wage losses suffered by employees who would have been recalled or retained but for the exercise of superseniority by Howard and Schneider.

The Company and the Unions are also required to post notices for 60 days in all plants and meeting halls frequented by employees covered by the collective bargaining agreement. The notices to be posted in substance advise that henceforth superseniority will be invoked only for proper union officers. It is this last aspect of the Board's order which the respondents find objectionable and contend should be altered.

The respondents urge that the Board's order in this case is a retroactive change in previously established rules, and ought not to be enforced against them. In the alternative, they contend that the remedy is overbroad and not justified by the violations.

As to the retroactivity contention: We disagree that this is an abrupt change in a previously announced rule. Cf., Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union v. N.L.R.B., 466 F.2d 380 (D.C. Cir. 1972). In Dairylea, the Board did not, as respondents suggest, adopt a rule that all superseniority clauses are lawful if limited to layoff and recall. Dairylea, dealth with superseniority for stewards; superseniority limited to layoff and recall was recognized as lawful "on the ground that if furthers the effective administration of bargaining agreements on the plant level by encouraging the continued presence of the steward on the job." 219 NLRB at 658 (emphasis added).

We must reject the respondents' contention that the Dairylea, opinion can be read to establish the lawfulness of superseniority clauses for all union officers if limited to layoff and recall. Indeed, Dairylea, indicates the Board's view that superseniority clauses have "an inherent tendency * * * to discriminate against employees for union-related reasons," and the corresponding likelihood that the party asserting the legality of a superseniority clause might be called upon to justify the clause.

It does not appear that there are any Board opinions regarding superseniority clauses for union officials prior to Dairylea, supra. The fact that unions and employers may have been negotiating and enforcing such clauses for some time does not preclude the Board from finding such clauses improper when presented with the issue. An administrative agency can rule on a question of first impression in an adjudicative context. See S.E.C. v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 67 S.Ct. 1575, 91 L.Ed.

1985 (1947), reh. denied 332 U.S. 783, 68 S.Ct. 26, 92 L.Ed. 367 (1947), and N.L.R.B. v. Bell Aerospace Co. Div. of Textron, Inc., 416 U.S. 267, 94 S.Ct. 1757, 40 L.Ed.2d 134 (1974), where the court stated: "The Board is not precluded from announcing new principles in an adjudicative proceeding and the choice between rule-making and adjudication lies in the first instance within the Board's discretion." 416 U.S. 294, 94 S.Ct. 1771.

In case at bar, adjudication can be viewed as particularly appropriate. There are a wide variety of circumstances in which superseniority might be asserted for union officers. "The Board thus has reason to proceed with caution, developing its standards in a case-by-case manner, with attention to the specific circumstances presented. The Board's judgment that adjudication best serves this purpose is entitled to great weight." 416 U.. at 294, 94 S.Ct. at 1772. We, therefore, reject the respondent's contention that the Board's order is not to be enforce because of its retroactive impact.

We also disagree with the arguments of the respondents that the order is overboard. The superseniority clause here is contained in a collective bargaining agreement between the International Union and the Company affecting employees at plants, throughout the United States. Thus, the Unions reliance on Reads, Inc., 228 NLRB 1402 (1977) is not correct. That case involved interrogation of a single employee by a store manager.

It is for the Board, not the courts, to determine how the effect of unfair labor practices are to be expunged. N.L.R.B. v. Link-Belt Co., 311 U.S. 584, 600, 61 S.Ct. 358, 366, 85 L.Ed. 368 (1941).

> Section 10 (c) * * * charges the Board with the task of devising remedies to effectuate the policies of the Act. The Board's power is a broad discretionary one, subject to limited judicial review. The relation of remedy to policy is peculiarly a matter for administrative competence. In fashioning remedies to undo the effects of violations of the Act, the Board must draw on enlightment gained from experience. The Board's order will not be disturbed unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act. Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct 398, 405—406, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1965) (citations omitted).

We agree with the Board's aggregate majority conclusion that a violation of the Act occurred in this case. The order seeks to correct that violation and to prevent future violations based on the same contract clause. Our view is that the Board's order is valid. It does not seek to achieve ends which are out of harmony with the policies of the Act.

Accordingly, we decline to modify or set aside that order.

* * * *

The Company finally contends that it cannot be held responsible for application of the superseniority to Howard and Schneider; it contends that the Union bears sole responsibility for any violation of the Act in this case. The argument of the Company is based upon the fact that the Union names those to whom superseniority will apply. However, although the Company cannot conduct a full scale investigation as to the applicable facts, it certainly has access to some information without applying to union officers for information.

In Union Carbide Corp., Chemical & Plastics Operations Div., supra, it was found that an employer had violated § 8(a) and (1) of the Act by refusing to apply super-seniority rights to stewards regarding shift transfers. The emmployer in that case had relied on Dairylea for the view that superseniority for stewards must be limited to layoff and recall. The Board found that superseniority regarding shift retention was justified, because it served to protect the steward's continued presence in their respective departments. Thus, an employer may be found to be in violation of the Act for improperly allowing or improperly disallowing use of superseniority. In the case of union officers, the lawfulness of superseniority turns on the nature and extent of their collective bargaining duties. A company may thus have to determine the nature of a union officer's duties, an effort which may prove awkward.

The task of balancing such problems as are set forth above as against the need to enforce the provisions of the NLRA is the responsibility of the Board. The Supreme Court has expressed the proposition that both unions and employers are liable for violations of the Act which constitute discrimination in respect to encouragement of union membership. Radio Officers' Union v. N.L.R.B., supra. The Act itself contemplates such liability in the paralled provisions of § 8(a)(1) and (3), and § 8(b)1) and (2). It cannot be denied that the Company here acceded to the Union's request and in doing so made the unlawful discrimination possible and effective. Therefore, we must refuse the request to overrule the Board's judgment that American Can Company is to be held responsible along with the Unions for the violations shown in this case.

Based upon the reasons set forth above, the Board's petition for enforcement should be and the same is hereby granted.

NLRB v. Robin American Corporation

654 F.2d 1023 (5th Cir.), August 31, 1981—245 NLRB 822

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before GODBOLD, Chief Judge, MORGAN and HENDERSON, Circuit Judges

GODBOLD, Chief Judge: The Board sues to enforce its order.[1] The major issues concern threats and interrogation, lay-offs and discharges, failure to reinstate unfair labor practice strikers, and validity of a Gissel [2] bargaining order.

Principals of a company not involved in this case purchased the zipper manufacturing department of the company in March 1977 and under the name Robin American ("RA") began producing zipper chain and the parts for the sliders that open and close zippers.[3] Of the three principals Robinson became president of the company, Benbasat vice president for manufacturing, and Samberg vice president for engineering. RA had several departments: coiling department, finishing department, sewing department, weaving department, slider department, shipping and receiving department.

Between November 5 and 10, 1977, 59 of approximately 86 to 88 non-clerical workers at RA's plant at Hialeah, Florida, signed union authorization cards.[4] The union demanded recognition, the request was refused, and in mid-November the union petitioned for a representation election.

I. Interrogation and threats

The Board found that between November and mid-January managerial and supervisory employees engaged in a number of interrogations and threats to persons who had signed union cards. RA does not deny that these events occurred but merely argues that they were not coercive. The question is not even close. The evidence amply supports the tendency of the interrogations and threats to coerce.

II. Closing of the slider department and discharge of employees

All five employees in the slider department signed union cards. Three were subjected to interrogation or threats by management or supervisory employees. On December 9 without prior warning Samberg told these five employees that the department was being closed and all of them terminated. All except one had been working in the department since 1972 or 1973. RA had been manufacturing some of its slider requirements and purchasing others from suppliers. On closing the department it began purchasing all of its needs from suppliers.

As is true of several issues in this case, the question is sufficiency of the evidence. There was evidence both ways. The Board considered testimony that the slider department was—and was not—successful, that the costs of operating it were excessive, and that the sliders produced were—and were not—of acceptable quality. Portions of the evidence tending to show that the slider department was successful came from company witnesses, including vice president for engineering Samberg. The evidence that the department was closed and the employees discharged for anti-union motives was adequate to make out a prima facie case to support the inferences that protected conduct was a motivating factor in RA's decision. The burden shifted to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have been taken in the absence of protected conduct. Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150, 105 LRRM 1169 (1980). RA did not discharge this burden.

[3] Zipper chain consists of two continuous woven tapes, each with "teeth" on one side. A slider is a mechanism applied to the tapes to engage or digengage the teeth, thus opening and closing the zipper.

[4] The union is the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, AFL-CIO.

III. Other lay-offs

(a) Oses and Ruiz

These two employees worked in the sewing department. Both had signed cards. In early January superintendent Quiros, who was in charge of the sewing department, told Oses not to think that the union was going to protect her from lay-off. On January 20, a Friday, Oses was told by Quiros that she was laid off. Union spokesman Luna intervened with Quiros, who said he had been ordered to lay off Oses. Luna accused Quiros of laying Oses off because she was a member of the union. Quiros replied with an "affirmative gesture" and reiterated that he was following orders. Luna made the same accusation to Benbasat, who told him to "tell the union to stay in Coral Gables."[5] Oses had more seniority than sewing machine operators not laid off.

The next day, Saturday, Ruiz was laid off. On the Monday following, Luna asked Quiros about both of the lay-offs. Quiros responded that "the Company don't want the Union inside" and "if any people put the Union inside, I think he's not working in this Company."

RA contends that Oses and Ruiz were laid off because of a decline in sales and excessive inventory. According to Benbasat it was evident as early as September that RA was overproducing. But the lay-offs did not occur until four months later and two months after the union had come in and demanded recognition and approximately two weeks before the date of a scheduled election. Benbasat attempted to explain this discrepancy, but the Board was not required to accept his explanation.

The evidence adequately supports that Oses and Ruiz were laid off because of their union membership and not for economic reasons.

(b) Izquierdo

This employee, a sister-in-law of Octavio Rodriguez, the prime union supporter, worked in the finishing department. She had signed a union card and solicited three others. On January 20 she was told she was being laid off. This was done in the presence of her brother-in-law, Rodriguez. Rodriguez protested the discharge but without success. The company explains that it laid off Izquierdo because arrangements it had made with an outside firm to perform some manufacturing functions eliminated the need for her job. But immediately after Izquierdo was laid off the company replaced her with a worker from another department, who, however, had more seniority. Soon after the lay-off Arroyo, a junior employee in the finishing department, quit.

Although Arroyo's job was difficult and Izquierdo had previously performed it, Izquierdo was not recalled to fill the vacancy

We agree with the company that there is not substantial evidence that it had knowledge of Izquierdo's union activity. Izquierdo's situation is different from that of Oses and Ruiz. No statements were made at the time of her lay-off that tended to show company knowledge of her union activities or anti-union bias. When Rodriguez accused Ballarino of laying off Izquierdo because she was his sister-in-law and was a union member Ballarino merely responded that he was carrying out orders. Rodriguez repeated his accusation to Benbasat, who only said "this is my decision." Izquierdo was not one of the persons found by the Board to be leaders of the organizational campaign. The Board made general findings that since the plant was small and relationships were informal and friendly it was likely that everybody knew what was going on. To infer knowledge the Board also relies upon the evidence that Ballarino and Benbasat did not deny they laid off Izquierdo for union activities when accused of having done so. These failures to deny their motives, the locale of a small and informal plant, plus the in-law relationship with Rodriguez, are not substantial evidence on which to base an inference that the company knew Izquierdo was a union supporter.

IV. The strike

[5] Some of RA's operations were in Coral Gables. The sewing department was at Hialeah.

The strike began January 24. The preceding day 40 to 50 employees met at the union hall. The Board found that the employees were upset by the recent discharges and lay-offs,[6] they were concerned that there would be more lay-offs, and they feared that the union would lose its support before the election. The union attempted to dissuade the employees from striking before the election, but some of them went out on strike the next day. On January 25 another meeting was held at which union officers told the employees that if they really believed that the company would "throw everybody out" the union would support the strike. The employees then voted unanimously to strike.

The foregoing findings, plus the recent lay-offs and discharges, the closing of a department, and the threats and interrogations adequately support the finding of the Board that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike and not a demand for recognition. Therefore, RA's refusal to grant reinstatements was a violation of the Act.

On January 27 Vice President Benbasat personally delivered pay checks to employees including strikers. Of the 40 employees on strike he asked 20 selected strikers, by a question to each employee, whether he wished to return to work. Eight accepted the invitation soon thereafter. The Board found that this solicitation to abandon the strike and return to work violated § 8(a)(1) because it was an attempt to deal with the individual employees in disregard of the right of the employees to bargain through a chosen collective bargaining agent. There was no evidence of threats or promises of benefits made in connection with the solicitation, but this is not necessary since the rationale of this particular unfair practice is interference with the collective bargaining process. NLRB v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 133 F.2d 676, 681–82 (9th Cir. 1943); NLRB v. Wooster Division of Borg-Warner Corp., 236 F.2d 898, 905 (6th Cir. 1956), rev's on other grounds, 356 U.S. 342 78 S.Ct. 718, 2 L.Ed.2d 823 (1958), General Electric Co. v. NLRB, 400 F.2d 713, 720 (5th Cir. 1968), cert denied, 394 U.S. 904, 89 S.Ct. 1012, 22 L.Ed.2d 216 (1969), is relied upon by the company as authority that soliciting employees not to strike is lawful. In that case, however, we explicitly recognized that solicitation of striking employees to return to work may be unlawful but distinguished the facts before us because there the employer was not guilty of over-all illegal opposition to the union, there was no unfair labor practice strike, and the employer recognized and bargained with the union.

The election was set for March 3. On February 15 the union notified RA that the 32 employees still on strike wanted to return. The company did not respond to the request for reinstatement until after the election. In the election there were 40 votes against the union 14 in favor, and 30 challenged ballots. Of the 30 challenged, 27 were cast by strikers or alleged discriminatees. Three days after the election the company offered reinstatement to two employees, stating that 13 had been permanently replaced, three were ineligible, and the rest were not needed and had no expectation of early recall.

Unfair labor practice strikers are entitled to reinstatement on request even if they have been replaced. Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 76 S.Ct. 349, 355 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956). The company refused to reinstate Octavio Rodriguez and Martin Santiago on the ground they were supervisors and therefore not protected by the Act and subject to discharge for striking. In part V, below, we reject the argument that they were supervisors. They were, therefore, entitled to reinstatement.

The company argues that it was not required to reinstate strikers when they offered to return to work because no jobs were then available. It was not until March 6, three days after the election and 21 days after the offer to return, that the company responded to the strikers' offer. The company hired 10 to 12 replacements for strikers, and it did not begin to lay them off until early March. It is therefore, clear that the company committed an unfair labor practice by refusing reinstatement for three weeks and until after the election.[7]

V. The Gissel bargaining order

The Board issued a bargaining order based on both prongs of NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). It found "outrageous" and "pervasive" unfair labor practices had been committed and a bargaining order was the only available and effective remedy (Type I Gissel order). Also it found that the union had enjoyed a majority status, that the company had committed serious unfair labor practice that had undermined the union, and it was highly improbable that in the near future the employees could freely excercise their preference in an election (Type II Gissel order).

[6] Oses and Ruiz and Izquierdo had been discharged/laid off only two or three days earlier.

[7] Also, when the company did respond it refused to reinstate two employees on the ground they were guilty of strike misconduct. No evidence was offered at the hearing to support this claim.

RA contends the card count was tainted because a substantial number of cards were solicited by Martin Santiago and Octavio Rodriguez who, it contends, were supervisors. Before the change in ownership there were three supervisors in the plant: plant superintendent Ballarino and salaried supervisors Rodriguez and Santiago. After the change in ownership Benbasat called Rodriguez in and told him that there would be no more supervisors, that the only supervisor recognized would be [plant superintendent] Ballarino. Rodriguez was switched from salary to hourly wages and began to punch in on the time clock. He lost several benefits but was promised overtime work so his pay would equal his previous salary. Rodriguez was a leader in the organization campaign and solicited 18 cards. He was interrogated about the union. The Board recognized that Rodriguez was the most senior and most qualified employee in his department. His hourly wage was, however, not the highest in the department. On adequate evidence the Board found that Rodriguez did not make hiring and firing decisions but merely made casual suggestions, in the same way other employees did, of persons available for hire, and these suggestions were often not accepted by Benbasat, who made the actual hiring decision; that Rodriguez did not effectively recommend promotions or wage increases; that he did not supervise overtime work, though he initialed time cards of employees who did work overtime (several other non-supervisory employees could initial time cards). In the absence of the department head Rodriguez was notified by employees leaving early, but he had no authority to, nor did he, approve employees leaving early. Rodriguez performed a number of manual routine tasks, such as cleaning ovens, unloading boxes, moving material by hand trucks, and operating a fork lift.

Santiago's situation was generally parallel to that of Rodriguez. He had been supervisor of the weaving department. When RA took over, Banbasat told Santiago that Ballarino would be the only supervisor, that Santiago was to be transferred to a mechanic, and that under the law a supervisor could not repair a machine. He was changed from salary to hourly wage. Thereafter Santiago spent 90 percent of his time repairing machines. He had no substantial connection with hiring.

Several months after the change in ownership Quiros was hired to supervise the coiling and sewing departments, and Ballarino retained supervision of other departments.

The Board correctly found that Rodriguez and Santiago were not supervisors. See NLRB v. Security Guard Service, Inc., 384 F.2d 143 (5th Cir. 1967). The card count was, therefore, not tainted.

The unlawful threats and interrogations, the discharges/lay-offs, the abolition of the slider department, the selective requests to employees to return to work, the offer of reinstatement to only two of the 32 strikers remaining out after eight of those solicited to return did return, all of which we have found supported by sufficient evidence, occurring within a short span of time and in a small shop where relationships were close, meet the requirements for a Type I order.

The company questions whether the Board has made the four findings required for Type II Gissel orders by NLRB v. American Cable System, Inc., 414 F.2d 661, 668–69 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 957, 91 S.Ct. 356, 27 L.Ed.2d 266 (1970), discussed in Bandag, Inc. v. NLRB, 583 F.2d 765, 770–73 (5th Cir. 1978). These criteria do not apply to a Type I Gissel order, which may be entered when the employer has committed outrageous and pervasive unfair labor practices and a bargaining order is the only available effective remedy. The first of these two prerequisites is clearly met. And the Board was entitled to conclude that the second was met because of the nature and severity of the unfair labor practices committed over a brief period of time in a small plant where relationships were close. Moreover, a Type I Gissel order may issue though no card majority has been demonstrated. Here the union had a card majority before the company's unfair labor practice began. The rationale of Gissel seeks to protect the "values of free choice," NLRB v. WKRG-TV, Inc. 470 F.2d 1302, 1320 (5th Cir. 1973). Here free choice was made and recorded before the company began its pattern of illegal conduct. When free choice is followed at once by pervasive and outrageous unfair practices "the card majority should not be subordinated to a potentially tainted election." WKRG-TV, supra, at 1320.

The Board order is ENFORCED except with respect to the discharge of Izquierdo.

Herman Brothers, Inc. v. NLRB

658 F.2d 201 (3d Cir.), September 3, 1981—252 NLRB 848

On petition to review Board Order

Before SEITZ, Chief Judge, and VAN DUSEN and HIGGINBOTHAM, Circuit Judges

VAN DUSEN, Senior Circuit Judge: Herman Brothers, Inc. (the "Company") petitions this court to review and set aside an order issued by the National Labor Relations Board ("Board"). The Board seeks enforcement of its order. The Company contends that (1) the Board erred in refusing to defer to the arbitration procedure established in the collective bargaining agreement, and (2) the Company did not violate § 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act ("Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (3). After careful consideration, we have decided to deny the Company's petition and grant the Board's application for enforcement.

203

FACTS [1]

The Company engages in the interstate transportation of freight and other commodities. It employs truck drivers represented by the General Drivers, Warehousemen, and Helpers Local Union No. 21, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America ("Union"). Stief, the complainant in this case, works for the Company as a truck driver and is a Union member.

At the time this dispute arose, the Union and the Company were operating under an extension of their expired collective bargaining agreement. A new collective bargaining agreement had been negotiated but not yet ratified. The Union submitted this proposed contract to its membership for approval. Mail ballots were distributed and due to be counted in Hannibal, Mo., on October 5, 1979.

A dissident faction within the Union, including Stief, opposed ratification. This faction's opposition focused on the so-called mileage payment provision. This provision altered the manner of computing the drivers' wages: instead of using an hourly rate, the proposed agreement required using a mileage rate.

On September 26, 1979,[2] Stief wrote and distributed a letter to his fellow drivers in which he criticized the mileage payment provision. The Company acknowledges that its management learned Stief had written the letter and was irritated by it.

On October 3, Stief asked Dispatch Supervisor Hansen if he could take October 5 off to attend to personal business in Bowling Green, Mo. Hansen granted his permission Normally, Stief received his job assignments from Dispatch Supervisor Hansen. Hansen would call Stief either the evening before, or the morning of, the day the job had to be done. Jobs were assigned according to seniority. Following this standard dispatch procedure, Hansen called Stief early on October 4 to give him his day's work assignment. Stief's wife told Hansen that Stief was ill and could not work.

Hansen called again that evening to given Stief his job assignment for October 5. Mrs. Stief answered the call and reminded Hansen that he had given Stief October 5 off. Because Hansen had heard that, instead of attending to personal business, Stief was going to watch the ballots being counted, he told Mrs. Stief that if Stief went to watch the ballot count, the Company would issue a warning letter for excessive absenteeism. Hansen repeated this statement to Stief and, in a later telephone conversation, told Stief he would be in a lot of trouble if he went to the union hall in Hannibal.

Stief did not watch the ballot count on October 5. He did attend to his personal business and also went to St. Louis where he discussed several problems with a Union busines representative.

[1] These facts reflect the findings of the ALJ (A. 401–411) and are not contested here by the Company.

[2] Unless otherwise noted, all dates refer to 1979.

Because October 5 was a Friday, the next work day was October 8. Stief did not receive a call to work on October 8 or on any day thereafter. He did receive, however, a call from Union Steward Hubbard. The Company had asked Hubbard to call Stief and tell him that, due to his October 4 and 5 absences, he was obliged to call in his availability to work. Hubbard called Stief and relayed this message on October 6 and again on October 8.[3] Both calls were made at the Company's request. Stief refused to call in his availability because "the Company was obliged to call him" (A. 406).

204

In a letter dated October 11, the Company notified Stief of his discharge. According to the letter, Stief had voluntarily quit pursuant to Work Rule 6(a). Work Rule 6(a) provides: "Absent for 3 consecutive working days without notification. Voluntary Quit."

PROCEDURAL HISTORY

The procedural history of this case is complicated by the presence of two arbitration proceedings, both of which concern Stief's discharge. The chronology of events is particularly noteworthy.

Stief filed a grievance on October 11, 1979. On October 25, 1979, the arbitration committee,[4] consisting of three union and three management representatives, considered Stief's grievance and held he had been discharged for cause. All now agree that certain remarks made by the Company representative rendered this first arbitration proceeding unfair.

In early November, Stief filed unfair labor practice charges against both the Union and the Company. He charged the Union with unfairly representing him at the arbitration proceeding and charged the Company with violating § 8(a)(1) and (3). The charges against the Company are the subject matter of this petition.

A hearing before an administrative law judge ("ALJ") on all charges was scheduled for January 15, 1980. Immediately prior to the start of the hearing, the Union and Stief settled their differences. Pursuant to their settlement agreement, the Union promised to seek a second arbitration concerning [3] The findings of the ALJ include this wording (A. 406–07):

"The Respondent took the position that Stief did not have permission to be away from work on Friday, October 5, and that under all the circumstances, including his unavailability due to illness on October 4, was obliged to call in his availability for work before being dispatched. Consequently, on October 6, when Werbach and Hansen made up and issued the dispatches for Monday, October 8, Stief was bypassed. In addition, Werbach, who customarily contacted Union Steward Kenneth Hubbard when a potential employee problem arose, asked Hubbard to call Stief and make sure he understood the company policy about making himself available for work. Hubbard agreed. However, before Hubbard reached Stief, Stief called Hubbard around 1 p.m. that day and complained about not having been dispatched. Maureen Stief testified that she secretly listened to the conversation on another phone. Hubbard advised Stief to call the respondent and make known his availability for work, but Stief insisted he had been bypassed and that the Company was obliged to call him. Stief accused Hubbard of failing to properly represent the Union's members, favoring the Company, engaging in improper conduct by hitting a union member in the mouth, and demanded Hubbard's resignation. Hubbard hung up the phone.[7] A few minutes later Hubbard called Stief in an effort to placate him. Hubbard explained that he did not want to see Stief create a situation which might result in his supension, discharge, or a voluntary quit. According to Hubbard, Stief responded that he didn't mean what he'd said about Hubbard resigning, and that Hubbard had done a good job and Stief hoped he would stay on. In his testimony, Stief agreed that Hubbard apologized, but insisted that the apology was for threatening Stief. Stief also claimed Hubbard stated that the pressures of being a shop steward were too much for him, and that he would resign in January. Hubbard's telephone bill shows that he made a call to Stief's telephone number at 2:44 p.m. on October 6, and talked for 41 minutes. I find the timing and the length of the call more consistent with the conciliatory tone of Hubbard's version, which is credited.

"[7] Fred and Maureen Stief also testified that Hubbard ended the conversation with the remark that the Union and the Company were tired of Steif's s——, and were going to get rid of him. Stief also insisted that Hubbard made no mention of the contention that Stief was obliged to report himself available for work on October 5 in order to be eligible for dispatch. Hubbard denied making the threat, and insisted that he relayed the Respondent's position with respect to Stief's availability. I credit Hubbard over Stief in this respect. In all other respects the above version of this telephone conversation is an amalgam of their credited testimonies. In any event the alleged remark is hearsay with respect to the Respondent's intentions, as is the subsequent alleged threat by Hubbard, concerning Stief, to driver-steward Frank Warren.

"On Monday, October 8, Stief remained at home. * * * At 4:09 p.m. that afternoon, in response to a second request from Werbach, Hubbard again telephoned Stief and talked with him for 8 minutes about contacting the Company with respect to making known his availability for work. Stief adhered to his original position that he had been wrongfully bypassed by the Company, that the Respondent was obliged to call him for dispatch, and that if he lost his job he would file a grievance and, if necessary, take the matter up with the Labor Board.[8]

"[8] As indicated by Hubbard's telephone bill, Fred and Maureen Stief's testimony that they received no phone call from Hubbard on October 8 is clearly in error. Hubbard is credited with respect to this conversation."

[4] In the record, this is called a grievance committee.

Stief's discharge. The Company was told of this arrangement and indicated it would not object to a second proceeding. The ALJ then received testimony on Stief's charges against the Company.

On February 1, 1980, Stief's grievance was resubmitted to a different arbitration committee. This committee, like that of October 25, consisted of three union and three management representatives. The committee held:

> "Based on the facts presented, the grievant [Stief] was justly discharged for bein [sic] unavailable for work for more than three days without notice and without making himself available for work. Although the grievant engaged in activity in opposition to the mileage contract, this activity played no part in the decision to discharge."

On February 21, 1980, the Company submitted its brief regarding Stief's unfair labor practice charge to the ALJ. Although the record had closed, the Company also submitted, attached to its brief, a copy of the second, February 1, 1980, arbitration award and requested that the ALJ defer to this second award.

The ALJ rendered his decision in July 1980. He determined that: (1) the Company violated § 8(a)(1) when its Dispatch Supervisor Hansen threatened Stief with disciplinary action if Stief went to watch the ballot count; and (2) the Company violated § 8(a)(1) and (3) when it discharged Stief in retaliation for his protected union activities.[5] The ALJ never mentioned or considered deferring to the second arbitration award issued on February 1, 1980.

The Company moved to reopen the record to admit the second arbitration decision. The Board denied the motion and refused to even consider whether or not to defer to the second award. The Board affirmed the conclusions of the ALJ.

The Company seeks review of: (1) the Board's decision not to even consider deferring to the second arbitration proceeding (deferral issue), and (2) the Board's conclusion that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) and (3) when it discharged Stief. The Company does not dispute that Hansen's threat to discipline Stief if he went to watch the ballot count constitutes a violation of § 8(a)(1).[6]

THE DEFERRAL ISSUE

The Company argues that the Board should have refused to assert its jurisdiction and, instead, deferred to the second arbitration award. The Board, in addressing the Company's deferral request, reached alternative holdings.[7] The Board first held that it did not have to even consider deferring to the second arbitration award because the award was not issued or brought to the ALJ's attention until after the hearing when the record was closed. Alternatively, the Board held that, under the facts of this case, it would refuse to defer. The Company challenges both holdings.

We first address the Board's determination that it need not even consider deferring to an arbitration award issued after the record is closed. Pursuant to a long-standing, discretionary policy, the Board has chosen, in certain situations, to reliquish its jurisdiction and defer to the arbitral procedure established in the parties' collective bargaining agreement. Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080 (1955); Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 N.L.R.B. 837 (1971). This discretionary deferral policy has been noted with approval by the Supreme Court. Carey v. Westinghouse Corp., 375 U.S. 261, 270–71, 84 S.Ct. 401, 408–409, 11 L.Ed.2d 320 (1964).

The Board will consider deferring to arbitration only if the party seeking deferral raises it before the ALJ and states the factors that make deferral appropriate in that particular case. MacDonald Engineering Co., 202 N.L.R.B. 748 (1973), cited with approval in Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel v. N.L.R.B., 618 F.2d 1009, 1015 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 859, 66 L.Ed.2d 801 (1981). The issue presented here is whether the Company's request for deferral, made after the hearing and the closing of the record, but before the ALJ issued his decision, satisfies the notice requirement set out in MacDonald Engineering Co. and approved in Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel.

[5] The ALJ also refused to defer to the first arbitration award rendered on October 25, 1979. The Company does not contest this determination.

[6] Although the Company seeks review of the Board's decision generally, see "Petition for Review" at A. 433, it did not discuss in its brief or at oral argument the Board's conclusion that Hansen's threat to discipline Stief constitutes a violation of § 8(a)(1). Therefore, we do not address this conclusion.

[7] The Board also denied the Company's motion to reopen the record. In light of our approval of the Board's refusal to defer, this denial was appropriate.

Normally, the party seeking deferral must make its request at the first opportunity. As the Board points out, the Company did not notify the ALJ that it sought deferral at the hearing of January 15–16, 1980. Rather, the Company waited until February 21, 1980, at which time the record had closed and the Company knew of the arbitration committee's favorable decision. The Company's failure to request deferral at the hearing or before the record closed, however, is understandable. Generally, a dispute only goes through arbitration once. Although the Company knew the Union had agreed to seek a second arbitration, it did not know when, if ever, such arbitration would occur.[8] Furthermore, had the Company requested the ALJ to defer to the second, pending arbitration proceeding, its request would have been denied. The Board has not in the past deferred to pending arbitration where § 8(a) (1) and (3) has allegedly been violated. General American Transportation Corp., 228 N.L.R.B. 808 (1977). Because the Company was charged with violating § 8(a) (1) and (3), any request for deferral at the time of the hearing would have been futile. Under these circumstances, the Company logically waited until the arbitration occurred and an award issued before it asked the ALJ to defer.

The Company did notify the ALJ of the second arbitration award at the first reasonable opportunity. The Company attached a copy of the second arbitration award to its brief which it submitted to the ALJ on February 21, 1980, just 20 days after the arbitration award was rendered. There was no reason to notify the ALJ any earlier as the ALJ could not be expected to take any action in the case until the briefs were filed.

Because the Company requested deferral before the ALJ issued his decision, the ALJ was given the time and opportunity to consider deferral. Consideration of the deferral issue, in many cases including this one, will not delay resolution of the dispute because the issue can be resolved without reopening the record. If the party seeking deferral (here the Company) fails to present factors supporting deferral, the ALJ, like the Board, may properly refuse to defer.[9] Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel, supra at 1015. Requiring the ALJ and Board to at least consider the deferral request also promotes the Board's deferral policy, a policy the Board voluntarily adopted. Once the policy is adopted, it should be consistently applied. Memorial Hospital of Roxborough v. N.L.R.B., 545 F.2d 351 (3d Cir. 1976); N.L.R.B. v. Silver Bay L.U. No. 962, Int. Bro. of P., S. & P.M.W., 498 F.2d 26 (9th Cir. 1974).

We hold that, under the particular circumstances in this case, the Company's request for deferral, made before the ALJ rendered his decision, satisfies the notice requirement established in MacDonald Engineering Co., supra, and approved in Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel, supra. Therefore, the ALJ and the Board should have considered whether or not to defer to the second arbitration award.

Because we hold that the Board should have considered whether or not to defer, we must review the Board's alternative determination that, if it had to consider deferring, it would refuse to defer. In Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080, 1082 (1955), the Board determined it would defer to an arbitrator's decision if "the proceedings appear to have been fair and regular, all parties had agreed to be bound, and the decision of the arbitration panel is not clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the [National Labor Relations] Act." After applying Spielberg to the facts of this case, Members Jenkins and Penello both concluded, although for different reasons, not to defer because the second arbitration proceeding did not appear to be fair.

The Board's decision that the arbitration proceeding appeared to be unfair can be reversed only if the Board abused its discretion. Hammermill Paper Company v. N.L.R.B., 658 F.2d 155 (3d Cir. No. 80-2499, Aug. 26, 1981). We hold the Board did not abuse its discretion and agree with the rationale presented by Member Penello as to why the second proceeding appears to have been unfair.[10] The arbitration panel consisted only of union and management representatives, both of whose interests appeared to be aligned against Stief. Normally, the Union representatives would adequately represent Stief's interest. Here, however, Stief actively opposed adoption of the proposed collective bargaining agreement which was supported by the Union as well as the Company. Stief had had several disagreements with the Union leadership[11] which further aggravated the relationship between Stief and the Union. Given these facts, the Board did not abuse its discretion in determining that the arbitration proceedings did not appear to have been fair and regular as far as Stief was concerned. Therefore, we affirm the Board's decision not to defer to the second arbitration award.

[8] Even though the ALJ may have known of the likelihood of a second arbitration proceeding since it was included in the settlement agreement submitted to the Board, the Company did not present to the ALJ factors justifying deferral as contemplated by Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel v. N.L.R.B., supra at 1015.

[9] In other cases where the request to defer appears meritorious, the Board may have to reopen the record and permit the opposing party to submit evidence against deferral. This may delay resolution of the dispute.

THE § 8(a) (1) and (3) VIOLATIONS

The Board found that the Company violated § 8(a) (1) and (3) of the Act when it discharged Stief in retaliation for his protected, concerted activities. The Company admits knowing of Stief's efforts to defeat approval of the proposed collective bargaining agreement. These activities are concerted activities carried out on behalf of the Union and its members and so are protected under § 8(a) (1) and (3) of the Act. The Company, however, claims it discharged

Stief for good cause pursuant to Work Rule 6(a). Thus we are presented with yet another case in which the parties disagree as to why the employer discharged an employee.[12] See N.L.R.B. v. General Warehouse Corp., 643 F.2d 965 (3d Cir. 1981); Gould, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir. 1979), cert. denied,—— U.S.——, 101 S.Ct. 247, 66 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980); Edgewood Nursing Center, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 581 F.2d 363 (3d Cir. 1978). As in all such cases "[o]our goal is to find the 'real motive,' NLRB v. Brown, 380 U.S. [278] at 287, 85 S.Ct. [980] at 985 [13 L.Ed.2d 839]; NLRB v. Gentithes, 463 F.2d 557, 560 (3d Cir. 1972) or 'real cause,' NLRB v. Rubber Rolls, Inc., 338 F.2d 71, 74 (3d Cir. 1967)" behind the discharge. N.L.R.B. v. General Warehouse Corp., supra at 972. Both the Board and the courts have struggled to construct a legal framework to aid in the difficult, yet crucial, determination of the employer's actual motivation.

The Company first argues that the Board applied incorrect law. The ALJ applied the so-called "in-part" test under which the employer violates § 8(a)(1) and (3) if only part of the employer's reason for discharge is unlawful.[13] The Board specifically disavowed the ALJ's use of the "in-part" test and applied instead the more stringent test announced in Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 N.L.R.B. 150 (1980).[14] Wright Line defines and allocates the burden of proof for mixed motive cases. To establish a prima facie case, the General Counsel must initially demonstrate that the employee's protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in the employer's decision to discharge. To rebut this, the employer then must prove it would have discharged the employee, even had the employee not engaged in protected activity.

Wright Line, the Company argues, is inconsistent with law of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals as expressed in Edgewood Nursing Center, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., supra, and Gould, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., supra. The language used in these cases could possibly be interpreted as differing somewhat from the Board's shifting burdens approach stated in Wright Line. In Edgewood Nursing Center, Inc. this court explained:

> "[I]f the employee would have been fired for cause irrespective of the employer's attitude toward the union, the real reason for the discharge is nondiscriminatory. In that circum-

[10] See Herman Brothers, Inc., et al., Case No. 14-CA-13123, 252 N.L.R.B. No. 121, at note 3, appendix at 428–29, where this wording is used:

> "Member Penello would not defer to the grievance-arbitration proceedings herein because the interests of both the employer and union members of the joint committee, which has no neutral member, appear to be aligned against the interests of the grievant on the crucial issue of whether the contract should have been ratified. Because of this appearance of bias by the committee, which controlled, presented, argued, and decided the grievance, the grievance proceedings herein do not 'appear to have been fair and regular' as required by Spielberg."

We appreciate the concerns expressed in the last two paragraphs of the concurring opinion, but note that Roadway Express, Inc., 145 N.L.R.B. 513 (1963), was not cited in petitioner's briefs and it appears unnecessary to discuss it.

[11] Stief opposed the Union leadership's decision to have the Union membership ratify the contract by mail ballot (A. 403). "Stief accused [Union Steward] Hubbard of failing to properly represent the Union's members, favoring the Company, engaging in improper conduct by hitting a union member in the mouth, and demanded Hubbard's resignation" (A.406). See note 3 above.

[12] The cases have been referred to as pretextual, mixed, or dual motive cases.

[13] See ALJ's decision at A. 410.

[14] The Board's decision and order is reprinted at A. 427–30.

stance there is no causal connection of any anti-union bias and the loss of the job. * * *

* * * *

"Once a legitimate reason for discharge is indicated, we must determine whether there is substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion that the reason was merely a pretext for the discharge."

581 F.2d at 368. Similarly in Gould, this court stated:

> "[W]here an employee's discharge is prompted by concurrent reasons, some permissible and some not, * * * the Board must find that the permissible reason proffered by the employer is merely a pretext and that in fact the employee was disciplined because of anti-union sentiment."

612 F.2d at 734.

The Company here appears to argue that once it establishes a legitimate reason for the discharge, the burden shifts back to the General Counsel to prove that this reason is pretextual. The Company claims its reason for discharge was not pretextual and that the Board did not require the General Counsel to demonstrate that it was.

We need not decide here whether Wright Line and Third Circuit law differ. Under either test, assuming the General Counsel has proved an unlawful motive, the employer clearly has the burden of proving it had a legitimate reason for the discharge. The Company does not challenge the adequacy of the General Counsel's prima facie case. Rather, the Company argues it met its burden of proof (petitioner's brief at 12-13). The Board, however, reached the contrary conclusion and held the Company had failed to carry its burden of proof, i.e., that the Company's proffered excuse was legitimate.[15]

The question thus presented is whether substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that the Company "has not presented persuasive evidence that it would have discharged Stief for reasons other than his [Stief's] protected activities." Universal Camera Corp. v. Labor Bd., 340 U.S. 474, 438, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). The court's review of the Board's finding in mixed motivation cases is limited; the court will accept all reasonable inferences drawn by the Board even though this court, if it considered the case de novo, might interpret the facts differently. Labor Board v. Walton Mfg. Co., 369 U.S. 404, 405, 82 S.Ct. 853, 854, 7 L.Ed.2d 829 (1962); National Labor Rel. Bd. v. Lewisburg Chairs & Furn. Co., 230 F.2d 155, 157 (3d Cir. 1956).

After reviewing the record presented on appeal, we hold the inferences drawn by the Board were reasonable, and that substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that the Company did not fire Stief for violating Work Rule 6(a). We observe at the outset that the issue of why the Company fired Stief is a close one. Were we to consider the case de novo, we might mark a different decision. See N.L.R.B. v. General Warehouse Corp., supra at 972.

The Company contends it discharged Stief in accordance with Work Rule 6(a). To determine whether the proffered reason for discharge is true, it is necessary to understand both Work Rule 6(a) and the Company's dispatch policy. Work Rule 6(a) provides that an employee who is absent for three consecutive days without notification is deemed to have voluntarily quit. The Company's dispatch policy purportedly requires an employee who has been absent ("booked himself off" or "reported off sick")[16] to call in his availability to work. According to the Company, if the employee fails to call in his availability for three days after an absence, he is deemed to have voluntarily quit under Work Rule 6(a).

The Company argues that because Stief failed to call in his availability for the three days after his October 5 absence, he was properly discharged pursuant to Work Rule 6(a). The Company emphasizes that Work Rule 6(a) is well established and that it had discharged 10 other employees for Work Rule 6(a) violations within the past three years. Because the Company was simply enforcing a well-established Work Rule, it argues it proved it had a legitimate reason for the discharge. United [15] "As * * * Respondent has not presented persuasive evidence that it would have discharged Stief for reasons other than his protected activities, we find in agreement with the Administrative Law Judge that Stief was discriminatorily discharged." (A. 429–30).

[16] The Company in its appellate brief represents that an employee who "is sick or has booked himself off" must call in his availability. Petitioner's brief at 5. "Dispatch Supervisor Hansen testified that drivers who report off sick are required to call in and report their availability" (A. 406).

Parcel Service, Inc., 252 N.L.R.B. No. 145, 105 L.R.R.M. 1484 (Sept. 30, 1980).

The Company's argument misses the point: it is not the applicability of Work Rule 6(a) but rather the applicability of the call-in requirement under the Company's dispatch procedure that is in dispute here. Unless Stief was obligated to call in his availability after his October 5 absence, he could not have been considered "unavailable" and therefore could not have been discharged pursuant to Work Rule 6(a).

The testimony on the call-in procedures under the Company's dispatch policy is conflicting. Stief testified that he understood the Company did not want drivers to call in under any circumstance. Dispatcher Hansen testified that drivers had to call in their availability after reporting off sick. Hansen admitted he was not aware that the drivers had ever been given copies of the Company's call-in procedures. Hansen also admitted that there were departures from the call-in rules from time to time. Indeed, in this case, there appears to be evidence of such a departure. Stief was absent due to illness on October 4. Nonetheless, Hansen called Stief that evening to give him an assignment for the next day, October 5. Thus the record itself demonstrates that the call-in procedure was not applied consistently, at least as to Stief. Yet after Shief's October 5 absence, the Company suddenly insisted that Stief call in his availability. This inconsistency in application justifies the Board's inference that the Company's proffered excuse was not legitimate. We conclude that substantial evidence supports the Board's determination that the Company's excuse for discharging Stief was not legitimate.

We recognize that the Company went out of its way to ensure Stief knew he was to call in his availability. Twice the Company had the union steward call Stief and tell him he was expected to call in. Stief stubbornly refused to do so. Were we empowered to consider the case de novo, this fact might persuade us to conclude the Company had a legitimate reason to discharge Stief. Stief's stubborn refusal to call in his availability works against the peaceful resolution of labor disputes and thus against the primary goal of the Act. Cf. Fibreboard Corp. v. Labor Board, 379 U.S. 203, 211, 85 S.Ct. 398, 403, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964). Such conduct should not be condoned or encouraged. Given this court's limited role of review, however, Stief's dubious conduct is not enough to offset the Board's conclusion, based on other evidence, that the employer did not discharge Stief pursuant to Work Rule 6(a).

Substantial evidence justifies the Board's conclusion that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) and (3). The Company admits it knew of Stief's efforts to have the union membership reject the proposed contract. The Company insisted that Stief call in his availability after his October 5 absence pursuant to a call-in procedure that was not known to Stief and had not been consistently followed by the Company in the past. Dispatcher Hansen threatened to discipline Stief if he attended the counting of the ballots on October 5. This threat constitutes an uncontested, independent violation of § 8(a)(1), thus conveying the "unmistakable overtone of a purpose to discriminate and retaliate because of union membership [or the protected activity]." National Labor Relations Board v. Ferguson, 257 F.2d 88, 89 (5th Cir. 1958). Stief was discharged shortly after the Company learned that Stief had written the anti-contract letter and within three days of the defeat of the proposed contract. The timing of the discharge immediately after Stief engaged in protected activity supports an inference of unlawful motive. N.L.R.B. v. General Warehouse Corp., supra at 971.

The Company's petition for review will be denied and the Board's cross-application for enforcement will be granted.

SEITZ, Chief Judge, concurring: I agree that the Board did not abuse its discretion in refusing to defer to the second arbitration proceeding and that substantial evidence supports the Board's conclusion that the employer violated section 8(a)(1) and (3). Because two members of the Board apparently would not have deferred to the second arbitration proceeding even if they had reopened the record to consider it, I rely on their rationale for not deferring in this case and do not think that it is necessary that I decide whether the Board abused its discretion by not reopening the record. I write separately because I believe the Board's policy of not deferring to an arbitration proceeding in a case such as the present one may be unfair to the employer.

In Roadway Express, Inc., 145 N.L.R.B. 513 (1963), the Board held that it would not defer where, in addition to the absence of an impartial member, it appears from the evidence that the arbitration committee was constituted with members whose interests appeared to be aligned against the grievant. If the grievant had won at arbitration in this case, he would, of course, have been reinstated. When the employer won at arbitration, however, the Board refused to defer. The arbitration proceeding was thus a frustrating, costly hurdle for the employer, and the employer was compelled to participate in a proceeding in which it could not really win.

It is difficult to make principled judgments as to when the interests of the grievant and the union so diverge as to justify not deferring to an arbitration award, but in a day when employees are often hostile to their union and its leadership, the Board's policy of refusing to defer when there is the "appearance" of bias on an arbitration committee may threaten the validity of the decision of many committees that lack a neutral member. The Board may not have fully considered all of the possible ramifications of the Roadway Express doctrine as applied to a case such as the present one. Perhaps the Board will want to reconsider its doctrine, which is designed to promote fairness, to assure that it does not operate in a way that would be unfair to one party.

NLRB v. Slagle Manufacturing Company

658 F.2d 785 (10th Cir.), September 9, 1981—246 NLRB 449

On petition to enforce Board Order

MCKAY, Circuit Judge: After an administrative investigation and a hearing, the National Labor Relations Board overruled a company's procedural objections to an election of the bargaining representative for the company's production and maintenance employees, and certified the elected union. To test the validity of the Board's rulings, the company refused to bargain with the certified union. The Board here is seeking enforcement of its order finding the company in violation of §§ 8(a)(5), 8(a)(1) of the Labor Management Relations Act (29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(5), 158(a)(1)).

All the proceedings below as well as in this court center on the status and activities during the election of an employee named Gann who had been discharged during the course of the union's organizing activities on company premises. Gann's discharge was the subject of an unfair labor practice charge which was pending at the time the election was held. Gann was present at the election to cast his vote. The company argues that the election must be set aside because the company met its burden to show either that Gann, as a union agent or representative, unlawfully engaged in prolonged conversations with employees during the election, or that his activities were so disruptive or coercive that the free expression of the will of voting employees was severely impaired.

The company's first theory on the basis of which it attacks the validity of the election is based on Milchem, Inc., 170 NLRB 362 (1968), in which the Board ruled that any "prolonged" conversations between representatives of any party to an election and voters waiting to cast ballots will invalidate the election without inquiry into the substance of the conversations. The Board reasoned that such conversations carry with them so great a potential for last-minute engineering of unfair advantage that this prophylactic rule is warranted. This strict rule, however, applies only to conversations between parties to the election—union or employer representatives—and employees, not to conversations between employees. The Board apparently "credits employees with the ability to give true weight to the possibly impulsive allegations of fellow employees induced by the heat of the campaign." NLRB v. Sauk Valley Manufacturing Co., 486 F.2d 1127, 1131 n.5 (9th Cir. 1973).

The company's second theory is that an employee's conduct, though not attributable to a party to the election, may become coercive, disruptive, or so aggravated "that a free expression of choice of representation [by voting employees] is impossible" Bush Hog, Inc., v. NLRB, 420 F.2d 1266, 1269 (5th Cir. 1969). The election may be set aside irrespective of party conduct "if the acts [of non-party persons] disrupted the voting procedure or destroyed the atmosphere necessary to the exercise of a free choice in the representation election." NLRB v. Carroll Contracting & Ready-Mix, Inc., 636 F.2d 111, 113 (5th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Claxton Manufacturing Co., 613 F.2d 1364, 1371 (5th Cir. 1980).

In reviewing the Board's resolution of the factual dispute under each of these theories, we must uphold the Board's findings if they are "supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), (f). The company's primary factual contentions are (1) that on election day the union arranged for Gann to attend the pre-election conference; (2) that Gann assisted the union's election observer in checking the polling place; and (3) that Gann engaged in conversation with some of the voters. The Board concluded, however, that Gann had not become an agent or representative of the union and therefore that his conversations were not governed by the strict rule of Milchem. The Board's finding in this regard is amply supported by the record. Neither the union's arranging for an employee to attend the pre-election conference nor the employee's inspection of the polling area conclusively converted that employee into an agent or representative of the union, and substantial evidence on the record suggests that he remained merely a disaffected employee.

The Board further concluded that Gann's conduct was not so clearly disruptive of the atmosphere of free choice during the vote that the election must be set aside. The presence of an election of any employee recently discharged for reasons that could be construed as an unfair labor practice always carries with it the potential for affecting voting choice. Nevertheless, where an employee's discharge is the subject of an alleged unfair labor practice at the time of an election, the employee has the right to be present at and to vote in that election. See NLRB v. Hunter Engineering Co., 215 F.2d 916, 921 (8th Cir. 1954). The point at which this legitimate presence slides over into a clearly disruptive and thus an illegitimate presence which must be held to void the election is essentially a matter of reasonable judgement. Although the outer reaches of a legitimate presence may have been approached in this case, we hold that the record in this case viewed collectively in its component parts contains substantial evidence to support the Board's conclusion that the company did not show those limits to have been exceeded here.

ENFORCEMENT GRANTED.

Northwest Publications, Inc. v. NLRB

656 F.2d 461 (9th Cir.), September 14, 1981—250 NLRB 838

On petition to review Board Order

Before MARKEY,* Chief Judge, United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, WALLACE and SCHROEDER, Circuit Judges

462

MARKEY, Chief Judge: Northwest Publications, Inc. (Northwest) petitions for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). We vacate the order and remand to the NLRB.

Background

Northwest publishes two daily newspapers, The San Jose Mercury and The San Jose News. Robert O'Donnell, foreman of the newsprint warehouse since February 1978, is a member of Teamsters Local 296, Sales Delivery Drivers, Warehousemen and Helpers Union (Union). O'Donnell receives a ten percent pay premium for his duties as foreman. In addition to regular work duties, O'Donnell's position as supervisor requires him to hire employees, set work schedules, determine if part-time help is needed, and assign overtime. O'Donnell also has responsibility for inventory, paper work associated with the newsprint warehouse, and determining work priorities in the warehouse.

Beginning in February 1978, O'Donnell normally arrived at the warehouse thirty to forty-five minutes before the shift officially began. He unlocked the warehouse doors, walked through the warehouse and performed certain preliminary "prestart activities" so that work could begin smoothly when the shift started at 7 a.m. Those activities included one or all of the following: (1) starting a forklift to warm it up prior to the start of work, (2) if there was a truck at the loading dock, he would remove the first two rolls of newsprint and lower a dock plate into the truck, forming a bridge between the truck and the warehouse, (3) turning on the warehouse conveyor to move any newsprint rolls on it to the end of the warehouse. After performing those tasks, O'Donnell would punch in on the time clock. It is undisputed that Northwest did not pay O'Donnell "overtime" for his prestart activities.

*The Honorable Howard T. Markey, Chief Judge, United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, sitting by designation.

O'Donnell received a letter from Union dated April 12, 1979, stating that he had been observed working "off the clock", before starting time, on a number of occasions. Union, asserting that O'Donnell's actions constituted a violation of Union rules and sections 15 and 16 of the collective bargaining agreement between Union and Northwest, notified him to appear for a hearing.

On April 18, 1979, Northwest's Vice President for Employee Relations sent a letter to Union, pointing out that O'Donnell is a foreman, that the off clock work he does is necessary to assure efficient operation of the warehouse, and thus that that work is part of O'Donnell's duties as supervisor.

Acting on the advice of Northwest, O'Donnell did not appear at the hearing. He received a letter telling him he had been fined $250 for his actions, and that $150 of the fine had been suspended, leaving a fine owing of $100. The letter further stated that if he continued to work off the clock the suspended $150 fine would be reinstated. O'Donnell paid the $100 fine under protest.

On May 4, 1979, Northwest filed an unfair labor practice charge against Union, alleging violations of sections 8(b)(1)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act). 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(B).

The NLRB administrative law judge concluded that Union fined O'Donnell solely for performing bargaining unit work off the clock and that there was no evidence that the discipline of O'Donnell involved a dispute between Northwest and Union over the meaning of a contractual provision.

A three-member panel of the NLRB affirmed by vote of 2-1. Northwest petitioned this court for review.

ISSUE

Section 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act makes it an unlawful labor practice for a labor organization or its agents "to restrain or coerce an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances." 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(B).[1] The circumstance in the industry here involved, in which supervisors are also union members, creates a special problem in relation to union discipline.

In Florida Power and Light Company v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO, et al., 417 U.S. 790, 94 S.Ct. 2737, 41 L.Ed.2d 477 (1974) (hereinafter Florida Power), the Supreme Court set forth the standard for determining when union discipline violates the statute. Enroute to its holding that the union did not violate Section § 8(b)(1)(B) of the Act by disciplining a supervisor for performing bargaining unit work during a strike, the Court stated:

> The conclusion is thus inescapable that a union's discipline of one of its members who is a supervisory employee can constitute a violation of § 8(b)(1)(B) only where that discipline may adversely affect the supervisor's conduct in performing the duties of and acting in his capacity as grievance adjustor or collective bargainer on behalf of the employer.

Id. at 805, 94 S.Ct. at 2745. As the Court noted in Florida Power the interpretation of activity that would adversely affect the supervisor's conduct as a grievance adjustor or collective bargainer has significantly expanded since the enactment of the Act in 1947.

[1] It is undisputed that O'Donnell is a supervisor. Neither the administrative law judge nor the Board reached the question of whether O'Donnell was a "representative" within the purview of § 8(b)(1)(B), though the former indicated that he would not so hold if the question were reached. The Board's brief candidly refers to the administrative law judge's express recognition that Board guidance was lacking, citing conflicting authorities. Northwest's brief cites authorities, including Wisconsin River, infra, note 7, indicating that a supervisor having O'Donnell's duties is within § 8(b)(1)(B). Whether a supervisor is currently a representative may not be material if a union's disciplinary action be such as to chill a supervisor's willingness to undertake representative responsibilities, and thus restrain an employer in selecting his representatives. Because § 8(b)(1)(B) would not be implicated at all if O'Donnell were neither a representative nor one against whom disciplinary action would restrain Northwest's selection of representatives, it must be presumed that the Board assumed one or the other fact as true. Like the Board, however, we refrain from deciding the question, taking the case as it is presented and without prejudice to the Board's consideration of the question should it so elect on remand.

For more than 20 years the Board applied Section 8(b)(1)(B) only to cases squarely within the metes and bounds of the statutory language.[2] In 1968, however, the Board extended the reach of that section with its decision in San Francisco-Oakland Mailers Union No. 18 (Northwest Publications, Inc.), 172 N.L.R.B. 2173 (hereinafter Oakland Mailers). In that case, involving the same employer as here, three foremen-members were expelled from the union for allegedly assigning bargaining unit work in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement. Despite the absence of union pressure or coercion aimed at securing the replacement of the formen, the Board held that the union had violated section 8(b)(1)(B) by seeking to influence the manner in which the foreman interpreted the contract.

In "assum[ing] without deciding that the Board's Oakland Mailers decision fell within the outer limits of [the] test"[3] being set forth in Florida Power, the Supreme Court observed:

> In Oakland Mailers the union had disciplined its supervisor members for an alleged misinterpretation or misapplication of the collective-bargaining agreement, > and the Board had reasoned that the natural and foreseeable effect of such discipline was that in interpreting the agreement in the future, the supervisor would be reluctant to take a position adverse to that of the union.

Florida Power, 417 U.S. at 801, 94 S.Ct. at 2743.

In American Broadcasting Companies v. Writers Guild, supra, note 3, the court again recognized that union discipline may have a "carryover" effect which would adversely affect the supervisor's conduct, depriving the employer of the full services of his representative and thereby restraining and coercing the employer in his selection of representatives. Id. at 429, 98 S.Ct. at 2434.

The inquiry into whether union conduct would or might adversely affect the duties of an employer's representative is "necessarily a matter of probabilities, and its resolution depends much on what experience would suggest are the justifiable inferences from the known facts. This seems . . . to be peculiarly the kind of determination that Congress has assigned to the Board. . . ." Id. at 432, 98 S.Ct. at 2435.

An order of the Board will be enforced by this court if there is substantial evidence in the record supporting it. Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 465, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); N.L.R.B. v. Best Products Co., Inc., 618 F.2d 70 (9th Cir. 1980). Fear of an accusation that it is substituting its judgment for that of the Board should not, however, so enervate a court as to substitute judicial abdication for judicial review. N.L.R.B. v. Truck Drivers, Oil Drivers, Filling Station and Platform Workers Union, Local 705, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, 630 F.2d 505, 507 (7th Cir. 1980).

There is no factual dispute between the parties concerning O'Donnell's specific prestart activities. The question before this court is therefore whether the Board applied the correct legal analysis to the facts of record.

In its decisions subsequent to Florida Power the Board has clarified the circumstances under which union discipline has a carry-over effect that impairs the supervisor's 8(b)(1)(B) functions. In Teamsters Local No. 524, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Yakima County Beverage Company), 212 N.L.R.B. 908 (1974) (hereinafter Yakima), the union filed charges against three supervisors for performing bargaining unit work off the clock at the request of a customer. The union charged that the supervisor-members violated the union's bylaws and constitution by breaching a provision of the applicable collective-bargaining agreement because they performed work after regular working hours without prior union consent. The union therein acknowledged that its discipline of the supervisors was directed at the employer's interpretation of the contract, not primarily at the three men as union members. The union fines therefore served to impose upon the company the union's interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement without initiating a grievance procedure. The Board has similarly found violations of Section 8(b)(1)(B) in numerous other cases where the union fine was in fact founded upon a disputed contract provision.[4]

In an attempt to distinguish Yakima and its progeny, the Board first says Union's fining of O'Donnell did not involve the interpretation or application of the collective-bargaining agreement. That assertion falls victim to the undisputed record.

In Union's initial letter to O'Donnell, citing him to appear before its executive Board, O'Donnell was charged with, "violation of Sections 15 and 16 of the contract and the working rules of this Local Union."[5] Sections 15 and 16 of the collective-bargaining agreement relate to the hours of work and wage rates therefor. More specifically, section 15 states that overtime shall be paid for all time worked in excess of 8 hours per day and 40 hours per week. Union's post-hoc efforts to portray the charge as solely a union matter, not involving the employer or the agreement in any way, cannot replace Union's own assertion to the contrary.

Similarly, it will not do to rest decision on the view that there was no employer-union dispute extant when Union's disciplinary action was taken. A major purpose of the National Labor Relations Act, and of the practices evolved under it, is to provide for an organized, and to the maximum fesible extent peaceful, mechanism for resolving such disputes. For a union to by-pass that mechanism, raising no contract interpretation dispute with the employer but proceeding directly to disciplinary action, would defeat that purpose of the Act. Hence, the question is not whether there was an employer-union dispute but whether there should have been. The focus is not on the existence of a dispute but on whether the subject matter involved in the disciplinary action is such as to require its submission to the agreed dispute-resolving mechanism.

Northwest posits that all of O'Donnell's prestart activities are supervisory duties customarily undertaken by his predecessors, "off the clock", without protest by the Union. It is undisputed that O'Donnell's activities are intended to facilitate the actual start of work at the scheduled hour. That action is asserted to be consistent with O'Donnell's supervisory responsibility for the effecient scheduling of work in the warehouse.

The Board says O'Donnell's prestart activities do not constitute a supervisory function, a view inconsistent with Yakima, in which the Board found that the supervisors conduct was "arguably for exercising supervisory or management functions"[6] when they performed bargaining unit work after hours. Thus the Board there recognized that proper classification of the work should be based upon an overall analysis of the activity engaged in by the supervisor during the period for which the discipline is imposed.

Likewise, in other post-Florida Power decisions the Board found a violation of section 8(b)(1)(B) where the work performed was at least in part bargaining unit work.[7]

Of O'Donnell's numerous prestart activities, Union complains only of his removal of print rolls from the truck, for which O'Donnell should have been paid overtime under section 15 of the collective bargaining agreement. In selecting for disciplinary action a portion of O'Donnell's activity, Union reserved for itself the right to unilaterally decide what acts are covered under the collective-bargaining agreement and what acts are supervisory. Such a decision

VACATED AND REMANDED.

Wells Fargo Guard Services, a Division of Baker Protective Services, Inc. v. NLRB

659 F.2d 363 (3d Cir.), September 15, 1981—252 NLRB 55

On petition to review Board Order

Before ADAMS, HUNTER and SLOVITER, Circuit Judges

JAMES HUNTER, III, Circuit Judge: This case is before the Court on a petition filed pursuant to sections 10(e) and (f) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. §§ 160(e) and (f)) by Wells Fargo Guard Services, Inc. ("Wells Fargo") to review, and a cross-application of the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB", "Board") to enforce, an order issued by the NLRB against Wells Fargo. The order directs Wells Fargo to bargain collectively with the United Security Guard Guild ("Guild"), and is based upon the Board's decision that Wells Fargo had refused to bargain with the Guild in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (5)).

Whether Wells Fargo committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain with the Guild depends upon whether the Board's certification of the Guild as the exclusive bargaining agent of the Wells Fargo employees was correct. Wells Fargo contends that the Guild should not have been certified by the NLRB because the Guild engaged in improper conduct in the course of the campaign prior to the election won by the Guild. The NLRB rejected Wells Fargo's contentions during the certification proceedings without holding an evidentiary hearing and refused to reconsider them during the unfair labor practice hearing. We conclude that the NLRB's certification decision should not have been reached without holding an evidentiary hearing on one of the alleged pre-election improprieties. Since the Guild was not properly certified as the bargaining representative, Wells Fargo committed no unfair labor practice when it refused to bargain. Wells Fargo will be granted a hearing as set forth below, the Board's petition for enforcement will be denied, and the case will be remanded to the NLRB.

FACTS

On December 28, 1978, the United Security Guard Guild ("Guild") filed a petition with the National Labor Relations Board requesting that the Guild be certified as the exclusive bargaining agent for the security guards employed at the Lawrenceville branch of Wells Fargo Guard Services ("Wells Fargo"). In a letter sent by the Guild to the security guards in or around November 1978, Harry J. Martin, the president of the Guild, had introduced himself and the Guild to the guards. That letter contains the following paragraph: "Incidently [sic], I have heard rumors to the effect that my character is questionable and some go as far as to say that I am wanted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Well, they have my address and phone number if they want me." Appendix at 165. In a letter dated November 28, 1978 from Wells Fargo to its employees, Wells Fargo included the following as the opening paragraph:

> As some of you may know, Harry Martin, an individual who worked for Wells Fargo as a Field Inspector in 1976, is attempting to form a union and to organize our Trenton Office employees. He is calling his union the "UNITED

[8] The parties here have not asked this Court to consider the correctness of the Board's reasoning or conclusion in Yakima in light of 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(B) and the Supreme Court's decision in Florida Light and Power. We express no view, therefore, on that question.

> SECURITY GUARD GUILD". He has drawn up a constitution and bylaws under which he had had himself named President and his wife Secretary Treasurer. Martin's union does not now and never has represented any employees of any company. He has never previously organized a union and has never negotiated a union contract. To our knowledge he has no experience whatever in organizing or running a union. By his own admission, Wells Fargo is his first target.

Appendix at 167.

On January 12, 1979, a hearing was held before Louis Verrone, Esq., a Hearing Officer of the NLRB, on the question of whether the Guild was in violation of section 9(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, (29 U.S.C. § 159(b)(3)) which forbids affiliations between unions which have guards as members and unions which do not.[1] At the hearing, Harry J. Martin, president of the Guild, testified that he founded the Guild in May 1978 and registered it with the Department of Labor in November 1978. Appendix at 16. At the time of the hearing, the Guild had no members, no funds, and no paid employees. Appendix at 23, 34–39.

Mr. Martin further testified that "I consider that I am the United Security Guard Guild." Appendix at 41.[2]

On January 22, 1979, the hearing officer issued a decision in which he found that the Guild was not in violation of section 9(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act and directed that an election be held. Wells Fargo did not appeal from that decision.

The campaign recommended, and the Guild and Wells Fargo each stated its case in numerous pieces of campaign literature. On or about February 9, 1979, Wells Fargo wrote a letter to its employees on the character and police record of Mr. Martin. Appendix at 178–79. On or about February 12, 1979, Mr. Martin wrote the following in a letter to the guards, defending himself and his character:

> My sincere thanks to the many of you who called me on Saturday to inform me of TITKO'S [the Wells Fargo Branch Manager] latest SMEAR CAMPAIGN * * *.
> First of all, let me set the record straight. I've never RAPED, ROBBED A BANK, STUCK ANYONE UP, MOLESTED, PUSHED DRUGS, KILLED ANYONE OR ROBBED OLD LADIES * * *.
> I am not going to try to defend my mistakes of 20 YEARS AGO, but I will say this, I was not born with a silver spoon in my mouth * * *. I found out [one] thing during this [campaign] BATTLE; I am up against the best PROPAGANDISTS in the business, but the more THEY try to KNOCK ME DOWN, the more DETERMINED I AM TO FIGHT ON. They know that I can never be BOUGHT OFF, so they STOOP LOW to pick the bones of a roguish kid of 20 YEARS AGO.

Appendix at 236.

On or about February 14, 1979, Wells Fargo distributed materials to its employees which included the information that Mr. Martin, under the alias of Harry Meehan, had pled guilty to and been sentenced to jail for felonious assault and robbery at age 18, had been sentenced to jail for auto larceny at age 20, and in 1962 at age 30 had pled guilty to charges of unlawful possession of a gun and assault and battery and been required to pay restitution to the victim. Appendix at 184–89.

A mailed-ballot election was held between February 16 and February 28, 1979. One of the pieces of campaign literature distributed by Wells Fargo at the beginning of that period was a two-page letter accompanied by a one-page sample ballot. Appendix at 104–06. The first page of the letter and the sample ballot were duplicated onto Wells Fargo letterhead, which is printed in blue and red ink. In the letter, George Titko, the branch manager, explained NLRB voting procedures and encouraged employees to vote against the Guild. The sample ballot consisted of a page of Wells Fargo letterhead in blue and red, with the sample ballot duplicated beneath the letterhead. The ballot was marked "sample" across its face, and was designated a sample ballot in printing beneath the ballot itself. Beneath the second sample ballot designation was printed the following:

[1] Section 9(b)(3) provides in part as follows: [N]o labor organization shall be certified as the representative of employees in a bargaining unit of guards if such organization admits to membership, or is affiliated directly or indirectly with an organization which admits to membership, employees other than guards.

Wells Fargo sought to demonstrate at the hearing that the Guild was in violation of section 9(b)(3), and that certain connections between 9(b)(3), and that certain connections between the Retail Clerks International Union (of which Harry J. Martin, a supermarket employee and president of the Guild, was a member) and the Guild constituted a forbidden affiliation.

[2] The other two officers of the Guild, a friend of Mr. Martin's named Pat McCullaugh and Mr. Martin's wife, had been appointed by Mr. Martin as officers so that the Guild could qualify as a bargaining agent. Letter of Mr. Martin to the security guards; appendix at 230–231.

> THANKS FOR YOUR SUPPORT—MARK YOUR BALLOT "NO"!

Beneath that sentence was printed "George M. Titko, Branch Manager." The "no" box on the ballot was filled by an X which, though duplicated like the rest of the sample ballot in black ink, was irregular in shape.

The Guild lost the February 1979 election by eight votes (62 to 54, with approximately 172 eligible to vote and 120 ballots cast). On March 6, 1979, the Guild filed objections to the election, but pursued only one objection: that Wells Fargo had impermissibly distributed a facsimile ballot before the election in violation of the rule of Allied Electric Products Inc., 109 NLRB 1270 (1954).

On March 23, 1979, Arthur Eisenberg, Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board, issued a Supplemental Decision, Order and Direction of Second Election after conducting an investigation and allowing the parties to submit evidence. In his decision, the Regional Director ruled that the distribution of the facsimile ballot rendered the election invalid under Allied Electric. He concluded that the distribution of the facsimile ballot had interfered with the election, particularly in light of the facts that an X had been placed in the "no" box, that the facsimiles had been mailed out on the same day as the real ballots, and that the NLRB has a history of "strict and continuing adherence" to the Allied Electric doctrine. The Regional Director also decided that the presence of the letterhead, the "sample" designations and the partisan message were insufficient to "neutralize" the impact of the facsimile. Appendix at 110–11. He ordered that a second election be held. The NLRB denied Wells Fargo's request for review, and the second campaign began shortly thereafter.

In early April, 1979, Mr. Martin/Meehan wrote a letter to the security guards in which he spoke as follows:

> This will be my last letter to you with deep regret.
> When I began this fight for higher wages, benefits and standards for you, I was under the impression that I had paid a debt to society for being an irresponsible and roguish young man. I can see now that I was under a grave misconception * * *.
> I have tendered my resignation in the interest of all of you, because in order to achieve the high standards I feel you all deserve I will not remain in office to taint what I have fought so hard these many months to achieve for you.
> There is something that does make me happy to tell you, and that is the news of some of the states finest and influencial people who have offered their services in your behalf. They will be made known to you in the very near future. They will act as a board of trustees on a gratis basis, and I am certain that with their aid you will have a real chance for a successful future. You will also have a board comprised of fellow guards who will be acting in your interest.

> Through the publicity gained in the news media during this campaign I was fortunate to have been offered some extremely well paying positions, one of which I will eventually accept. I only regret that I should be the one to benefit from something I started in your behalf * * *

Appendix at 195.

After Mr. Martin's resignation letter (which was signed with his own name) had been distributed, the Guild circulated a letter signed solely by the United Security Guard Guild. That letter read, in part, as follows:

> We are proud and happy to announce a newer and stronger Guild since the resignation of Harry Martin, a man we will all remember and respect for his courage and sacrifice to create a more secure and prosperous future for those of you in the security field.
> The board and members of the committee have allied themselves to carry on the fight for your future benefits. . . .
> The National Labor Relations Board has approved a petition for a new election, based on evidence of foul play on the part of Wells Fargo. It is unfortunate that companies should resort to such tactics, but thanks to agencies such as the N.L.R.B., the rights of the little person are still protected from such unfair practices.

Wells Fargo succeeded in their quest to confuse you, thereby escaping unionization by a narrow margin. We intend to present a more candid picture of your future and benefits. > that they have always defeated unionization. We are going to prove to you that they have misled you and have distorted many issues of vital importance.

Shortly after this letter was sent to the guards, and, according to the letter itself, within a week of the mailing out of official ballots, the Guild, over the signature of Harry Rouse, Secretary-Treasurer of the Guild, sent out the promised letter concerning prior unionization of Wells Fargo. The letter was accompanied by excerpts from a contract represented as being between Wells Fargo and the American Federation of Guards. Appendix at 129–131. In it, the Guild spoke as follows:

> Wells Fargo has been constantly telling you that they have always defeated unionization. We are happy to say that it is not so. The enclosed excerpts of an existing contract between Wells Fargo and the American Federation of Guards will attest to their misrepresentation. The entire contents of the current contract, which has been in effect for quite some time, is to [sic] lengthy to include in this letter, but we are certain that it will express the validity of such unionization, and prove to you that fellow officers from other branches of Wells Fargo are currently enjoying better wages and benefits * * *.
> Those of you who attended the meeting on Feb. 13th were given copies of the bylaws of the Guild, and the majority have agreed that the laws were written to the common benefit of the security officer. They were outlined by a former officer who had great love and respect for his fellow workers * * *.

In a letter dated April 17, 1979, Wells Fargo set forth its version of the contract discussed by the Guild. Appendix at 133–35. Wells Fargo argued that the contract was one between Desert Patrol, Inc. and the American Federation of Guards, and that Desert Patrol was a "small separate corporation" which had already been unionized at the time of its purchase by Wells Fargo.[4] Wells Fargo also stated that the higher wage rates applied only to employees assigned to the Occidental Center, and that they had been negotiated by Wells Fargo and not by the union. The Wells Fargo letter also stated that several other benefits listed in the Guild materials as received by Desert Patrol employees were in fact not as good as the benefits received by Wells Fargo employees.

The second mailed-ballot election took place between April 17 and April 30, 1979. The Guild won the election by a vote of 67 to 59, with 165 eligible to vote and 130 votes cast—in other words, by an eight vote margin, the same margin by which it had lost the first election.

On May 2, 1979, an article appeared in the Trentonian in which Mr. Martin was quoted. He was the only person quoted for the Guild. The article characterized Mr. Martin as a "consultant" to the Guild. Appendix at 197.

Wells Fargo filed three objections to the election: that the Guild had misrepresented Wells Fargo as having engaged in foul play and unfair practices in the first election and had thereby implied that the NLRB supported the Guild (Objection 3), that the Guild had misrepresented the facts about the relationship between Wells Fargo and the American Federation of Guards and the nature of the contract achieved by the Federal (Objection 1), and that Mr. Martin had misrepresented the nature and extent of his relationship with the Guild subsequent to this purported resignation (Objection 2). Wells Fargo also argued that the misrepresentations were material.

The Regional Director conducted an investigation and afforded all parties the opportunity to submit evidence. Despite a request from Wells

[3] In a letter dated April 10, 1979, Wells Fargo had sent to the employees its own version of the events which had led to the ruling that a second election must be held. Appendix at 199–200.

Fargo that he do so, he did not conduct an evidentiary hearing. See appendix at 442. On July 20, 1979, the Regional Director handed down his decision overruling all of Wells Fargo's objections and certifying the Guild. Appendix at 247–58.

On the question of whether the Guild had misrepresented the facts about the American Federation of Guards and Wells Fargo in California (Objection 1), the Regional Director noted that Wells Fargo had itself stated to the employees that Wells Fargo had purchased Desert Patrol's parent, that the Guild's statements about the California contract were either quotations or "adequate paraphases," that the information about wage rates at the Occidental Center was in the form of a photocopy of the actual contract provision and indicated on its face that it only applied to employees stationed at the Center, and that "the information set forth in this material is easily subject to evaluation by the employees themselves." Appendix at 252–53. The Regional Director concluded "that there were no material misrepresentations contained in these documents which warrant setting aside the election." Appendix at 252. In the course of his discussion of the materials in question, the Regional Director referrred to testimony of Henry Rouse and Harry Martin the "former president," proffered by the Guild, concerning the date and content of the letter dealing with the California contract. If they had been called, Messrs. Martin and Rouse would have testified that the letter had been mailed to the guards on or before April 10 or 12, 1979. Appendix at 250.

On the issue of whether the Guild had tainted the second election by accusing Wells Fargo of committing unfair practices in sending out a facsimile ballot prior to the first election (Objection 3), the Regional Director ruled that the Guild's > characterization of the results of that [first] investigation and Decision, while strong in tone, does reflect the Board's earlier determination that the Employer's conduct was improper. Consequently, the characterization of "foul play" in these circumstances, does not warrant setting the election aside, particularly where the Employer had given its own account of the Board's action.

Appendix at 256; footnote omitted.

With regard to Wells Fargo's contention that Mr. Martin had misrepresented his role in the Guild after his purported resignation (Objection 2), the Regional Director took note of Wells Fargo's contention that "the character and personal background of Harry J. Martin was [sic] in issue during the first campaign." Appendix at 254. The Regional Director wrote as follows:

> Rouse and Martin, stated that Martin resigned effective March 1, 1979, and that the letter in question was sent to all bargaining unit employees on March 31, 1979. The Petitioner also asserts that by the date of that letter, it had contacted several individuals to serve on the Board of Trustees * * *.
> It is conceded that the Petitioner did not advise the unit employees, prior to the date of election, who would be serving on the Board of Trustees, "Contrary to the assertion of the Employer that "new management of the Union was never made known to the employees" the Petitioner distributed a letter dated April 17, 1979, listing Patrick C. McCullagh [sic], Joseph Coculo, and Henry Rouse, as president, vice president, and secretary-treasurer, respectively.
> The Board has never, with respect to representation matters, adopted an affirmative requirement for a union to disclose the type of internal information that the Employer asserts should have been distributed to unit employees during the instant election campaign. Based on the above, I am unable to conclude that the statements contained in the Petitioner's letter were likely to confuse or mislead the voters as to the identity of the bargaining agent involved. I find that the fact that Petitioner did not inform the bargaining unit employees of the names of the new trustees, contrary to its statement that it would do so, constitutes the type of practice which is subject to employee evaluation during the election campaign. Noting that what the Petitioner said about the resignation of Harry J. Martin and the establishment of the Board of Trustees was true, and the Petitioner did not have any affirmative requirement to disclose the type of information involved herein prior to the election, I find that his objection does not warrant setting aside the results of the election.

Appendix at 254–55; footnotes omitted.

Wells Fargo filed a request for review of the July 20 decision and certification which was denied by the NLRB. While the petition for review was pending, Mr. Martin, as "advisor" to the Guild, sent Wells Fargo a mailgram dated September 10, 1979 demanding that Wells Fargo send the Guild a list of guards. Appendix at 430. Wells Fargo sent copies of that mailgram to the NLRB; however, they arrived at the Board after the Board had denied Wells Fargo's petition for review and were not considered. Appendix at 432.

Wells Fargo refused to bargain with the Guild in order to obtain judicial review of the certification. On October 23, 1979, the Regional Director issued an Order Consolidating Cases, First Amended Complaint and Notice of Hearing[5] based on the refusal to bargain. Appendix at 293–298. Wells Fargo answered the complaint, raising as defenses the contentions that Harry Martin had remained in control of the Guild throughout, that he had obtained the certification of the Guild by means of representing to the contrary, and that the Guild was in violation of section 9(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act. Appendix at 301–03.

A hearing was held before Edwin H. Bennett, Administrative Law Judge, on November 25, 1979. Wells Fargo sought to introduce evidence going to its affirmative defenses, including a letter dated October 22, 1979, from Robert F. O'Brien, counsel for the Guild, to Mr. Volger of the NLRB which, on its bottom, contains "cc: Harry J. Martin, President." Appendix at 434; exhibit 4 to the November 26, 1980 hearing.[6] The ALJ refused to hear Wells Fargo's evidence and quashed the subpoenas issued by Wells Fargo, on the ground that the issues which Wells Fargo was seeking to litigate had already been or could have been litigated in the context of the prior representation proceedings. The ALJ reaffirmed his decision not to hear Wells Fargo's evidence in his opinion, which he issued on May 9, 1980. Appendix at 439–449. The ALJ ordered Wells Fargo to bargain with the Guild and to post a notice.

Wells Fargo filed exceptions to the decision of the ALJ and petitioned for review of his decision by the NLRB. On September 9, 1980, the Board issued an order affirming the decision of the ALJ except in one minor respect related to the notice. Wells Fargo appealed from that affirmance, and the Board cross-petitioned for enforcement.

DISCUSSION

Because the Board's decision that Wells Fargo was guilty of an unfair labor practice in refusing to bargain with the Guild is premised upon its certification of the second election, we must consider the validity of that certification. Anchor Inns, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 292, 293 (3d Cir. 1981). The Board has "'wide discretion'" in conducting representation elections. Monmouth Medical Center v. NLRB, 604 F.2d 820, 823 (3d Cir. 1979), quoting NLRB v. A. J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330, 67 S.Ct. 324, 327, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946). However, where, as here, an election is close, "closer scrutiny of objections may be required of the Board." Id. at 823 n.4.

The Board overruled Wells Fargo's objections to the second election without holding an evidentiary hearing. A party objecting to an election is entitled to an evidentiary hearing if its objections have raised "substantial and material issues of fact." Anchor Inns, 644 F.2d at 296. If assuming all the allegations by the objecting party to be true would lead to the conclusion that the election should be set aside, then an evidentiary hearing to determine the truth of those allegations is required. Id. Based on this standard, we believe that Wells Fargo's contention that an evidentiary hearing should have been granted with regard to the role of Harry Martin is correct, and remand so that a hearing may be held on that subject.

A. The Role of Harry J. Martin a/k/a Meehan (Objection 2)

The Regional Director, affirmed by the Board, overruled Wells Fargo's objections concerning the alleged continuing role of Mr. Martin in guiding the Guild. He based his ruling on the absence of an affirmative obligation that a union "disclose the type of internal information [about who controls the union] that the Employer asserts should have been distributed to unit employees during the instant election campaign." Appendix at 255; footnote omitted. In addition, after stating the Guild's assertion that the Guild had "contacted several individuals to serve on the Board of Trustees," appendix at 254, the Regional Director stated that "what the Petitioner said about the resignation of Harry J. Martin and the establishment of the Board of Trustees was true." Appendix at 255.

[5] The case with which the refusal to bargain was consolidated was settled and is not at issue in this appeal.

[6] This letter and several other documents were received into evidence by the ALJ "only for my personal convenience in writing the decision so that I have before me, in a single, contained file, the necessary proceedings for reference sake." Appendix at 347.

The Regional Director reached his decision without holding an evidentiary hearing, even though the factual question of whether or not Mr. Martin remained in control of the Guild was disputed. In his analysis of Wells Fargo's contentions, "the Regional Director substituted 'facts' gleaned from his ex parte investigation * * *." Seasonal-All Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 654 F.2d 932 at 939, 940 (3d Cir. 1981), quoting Anchor Inns, 644 F.2d at 297. He should not have done so: material concerning disputed facts gleaned from an ex parte administrative investigation cannot take the place of an analysis of whether, if true, the allegations of an objecting party would warrant setting an election aside. See Season-All Industries, supra at 14–15; Anchor Inns, 644 F.2d at 297. Here, the question of whether Harry Martin remained in control of the Guild was a "substantial and material" issue of fact. Although it may be true that a union has no general duty to disclose information about who is running it, that does not answer Wells Fargo's objection here. Wells Fargo contends that Mr. Martin was himself a campaign issue in the first election, and that his representations about his departure from the Guild were, if false, material misrepresentations which would warrant setting aside the second election. We agree.

1. Materiality

The conclusion that Mr. Martin was himself a material campaign issue in the first campaign follows from a review of the campaign literature distributed by the Guild during the second campaign. The Guild with Harry Martin at its helm lost the first election by eight votes. Shortly after the Regional Director ordered that a second election be held, Harry Martin, in the opening salvo of the second campaign, sent his letter of resignation—his "last letter"—to the guards. His letter clearly implies that he resigned because he did not wish his past record to stand in the way of the Guild. In his letter he also implied that he was on the point of accepting a "well-paying" job elsewhere.

In an unsigned letter to the guards, the Guild, after Mr. Martin's ostensible severance of his ties with the Guild, announced that it was the stronger for Mr. Martin's resignation and that Mr. Martin would be remembered for his "courage and sacrifice." The Guild also stated that "many" of the Wells Fargo employees in the bargaining unit had failed to vote in the election because of the "cleverly devised smear campaign leveled at Martin," and that Wells Fargo had escaped being unionized because its smear campaign had succeeded. Given the Guild's assertions that the "smear campaign" led to a failure to vote on the part of many of the guards and to the Guild's losing the election, the Guild cannot be heard to argue now that Mr. Martin's presence in the Guild was not a material issue in the first campaign.[7]

Mr. Martin sought to remove himself as a campaign issue by ostensibly resigning from the Guild. If, as Wells Fargo asserts, he removed himself in form but not in substance, then he remained as a campaign issue—only none of the voters knew it. At least some of those guards who failed to vote or voted against the Guild in the first election because Mr. Martin was in control of the Guild may have voted for the Guild in the second election under the erroneous assumption that Mr. Martin had severed his ties with the Guild. Mr. Martin's title was irrelevant; his role was not.

Not only did Mr. Martin seek to remove his character from the campaign, but he also sought to remove his inexperience. In the letter in which he announced his departure from the Guild, Mr. Martin also announced that a group of influential citizens had offered their services to the Guild, and that the Guild would be governed by a board of influential people and a board of guards. In a subsequent letter to the guards, the Guild stated that the "board and members of the committee have allied themselves to carry on the fight for your future benefits." The inference follows that the board of influential citizens was in place and looking after the interests of the Guild.

[7] The Guild's assertion that the smear campaign succeeded in deterring some voters receives prima facie support from the fact that 120 guards voted in the first election (Harry Martin present) and 130 in the second (Harry Martin ostensibly absent).

The Board asserts in its brief that "the Union had never represented that Martin had severed all connection with the Union," and that "there was no evidence that the employees themselves were concerned about Martin's presence in the Union; rather, it is clear that it was the Company that made an issue out of who was running the Union during the second election." NLRB brief at 23. Neither assertion is correct.

2. Falsity

Wells Fargo contends that Mr. Martin in fact remained in control of the Guild, even after his purported resignation. In support of its contentions, Wells Fargo points to the following: that immediately after the second election, which the Guild won by eight votes, Harry Martin resurfaced as speaking for the Guild to the media; that it is difficulty to determine who was running the Guild if Mr. Martin was not; and that it was Harry Martin who demanded a list of guards from the Wells Fargo on September 10, 1979.[8] Wells Fargo also cites the October 22, 1979 letter written by Robert O'Brien, Counsel for the Guild, to the NLRB after the Guild had been certified by the Board. Copies of that letter were sent to John F. Cannon, counsel for Wells Fargo, and to Harry J. Martin, "President."

An additional item in support of Wells Fargo's contention that Harry Martin maintained his role in the Guild after his purported resignation emerges from the opinion of the Regional Director. In his opinion, the Regional Director referred to a proffer of testimony which Harry Martin would give to the effect that the letter written by the Guild about the relationship between the California union and Wells Fargo was mailed on or about April 10 or 12, 1979, considerably after the date Mr. Martin claimed to have resigned.

The Regional Director found that "what the Petitioner said about the resignation of Harry J. Martin and the establishment of the Board of Trustees was true." The only bases for these conclusions set forth in the opinion are the Regional Director's findings that Harry Martin had in fact resigned the presidency of the Guild and that the Guild had "contacted" influential citizens. Those findings, however, are not determinative of the objections raised by Wells Fargo. Wells Fargo contends that Harry Martin remained in control. That he did not retain the title of president does not mean that he did not remain in control. An evidentiary hearing is required to ascertain whethe. he in fact remained in control. In addition, the finding that the Guild had "contacted" influential citizens. Those findings, however, are not determinative of the objections raised by Wells Fargo. Wells Fargo contends that Harry Martin remained in control. That he did not retain the title of president does not mean that he did not remain in control. An evidentiary hearing is required to ascertain whether he in fact remained in control. In addition, the finding that the Guild had "contacted" influential citizens does not answer Wells Fargo's contention that the Guild had falsely asserted that influential citizens had offered themselves to the Guild and that the board of influential citizens was in place.

The Regional Director's failure to conduct an evidentiary hearing on the issue of whether Mr. Martin maintained his ties with the Guild was erroneous. In General Knit of California, Inc., 239 NLRB 619 (1978), the Board readopted the rule of Hollywood Ceramics Co., Inc., 140 NLRB 221 (1962), pursuant to which an > election should be set aside only where there has been a misrepresentation or other similar campaign trickery, which involves a substantial departure from the truth, at a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply, so that the misrepresentation, whether deliberate or not, may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on election.

General Knit, 239 NLRB at 620, quoting Hollywood Ceramics, 140 NLRB at 224; footnote omitted. Under that rule, if Mr. Martin in fact remained in control of the Guild after his purported departure, the second election should be set aside. According to the Guild's own campaign literature, Mr. Martin's presence as a guiding force in the Guild was a campaign issue in the first campaign: Mr. Martin/Meehan severed his ties with the Guild in order to leave those who had been affected by the "smear campaign" free to vote for the Guild. If Mr. Martin in fact continued to guide the Guild, his purported resignation was a misrepresentation, a substantial departure from the truth, and might well have had a significant impact on the election, which was close. Wells Fargo, of course, had no opportunity prior to the election to respond to the misrepresentation effective, since Mr. Martin did not resurface until after the election and only the Guild knew the truth.

[8] Because Mr. Martin did not send the mailgram until after the Guild had been certified, the Regional Director did not have the mailgram before him in deciding whether to hold an evidentiary hearing.

Objections 1 and 3 of the Second Election

Wells Fargo also raised objections to the Guild characterization of the events which led to the setting aside of the first election as "foul play" and "unfair practices" on the part of Wells Fargo. However, it is undisputed that Wells Fargo had an opportunity to place its side of the story before the guards; indeed, Wells Fargo apparently explained the need for a second election to the guards before the Guild distributed the materials containing the characterizations to which Wells Fargo objects. In any event, as the Regional Director pointed out in his opinion certifying the Guild, Wells Fargo was in fact found guilty of conduct which required the setting aside of the first election.

Wells Fargo also objected to information disseminated by the Guild concerning the alleged relationship between Wells Fargo and the American Federation of Guards in California. For the reasons given by the Regional Director and set forth supra, this Court affirms the Board in overruling the objections of Wells Fargo to the Guild's analysis of the relationship between Wells Fargo and Desert Patrol.

The First Election

The Regional Director set aside the first election on the ground that Wells Fargo had distributed an altered facsimile ballot. In Allied Electric Products, Inc., 109 NLRB 1270 (1954), the seminal NLRB opinion on facsimile ballots, the Board set an election aside where the union had distributed a sample Board ballot with the word "yes" printed to one side of the "yes" box, an "X" printed in the "yes" box, and an exhortation to place an X in the yes box printed on the bottom of the sample. In the course of its opinion, the Board wrote as follows:

> We find that the reproduction in this case by the Petitioner of altered copies of the Board's official ballot tended to interfere with a free choice in the election, and was improper. We shall therefore set the election aside and order a new election. Upon consideration, the Board has decided that in the future it will not permit the reproduction of any document purporting to be a copy of the Board's official ballot, other than one completely unaltered in form and content and clearly marked sample on its face, and upon objection validly filed, will set aside the results of any election in which the successful party has violated this rule.

Id. at 1272; footnotes omitted.

This Court recently discussed the Allied Electric rule in Monmouth Medical Center, 604 F.2d at 825-27 & n.12, and noted that the rule against distribution of an altered sample ballot has been strictly applied by both the Board and the courts, on the ground that such distribution has a strong tendency to mislead. Thus, this Court will affirm the action of the Regional Director in setting aside the first election. This Court notes in passing, however, that the possibility that the facsimile ballot in this particular case actually misled anyone is small. Among other factors, the ballot was clearly marked as a sample and was reproduced on the distinctive blue and red Wells Fargo letterhead. Thus, in setting aside the first election the Board applied the Allied Electric rule at its most strict, an application warranted in part by the closeness of the election. See Monmouth Medical Center, 604 F.2d at 823 n.4.

The first election, however, was no closer than the second. In ruling that the first election must be set aside, the Board stretched the Allied Electric doctrine to its outer limits. In certifying the results of the second election, the Board adopted a flexible approach in its analysis of objections to the materials distributed by the Guild and possible misrepresentations therein. The strictness of the Board's action in setting aside the first election, when contrasted with its flexibility in certifying the Guild after the second election, supplies a reason in addition to the ones discussed above for a remand of the case to the Board: the Board should have been as strict in examining possible Guild misrepresentations as it had been examining Wells Fargo's alleged misconduct, particularly given that the margins of victory in the two elections were equally narrow.

In sum, this Court affirms the Board's decision to set aside the first election and the Board's overruling of Wells Fargo's first and third objections to the second election (concerning the California union and Guild allegations of "foul play"). This Court remands this case to the Board for an evidentiary hearing on Wells Fargo's second objection (the role of Harry J. Martin/Meehan).[9] The NLRB's cross-petition for enforcement of its order is denied.

NLRB v. Digital Prging System of Toledo, Inc.

659 F.2d 725 (6th Cir.), September 17, 1981—244 NLRB 127

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before KEITH and MARTIN, Circuit Judges, and PECK, Senior Circuit Judge

The National Labor Relations Board is applying to the Court under § 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), to enforce its order against the Digital Paging Systems of Toledo, Inc., issued on April 29, 1980, to cease and desist from unfair labor practices, to reinstate an employee and to bargain with the Union. The Company filed an answer to the application. The application has been referred to a panel of this Court pursuant to Rule 9(a), Rules of the Sixth Circuit. After examination of the briefs and record, this panel agrees unanimously that oral argument is not needed. Rule 34(a), Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

In August, 1978, the Company demoted Carol Van Tuinen from the position of manager to salesperson in the Toledo office. She and the only two other employees in the bargaining unit became concerned over the security of their jobs and contacted a union agent. The three signed union authorization cards. The union agent met with the new manager to demand recognition. The manager began to interrogate Ms. Van Tuinen and the others about their knowledge of the union. On September 19, 1978, Company officials learned of the demand and two days later Ms. Van Tuinen was discharged. The Company thereafter refused to bargain with the Union, which then filed unfair labor charges against the Company.

As a result of the charges, the National Labor Relations Board held a hearing before an Administrative Law Judge. He found that the Company had unlawfully interrogated employees about union activity, improperly discharged Ms. Van Tuinen and refused to bargain with the Union in violation of § 8(a)(5) and (1). The ALJ recommended, inter alia, an order be issued requiring the Company to bargain with the Union.

The Company filed exceptions to the latter two findings. The Board affirmed the ALJ's decision and adopted his recommendations. That decision is reported at 249 NLRB No. 15 (1980).

The standard of review in Board cases is whether the Board's determination is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). Conflicts in the evidence are for the Board to resolve and, if supported by substantial evidence, such resolutions must be accepted by this Court. NLRB v. Pinkerton's Inc., 621 F.2d 1322, 1324 (6th Cir. 1980). The same is true for determinations of credibility. NLRB v. Cement Transport, Inc., 490 F.2d 1024, 1029 n.5 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 828, 95 S.Ct. 47, 42 L.Ed.2d 52 (1974).

Upon review, the Court has examined the record, including portions of the hearing held before the Administrative Law Judge. We find substantial evidence in the record to support the Board's findings of the unfair labor practices listed above. We also find the Board properly applied the guidelines of NLRB v. Gissell Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969) in ordering the Company to bargain with the Union.

Accordingly, enforcement of the Board's order of April 29, 1980, is hereby granted. Rule 9(d)3, Rules of the Sixth Circuit.

On petition to enforce Board Order

[9] New evidence on the 9(b)(3) issue may materialize during the hearing on Mr. Martin's role in the Guild or during the preparation for that hearing. This opinion should in no way be construed as precluding additional exploration of the 9(b)(3) issued by the Board if the need to do so arises.

The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) is applying to the Court under § 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) to enforce its order against Medical Mutual of Cleveland, Inc. (the Company) issued on March, 13, 1980 to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found and to reinstate an employee to her former position. Medical Mutual has filed a cross-application for review and to set aside the order. The application has been referred to panel of this Court pursuant to Rule 9(a), Rules of the Sixth Circuit. After examination of the briefs and record, this panel agrees unanimously that oral argument is not needed. Rule 34(a), Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

In September, 1977, the Union began a drive to organized the Company's employees and, on July 11, 1987, filed a representation petition with the Board requesting a Board-conducted election. By June, 1978, the Company had formed a Communications Committee to combat the Union's organizational efforts among its employees. The Board found a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, in the interrogation attributed to a Company supervisor. At the beginning of a Communication Committee presentation, the supervisor informed the employees in attendance that "if there is anyone here that doesn't want to be fair and hear the other side of this, then you may leave." In response to this statement, employee Mickey Woods did leave and was subsequently confronted by a supervisor about her reason for leaving. The Board found that the remark "amounted to conduct which, * * * compels employees to make a choice or exhibit the depths of their pro or antiuion feelings * * *."

Beginning in May, 1978, Mary Olsen became an active union supporter. On February 27, 1979 she was placed on probation for low productivity. She was given thirty days to improve her performance or face termination. Olsen offered to resign rather than face the pressure of working on probation. However, Supervisors Lencses and Mendolsohn encouraged her to stay on. Mendolsohn told Olsen that there definitely was a place for her, that the matter could be worked out, and that he'd like to see some improvement in her production over the next thirty days. On March 15, Mendolsohn told her that there were indications that her productivity had increased. On March 20, Mendolson told her he would be away from March 21 to 27 and that Supervisor Rosul would meet with her. However, no meetings took place during that period. Olsen was discharged on March 28, two days after a complaint had issued on the charge filed March 7, 1979 and only a few hours after she had refused to postpone the hearing date.

On April 4, 1979 the General Counsel amended the complaint in the Olsen case to include allegations that Medical Mutual discharged Olsen in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act. The Board adopted the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Medical Mutual violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by coercively interrogating Woods about her union activity. The Board also adopted the Administrative Law Judge's finding that Medical Mutual violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act by discharging Olsen on March 28, 1979. The Board's order requires the Company to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices found and from in any other manner interfering with, restraining or coercing its employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. Affirmatively, the order requires the Company to offer Mary Olsen reinstatement to her former position, to make her whole for loss of earnings and to post notices.

The standards of review of Board cases is whether the Board's decision is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, including the body of evidence opposed to the Board's view. Jim Causley Pontiac v. N.L.R.B., 620 F.2d 122, 213 (6th Cir. 1980). This standard of review does not allow the reviewing court to set aside the Board's choice between two conflicting views of the evidence, even though the Court might have reached a different conclusion, if the matter had been before it de novo. Randall v. N.L.R.B., 638 F.2d 957 (6th Cir. 1981).

Upon review, the Court has examined the record, including portions of the hearing held before the Administrative Law Judge. We find substantial evidence in the record to support the Board's findings of the unfair labor practices listed above.

Accordingly, enforcement of the Board's order of April 29, 1980 is hereby granted. Rule 9(d)3, Rules of the Sixth Circuit.

NLRB v. Wilson-Crissman Cadillac, Inc.

659 F.2d 728 (6th Cir.), September 17, 1981—244 NLRB 219

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before KEITH and BOYCE F. MARTIN, JR., Circuit Judges, and PECK, Senior Circuit Judge

This matter has been referred to a panel of the Court pursuant to Rule 9(a), Rules of the Sixth Circuit. After examination of the briefs and record, this panel agrees unanimously that oral argument is not needed. Rule 34(a), Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure.

The National Labor Relations Board (Board) is applying to the Court under § 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), to enforce its order against Wilson-Crissman Cadillac, Inc. (the Company) issued on August 14, 1979, to bargain with the Union and to furnish the Union with requested information about unit employees. The Company has filed an answer to the application. The Company refused to bargain with the Union based on its contention that the Board improperly overruled the challenge to the ballot of Carl Roehling because he was either a supervisor within the meaning of the Act or a managerial employee and was thus ineligible to vote. The Union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board on May 4, 1979. On May 9, 1979 the General Counsel issued a complaint alleging that the Company's refusal to bargain violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. In its answer, the Company admitted its refusal to meet but denied that it violated the Act by so doing in that it maintained a good faith doubt as to the majority status of the Union. On August 14, 1979, the Board issued its decision and order granting the General Counsel's motion for summary judgment and finding that the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to bargain with the Union. The Board's order requires the Company to cease and desist from refusing to bargain with the Union, and from in any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights. Affirmatively, the Board's order requires the Company to bargain with the Union upon request, to embody any agreement reached in a signed agreement, to furnish the Union with the information sought with respect to bargaining unit employees, and to post the appropriate notices.

The standard employed by courts reviewing a Board determination of factual issues is whether its findings are "supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). Upon review of the record it appears that the Board's finding that Roehling is not a supervisory or a managerial employee within the meaning of the Act is supported by substantial evidence.

Section 2(11) of the Act, 29 U.S.C.A. § 152(11) defines "supervisor" in the following manner:

> The term "supervisor" means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

The exercise of any one of the enumerated powers combined with "independent judgment" is enough to make one a supervisor. Walla Walla Union Bulletin v. N.L.R.B., 631 F.2d 609, 613 (9th Cir. 1980). The record supports the Board's finding that Roehling does not have the authority to hire or fire. During the short periods that Roehling is "in charge" of the parts department, he performs routine tasks such as ordering parts when the bin is empty and assigning tasks such as sweeping and emptying waste paper baskets. It appears that he has no control over inventory nor does he participate in formulating or determining policies for the employer with regard to labor relations. It has been held that the mere fact that an employee may give some instructions to others, or that he may command their respect, does not indicate that he must identify with the interest of the employer rather than the employees; the test must be the significance of his judgments and directions. Stop and Shop Companies, Inc., Etc. v. N.L.R.B., 548 F.2d 17, 19 (1st Cir. 1977). There is evidence that Roehling had the title "assistant parts manager" however, the specific job title of the employer is not controlling. Courts must examine the employee's actual job responsibility, authority and relationship to management. Walla Walla Union Bulletin v. N.L.R.B., supra.

The Supreme Court has defined managerial employees as those who "formulate and effectuate management policies by expressing and making operative the decision of their employer." N.L.R.B. v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672, 682, 100 S.Ct. 856, 862, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1979). This Court has held:

> The determination of an employee's managerial status depends upon the extent of his discretion, although even the authority to exercise considerable discretion does not render an employee managerial where his decision must conform to the employer's established policy.

N.L.R.B. v. Retail Store Emp. U., Local 876, 570 F.2d 586, 592 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 819, 99 S.Ct. 81, 58 L.Ed.2d 109 (1978). The record is devoid of any involvement with labor policies by Roehling. His responsibilities are "minor in nature and not tantamount to those of an employee who formulates, determines, and effectuates his employer's policies." Illinois State Journal-Register, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 412 F.2d 37, 41 (7th Cir. 1969).

This Court has held that the finding of the Board must be sustained if it is supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole. N.L.R.B. v. Retail Store Emp. U., Local 876, 570 F.2d at 589. Accordingly, enforcement of the Board's order is granted pursuant to Rule 9(d)3, Rules of the Sixth Circuit, because the questions on which the decision depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument.

NLRB v. Cable Vision, Inc.

660 F.2d 1 (1st Cir.), September 18, 1981; rehearing denied Oct. 7, 1981—249 NLRB 412

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before CAMPBELL, BOWNES and BREYER Circuit Judges

BREYER, Circuit Judge: This case grows out of a labor dispute between Cable Vision, Inc., a subsidiary of AR Telecommunications, Inc., which sells and installs cable television service in Lewiston, Maine, (the "Company") and Local 2327, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO (the "Union"). On January 17, 1977, the NLRB certified the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Company's seven technicians and installers and its one part-time worker. Between February 23, 1977 and April 27, 1978, the Union and the Company held twenty-two collective bargaining sessions. The Union went on strike against the Company from May 1 until June 23, 1978. They did not reach agreement.

The NLRB found that the Company committed several unfair labor practices during this time: it did not bargain in good faith; various of its supervisors in conversations with employees coerced them in the exercise of their organizational rights; and the Company effectively discharged one of its employees because he engaged in union activity. The Board has applied for enforcement of a remedial order[1] based upon these findings.

We have reviewed the record in accordance with the mandate of Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). We uphold findings of fact if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. (Substantial evidence "means such relevant evidence as a reasonable mind might accept as adequate to support a conclusion." Id. at 477, 71 S.Ct. at 459, quoting Consolidated Edison Co. v. NLRB, 305 U.S. 197, 229, 59 S.Ct. 206, 216, 83 L.Ed. 126 (1938)). We sustain the inferences that the Board draws from those facts and its application of statutory standards to those facts or inferences as long as they are reasonable. Soule Glass and Glazing Co. v. NLRB, 652 F.2d 1055, 1073 (1st Cir. 1981). And we will not substitute our judgment for that of the Board when the choice is "between two fairly conflicting views, even though the court would justifiably have made a different choice had the matter been before it de novo." Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. at 488, 71 S.Ct. at 464, 95 L.Ed. 456. Our review of the record in light of these standards convinces us that the Board's findings are adequately supported and we grant enforcement of the Board's order.

[1] The Board's Decision and Order is reported at 249 N.L.R.B. 412 (1980).

I.

The Board found that the Company violated section 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by failing to bargain with the Union in good faith.[2] Rather, in its view, the Company engaged in mere "surface bargaining", or "shadow boxing to a draw", or "giving the Union a runaround while purporting to be meeting with the Union for purpose of collective bargaining". Quoting NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., 275 F.2d 229, 232 (5th Cir. 1960). We have noted that in such a case, > [t]he question is whether it is to be inferred from the totality of the employer's conduct that he went through the motions of negotiations as an elaborate pretense with no sincere desire to reach an agreement if possible, or that it bargained in good faith but was unable to arrive at an acceptable agreement with the union.

NLRB v. Reed & Prince Mfg. Co., 205 F.2d 131, 134 (1st Cir.), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 887, 74 S.Ct. 139, 98 L.Ed. 391 (1953). The record supports the Board's negative answer to the question.

First, the Administrative Law Judge found, and the Board concurred, that the bargaining between the parties was marked by a series of delays caused primarily by the Company. The record supports this conclusion. Indeed, these factors alone go far towards supporting a finding of an unfair labor practice. Only twenty-two bargaining sessions were held over a period of fourteen months—with an average of two weeks and as much as a month passing between each session. The parties averaged only 4½ hours per month at the bargaining table. While this schedule would not be a matter of concern if both parties were pleased with it, such was not the case here. Rather, the Company repeatedly ignored requests by the Union that both the frequency and length of the bargaining sessions be increased and rejected a Union request to accept counter-proposals by mail to expedite the bargaining. Additionally, the record shows that only four of the twenty-two sessions began on time—and most of the delays appear to be attributable to the Company.

Foot-dragging characterized the bargaining process. The Company failed to provide a single written proposal of its own until the fifth session, 3½ months after receiving the Union's proposed agreement. The Company's first proposals on discharge and travel expenses appeared six months into the bargaining. In addition, the Company did not complete data on its health, pension and welfare plan until some three months after the Union's initial request for the information.

At the bargaining sessions, the Company tended neither to accept, reject, nor offer modifications of Union proposals. Instead, it would promise to "study" and "consider" the Union's suggestions, a promise the Company was still freely giving after nearly a year of negotiations during which its own proposals had been submitted and resubmitted with little, if any, change. While an attitude of open-mindedness is a hallmark of good faith bargaining and should be encouraged by both the Board and the courts, the mere statement that a party will "study" and "consider" proposals, repeated ad infinitum and combined with other evidence of deliberate delay, gives the impression of a party which is attempting to avoid rather than to induce agreement.

Second, the Company's positions on the substantive issues debated at the bargaining table suggest a lack of good faith. The parties debated sixteen major subjects.[3] In thirteen of the areas, it was possible to determine what the Company's practice was prior to unionization. In ten of those thirteen, the Company sought an agreement less favorable to its employees than its current practice. It offered less than "current practice" in relation to wage increases, unpaid personal time, standby work on a holiday, tower work, out-of-town expenses, the pension plan, holiday pay for work before and after a holiday, subcontracting, work week schedule, and vacation periods.

[2] Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5), makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees." Section 8(d), 29 U.S.C. § 158(d), states that:

> to bargain collectively is the performance of the mutual obligation . . . to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement.

At the same time, however, this "obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession * * *." Id.

[3] The sixteen priority subject were wages/promotion; seniority-layoff; work week; overtime; grievance and arbitration; call out; standby; paid/unpaid absences; tower work; subcontracting; vacations; holidays; expenses; uniforms; pension, health and welfare; and management rights.

During the next twenty-two months of bargaining, each side made proposals and counterproposals. The record suggests that the Union made important concessions in fourteen areas, while the Company's concessions seem minor. In the area of "seniority", for example, the Union initially sought seniority within job classification, two weeks notice and severance pay if there was a lay-off, laying off by seniority with part-time employees and subcontractors going first, recall rights for two years, and a two-week period for a recalled employee to return to work. The Company proposed a lay-off principle that would allow it to keep part-time employees and subcontractors while laying off bargaining-unit members according to length of service and according to "ability and skill to perform in the judgment of the Employer"; it proposed recall rights for three months, and permitted three work days for a recalled employee to return to work. The Union later modified its proposals to allow the employer to use skill and ability in considering whom to lay off; it withdrew its requests for notice and severance pay; and it reduced its demand for recall rights to six months with a ten day period for the recalled employee to return to work. The Company met these modifications by offering to increase its proposed "three work day" return period for a recalled employee to five days. It made no further offer.

In most key areas the Company remained immovable. With the exception of "grievance procedure", it did not accept any change during the negotiations that would have made the employees better off in any significant respect than the firm's "current practice". It did not change its position on wages or insurance. (Indeed, the Company would not offer to give its employees the annual wage increase that was its current practice, despite significant union modifications of its initial wage request.) It made no counterproposal on the issue of "uniforms". It remained firm as to the essential aspects of its position on a pension plan, call-outs, and sick leave. It insisted upon an extensive management rights clause, which would have significantly curtailed the Union's general powers, and it also insisted upon specific individual restrictions upon such Union activities as grievance arbitration. In sum, the record suggests little meaningful response by the Company to the Union's offers and counteroffers—to the point where, after twenty-two months of bargaining, the parties reached agreement on only one subject: tower work.

While "[a]damant insistence on a bargaining position. * * * is not in itself a refusal to bargain in good faith", Chevron Oil Co., Standard Oil Co. of Tex. Div. v. NLRB, 442 F.2d 1067, 1072 (5th Cir. 1971), and use of a company's relative economic strength to exert pressure on a union "is of itself not at all inconsistent with the duty of bargaining in good faith", NLRB v. Insurance Agents' Union, 361 U.S. 477, 490–91, 80 S.Ct. 419, 427–28, 4 L.ED.2d 454 (1960), the failure to come close to agreement accompanied by a failure to make meaningful concessions on nearly every subject suggests that something is awry. One major function of collective bargaining is to allow the parties—union and management—separately to order their priorities and then to meet and trade off what is less important for what is more important to each side individually. D. Bok and J. Dunlop, Labor and the American Community 225 (1970). Thus, one would ordinarily expect meaningful trading and movement—even within the confines of a fixed management budget—particularly when as many as sixteen different complex subject matters are on the table. When no such movement occurs, one wonders why. And, if management has adhered uniformly to proposals predictably unacceptable to the Union, has refused to make meaningful concessions in nearly every area, and has insisted (without clear justification in principle) on maintaining its original positions in these areas (and the Union has not), one has some evidence for concluding that the Company has engaged in surface bargaining instead of bargaining in good faith.

These Board findings on both procedural and substantive matters are supported in the record. They justify a Board finding of failure to bargain in good faith. The circumstances present here are sufficiently close to those at issue in Reed & Prince, 205 F.2d at 131 (employer's delay of initial bargaining session, refusal to allow union to post routing notices to members, unjustified delay in providing requested information, adamant refusal to consider key terms without a principled reason, and presenting a seriously deficient and one-sided "proposed contract") as to warrant a similar result. See K Mart Corp. v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 704, 704–07 (9th Cir. 1980). NLRB v. Wright Motors, Inc., 603 F.2d 604, 608—10 (7th Cir. 1979). See also Alba-Waldensian, Inc., 167 N.L.R.B. 695 (1967).

II.

The Board also found that several conservations between two company supervisors, Walter Radvon and Ronald Hammaker, and various employees interfered with, restrained, or coerced the employees in the exercise of their rights to organize, join unions, bargain collectively, and strike, in violation of the Act, Section 8(a)(1).[4] In determining the likely effect of these conversions, the Board correctly examined the employer's remarks "from the listener's point of view", Hendrix Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 321 F.2d 100, 105 (5th Cir. 1963), taking into account "the economic dependence of the employees on their employers" and "the necessary tendency of the former, because of that relationship, to pick up intended implications of the latter that might be more readily dismissed by a more disinterested ear." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 617, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1941, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). We believe the conversations were such as to justify a Board finding of violation.

One conversation took place in Cable Vision's office about a year after the Union's certification. Radvon, a supervisor working for Montachusetts Cable, another of AR Telecommunication's subsidiaries, spoke to Richard Vallee, a Cable Vision employee. Radvon told Vallee that Cable Vision's employees were unhappy but Montachusetts' employees had no union and were happy. He stated that if Cable Vision's employees dropped the Union there would be changes. He added that he had once been a member of a union, which had wanted only money and was no good. In response to Vallee's question about what specific changes he might expect if the union were dropped, Radvon replied that he could make no specific promises or say that there would be a raise. The ALJ found that, in context, Vallee might reasonably have believed Radvon to promise impliedly that working conditions would improve if the Union were dropped. His refusal to give a specific promise did not demonstrate the absence of an implied, general promise. While Radvon did not work for Cable Vision, he was a supervisor at another AR Telecommunications subsidiary; hence his views expressed in a converation were bound to carry weight. The degree of weight and the likely interpretation to be given to Radvon's statements depends upon context, and an ALJ is likely to understand that context better than is a reviewing court. Though the issue is a close one, given the deference due the Board on this type of question, a majority of the court [5] upholds its finding that Radvon gave an implied, general promise to remedy employee grievances or provide other employee benefits if the Union was abandoned, in violation of section 8(a)(1). NLRB v. Pilgram Foods, Inc., 591 F. 2d 110, 114–17 (1st Cir. 1979).

Another conversation took place in early 1978 when Hammaker, the Company's Director of Operations, rode with employee Lucien Mailhot on his service route. Mailhot apparently brought up the subject of union negotiations. After avoiding the subject for a while, Hammaker asked Mailhot why he had voted for the Union. In response to Mailhot's complaints about management, Hammaker said that management had been changed and that matters would have improved, but now that there was a union "it was going to take some time". Hammaker asked for other comments. Mailhot complained about the firm's policy concerning uniforms. Hammaker noted that there was a new manager, but that Mailhot's complaint about the Company's charge for uniforms would have to be negotiated through the Union. Mailhot asked about his annual raise; Hammaker responded that he would probably not get it "because things had to remain status quo because of the Union."[6] Hammaker asked what the employees wanted and what they hoped to achieve through the Union. Mailhot said that the employees would not give up. Hammaker assured Mailhot that the Company would not penalize him if he dropped the Union. And, with Mailhot reiterating his support for the Union, the conversation ended.

[4] Section 8(a)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), makes it "an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees", in the exercise of their section 7 rights to organize and to engage in protected concerted activities.

[5] Judge Campbell believes that there is not substantial evidence to support the Board's finding in this regard, and would reverse on this particular matter.

[6] Hammaker testified at the hearing before the ALJ that the employees received merit raises each year, "give or take three months."

Again, the issue is a close one. But, on balance, we believe that the ALJ, primarily responsible for judgments as to credibility, see NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., Inc., 517 F.2d 1108, 1112 (1st Cir. 1975), could reasonably conclude that this conversation contained elements of restraint, interference or coercion, in that Hammaker drew Mailhot out about his grievances and implied that they might be resolved were there no union, NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d at 114–15. Hammaker impliedly (and wrongly) blamed the Union for a decision to withhold a wage increase, NLRB v. Otis Hospital, 545 F.2d 252, 255–56 (1st Cir. 1976).[7] And, Hammaker delved into the strength of Mailhot's union sympathies, id. at 256–57; NLRB v. Sandy's Stores, Inc., 398 F.2d 268, 270 (1st Cir. 1968).

Finally, employee Ralph Caron testified that Hammaker and Vallee met him on the job in January 1978. When Carson complained about the lack of a raise, Hammaker said that he could do nothing about it because "there would be outside influences." In response to a question by Caron about his uniform, Hammaker noted that his men at Montachusetts did not pay for their uniforms but Cable Vision's employees did pay. The ALJ, reasonably crediting Caron's assertions over Hammaker's denials, see NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., Inc., 517 F.2d at 1112, found that these responses constituted a wrongful effort to blame the Union for the employer's decision to withhold the wage increase, NLRB v. Otis Hospital, 545 F.2d at 255–56, and an implied promise that a grievance might be resolved were the Union given up, NLRB v. Pilgrim Foods, Inc., 591 F.2d at 114–15. In sum, we believe in the case of each of these conversations that the ALJ's findings and the Board's decision to adopt those findings were within the confines of the statute and adequately supported in the record.

The most questionable of the Board's determinations is its finding that the Company violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3)[8] of the Act when it assigned installer Donald Jandreau to standby duty. During his years with the Company Jandreau worked during his off-hours as a musician at various night clubs, mostly on weekends and an occasional week-night, with each engagement lasting for three or four hours. He also attended rehearsals about twice a week for three to four hours. Jandreau testified that during some months, his income from his musical work exceeded his earrings at the Company. His musical activities were reported in the Company's November-December 1977 newsletter, and Company Supervisor Jim Palmer attended some of his performances. Jandreau refused to accept the standby duty, requiring night and weekend availability, and resigned from the Company. This, in the Board's view, amounted to his "constructive" discharge by the Company and discriminated against him on account of his union activity.

In a dual motive case such as this one, initial inquiry is whether the Board has made a prima facie showing that a "significant improper motivation" underlay the Company's action. Statler Indus., Inc. v. NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666, 671 (1st Cir. 1979). Such a showing can rest either on independent evidence of antiunion animus or on the circumstances surrounding the conduct itself. Id. at 670. Here we find both sorts of evidence.

First, there is evidence that, prior to Jandreau's assignment, the Company did not assign employees with his limited technical abilities to standby work. The Company installs and maintains cable television systems. It stands ready to respond to emergency calls from its customers. Such calls may reflect a problem with a television set in a customer's home, with the wires connecting that set to the outside trunk lines, or with parts of the cable television "system" in the area outside the home. But, since the Company usually dispatched standby workers to the field only after three service calls from an area were received, usually, or at least often, emergency work involved a "system" problem. Those who, like Jandreau, were primarily installers could deal with fairly simple problems related to fine-tuning the television set, to its installation, and to the home/

[7] See generally NLRB v. Patent Trader, Inc., 415 F.2d 190, 199 (2d Cir. 1969) (where wage "increase were given pursuant to normal Company policy", failure to grant the usual increases during negotiations may be held to constitute "punitive action" by the Company against those engaging in union activities.)

[8] Section 8(a)(3), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3), provides in relevant part that "[i]t shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer by discrimination in regard to * * * any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization."

trunk wire connections. But, they were not able to deal with most "system" problems. Rather, "system" problems were ordinarily dealt with by technicians, who could service system amplifiers, transformers, relays, main trunk lines, and deal with more complex electronic problems. Thus, it is not surprising that the Company's standby roster originally contained the names of technicians and those installers who had received technician-type training, but not Jandreau.

Second, there is evidence that Hammaker, who assigned Jandreau to standby duty, knew that Jandreau held a job as a part-time musician, that standby duty and musical duty would prove incompatible, and that Jandreau was, therefore, likely to quit. Indeed, Jandreau told Hammaker that Hammaker's predecessor had promised him when he was hired that he would not have to work standby as an installer.

Third, Jandreau was an important figure in the Union. He was chief union steward, the leading organizational activist, the employee representative at contract negotiating sessions, and the most active employee on the picket line.

Fourth, Hammaker assigned Jandreau to standby duty on June 26, 1978, three days after the strike ended. He also incorrectly implied to Jandreau that he was without power to change Jandreau's assignment.

Fifth, the Company's activities during the negotiation sessions and its practices described earlier in this opinion provide some evidence of an antiunion animus.

We think these factors suffice to establish a "significant improper motivation" for the standby duty assignment. The burden therefore shifts to the Company to "prove that it had a good reason, sufficient in itself, to produce" the assignment. Statler Indus., Inc., v. NLRB, 644 F.2d at 905, quoting NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d at 671. This shift does not impose an overall burden upon the Company of proving itself "innocent" of violating the statute. Rather, it must simply come forward with enough evidence to convince the trier of fact that, under the circumstances, there is no longer a preponderance of evidence establishing a violation. NLRB v. Amber Delivery Service, Inc., 651 F.2d 57, 69 (1st Cir. 1981). We believe the ALJ—the trier of fact—could reasonably conclude that the Company here failed to do so.

In its efforts to show that it would have assigned Jandreau to standby duty anyway—regardless of any "antiunion motive"—the Company produced evidence that two "installers" had been placed on the standby roster even before the strike, that Jandreau was able to carry out many technical repairs, that technological developments had made "emergency" repairs easier to carry out, that the Company placed eight other installers (hired during the strike) on the standby roster after they had been employed for eight weeks, and that Jandreau was able to "trade" his standby duties with other employees.

The ALJ found this evidence insufficient to overcome the prima facie case for several reasons. First, the two employees previously on the standby roster, while called "installer", had significantly more technical training than Jandreau and were effectively "technicians". Second, the technological developments took place in late 1977 (or January 1978 at latest); no change in the nature of the emergency work had taken place since that time; yet the Company did not put installers on standby duty until it approached Jandreau in June. Third, while Jandreau was able to perform many repairs, he had significantly less ability to make "system" repairs than all others who had previously been placed on standby duty. Fourth, (despite the strong support that he assignment of eight other installers to standby duty apparently offers the Company's argument) the eight "strike replacement" workers were not placed on the standby roster until well after Jandreau was placed there (thus calling into question the value of their assignment as objective evidence). The record is silent as to the extent of their technical training. And, during the strike itself, when the Company may have been hard pressed for personnel to perform emergency work, it did not assign installers to standby duty, but, rather, relied upon one technician to perform emergency work.[9]

The record provides evidence in support of the claims and findings by both the Company and the

[9] The Company argues that during the bargaining the Union agreed, with no objection from Jandreau, to permit all "qualified" employees to perform standby. But that fact does not show that Jandreau expected to be called to standby because, presumably he did not think of himself as "qualified" to do such work.

ALJ. After reviewing it, we would state our conclusion on this issue with caution: although we might not have decided this issue as did the Board were we viewing the matter de novo, we cannot say that there was no substantial evidence supporting the ALJ's, and subsequently the Board's, finding that the evidence of "significant improper motivation" outweighed the evidence of proper motive produced by the Company. Therefore, we accept the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice.

For these reasons, we grant enforcement of the Board's order.

NLRB v. Local 825, A.B.C.D. International Union of Operating Engineers

659 F.2d 379 (3d Cir.), September 18, 1981

On motion for assessment of fines against union

Before SEITZ, Chief Judge, and ROSENN and HIGGINBOTHAN, Circuit Judges

381

SEITZ, chief Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) moves this court for an order assessing a fine against Local 825, A.B.C.D. International Union of Operating Engineers (Local 825). The Board alleges that Local 825 disobeyed judgments entered by this court in 1963, 1966, and 1971. The Board also contends that Local 825 failed to comply with a purgation order entered in 1970 after this court found Local 825 in contempt. After the Board filed its motion, this court appointed a master to hear evidence and make recommended findings of fact and conclusions of law. The master found that Local 825 had not disobeyed this court's judgments and purgation order, and he therefore recommended that the Board's motion be denied. The Board filed exceptions to the master's report which we now address.

I. FACTS

The Board's orders, as enforced by this court, direct that Local 825 cease and desist from coercing neutral employees, or from restraining neutral employees, with an objective of causing any neutral employer to cease doing business with a party to a labor dispute. See. e. g., Local 825, International Union of Operating Engineers, 138 N.L.R.B. 279 (1962), enforced, 322 F.2d 478 (3d Cir. 1963). In 1970 this court found Local 825 in contempt for having violated the court's 1963 and 1966 decrees. See NLRB v. Local 825, International Union of Operating Engineers, 430 F.2d 1225 (3d Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 976, 91 S.Ct. 1200, 28 L.Ed.2d 326 (1971). The court directed that Local 825 purge itself of its contempt by, inter alia, complying with the decrees. The order also provided that Local 825's failure to purge itself of contempt would result in compliance fines of $10,000 for each violation of the decrees and of $1,000 for each day that such violation continued. See NLRB v. Local 825, 430 F.2d at 1229–30. The Board alleges that Local 825 violated this court's judgments and purgation order by engaging in secondary boycott activity at an East Brunswick, New Jersey jobsite during the period from July 19 to July 30, 1979, and at a Jackson Township, New Jersey jobsite on September 5 and 6, 1979.

A. East Brunswick Jobsite

The East Brunswick jobsite is a twenty-five acre commercial development located on Route 18 in northern New Jersey.[1] The rectangular-shaped development runs along Route 18 for approximately 2,000 feet, with the main entrance in the middle of the development. A turn on Route 18 (the "jughandle") is located a short distance to the east of the main entrance.

R. H. Drukker & Co. (Drukker), a nonunion general contractor, had a contract with Sigmacon Corp. (Red Lobster) and the Hartford Company (Hartford) to do site development work in East Brunswick on land owned by Robert Lehmann.[2] Red Lobster's property ran along Route 18 approximately 400 feet from the western end of the jobsite of a point halfway to the jughandle. A sign facing Route 18 announced: "Red Lobster Restaurant coming soon."

Drukker completed the initial site preparation for Red Lobster during the week of July 15, 1979. By [1] Unless otherwise indicated, the facts set forth in this opinion either were found by the master or are supported by uncontradicted documentary and testimonial evidence.

[2] The Board did not except to the master's reference to Lehmann as "developer and owner" of the East Brunswick jobsite. Indeed, the Board's brief also refers to Lehmann as "owner of the site," citing the master's finding for that point. We see no reason to question this statement of fact if the parties do not.

July 19 Red Lobster was ready to proceed with the construction of its building, and Drukker had moved to the Hartford section in the center of the jobsite, several hundred feet behing the jughandle and about 500 feet from the Red Lobster project. Although a part of the Red Lobster-Drukker contract was yet to be performed, Drukker did not expect to start this work for approximately a month. Therefore, it was not scheduled to perform any work for Red Lobster during the period between July 19 and July 30.

The Board claims that at 6:30 a.m. on July 19, Drukker's employees arrived for work at the Hartford jobsite and encountered between sixty and seventy-five Local 825 members picketing along Route 18. The picket signs carried by the Local 825 members stated that Drukker's employees were receiving "Less Than Local 825's Wages And Conditions[.] We Have No Dispute With Any Other Employer At This Site." Virtually all of the pickets were concentrated along Route 18 from the jughandle to the western end of the Red Lobster property. As a result, they covered the entire southern perimeter of the Red Lobster jobsite, including Red Lobster's entrance to its jobsite, which was located about 100 feet east of its western boundary off Route 18. When the pickets arrived, Durkker's equipment was parked along Route 18, but it was moved to the Hartford site that night and remained there for the rest of the period in issue. Picketing continued through July 30. As many as thirty pickets arrived at 6:00 a.m. each day, but by 8:00 a.m. only about fifteen pickets would remain along Route 18.

On the day the picketing began, Herve Goyette, job superintendent for Red Lobster, asked T. Allen Jones, a Local 825 business agent, why Local 825 was picketing along the perimeter of the Red Lobster jobsite. Jones replied that Drukker was working on the Red Lobster jobsite and had a large contract to do work for Red Lobster. Goyette than told Jones that Drukker's work was completed "at that time" and that Drukker was therefore no longer working on the Red Lobster jobsite. Goyette asked Jones whether he would remove the pickets if Goyette gave him a letter stating that Drukker was not working on the Red Lobster jobsite. Jones replied that if Goyette "could get a letter [Jones] would present it to his people and they would see what would happen." Goyette did not produce the letter.

On July 26, two public utility vehicles arrived at the Red Lobster jobsite to connect the electrical service for Red Lobster. An employee of Drukker testified that the pickets located along the Route 18 frontage "converged" on the trucks as they were turning into the Red Lobster jobsite. The trucks pulled onto the shoulder of Route 18 and left about one-half hour later without having entered the jobsite.

On July 30, Goyette asked Jones whether Red Lobster could proceed with the installation of the foundation for its building if it did not employ nonunion personnel. Jones stated that Red Lobster could proceed, but emphasize that he would extend the picket line back to the Red Lobster location as soon as he saw Drukker working on the Red Lobster jobsite. Jones then pulled the pickets away from the Red Lobster entrance, and work began on the restaurant for the first time since July 19.

A Denny's Restaurant (Denny's) was also being build on the East Brunswick jobsite, but Denny's did not have a contract with Drukker. When the picketing began, Denny's was ready to lay its foundation. Denny's jobsite was located in the middle of the project going from east to west. On July 27, William Castongue, job superintendent for Denny's, saw a truck with a delivery for Denny's drive to the entrance of the jobsite. Castongue saw the driver stop, get out of his truck, and speak to the pickets. Castongue explained that he was unable to hear the conversation between the driver and the pickets because his jobsite was located too far away from the roadway. The truck did not enter the jobsite, and the delivery was not made to Denny's.

On that same day, Castongue spoke to Jones and asked him "what it would take" for Denny's to be able to "proceed with the project." Jones told Castongue that Denny's could proceed only if it used union people on the job. In reply to Castongue's question whether Local 825 would let Denny's concrete and backhoe people through the picket line if they were union members, Jones replied in the affirmative. He added, however, that "the first time that Drukker put a piece of equipment on [Denny's] job site he'd throw pickets around it." After Castongue agreed to use only union personnel, Denny's masonry subcontractor began work on the Denny's jobsite.

B. Jackson Township Jobsite

D. T. Leeds, Inc. (Leeds), a nonunion plumbing and heating contractor, and Arthur J. Ogren, Inc. (Ogren), a general contractor, had separate contracts with the Board of Education of Jackson Township to do work at Goetz Elementary School. On August 27, 1979, pickets appeared at the jobsite carrying signs stating that Local 9 of the Plumbing and Fitters Union (Local 9) had a dispute with Leeds. As a result of this picketing, Leeds set up separate entrances: one was reserved for the employes and suppliers of Leeds; another was set up for the employees and suppliers of all other contractors and employers. The sign establishing the gate reserved for Leeds read: "Entrance No. 2. This entrance for employees, subcontractors, suppliers of D. T. Leeds, Inc. All others use Entrance No. 1." The sign for the neutral gate read: "This entrance not to be used by employees, subcontractors and suppliers of D. T. Leeds. All others use entrance 2." Leeds sent letters to the unions, including Local 825, and to the other contractors engaged on the job, advising them of the establishment of the separate gates and indicating their location. Leeds also informed all of its suppliers that a separate gate was being set up for their use.

On September 5, Local 825 members carrying signs indicating that Leeds did not pay Local 825's area standard wages and benefits picketed the neutral gate. Ogren job superintendent Charles Cox testified that when he arrived at the neutral gate a business agent for Local 825 told him that he would be crossing a picket line if he entered the jobsite. Cox saw the sign identifying the neutral gate behind the business agent, but he did not go to work that day. In the absence of Cox, no work was done on the Ogren job. Chester Hagenbarth, an Ogren officer, testified that he was unable to drive onto the jobsite because the pickets blocked his path. Hagenbarth testified that when he asked the pickets why Local 825 was present, he was told that it was "supporting" the "plumbers' and pipe fitters' efforts to punish the owners for hiring a nonunion contractor." Hagenbarth left the jobsite without entering. Between four and six Local 825 members without picket signs were present across the street from the neutral gate on several occasions after September 5. At no time did Local 825 picket the reserved gate.

II. DISCUSSION

Rule 53(e)(2) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides that "the court shall accept master's findings of fact unless clearly erroneous." Although the rule literally applies solely to the district courts, we think it should be applied here by analogy. Accord, OCAW v. NLRB, 547 F.2d 575, 580 (D.C.Cir. 1976), cert denied, 431 U.S. 966, 97 S.Ct. 2923, 53 L.Ed.2d 1062 (1977); NLRB v. Remington Rand, Inc., 130 F.2d 919, 952 (2d Cir. 1942). Nevertheless, "the mere fact that a [master's] finding is supported by substantial evidence does not prevent its being overturned if the reviewing court, with due regard for the master's opportunity to judge credibility, 'is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been committed.'" OCAW, 547 F.2d at 580 (quoting United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 333 U.S. 364, 395, 68 S.Ct. 525, 541, 92 L.Ed. 746 (1948)). Although the Board would have had to meet the easier burden of "preponderance of the evidence" if it had chosen to proceed against Local 825 in an administrative unfair labor proceeding, in this civil contempt proceeding the Board must establish by "clear and convincing proof" that Local 825 violated the underlying decrees. NLRB v. Local 825, 430 F.2d at 1230.

Local 825 was engaged in primary disputes with Drukker and Leeds. Accordingly, it was entitled to bring pressure to bear upon Drukker and Leeds, but not upon the secondary employers at the East Brunswick or the Jackson Township jobsite. See NLRB v. Denver Building & Construction Trades Council, 341 U.S. 675, 692, 71 S.Ct. 943, 953, 95 L.Ed. 1284 (1951). To establish a violation of the decrees, the language of which tracks the wording of section 8(b)(4)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(B) (1976), the Board must show that Local 825 induced or encouraged a cessation of work by employees or suppliers of a neutral employer with an object of forcing a neutral employer to cease doing business with another employer. See, e. g., Carrier Air Conditioning Co. v. NLRB, 547 F.2d 1178, 1188–89 (2d Cir.

1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 974 97 S.Ct. 2940, 53 L.Ed.2d 1072 (1977). To aid in discerning the fine line that often separates primary and secondary picketing, the Board in Sailor's Union of the Pacific (Moore Dry Dock Co.), 92 N.L.R.B. 547 (1950), established evidentiary standards that, while not absolute, are nevertheless helpful in determining whether an object of picketing at a common site was to induce a secondary boycott. Under these standards, picketing may be primary if it (1) is limited to times when the primary employer is present at the common site; (2) is limited to places reasonably close to the location of the primary's work; and (3) discloses clearly that the dispute is with the primary employer. See id. at 549.

A. East Brunswick Jobsite

The Board challenges the master's legal conclusion that Local 825 engaged in lawful picketing of Drukker from July 19 through July 30, 1979. The Board also specifically excepts to many of the factual findings made and inferences drawn by the master in support of his legal conclusion. We need not address the many exceptions individually, however, because the dispute appears to break down into three principal issues that we believe are determinative of this motion for contempt: (1) whether the master was justified in not finding Local 825's picketing in front of the Red Lobster jobsite to be unlawful; (2) whether the master erred in finding that Local 825 interfered with the delivery of supplies and services to the secondary employers; and (3) whether the master correctly concluded that Jones' statements to Goyette and Castongue did not constitute threats and coercion within the meaning of the decrees.

Local 825's picketing in front of the Red Lobster jobsite was not unlawful, because it did not have a secondary boycott as an object of the the picketing. The Board directs our attention to evidence in the record indicating that Local 825 intended not only to inform the public of its dispute with Drukker, but also to enmesh neutral employers in the dispute. This evidence consists of (1) the physical blocking of the entrance to the jobsite; (2) the presence of pickets on July 27 despite July 26 telegrams informing Local 825 that Drukker would not be working on the 27th; (3) the intimidatingly large number of pickets early in the morning relative to the small number of neutral subcontractors; (4) the smaller number of pickets present during normal business hours when informational picketing would seem most effective; and (5) the continued presence of the pickets at Red Lobster even after Jones had been informed of what may have been an obvious fact—that Drukker was not working there.

The master found that about fifteen pickets generally remained on Route 18 during business hours. We cannot find a record basis for disagreeing with the master's determination that this number was "not excessive or unreasonable" given the dimensions of the jobsite. Nor do we think that the master was clearly erroneous in using the number of pickets present at 8:00 a.m.

rather than the number of those present at 6:00 a.m. in assessing Local 825's object. The master could reasonably infer an object to inform the public of the primary dispute from the 8:00 a. m. figures and an object to inform the primary employer's employees from the 6:00 a. m. figures.

Furthermore, the fact that Drukker was not working on the Red Lobster jobsite during the picketing is not determinative of object. Red Lobster and Drukker remained under contract throughout the period at issue. Drukker had completed an initial phase of work immediately before the picketing, and it had another phase scheduled within a month. On the first day of picketing, Drukker still had equipment on the Red Lobster jobsite. Goyette had indicated to Jones on July 19 that he would produce a letter confirming his assertion that Drukker was no longer working for Red Lobster, but no letter was produced. Moreover, even when we review the master's finding as a legal conclusion and not as a factual determination, we do not believe that the Board has satisfied its burden of proving by "clear and convincing proof" that Local 825 was motivated by an unlawful object in picketing the Red Lobster jobsite.

We also are unable to disagree with the master's conclusion that Local 825's conduct was not "threatening" or "coercing". The master found both that the pickets did not interfere with the installation of Red Lobster's electrical service on July 26 and that there was insufficient evidence to show that the pickets were responsible for turning away Denny's suppliers. The statutory words "induce or encourage" include every form of influence and persuasion. See IBEW v. NLRB, 341 U.S. 694, 701–02, 71 S.Ct. 954, 958, 95 L.Ed. 1299 (1951). Thus, the convergence of the pickets on the utility trucks might support an inference that the truck drivers were restrained or threatened. An equally permissible inference that the drivers simply asked the pickets what was going on and decided to support the union's efforts, however, can be drawn from the fact that the truck drivers pulled onto the shoulder and talked to the pickets. There was testimony that most of the truck drivers did not stop and converse with the pickets, but instead slowed down, saw the picket line, and kept on going. We do not believe on this record that the master clearly erred in drawing the inference that the drivers were neither threatened nor coerced, and certainly the evidence is not clear and convincing proof that the pickets actually coerced the drivers.

Finally, the Board argues that the direct threats made by Jones to Denny's and Red Lobster support a finding of coercion. Jones cautioned Goyette that he would "throw the picket [line] up" if "any nonunion people" returned to work, but he agreed to remove the pickets if Red Lobster used union personnel on the job. Goyette testified, however, that he understood that Local 825 would have to picket Drukker wherever Drukker worked, even if Drukker worked on the Red Lobster jobsite. He also admitted that nether Jones nor Local 825 ever "threatened" him. Indeed, to say that the union threatened Goyette seems to penalize Local 825 for attempting to comply with the Moore Dry Dock standards for primary picketing. See 92 N.L.R.B. at 549. Jones' statements to Castongue are more difficult to justify: Drukker had not worked for or had any contract with Denny's, and Jones' statements might be seen as a warning to avoid Drukker. It is not clear, however, that the statements made by Jones were anything other than indications of what the union would do if Drukker came onto the Denny's jobsite. Because Castongue initiated the conversation, we are not convinced that the master erred when he refused to find that these conversations constituted "threats" within the meaning of section 8(b)(4)(ii).[3]

In sum, we do not think that the Board proved clearly and convincingly that Local 825 had a secondary boycott as an object of its picketing, that it coerced employees or suppliers of neutral employers not to cross its picket line, or that Jones threatened either Denny's or Red Lobster with an object of preventing their contracting with Drukker. The master made the findings of fact that are essential to support his conclusions, and the Board's evidence does not "leave us with the definite and firm conviction" that the master's findings were wrong.

B. Jackson Township Jobsite

The Board challenges both the master's conclusion that the picketing of Leeds by Local 825 constituted lawful area standards picketing and the master's factual findings supporting that conclusion. Analysis of this challenge also breaks down into three issues: (1) whether the master correctly concluded that Leeds failed to establish and post a reserved gate by the time the picketing began; (2) whether the master correctly determined that the union did not hinder secondary employees from entering the common jobsite; and (3) whether the master erred when he refused to find that the union's posting of observers after September 5 indicates that the picketing had a secondary object.

It is well established that a general contractor may, "by the use of separate gates for the purpose of ingress to and egress from the jobsite, lawfully force the union to picket only those 'separate gates.'" See Local 519, United Association of Journeymen v. NLRB, 416 F.2d 1120, 1125 (D.C. Cir. 1969). The master, however, found (a) that the sign posted at the neutral gate was confusing and that a neutral gate was not established; (b) that Leeds may have continued to use the "neutral" gate; and (c) that the record did not prove that the sign identifying the neutral gate was posted on September 5 and 6 when the picketing commenced.

[3] The Board suggests that Local 825 violated this court's decrees and established an unlawful picket line as evidenced by conversations between Rhine Drukker and Jones. In these conversations, Jones allegedly indicated that "there would be trouble" for Drukker if he did not sign a contract with Local 825. The union also allegedly undertook this picketing with only a minimal investigation of Drukker's wage and benefit schedule. The Board further argues that police assistance was necessary to enable Drukker representatives and owner Robert Lehmann to enter the jobsite. Whether these incidents constitute illegal conduct need not concern us here. The Board admits that Local 825 had a primary dispute with Drukker, and this conduct certainly does not violate this court's injunctions against secondary boycotting. Nor do we believe that the incidents with Drukker indicate that Local 825 had a secondary object. The fact that Lehmann was also hindered in entering the jobsite may be evidence of a secondary object, but given the evidence indicating solely a primary object, we do not think this evidence is determinative of the issue.

It does not appear that the misleading signs actually confused anyone, but as David Leeds, who posted the signs, admitted, the sign at the neutral gate did not authorize anyone to use the gate. Moreover, it is not clear that the sign at the neutral gate was posted when Local 825 commenced picketing at the Jackson Township jobsite. The sign identifying the neutral gate was torn down on September 4. There is evidence in Cox's log, although its meaning is disputed, indicating that no sign was posted on the morning of September 5 when Local 825 started picketing. Cox testified that he was "99.9 percent" certain that the sign was up when he arrived for work at 7:45, but because the picket line was already up by that time, his testimony would not necessarily indicate that the sign was posted when the picketing commenced. Some of the Board's evidence indicates that the sign was not posted until 7:15 a. m., well after the picketing had begun. In light of this evidence, we cannot say that the master clearly erred in concluding that the gate was not established and that the sign was not up at the critical time.

There was conflicting testimony whether Local 825 picketed on September 6. At one point in his testimony Cox stated that he saw Local 825 picketing at the neutral gate only on September 5, but he elsewhere said that he went through a picket line on September 6 to get his tools. One Local 9 member testified that September 6 was the only time that he saw Local 825 picket at the neutral gate. Thus, it is not clear that Local 825 picketed on more than one day, and it was not unreasonable for the master to refuse to find that picketing began on that day after the sign was reposted.

We agree that the absence of the primary employer's employees at the gate picketed is evidence of a secondary object. See NLRB v. Local 254, Building Service Employees, 359 F.2d 289, 292 (1st Cir. 1966). In Brown Transport Corp. V. NLRB, 334 F.2d 30 (5th Cir. 1964), in which the picket signs made clear that picketing was directed only to the employees of the primary employer and no one else, see id. at 31, the court held that "[t]here is simply no excuse for picketing where the message is seen by neutral employees of neutral employers but is not seen at all by the employees of the primary employer," id. at 39. That, however, is not the situation here. The picketing in this case was aimed at informing both the public and Leeds' employees of the wages and benefits received by the employees. Although Leeds argues that it did not use the neutral gate, there is some suggestion in Hagenbarth's testimony that Leeds' "people were using [the] main gate during the time [the] project was shut down by picketing." Thus, we do not think that the Board has shown by clear and convincing evidence that Local 825's picketing was motivated by a secondary object.

The master found that no one was prevented from entering the jobsite. This finding is fully supported by the record. For example, there is evidence indicating that Local 825 pickets merely informed Cox that he was crossing a picket line. As to Hagenbarth, it is true that when he turned into the site "he could not continue without running [the pickets] over." On the other hand, after talking to the pickets and learning that Cox was not there, Hagenbarth admits that he "just backed out because there was no reason for [him] to be there," not because he was prevented from entering. The Board fails to show that the master clearly erred when he found that Ogren's employees were not restrained from entering the jobsite. While a picket line certainly "induces" employees not to cross, informational picketing is permissible. We do not believe that the Board has proved by clear and convincing evidence that this informational picketing was somehow more coercive than other area standards picketing.

Finally, the Board offers as further proof of Local 825's unlawful object its patrolling without signs across the street from the neutral gate for several weeks after the picketing. There is no requirement that pickets carry signs. The Board argues that "signal picketing," that is, activity that acts as a signal to neutrals that sympathetic action on their part is desired, is unlawful. See Bridge Workers Local 433 v. NLRB, 598 F.2d 1154, 1158 and n.6, 1159 (9th Cir. 1979). It is not clear, however, that the observers here were doing anything other than ensuring that Leeds did not use the neutral gate. The observers were not wearing picket signs; they did not identify themselves as Local 825 members; they did not stop anyone from entering the jobsite; they did not talk to anyone; and they were across the street, at least thirty to thrity-five feet away from the main gate.

Although some of the Board's many objections to the master's findings of fact may be meritorious, we believe that the master made the findings that are essential to uphold his conclusions and that those findings are not clearly wrong. As with the East Brunswick jobsite, we do not believe that the Board has shown error in the master's conclusion that the evidence failed to prove clearly and convincingly that Local 825 has violated the underlying decrees. Thus, we adopt the master's report with its recommendation that Local 825 not be adjudged guilty of civil contempt.

III.

The Board's motion for sanctions will be denied.

Rosenn, Circuit Judge, dissenting: I respectfully dissent because I believe the Board proved, by clear and convincing evidence, a classic case of illegal secondary activity and deliberate violations of this court's previous judgments and its purgation order of October 8, 1970. I have a definite and firm conviction that the Master was mistaken with respect to several critical findings of fact and that his conclusions of law run counter to firmly established principles governing secondary boycotts and common situs picketing. Accordingly, I would reject his recommendations and adjudicate Local 825 is further civil contempt and require it to take the steps in purgation requested in the Board's motion.

I.

A. East Brunswick

The Union's purported "area standards" picketing of R.H. Drukker & Co. ("Drukker") occurred at what was to become the East Brunswick Plaza, a complex of service establishments and office buildings being developed by Robert Lehmann. The Special Master, the Union in its brief to this court, and now the majority have all treated the entire Plaza project as a single jobsite and have accordingly applied principles relevant to common situs picketing to this aspect of the case. I will discuss my views on those principles and their application in Part II of this opinion and for the moment I mention only what I consider to be a serious factual error on which the "common situs" approach is apparently predicated.

In his Finding No. 12, the Master states that "Drukker * * * was engaged in site preparation work at the East Brunswick site, under contract with, inter alia, [Hartford, Red Lobster] * * * and Robert Lehman [sic], developer and owner of the site * * *." The Master's transcript references to this statment provide no support for the assertion that the entire Plaza tract was owned by Lehmann, and the record reveals a contrary set of facts. Both Rhine Drukker and Castongue, General Superintendent for Denny's, testified that Lehmann did not own the entire tract, but that Denny's and others owned their own development sites. Further, statments made by Herve Goyette, Field Superintendent for Red Lobster, are consistent with the notion that Red Lobster owned the property on which it was building its restaurant.

I therefore believe that this case centers around Union activities on no less than three worksites: Denny's, Red Lobster's, and Hartford. Such an approach is consistent with the geographic features of the development project. The entire Plaza tract fronted on Route 18 for 2000 feet. Red Lobster's frontage accounted for only one-fifth of the total. Denny's was located behind Red Lobster and had no frontage on Route 18. The Plaza tract was divided into ten parcels (Red Lobster and Denny's being located on two of the smallest), in addition to parcels reserved for Lehmann's use for landscaping and water detention sites. The Hartford property, the largest parcel in the development, was 500 feet away from Red Lobster and, like Denny's, had no Route 18 frontage.

Contracting for construction on each of the foregoing sites proceeded separately and independently. Red Lobster engaged R.H. Drukker & Co. ("Drukker") to do the initial site preparation work for a restaurant building. Drukker commenced the work on July 5 and completed it by July 19. It thereupon moved to the Hartford site and accordingly, the Master found that "by July 19, Drukker was working on the Hartford (McIntosh Motor Inn) section of the site, behind the jughandle located approximately in the center of Route 18 frontage." (Finding No. 13)

On July 13, Allen Jones, business agent for Local 825, while driving along Route 18, became aware of Drukker's presence on the Red Lobster site and inquired of the job superintendent "who Drukker was," and the nature of the operation. Leaving his business card, he left word for Drukker to get in touch with him as soon as possible; otherwise, there would be trouble. (Finding No. 14) Although Drukker's superintendent had only a two man crew and two pieces of equipment (Finding No. 13) [1], when they arrived for work at the Hartford job site on July 19, there were between 50 to 70 pickets patrolling the entire 400 foot length of the Red Lobster property, including Red Lobster's exclusive entrance to the site. The picket signs, printed in red and black lettering, but with Drukker's name inserted lightly in ink, gave notice that Drukker's employees "at this site are receiving less than Local 825's area standard wages and conditions."

Although Drukker was expected to return to the Red Lobster site in about a month to pave, it did no work for Red Lobster, nor was it scheduled to perform any work, between July 19 and July 30. Its superintendent and two employees and two pieces of equipment were engaged only on the Hartford site during this period. Nonetheless, the pickets continued to patrol each morning thereafter along Route 18 from the "jug handle" to and including the entire length of the Red Lobster site. After the first day 30 to 40 pickets appeared each morning when the men reported for work, diminishing to about 15 by 8:00 A.M. with 5 or 6 pickets at the rear entrance to the development.

When Goyette, Red Lobster's job superintendent, arrived at the Red Lobster site on the morning of July 19, he sought Jones out and informed him that Drukker's work was complete "at that time" and that it was no longer working on the Red Lobster site. When Rhine Drukker, a principal of Drukker, learned of the picketing on July 19, he arranged to meet Jones the following day. At that time Jones asked Drukker about the extent of its work on the East Brunswick development and if he, Jones, could put some of his own men to work. When Drukker indicated concern for the jobs of his employees, Jones said it "would really be impossible" for Drukker's employees to gain admission to Local 825 and that the work would have to be performed by their members. Drukker claims and Jones denies that Jones thereupon gave Drukker a copy of the Local 825 labor contract and requested him to sign it. Although the Master found there was such a meeting between Drukker and Jones, he made no findings as to what was discussed. Nor did he make any findings concerning Drukker's unchallenged testimony that later that morning Jones again asked Drukker to sign a contract with Local 825.

Picketing continued daily until July 30. Goyette again spoke to Jones on July 30 and inquired whether Red Lobster could proceed with the installation of the foundations for its building if it did not employ non-union labor. Jones replied in the affirmative but warned that he would "throw pickets up" once he saw any non-union workers on the Red Lobster site. Thus, with this parting admonition, construction of the Red Lobster building commenced on July 30.[2]

Red Lobster's masonry subcontractors, scheduled to lay the foundations for the building during this period, were unable to perform any work on the job site from July 19 until July 30 because of the picketing. Although the Master made this finding, he also found (Finding No. 22), in the face of evidence to the contrary, that there is "an absolute void in the record on the part of the Board to prove that some violation on the part of Local 825 resulted in the failure of the masonry contractor to appear." However, Goyette testified that the mason-

[1] Drukker's two pieces of equipment (a bulldozer and compactor) were parked along the Route 18 frontage when the pickets arrived but they were moved later in the day to the Hartford site where they remained for the period between July 19 and July 30. Although the Master made a finding to this effect (Finding No. 13), he subsequently made an inconsistent finding "that defendant continued to have his equipment on the job site (July 27)." (Finding No. 24) ry contractor was unionized and that he would not cross the picket line "and even if he did, then he would be unable to receive any concrete." Goyette also testified that on the morning of July 25, while he was in the trailer office, he was threatened by a large man from the picket line who swore at him and verbally abused him. Because of his fear of bodily injury, he did not return to the job site the next day and remained away until July 30. Goyette conceded that when he showed up on the job site on July 26, the pickets permitted him to pass through, although they did administer a verbal tongue lashing. One of the pickets on the Red Lobster premises called Goyette a "bald headed queer bastard and you come outside and I'm going to beat your goddamn head in." On July 25, public utility vehicles arrived at the Red Lobster site to make the electrical installation. "[T]he pickets converged on the two vehicles and they pulled off onto the shoulder of Route 18" and after waiting a half hour they decided to leave without entering the site.

On July 11, 1979, CBR Developments, a wholly owned subsidiary of Denny's, broke ground on the East Brunswick development for a new facility. The work was to be performed by subcontractors but Drukker was not one of them; it had not performed any work for Denny's. The Denny's site was about 300 feet from the Red Lobster property. On July 19, pickets also appeared at the Denny property and returned daily to picket. Concrete, door frames, and other material bound for the Denny construction were turned away. On July 27 Denny's job superintendent, Castongue, spoke to Jones and asked him "what it would take" for Denny's to be able to "proceed with the project." Although Denny's had no relationship whatsoever with Drukker, Castongue testified that Jones told him that the only way Denny's was going to do any work was if it "used union people on the job. He was very adamant about that and repeated that we would have to be union all the way."

Although the Master found that "Local 825 had a labor dispute at the East Brunswick site only with Drukker," (Finding No. 28) the Master concluded that there was no credible evidence that the pickets were responsible for the turning away of Denny's suppliers. He reached this conclusion by holding that direct evidence of what the pickets said to the truckdrivers was necessary to find inducement. After Castongue agreed to use union labor only, Denny's masonry subcontractor commenced work on Denny's site for the first time since the picketing began.

B. The Jackson Township School Site

In the spring of 1979, Leeds, a non-union contractor, commenced plumbing and drainage work and Ogren, a general contractor, undertook general construction work on an addition to the Goetz School pursuant to a contract with the Township Board of Education. Because of picketing by Local 9, Plumbers and Pipefitters Union, and by Local 8-9 of the International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators, commenced about the end of August, Leeds set up separate entrances at the Goetz School, reserving one exclusively for Leeds and its suppliers (entrance No. 2) and designating the other entrance (entrance No. 1) for all other subcontractors and suppliers. Simultaneously, Leeds sent letters to the two locals, the school board, and the other contractors notifying them of this action and fixing the location of the gates. On August 27 Leeds wrote to its suppliers informing them of its separate entrance on the Trenton-Lakewood Road accompanied by a map and a request to use this entrance No. 2 for all deliveries. On August 29 Leeds wrote to Local 825, the school board, and all other contractors giving notice of the separate gates, and advising them that the entrance "now in use by all contractors will remain in use and be designated No. 1 to be used by all other contractors, etc., but not by D.T. Leeds, Inc." The letter concluded with a request that Local 825 picket Leeds at entrance No. 2.

The Board's evidence pertaining to the picketing at the school site is unrefuted; Local 825 did not present any evidence. This evidence establishes that on September 5, Local 825 picketed the neutral gates on Patterson Drive with signs stating that Leeds did not pay Local 825 area wages and standards. When Cox, Ogren's job superintendent, arrived at the site on the morning of September 5 and found Local 825 picketing the neutral entrance, he stopped at the picket line. White, a business agent for Local 825, came over, introduced himself, and told Cox he would be crossing a picket line if Cox went to work. Cox withdrew and returned the next day to get his tools to work elsewhere. In his absence, no work was performed by his work crew under the Ogren contract. Furthermore, Ogren's subcontractors failed to work. When Cox returned for his tools on September 6, he again saw pickets at the neutral gate.

When Hagenbarth, an officer of Ogren, arrived at the neutral gate on September 5, he saw 15 to 20 pickets at the entrance. The pickets occupied the roadway to the entrance and thereby obstructed his ability to enter the job site. When he inquired of the pickets why Local 825 was there, he was informed that it was "supporting the plumbers' and pipefitters' efforts to punish the owners for hiring a nonunion contractor." Hagenbarth drove around to the Leeds' reserve gate and found pickets there from the two other locals. However, Local 825 never picketed this reserve gate. After September 6, four to six members of Local 825 lingered across from the main (neutral) gate without signs where they sat on their cars. Although the language on the gate signs was inartistically drafted, the undisputed evidence is that it left no confusion among the employees on the job site as to which gate they were to use. The gate signs were torn down on September 4, but were restored by Leeds' foreman, Alessandrini, about 7:15 A.M. on September 5.

II.

The decrees entered by this court in 1963 and again in 1966 against Local 825 prohibited, inter alia, the Local, its officers, agents, and representatives from "inducing or encouraging any individual" employed by any employer to engage in a strike or refusal in the course of his or her employment to transport or otherwise handle or work on any goods or materials or perform any services; "or threatening, restraining, or coercing any employer where, in either case, and object thereof is to force or require * * * any employer or persons to cease doing business with * * * any other employer or persons."[3]

On October 8, 1970, we entered a further decree against Local 825, its officers, agents, and representatives enforcing another order of the Board adjudging them in civil contempt for having violated the court's decrees entered in 1962 and 1963 and directed Local 825 to purge itself of the civil contempt. NLRB v. Local 825, International Union of Operating Engineers, 430 F.2d 1225 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 976, 91 S.Ct. 1200, 28 L.Ed.2d 326 (1970). Thereafter, on October 27, 1971, this court entered an additional decree enforcing another order of the Board issued February 13, 1967. Our order of October 27, 1967, barred Local 825, its officer, agents, and representatives from > inducing or encouraging any individual employed by * * * any * * * person engaged in commerce or an industry affecting commerce to engage in a strike or a refusal in the course of his employment to perform any services; or threatening, forcing, or restraining * * * any * * * person engaged in commerce or industry affecting commerce, where, in either case, an object thereof is to force or require * * * any * * * person * * * to cease doing business with * * * any other person.

Because of serious Congressional concern over the coercive involvement of third parties in labor disputes not their own, Congress in 1959 amended the National Labor Relations Act by adding section 8(b)(4)(B), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(B):

> This concern was focused on the "secondary boycott" which was conceived of as pressure brought to bear, "not upon the employer who alone is a party [to a dispute] but upon some third party who has no concern in it" with the objective of forcing the third party to bring pressure on the employer to agree to the union's demands.

NLRB v. Local 825, International Union of Operating Engineers, 400 U.S. 297, 302–03, 91 S.Ct. 402, 405–06, 27 L.Ed.2d 398 (1971) (footnotes omittted).

Local 825 ostensibly picketed the Red Lobster and Denny's construction sites to inform Drukker's employees and the public, according to the picket signs, that workers "operating power driven construction equipment at this job site are receiving less than Local 825's area standard wages and conditions." But there is no evidence in this record that Local 825 had any reliable basis for this information. It failed to verify with Drukker or any reliable source the information it was disseminating.[4] Furthermore, Denny's had not engaged Drukker to do any work for it; it had no contract with Drukker. None of Drukker's equipment was on Denny's property, nor were any of its employees. If the picketing was purely informational and not intended to induce or encourage anyone performing services for Red Lobster or Denny's to cease doing so, picketing nevertheless continued at the Red Lobster site even after Drukker had completed the first phase of its work there and had removed all of its equipment. For the following period of 11 days, a period when only the masonry subcontractor, Troy Stifler, was scheduled to lay the foundations, the pickets appeared daily en masse. If this was simply innocent informational picketing, one must ask how Local 825 can account for 50–75 pickets massed along Red Lobster's 400 foot front, particularly when the primary contractor and his employees were no longer there? Even if they were, the presence of 50–75 pickets reveals more than an informational purpose, especially when the employer had only two employees and a supervisor on the site to be informed. The picketing effectively shut down the Red Lobster and Denny's construction as the subcontractors refused to work and the suppliers refused to cross the picket line.

[3] This court enforced a broad order entered in 1963 against Local 825, NLRB v. Local 825, International Union of Operating Engineers, 322 F.2d 478 (3d Cir. 1963), when general counsel for the NLRB excepted to the narrower order of the trial examiner in the proceedings reported in Local 825, International Union of Operating Engineers, 138 NLRB 279 (1962). The Board agreed with General Counsel that a broad order was necessary "because of the extent to which [Local 825 and the named officers] have demonstrated a proclivity to engage in unlawful secondary activities in furtherance of their disputes with these and other primary employers." Id. at 280 (footnotes omitted).

As alluded to earlier, I believe the Master, the Union, and the majority rely improperly on principles applicable to common situs picketing in gauging the legality of the Union's actions in this case. The picketing at East Brunswick Plaza affected ongoing work at no less than three independently owned job sites, each of which was under development by separate general contractors. Two of those contractors and owners had no contacts with the primary employer during the time the pickets were patrolling their job sites. To sustain the legality of the Union activity affecting Red Lobster and Denny's is no different, in my view, from announcing a rule of law authorizing a labor organization to shut down construction on a group of homes being built separately by individual owners merely because the Union has a dispute with an electrician wiring someone else's home across the street. It requires little sustained consideration, and no citation of authority, to realize that such a result completely frustrates Congress' intent in enacting section 8(b)(4)(B).

However, even if application of Moore Dry Dock[5] standards were appropriate to this case, and there had been compliance with them, where the activities or statements of the union reveal any illegal secondary purpose, such conduct is unlawful. Texas Distributors, Inc. v. Local Union No. 100, 598 F.2d 393, 398 (5th Cir. 1979); Local Union No. 369, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. First, Local 825 did not comply with the Moore Drydock standards because at the time of the picketing—July 19 to July 30—Drukker, the primary employer, was not engaged in any business activity on the Red Lobster or Denny's site. That being so, the picketing on these properties could not have been within the sight of employees of the primary employer to persuade them. Thus, the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn is that the purpose of the picketing was to apply pressure to the neutral employees. "A picket line is a potent instrument." Superior Derrick Corporation v. NLRB, 273 F. 2d 891, 896 (5th Cir. 1960), and in the long history of the trade union movement, "it has a special message of its own. To a loyal unionist it is both a spontaneous plea not to engage in any business activity with those behind the picket curtain and an instantaneous branding of 'unfairness' on those engaged in activities behind the picket line." Id. at 896. In the instant case, this is illustrated by Red Lobster's masonry contractor's refusal to cross the picket line and his recognition that even if he did, concrete suppliers would not.

Picketing Denny's premises, when the primary contractor Drukker was neither there nor under contract, and the Red Lobster's premises after the primary employer has, as the Master found, moved his equipment and employees to the motel site, could not have been informational. The picketing amounted to a direct application of pressure on vulnerable neutral companies to induce them—at the very least, to encourage them—to cease or refrain from doing business with Drukker.[8]

---

[4] The Master's finding that Local 825 engaged in area standard picketing was predicated on the testimony of the business agent Jones that several of his pickets, none of whom he could identify, told him that Denny's was not paying the area standard. Jones admitted that he "never spoke to Drukker at all before putting up the picket lines."

[5] Sailors' Union of the Pacific, 92 N.L.R.B. 547 (1950); see maj. op., typescript at 8.

> The intended breadth of the words "induced or encouraged" in section 8(b)(4)(A) is emphasized by their contrast with the restricted phrases used in other parts of section 8(b) * * *. The scope of "induced" and especially of "encouraged" goes beyond each of them.

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers v. NLRB, 341 U.S. 694, 703, 71 S.Ct. 954, 959, 95 L.Ed. 1299 (1951). Thus, an allowance of picketing of neutral employers, regardless of how peaceful the picketing may be, "would be to open the door to the customary means of elicting the support of employees to bring economic pressure to bear on their employer." Id. It would be destructive of the purpose of section 8(b)(4). Implicit in the 1959 amendment to section 8(b)(4) of the Taft-Hartley Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b), is a Congressional recognition of the devastating effect secondary picketing can have on a neutral employer.

The object of the picketing can shed considerable illumination in ascertaining whether Local 825 induced or encouraged employees, subcontractors, and suppliers of Red Lobster and Denny's to refuse to work on their construction. The statute and our previous judgments forbid any activity which seeks to induce or encourage a person not the primary employer or an employee of his to take some action as to refuse to perform services or to do business with the primary employer.

> The cases recognize the very practical fact that, intended or not, sought for or not, aimed for or not, employees and neutral parties do take action sympathetic with strikers and do put pressure on their own employers.

Seafarers International Union v. NLRB, 265 F.2d 585, 590 (D.C. Cir. 1959). One of the most effective means of applying such pressure it to picket a neutral place of business, relying on the union adherent's traditional aversion to crossing a picket line. The purpose of our decrees, as it is of the statute, is to protect unoffending employers from this extraordinary presure.

The Master concluded that Local 825 engaged in lawful area standards common situs picketing of Drukker from July 19 to July 30, but he made no attempt to analyze the purpose of the picketing at the Red Lobster and Denny's properties. Some questions that immediately confront us and to which the Master provided no answers are: first, could it truly have been area standards informational picketing when Jones had no information on what Drukker was paying his employees or what their standards of employment were? Jones says he relied for this information on what one of his pickets told him. Second, considering that Drukker merely had a bulldozer and compactor operated by only two employees, did it require 50 to 75 pickets to patrol 400 feet of Red Lobster property for informational purposes, particularly when Red Lobster had an exclusive entrance to its property? Third, if this was simply informational picketing and not an appeal for a secondary boycott, was massive picketing required at the Red Lobster property when in fact Drukker had no equipment or employees there?

The Master found that the large number of pickets was required because they were patrolling 2,000 feet along the highway. However, the only construction on that 2,000 feet at that time was on the Red Lobster property. There is no evidence of any construction at the time of any other site fronting Route 18 in the development. The Master saw no impropriety because Red Lobster had a contract with Drukker for performance of additional work at some subsequent time. But how can the existence of such a contract lend credence to informational picketing when the primary employer has no employees on the premises of the neutral employer to be enlightened? Furthermore, Drukker had no contract with Denny's, had never done any work for them, and none of its employees were on Denny's property. Nonetheless, Denny's was still the victim of Local 825's campaign for enlightenment. The Master gave these facts no consideration whatsoever and makes no allusions to them. The conclusion is inescapable that the picketing campaign had the planned and expected effect of denying the services of all union workmen and suppliers of the neutral employers unless they committed themselves to disassociate then and in the future from Drukker or other non-union workmen. As soon as this illegal objective of the picketing had been achieved, the pickets were removed.

[8] The Union apparently draws solace from testimony of Denny's Castongue that his company had no intention of doing business with Drukker. The Union apparently believes that such testimony necessarily precludes attribution of an illegal object to the picketing because Denny's, as a neutral, had no way of pressuring Drukker. In light of the Denny's picketing, however, the clear import of Jones' statements to Castongue was that if any non-union workers, especially Drukker, appeared on the Denny's site, operation would be shut down.

There are other factors, also ignored by the Master, which point to Local 825's calculated plan to violate this court's decrees and which do not support the Local's claim of innocent, informational picketing. First, if its activities were merely informational, no explanation is offered for Jones insistence to Drukker that the work to be performed be rendered by Local 825 members and that membership was not available for Drukker's employees in this local. "The result is that [Local 825's] picketing in order to attain its ultimate purpose, must have included among its objects that of forcing [Red Lobster] to terminate [the] subcontract." NLRB v. Denver Building & Construction Trades Council, 314 U.S. 675, 688, 71 S.Ct. 943, 951, 95 L.Ed. 1284 (1951).

Second, on July 30 Jones withdrew Local 825 pickets from the Red Lobster property when their project superintendent assured Jones he would use only union labor to lay the foundation. Jones, however, threatened to "throw pickets up" if any non-union workers appeared at the site. This definitely demonstrates that Jones was interested in cutting off business with non-union contractors, not the mere dissemination of information.

Third, when Denny's job superintendent, Castongue, inquired of Jones on July 27 "what it would take" to be able to proceed with their construction, he was repeatedly warned by Jones that Denny's could do so only if they "used union people on the job." Here, too, when Denny's agreed to use union labor, its masonry subcontractor was for the first time permitted to commence work since the picketing began. Again, it is obvious that the picketing was not merely informational. On the contrary, the picketing was blatantly intended to induce Red Lobster to discontinue business with Drukker, a non-union contractor, and it succeeded. The picketing had also been intended to induce or encourage Denny's to refrain from using non-union contractors and subcontractors and there too it succeeded.

Finally, the Master completely ignored direct testimony from Castongue that he was threatened and abused as he crossed the line and while working at the Red Lobster site. This is not mere information, it is plainly and simply threats and coercion directed at a neutral employer. The picketing was intended to appeal to secondary employees not to cross the picket line or to perform services despite the lack of any presence of the primary contractor on the premises of the neutrals, and it met with obvious success. As an appeal to secondary employees, it was illegal. NLRB v. Denver Building and Construction Trades Council, 341 U.S. 675, 71 S.Ct. 943, 95 L.Ed. 1284 (1951).

III.

Local 825's activity at the East Jackson site falls within the same proscriptions of the law and this court's previous orders. When Leeds first encountered picketing at the school site, it immediately established two separate entrances. It reserved one for its employees and suppliers; it set up the other employees of all other contractors and their employers. Leeds scrupulously adhered to its reserve gate. Although the signs designating the gates were not drafted precisely, they were supported by letters to all interested parties, including Local 825, that clearly identified the separate entrances.

The Master, however, found that the sign posted caused such confusion that it failed to establish a reserve gate. His references to the record, however, do not support this finding. In fact, the uncontradicted evidence is to the contrary. Cox, the construction superintendent for Arthur Orgen, Inc., the general contractor, personally refused to cross the picket line except with the consent of Local 825 to pick up his tools. He testified that the signs did not create confusion among the employees on the job site. Leeds under cross-examination, also testified that "nobody was confused at the site."[7] [7] This testimony is further supported by the testimony of David Ochs, in charge of the picketing on this development for the International Association of Heat and Frost Insulators, Local 89, this his local picketed Leeds at the main entrance to the project on September 4 and 5. But after those dates they picketet only at "the restricted gate" on the Trenton-Lakewood Road. For the remainder of their picketing, they never picketed the main gate although Ochs appeared there to observe what was going on. At the main gate the only picketing he observed was by Local 825 pickets carrying signs and by no other union.

The Master, obviously uncomfortable with his finding, further compounded the error with an alternate finding that even if it be assumed that a reserve gate was established "it cannot be found by clear and convincing evidence that Leeds' employees and other contractors were not also using the neutral gate instead of the reserve gate which they attempted to establish." (Finding No. 36) This finding incomprehensibly places the burden of proof on the Board to negatively establish what otherwise should be an affirmative defense of the Union, if it exist at all. The record is absolutely devoid of any evidence that Leeds or its contractor were using the neutral gate once the reserve gate was established.

Although the Master found that on September 5 Local 825 picketed the main entrance on Patterson Drive (Finding No. 36), he was unable to find that the sign attempting to establish a reserve gate was posted "since there was great confusion even among the witnesses for the Board as to whether the picketing was done on September 5, or September 6, and further whether the sign attempting to establish the reserve gate was even posted at the time." (Finding No. 36) Ochs, in charge of the picketing for the Heating and Pipefitters Local, testified to the contrary, stating that he observed picketing at the main gate September 5 and 6. Cox also contradicted the Master's finding. He even sought Local 825's permission to cross the picket line on September 6 to withdraw his tools. Hagenbarth's testimony also contradicted the Master's finding. No evidence in the record supports it.[8]

It is firmly established that in common situs construction, one contractor may establish separate gates for the purpose of ingress and egress from the job site and thereby lawfully force the union to picket only a neutral gate. Local 519 v. NLRB, 416 F.2d 1120, 1125 (D.C.Cir.1969). To carry out the legislative purpose embodied in the secondary boycott amendments, a union must under such circumstances limit its picketing to areas reasonably proximate to the gate used by the primary contractor's employees and suppliers. See Local 761, International Union of Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers, v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 667, 81 S.Ct. 1285, 6 L.Ed.2d 592 (1961); Markwell and Hartz, Inc, v. NLRB, 387 F.2d 79, 81–83 (5th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 391 U.S. 914, 88 S.Ct. 1808, 20 L.Ed.2d 653 (1968). The record in this case clearly and convincingly establishes that Local 825 picketed the neutral gate; it never picketed the gate reserved for Leeds. The absence of Leeds' employees at the main gate is evidence of the secondary objective of the picketing. Painters District Council No. 38, 153 N.L.R.B. 797, 800–01 (1965); NLRB v. Local 254, Building Service Employees, 359 F.2d 289, 291 (1st Cir. 1966). "There is simply no excuse for picketing where the message is seen by neutral employees of neutral employers but is not seen at all by the employees of the primary employer." Brown Transport Co. v. NLRB, 334 F.2d 30, 39 (5th Cir. 1964).

Accordingly, I would reject the recommendations of the Master and adjudicate Local 825 in further civil contempt and require that it take the steps in purgation requested in the Board's motion.

On action for declaratory judgment

Before PHILLIPS, MURNAGHAN and ERVIN, Circuit Judges

[8] In a feeble effort to support his finding, the Master seized upon a small portion of Cox's testimony given under cross-examination that the signs had been torn down before Cox reported for work and were not present thereafter. Cox's amplified testimony, however, revealed that he personally did not observe the signs being torn down since he did not report for work until about a half hour after the signs had been restored by Alessandrini, Leeds' plumbing foreman. The record shows that the gate signs were torn down during the day of September 4 and that Alessandrini replaced them on September 5 about 7:15 A.M. immediately after starting his work. Cox testified that he was almost 100 percent certain that the signs were up when he arrived for work at 7:45 A.M. on September 5 and he described seeing it behind White, the business agent, as he spoke to him. This testimony is uncontradicted, and there is no testimony to indicate that the sign identifying the main gate was not posted on September 6. In substance, the Master's finding depends on Cox's testimony concerning an entry in his log indicating "no signs on main entrance" on September 6. Cox explained, however, that this entry referred not to a gate sign, but to picket signs.

James Dickson Phillips, Circuit Judge: Before us are consolidated proceedings that grow out of the refusal by Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Company (Company) to honor revocations of dues check-off authorizations by certain of its employees while they were represented by Peninsula Shipbuilders' Association (PSA). The refusal was based upon the employees' failure to use revocation forms furnished by PSA as required by section 23.2 of the collective bargaining agreement between the Company and PSA, and to follow certain other special procedures for revocation unilaterally imposed by PSA.

In a declaratory judgment action brought in district court by the Company aganist PSA and affected employees, the district court held inter alia that the revocation provision was valid as a matter of contract law and justified the Company's refusal. In No. 81-1412, the National Labor Relations Board (Board), as intervenor in that action, appeals the district court's judgment.

Following the district court's entry of judgment, the Board in an unfair labor practice proceeding against the Company and PSA held that the revocation provision was invalid both facially and as applied by PSA and the Company. On this basis the Board concluded that both the Company and PSA had violated section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 158, by enforcing the provision and by continuing to check off and receive PSA dues from employees who had sought to revoke their authorizations by means other than those provided in the collective bargaining agreement and as imposed by PSA. The Board issued a cease and desist order and held the Company and PSA jointly and severally liable to reimburse those employees who had effectively revoked their check-off authorizations on non-PSA forms. In No. 80-1012, PSA petitions to review and set aside those portions of the Board's decision and order which run against it and the Board cross-applies for enforcement. In No. 81-1179, the Board applies for enforcement of those portions of its decision and order which run against the Company.

We grant enforcement to the Board's order and hold invalid any portion of the district court's declaratory judgment in conflict with the remedial aspect of that order.

I

In 1975, the Company and PSA entered into a collective bargaining agreement covering the Company's approximately 19,000 production and maintenance employees. The contract was effective until June 30, 1978, and, by its terms, was extended until October 28, 1978, when the Board certified the United Steelworkers of America (Steelworkers) as the employees's bargaining agent and the winner of a representation election held in January 1978.[1] Between the election and certification dates, the Company recognized PSA as the employees' bargaining representative and it continued to check off PSA dues from the payroll checks of employees who had authorized such deductions under section 23.1 of the collective bargaining agreement.[2] The authorizations on forms furnished by PSA provided for the checkoff of $2.00 weekly until revoked by the employee in writing. During that same time, the Company received letters from 214 employees, on forms furnished by the Steelworkers, revoking their dues checkoff authorizations. The Company notified PSA that it would honor the revocations, but PSA threatened to sue the Company for breaching section 23.2 of the collective bargaining agreement[3] which required revocations to be on forms furnished by PSA. Consequently, the Company continued to check off and remit dues to PSA.

[1] The election outcome was disputed. In late 1979, this court ruled that the Steelworkers had won. Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co. v. NLRB, 608 F.2d 108 (4th Cir. 1979).

[2] Section 23.1. Check Off and Transmittal. Upon the written individual and voluntary authorization in accordance with the law of an employee who is a member of the Association, and in no way as a condition of employment, the Company will make payroll deduction of the required monthly dues (uniform in amount) of the Association in accordance with the said authorization. The Company will deliver the sums so deducted to the Association, upon its written receipt therefor.

[3] Section 23.2. Revocation of Check Off Authorization. (a) Any such dues check off authorization [as provided by section 23.1] shall not be for a period of time greater than one year or the termination date of this Agreement, whichever is the sonner. A revocation of such authorization shall be by use of the form furnished by the Association (in duplicate) and shall be delivered either to the Association or to the head of the Company's Personnel and Industrial Relations Division. If such revocation is to be effective upon the termination date of this Agreement, it shall be delivered within the last fifteen (15) days of the term of this Agreement.

(b) The above-mentioned authorization, the receipt and notice of cancellation shall be in form and substance satisfactory to the Company.

PSA then sent the 214 employees certified letters informing them that under the contract only PSA forms could be used to revoke checkoffs and that they must come by the PSA office on weekdays between 8:00 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. to sign those forms. PSA also issued a "Report to the Membership" on February 12, 1978, setting forth the same information. Eventually 56 of the 214 employees revoked checkoffs on PSA forms and the Company complied. Other employees testified, however, that it was difficult to obtain PSA forms because they either worked evening or night shifts when the union hall was closed or they had to go to the office, located outside the shipyard, during their noon lunch hour. The forms were not made available to employees at the plant—for example, through distribution by Company personnel or shop stewards. Finally, a few employees testified that they did not sign Steelworker revocation forms received by the Company and that they never intended to resign their PSA membership. All dues checkoffs terminated when the contract ceased on October 28, 1978.

On October 18, 1978, ten days before the contract expired, the Steelworkers filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board, alleging that the Company was violating subsections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) and PSA was violating subsections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 158, by continuing to check off the dues of employees who revoked on non-PSA forms. In response, the Board informed the Company that a complaint would issue against it, but orally advised that the Board intended to dismiss the charges against PSA. Subsequently, on November 16, 1978, the Company filed a declaratory judgment action in district 491 court against PSA, its business manager, and the 158 employees who attempted to revoke their checkoff authorizations on non-PSA forms.[4] The action sought a judicial construction of article XXIII of the collective bargaining agreement, in particular to determine what procedures under section 23.2 were necessary to revoke checkoff authorizations and whether PSA must indemnify and defend the Company under section 23.3.[5]

While the declaratory judgment action was pending in district court, the Board issued unfair labor practice complaints against the Company and PSA,[6] on January 12 and July 2, 1979, respectively, alleging inter alia that enforcing section 23.2 of the collective bargaining agreement unlawfully interfered with the employees' section 7 rights, 29 U.S.C. § 157. The Board then moved to intervene in and to stay the district court action pending the outcome of the unfair labor practice proceeding. Although the district court permitted the Board to participate at the hearing as an amicus curiae, in a decision issued October 24, 1979, it denied the Board's motion to intervene. The district court found the 158 employees, who failed to appear, in default. It then noted that no party challenged the validity of section 23.2 under the NLRA, but rather that the parties agreed the section was lawful. The district court therefore neither reached that issue nor considered it in interpreting section 23.2 as a matter of contract law. On the merits, the district court gave a declaratory judgment that section 23.2 was valid and binding in the case before it; that the Company accordingly was entitled to continue checkoffs not revoked on PSA forms; and that the Company was to be defended and indemnified by PSA under section 23.3. The Board appealed the denial of its motion to intervene and we reversed, granting the Board party status to perfect an appeal in order to protect its interests as the primary tribunal for the adjudication of unfair labor practices. Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Co. v. Peninsula Shipbuilders' Association, 646 F.2d 117 (4th Cir. 1981).

Armed with the district court decision, the Company appeared at the beginning of the unfair labor practice hearings to state that PSA would defend and indemnify it. The Company thereafter did not participate in the Board proceeding. PSA moved for dismissal of the unfair labor practice proceeding because either the district court's findings of fact were res judicata or principles of collateral estoppel barred the proceeding. Newport News Shipbuild- ing and Dry Dock Co., No. JD-403-80, slip op. at 10 (July 10, 1980) (appended to 253 N.L.R.B. No. 96). The administrative law judge (ALJ), however, noted that the issue before the district court was one of contract interpretation and the district court neither decided nor purported to decide the unfair labor practice question which would, of course, be within the Board's exclusive jurisdiction. Id. at 18. Accordingly, he denied the motion.

[4] Jurisdiction was based on sections 301 and 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act (LMRA), 29 U.S.C. §§ 185, 186, and 28 U.S.C. §§ 1331, 2201–2202.

[5] Section 23.3. Indemnification. The Association shall indemnify, defend and hold the Company harmless against any claim or liability arising out of the administration of this Article.

[6] The Regional Director initially dismissed the charge against the PSA but, after a successful appeal by the Steelworkers, he issued a complaint.

The ALJ next addressed the validity of section 23.2 of the collective bargaining agreement under subsection 302(c)(4) of the Labor Management Relations Act (LMRA), which permits the employer to withhold and remit dues to a union "Provided, That the employer has received from each employee, on whose account such deductions are made, a written assignment which shall not be irrevocable for a period of more than one year or beyond the termination date of the applicable collective agreement, whichever occurs sooner; * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(4). The ALJ found that section 23.2 was facially unlawful because it required the employee to use only forms furnished by PSA, thus imposing a requirement over and above those of subsection 302(c)(4), in contravention of Felter v. Southern Pacific Co., 359 U.S. 326, 79 S.Ct. 847, 3 L.Ed.2d 854 (1959). In Felter, the Supreme Court had held that a contract provision, requiring an employee to use a form provided by the union in order to revoke his checkoff authorization, violated subsection 2 Eleventh (b) of the Railway Labor Act [7] because it imposed requirements beyond those of the statute and limited the individual employee's freedom to authorize or reject checkoff of his union dues. In finding Felter to be dispositive of this case, the ALJ emphasized that the Felter Court considered subsection 2 Eleventh (b) to be quite similar to subsection 302(c)(4) of the LMRA. Id. at 332 n.10, 79 S.Ct., at 852 n.10. The ALJ alternatively found that section 23.2 of the collective bargaining agreement was unlawful as applied. There was no general distribution of or access to the PSA revocation forms, neither the PSA constitution nor union bylaws mentioned the procedure for checkoff revocation; there was no formal notification to employees before 1978 as to how they could obtain the forms; and the employees could revoke only by personally appearing at the PSA hall. These were further restrictions on the employee's individual freedom of decision than those imposed by the collective bargaining agreement.

The ALJ therefore concluded that the Company violated subsections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C § 158(a)(1), (3), by maintaining and enforcing section 23.2 and by continuing to check off PSA dues after receiving revocations. He also concluded that PSA violated subsections 8(b)(1)(A) and 8(b)(2), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A), (2), by maintaining and enforcing section 23.2, by causing the Company to continue to check off the dues of employees who submitted revocations, and by receiving and retaining those dues.

The Board affirmed the ALJ's findings and conclusions, ordered the Company and PSA to cease and desist from their unlawful conduct, and held them jointly and severally liable to reimburse the employees who had effectively revoked their checkoff authorizations on non-PSA forms. Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Company, 253 N.L.R.B. No. 96 (Dec. 12, 1980).

II

The validity of section 23.2 of the collective bargaining agreement—as a matter of contract or labor law—was raised in both the proceedings now before us. At issue specifically was the clause requiring an employee to use a form furnished by PSA in order to revoke his checkoff authorization. In the declaratory judgment action the district court found this requirement to be valid and binding upon the contracting parties; in the unfair labor practice proceeding, the Board found it invalid both facially and as applied as a matter of national labor law. Because the Board's jurisdiction to determine whether the provision is an unfair labor practice under the NLRA is primary and exclusive, we review its decision as the dispositive one to the extent the adjudications are in conflict.

We affirm the Board's finding that section 23.2 was invalid under the LMRA as applied in this case and, therefore, we do not reach the question whether under Felter v. Southern Pacific Co., 359

[7] Subsection 2 Eleventh (b) of the Railway Labor Act permits a carrier and a union to enter into an agreement for dues checkoffs "Provided, That no such agreement shall be effective with respect to any individual employee until he shall have furnished the employer with a written assignment to the labor organization of such membership dues, * * * which shall be revocable in writing after the expiration of one year or upon the termination date of the applicable collective agreement, whichever occurs sooner." 45 U.S.C. § 152 Eleventh (b).

U.S. 326, 79 S.Ct. 847, 3 L.Ed.2d 854, such a contract provision is on its face, per se violative of the LMRA.[8] In addition to its conclusion that the contract provision is facially invalid the Board held alternatively that the revocation procedure as actually enforced constituted an unfair labor practice under the total circumstances. There is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support this finding. Employees had no easy, general access to PSA forms; before 1978, they were not informed as to how they should revoke their checkoff authorizations short of the clause in section 23.2 requiring the use of a PSA form; and they had to appear personally at the PSA hall in order to sign the forms and possibly to resign their PSA memberships. While there is no evidence that employees who sought to revoke were harassed at the PSA office, this additional requirement clearly could dampen the employee's freedom to choose or revoke checkoff of his union dues as provided in subsection 302(c)(4) of the LMRA, 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(4).

Contesting the Board's findings and conclusions on this ground, PSA argues that these additional requirements were reasonable because it had serious doubts as to the authenticity of the revocations. Some forms lacked written signatures, a few employees later testified that they did not sign Steelworker forms or did not intend to resign their PSA memberships, and PSA at the time was hotly contesting the outcome of the representation election with the Steelworkers. Because of these doubts and in order to ascertain which revocations were genuine, PSA sent the 214 employees letters detailing the revocation process—appearing in person at the PSA hall to sign a PSA revocation form.

So runs PSA's argument, but when the record is assessed there is little or no evidence that PSA was motivated by any concern for ascertaining the authenticity of the revocations. PSA never mentioned its doubts to the employees or to the Company, a number of the checkoff authorization cards lacked written signatures which PSA never questioned, and the Company did not find the revocations fraudulent on their faces because it accepted them and notified PSA that it would honor them. As the Supreme Court noted in Felter, authenticity disputes are not unusual particularly when there is a contest between unions, but "[i]f the company suspects fraud or forgery in a revocation, it is within its power informally to check the matter with the employee." 359 U.S. at 335, 79 S.Ct. at 854. The checkoff authorization cards—the actual assignment contracts between the individual employees and the Company—did not authorize PSA to reject revocations under any circumstances, including doubts as to their authenticity. Therefore, we must reject PSA's contention that its actions were reasonable in this case.

Because there is substantial evidence that section 23.2 was applied unlawfully, we grant full enforcement to the Board's order, including that portion requiring the Company and PSA, as parties jointly and severally liable, to make reimbursement of the checked-off dues to the 141 employees who have verified their revocations on non-PSA forms and to those other employees who may now be determined to have executed similar effective revocations. To the extent that the district court's judgment might be interpreted to exonerate either PSA or the Company from any liability to make reimbursement to these employees under the Board's order, or otherwise to conflict with this opinion, we hold that it is invalid and of no effect.[9]

[8] The Board found that Felter compelled the conclusion that section 23.2 is facially invalid under section 302(c)(4) of the LMRA, 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(4), and that by maintaining and enforcing the contract, both the Company and PSA committed unfair labor practices. The Company and PSA argue that Felter is inapposite because the wording and legislative histories of subsections 302(c)(4) of the LMRA and 2 Eleventh (b) of the Railway Labor Act are significantly different; the Board and courts have given subsection 302(c)(4) a more liberal reading than subsection 2 Eleventh (b); the requirement of a particular revocation form is only a minor, nonburdensome clerical detail; and the employees, as members of the union which negotiated section 23.2, are barred from challenging its validity. Disposition of these contentions would require us to determine whether a violation of subsection 302(c)(4), perhaps controlled by the Supreme Court's decision in Felter, constitutes an unfair labor practice under section 8 of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 158. See NLRB v. Cameron Iron Works, Inc., 591 F.2d 1, 3 (5th Cir. 1979); In re Salant & Salant, Inc., 88 N.L.R.B. 816, 817–18 (1950). For the reasons stated, however, we need not reach this question.

[9] The Board, in appealing the judgment of the district court, contends that the court lacked jurisdiction because there was neither a case nor controversy before it—PSA and the Company were aligned on the interpretation of section 23.2—and that, alternatively, the district court abused its discretion by not deferring to the Board's primary jurisdiction or by not staying its action pending resolution of the unfair labor practice proceeding. Regardless of the Company's and PSA's positions as to section

ENFORCEMENT GRANTED.

23.2 of the contract, the issue of the Company's rights to defense and indemnification under section 23.3 of the collective bargaining agreement presented a live case to the district court. The district court also had jurisdiction under section 301 of the LMRA, 29 U.S.C. § 185, to address any issues of pure contract interpretation. While, with the advantage of hindsight, we may feel that the district court's better course would have been to stay its action, we cannot say that its decision to proceed was an abuse of discretion. Accordingly, the district court judgment is a valid one, except insofar as it conflicts with remedial aspects of the Board's order entered in a proceeding as to which its jurisdiction was exclusive. We need not attempt to delineate the precise jurisdictional line between the two adjudications, it being sufficient simply to confirm by this decision the primacy of the Board's remedial order to the extent any conflict might exist. Specifically not addressed in this opinion, hence neither affirmed nor rejected, is the Board's conclusion that the disputed provision is per se invalid under Felter. That issue we reserve for another day.

Tanforan Park Food Purveyors Council and the Hapsmith Company v. NLRB

656 F.2d 1358 (9th Cir.), September 21, 1981—239 NLRB 1061

On petition to review Board Order

Before ANDERSON, FLETCHER and FERGUSON, Circuit Judges

FERGUSON, Circuit Judge: Two corporations appeal a bargaining order of the National Labor Relations Board

1360

("NLRB"). They claim that they were erroneously determined to be joint employers and erroneously denied a new election or evidentiary hearing. We remand for consideration of the accuracy of a Samoan translation used during the election process; on all other issues, we affirm the NLRB order.

I.

Tanforan Park Shopping Center ("Tanforan") operates a shopping center in San Bruno, California. The center contains a restaurant complex consisting of various tenant restaurants around a common area. The tenants are by lease required to belong to Tanforan Park Food Purveyors Council ("Council"), a non-profit corporation which operates the common area for the tenants' mutual benefit. Council employs busboys, supply persons, janitors, and dishwashers. These unit employees comprise the bargaining unit which the Union in this case[1] sought to represent.

Tanforan hired the Hapsmith Co. ("Hapsmith") to manage its entire complex, including the restaurant area. Hapsmith also discharges Tanforan's lease obligation to provide administrative assistance to Council. Hapsmith employs Jack Kuks to conduct the day-to-day affairs of the restaurant common area.

The Union won the election to represent the unit employees in January, 1978. Afterwards, Hapsmith and Council filed objections to the Union's conduct prior to the election and the Board's conduct of the election. The Regional Director overruled these objections without a hearing. The NLRB denied the subsequent requests for review and ordered Council and Hapsmith to bargain with the Union. Council and Hapsmith refused to do so and the NLRB subsequently found that they had violated the National Labor Relations Act.

Hapsmith and Council, as petitioners here, dispute that order. They find error with the NLRB's determination that they are joint employers. They also claim error with the Regional Director's refusal to order a new election based on objections to the Union's campaign material. They assert that, at the least, the Regional Director should have ordered a hearing on these objections.

II.

The NLRB found Hapsmith to be a joint employer of Council's employees. Petitioners seek to excuse their admitted refusal to bargain with the Union by challenging that NLRB determination. Their challenge fails.

Whether a corporation possesses sufficient indicia of control to qualify as a joint employer "is essentially a factual issue * * *." Boire v. Greyhound Corp., 376 U.S. 473, 481, 84 S.Ct. 894, 899, 11 L.Ed.2d 849 (1964). The facts of this case accordingly warrant extensive exposition. The NLRB determination of joint employment will be upheld unless it is "arbitrary and capricious." NLRB v. Red-More Corp., 418 F.2d 890, 894 (9th Cir. 1969).

Petitioners present the facts as follows. Council pays the unit employees' worker's compensation insurance premiums and social security payments, assesses the tenants for expenses, and bears all the expenses for maintenance, utilities, and real estate taxes. In addition, unit employee wages, salaries, and fringe benefits are set and paid for by Council through accounts which bear its name. Hapsmith, by contrast, imposes no pricing or other restrictions, does not contribute to restaurant common area expenses, and has no authority to hire, fire, or otherwise influence terms and conditions of unit employees' employment. Finally, unit employees have their own lockers and break area, their personnel files are kept in a Council office, and Kuks' office is separate from Hapsmith's office.

[1] The Union, Local 340, San Mateo Bartenders and Culinary Workers Union, AFL-CIO, is not a party to this litigation.

1361

The NLRB offers the following facts. The Council, which is composed of a representative of each tenant plus a Hapsmith representative, meets only sporadically and plays little role in daily business, including employee supervision and labor relations. Its manager, Kuks, hires and fires all unit employees, sets their wage rates and vacation, holiday, and work schedules, and supervises them. Kuks was hired by Hapsmith, and all his incidents of employment are solely under Hapsmith's control. He serves at Hapsmith's pleasure—Council once tried to have him fired, but failed. Kuks supervises Council's bookkeeper, who is also a Hapsmith employee. Moreover, Council payroll checks may be signed only by Kuks or two other Hapsmith employees.

The NLRB makes the additional points that Hapsmith has the right to have any unit employee fired and that it may make rules and regulations governing use and operation of the common area.

In comparing these various factual claims and eliminating those which are irrelevant, conflicting, or conclusory, the following picture emerges. Council employs the unit employees and controls various incidents of ownership. Hapsmith, through the agency of its employee, Kuks, hires and fires all unit employees, sets their wage rates and vacation, holiday, and work schedules, and supervises them. Hapsmith can accordingly be treated as a joint employer.

"A joint employer relationship exists when an employer exercises authority over employment conditions which are within the area of mandatory collective bargaining." Sun-Maid Growers of California v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 56, 59 (9th Cir. 1980). The areas within Hapsmith's control—wage rates, vacation, holiday, and work schedules, and employee supervision—lie within the core of mandatory collective bargaining. See, e.g., Maas & Feduska, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 714, 717–18 (9th Cir. 1979); Gallenkamp Stores Co. v. NLRB, 402 F.2d 525, 529 n.4 (9th Cir. 1968). Hapsmith must therefore be considered a joint employer.

That conclusion follows far more strongly than is required by the "arbitrary and capricious" standard which governs review of NLRB determinations of joint employment, NLRB v. Red-More Corp., supra, at 894. Indeed, the breadth of Hapsmith's control over fundamental areas of mandatory collective bargaining makes its position as a joint employer emerge a fortiori from Boire, Sun-Maid, and Gallenkamp, supra, in which cases a determination of joint employment was made from lesser indicia of joint control.

III.

Council and Hapsmith (hereinafter "employers") objected to various campaign statements presented to unit employees. They claim that the election should be set aside and the order to bargain denied or, alternatively, that a hearing on the issue must be held. The Regional Director overruled these objections. We reverse and remand in part and affirm in part the NLRB order.

This court may overturn the decision of the Regional Director if it determines that she abused her discretion in reviewing the facts. NLRB v. J.R. Simplot Co., 322 F.2d 170, 171 (9th Cir. 1963). If the employees have been prevented from freely registering their choice in a representation election, the court may set the election aside and deny enforcement of the NLRB order. NLRB v. Winchell Processing Corp., 451 F.2d 306, 310 (9th Cir. 1971). Further, the court may require a hearing on a lesser showing than that required to overturn the election. Employers need only assert facts which would, if true, require a new election. NLRB v. G.K. Turner Associates, 457 F.2d 484, 487 (9th Cir. 1972).

A. The Alleged Preferential Treatment Based on Pre-Election Support

The employers object to statements made in the Union letter sent to the employees dated January 10, 1978. The letter allegedly implies that employees who are not Union members cannot vote to ratify a Union contract. Furthermore, the employers claim that the letter conditions a waiver of Union dues on the employee's pre-election support of the Union.

The NLRB will set aside elections when a union promises to treat union members differently from other employees in return for pre-election support. Knapp-Sherrill Co., 71 N.L.R.B. 1547 (1968). The Supreme Court has held that if a union promises to waive dues because of pre-election support, the election will be set aside. NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973). Furthermore, the election should be set aside if the fee waiver is communicated in such a confusing fashion that it implies that waiver hinges on pre-election support. NLRB v. Aladdin Hotel Corp., 584 F.2d 891, 893 (9th Cir. 1978).

The disputed statements do not violate these principles of the election process. The letter states that a Union contract must be ratified by "you, the members, before it is adopted." It also states that dues will be delayed until at least "thirty-one days after the members approve their contract." These statements refer to the Union members' ability to ratify the contract and to defer fees for a month. Neither is conditioned on joining the Union prior to the election. Nor do they deny the same rights to other employees. Absent a showing that the Union promised differential treatment in return for pre-election support, the employer's conclusory assertions do not support setting aside the election.

B. The Alleged Misrepresentation of Material Facts

The employers also claim that the Union materially misrepresented benefits employees would receive. In the January 10 letter, the Union described benefits members received at a nearby market. The employers did not demonstrate, however, that the statements in the letter are material misrepresentations of fact. Instead, they allege that part-time workers might have been confused about their own rights.

An election will be set aside if the Union has misrepresented information to the voters. Hollywood Ceramics Co., 140 N.L.R.B. 221 (1962). The party contesting the election must allege that the information is false and material. NLRB v. Snokist Growers, Inc., 532 F.2d 1239 (9th Cir. 1976). The employers' allegations of misrepresentation manifestly do not meet that standard.

C. The Notice of the Election and the Ballot

Finally, employers claim that the translation from English into Samoan of the official NLRB notice of election, prepared for the thirteen native Samoan unit employees, was erroneous. The English to Samoan translation used in this election is the official one promulgated by the NLRB for use in American Samoa. The employers submitted to the Regional Director a retranslation of the ballot from Samoan back into English, prepared by a native Samoan employee. This retranslation reads:

> Do you want someone to argue or to stand for you?
> Under the National Labor Relations Act all the employees should have an agent to their own people to bring someone to represent or help their own organization on their job. To argue for them throught their own representatives, to work together with them, who against in the progress of anyone or all these things unless the Union and the Management in any states who permitted this agreement, according to the government for the safety of the Union says that all employees should an [sic] are suppose [sic] to join the Union.

The employers claim that this retranslation suggests that the Samoan version of the notice is garbled and confusing.

The NLRB has proclaimed itself particularly "concerned with the protection of its procedures designed to provide fair elections." Columbia Tanning Corp. 38 N.L.R.B 1252 (1978). In addition, the NLRB has an affirmative duty to present election notices to employees in languages they will understand. Marriott In-Flite Service Div. of Marriott Corp. v. NLRB, 417 F.2d 563, 567 (5th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 920, 90 S.Ct. 929, 25 L.Ed.2d 101 (1970); Fibre Leather Mfg. Corp., 167 N.L.R.B. 393 (1967). This goal is not met if the presentation, in whatever language, is incomprehensible to the reader.

If the above retranslation presented by the employers is accurate, then it is likely that confusion resulted among the Samoan employees. Employers assert that such confusion would be so great as to undermine the election process. This assertion, if true, would require setting aside the election. Given the duty of the Board to protect its own procedures, and to present comprehensible election notices to employees, we hold that the Board was in error in denying an evidentiary hearing on the issue of the Samoan translation. Hence, we remand so that the NLRB may hold a hearing on this claim.

We REVERSE AND REMAND on the issue of the Samoan translation. In all other respects, the NLRB order is AFFIRMED.

FLETCHER, Circuit Judge, concurring: I concur in the result reached by the majority but I write separately to make clear my understanding of our holding in Part III C.

The employers made only one claim below regarding the Samoan translation of the sample ballot. They alleged that the translation conveyed the impression that the Board endorsed the Union. In support of this contention, the employers submitted two retranslations from the Samoan. Only one of these, the retranslation prepared by the Samoan employee, appears to support the claim.[1]

The Regional Director rejected this challenge to the election on the ground that a perfect translation from English into Samoan was not to be expected, because Samoan does not have the vocabulary necessary to render the technical language of federal labor law. She held that the translation was not so misleading as to prevent employees from making an informed choice in the election.

Translation is not an exact science. When the Board supplies employees with foreign language election notices and ballots, however, the translation must provide those who do not read English with the basic information necessary to an informed choice. See Marriott In-Flite Service Div. of Marriott Corp. v NLRB, 417 F.2d 563, 564 (5th Cir. 1969). Contrary to the employers' assertion here, an exact correspondence between the English version and the translation is neither possible nor necessary.

According to my understanding, we remand this case to the Board because the Samoan employee's affidavit, if believed, tends to show that the Samoan ballot suggested Board endorsement of the Union. Since nearly half of the 27 bargaining-unit employees were Samoan, misinformation on this issue might have prevented them from making an informed choice in the election. This issue should not have been resolved by the Board without an evidentiary hearing. At the hearing, the Board should determine whether the translation was so misleading or confusing as to suggest Board endorsement of the Union, and, if so, whether it prevented the employees from understanding the choices available to them.

NLRB v. World Evangelism, Inc.

656 F.2d 1349 (9th Cir.), September 21, 1981; rehearing denied December 2, 1981—248 NLRB 909

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before SKOPIL and FARRIS, Circuit Judges, and CURTISS,* District Judge.

SKOPIL, Circuit Judge: In October 1978 World Evangelism, Inc. ("WEI") acquired the El Cortez Center, a building complex occupying roughly one city block. The Center consisted of three motels, a swimming pool, a convention center, and a tower containing offices, hotel rooms, and restaurants. Prior to the acquisition, Handlery Hotels operated the Center, employing between five and nine engineers to operate its mechanical system, including electrical, plumbing, heating and refrigeration, and the swimming pool. The engineers were represented by Operating Engineers Local 501 ("Local 501"), and covered by a contract in force from November 1, 1977 to November 1, 1980.

Shortly before the takeover WEI decided to retain the engineers. It did not state whether it would adopt Handlery's contract. It notified Local 501 that it would not be a "successor" owner. When the engineers heard this, they notified Local 501's Business Representative, Brown, that they would resign unless WEI adopted Handlery's contract. WEI requested them to wait util its Executive Vice President, David Cerullo, could meet with them.

[1] The disputed paragraph is quoted by the majority, supra slip op. p. 4704, p. ——.

*The Honorable Jesse W. Curtis, Senior United States District Judge for the Central District of California, sitting by designation.

Undisputed evidence showed that at the meeting Cerullo claimed that the telegram had been sent to Local 501 by mistake. He stated that Local 501 should draft a contract and return it to him. The engineers agreed to continue working. Further content of the discussion is disputed. The Administrative Law Judge ("ALJ" credited the testimony of the Union witnesses that Cerullo spoke in terms which would lead a reasonable person to conclude an agreement had been reached on the contract and only formal steps of drafting and signing remained.

Brown returned with a copy of the standard San Diego Hotel Industry form contract which Handlery had signed. He discussed the specimen contract with WEI General Manager Rose, whom Cerullo had designated as his representative. Rose expressed problems with the non-discrimination clause, claiming that WEI reserved the right to discriminate on the basis of religion. Brown stated that the Union had no such right but that satisfactory language could probably be arranged. Brown promised to furnish Rose a completed clean copy of the contract along with fringe benefit trust subscription forms.

During the next two months WEI did not sign the contract nor communicate with Local 501. Brown spoke with Rose about reports that WEI was paying the engineers less than the contract rate. He was assured that the matter would be "looked into."

In December 1978, WEI notified Local 501 that it had not adopted Handlery's contract and did not want to sign the contract Brown had tendered. It still was concerned by the non-discrimination clause. WEI promised to interview the engineers regarding permanent jobs, suggesting for the first time that it considered them temporary employees.

WEI paid the engineers lower-than-contract wages. It also failed to contribute to the fringe benefit trusts referred to in the contract. WEI did not recognize nor bargain with Local 501 about these changes in the engineers' terms and conditions of employment.

PROCEEDINGS BELOW

The National Labor Relations Board ("the Board"), affirming the ALJ, held that the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act"), 29 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq., applied to WEI and that WEI violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(5), (1), by unilateraly changing terms and conditions of employment and by withdrawing recognition from and refusing to bargain with Local 501. 248 NLRB 909 (1980).

The Board ordered WEI to cease and desist, recognize Local 501, sign the pre-existing contract, and make whole employees for wages lost due to the refusal to implement that agreement.

ISSUES

1. Did the Board properly assert jurisdiciton over WEI?
2. Does substantial evidence support the Board's finding that WEI is a successor employer?
3. Does substantial evidence support the Board's finding that WEI adopted Handlery's collective bargaining agreement?

DISCUSSION

I. Standard of Review.

We must enforce the Board's order if the Board correctly applied the law and if the Board's findings of fact are supported by substantial evidence in the record viewed as a whole, even if we might have reached a different conclusion based on the same evidence. E. g., NLRB v. Nevis Industries, Inc., 647 F.2d 905, 908 (9th Cir. 1981); Stephens Institute v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 720, 726 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 358, 66 L.Ed.2d 217 (1980). We must consider both supporting evidence and contradictory evidence. Nevis Industries, Inc., supra; Stephenson v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 1210, 1214 (9th Cir. 1980). We will not overturn credibility determination unless shown to be incorrect by a clear perponderance of the evidence. NLRB v. Max Factor & Co., 640 F.2d 197, 204 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 2314, 68

II. Jurisdiction.

The Board has power to prevent commission of unfair labor practices by "any persons * * * affecting commerce." 29 U.S.C. § 160(a). This gives the Board the broadest jurisdiction permitted under the Commerce Clause. NLRB v. Reliance Fuel Oil Corp., 371 U.S. 224, 226, 83 S.Ct. 312, 313, 9 L.Ed.2d 279 (1963); NLRB v. Children's Baptist Home, 576 F.2d 256, 258 n.1 (9th Cir. 1978).

The Board asserts jurisdiction over non-profit religious organizations engaged in operations that are "in the generally accepted sense, commercial in nature," and if the time spent by the unit employees on commercial activities is more than de minimis. First, Church of Christ, Scientist, 194 NLRB 1006, 1008 (1972). To focus its resources, the Board, in its discretion, has adopted jurisdiction guidelines expressed as a dollar amount of business volume. Children's Baptist Home, supra. The guideline for motels is $500,000 annual gross revenue. NLRB v. Cofer, 637 F.2d 1309, 1312 (9th Cir. 1981); Floridian Hotel of Tampa, Inc., 124 NLRB 261, 264 (1959).

The Board found that WEI engaged in substantial commercial activities which were unrelated, except as a revenue source, to WEI's religious activities. WEI continued Handlery's contracts with two interstate airlines to provide hotel rooms on a priority basis for flight crews on layover. WEI continued to make motel rooms available to the transient public. The airline and transient lodgers are not screened for conformity to WEI's tenets, nor is their behavior at the hotel monitored. WEI leased out 25,000 square feet to 18 commercial tenants. While WEI's long-range plan is to use the Center exclusively for religious purposes, it conceded that that is not presently feasible.

The Board also found that a substantial portion of the engineers' time was spent on WEI's commercial activities. They worked throughout the complex on tasks required as much for the commercial activities as for the religious ones. WEI's gross revenue is within the Board's jurisdictional guidelines. WEI stipulated that its motel receipts would exceed $500,000 annually.

There is substantial evidence supporting the Board's findings that the Center is, at present, a commercial operation, and that the engineers spent a substantial portion of their time on commercial activities.

A finding of Board jurisdiction in this case will not offend NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490, 99 S.Ct. 1313, 59 L.Ed.2d 533 (1979). The narrow question addressed in that case was whether the Act gives the Board jurisdiction over teachers in church-operated schools. 440 U.S. at 507, 99 S.Ct. at 1322. In finding no jurisdiction, the Court relied in part on the fact that the Board had only recently reversed itself and asserted jurisdiction over private schools, after the most recent significant amendment of the Act. As a result, Congress had not passed upon the Board's action. Id. at 497–98, 505–06, 99 S.Ct. at 1317, 1321. The Court also noted that "the critical and unique role of the teacher in fulfilling the mission of a church-operated school" raised grave constitutional questions about the Board's assertion of jurisdiction. Id. at 501, 504, 99 S.Ct. at 1319, 1320. Consequently, the Court construed the Act not to grant jurisdiction over teachers in church-operated schools. Id. at 507, 99 S.Ct. at 1322.

In contrast to its practice with regard to private schools, the Board has long asserted jurisdiction over non-profit religious organizations engaged in commercial operations. See Christian Board of Publications, 13 NLRB 534, 547 (1939), enf'd, 113 F.2d 678 (8th Cir. 1940). In 1947 Congress rejected proposed amendments to exempt all non-profit organizations from the Act. Congress appeared to ratify the Board's assertion of jurisdiction at least as to the commercial activities of non-profit organizations. H.R.Rep.No. 510, 80th Cong., 1st sess. 31–32 (1947), reprinted in I NLRB, Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, at 535–36 (1948). See NLRB v. Wentworth Institute, 515 F.2d 550, 554–55 (1st Cir. 1975).

The First Amendment protects freedom to believe and freedom to act. The first is absolute. The second is "subject to regulation for the protection of society." Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296, 303–04, 60 S.Ct. 900, 903, 84 L.Ed. 1213 (1940). See also McDaniel v. Paty, 435 U.S. 618, 626–27, 98 S.Ct. 1322, 1327–28, 55 L.Ed.2d 593 (1978). Regulation of the freedom to act must not unduly infringe the protected freedom. Cantwell v. Connecticut, supra 310 U.S. at 304, 60 S.Ct. at 903; McDaniel v. Paty, supra 435 U.S. at 628, 98 S.Ct. at 1328.

The minimal infringement of WEI's freedom of operation is clearly outweighed here by the Act's role of promoting labor peace. Requiring WEI to recognize a union would not contravene its religious tenets. Nor would WEI's religious tenets compel it to commit an unfair labor practice. There has been no showing that recognizing a union would significantly impede WEI's ability to propagate its beliefs. See St. Elizabeth Community Hospital v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 123, 128–29 (9th Cir. 1980) (Sneed, J. dissenting). See also Yott v. North American Rockwell Corp., 501 F.2d 398, 403 (9th Cir. 1974) (clause requiring union membership of Seventh Day Adventist not unconstitutional); Cap Santa Vue, Inc. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 883, 891 (D.C. Cir. 1970) (applying Act to employer with religious objections to collective bargaining not unconstitutional). But cf. Catholic Bishop of Chicago v. NLRB, 559 F.2d 1112, 1123–25 (7th Cir. 1977), aff'd on other grounds, 440 U.S. 490, 99 S.Ct. 1313, 59 L.Ed.2d 533 (1979) (unconstitutional to apply Act where unionization would inhibit a religious group's ability to propagate its beliefs).

The Board properly assumed jurisdiction over WEI. WEI's operations were commercial, and its unit employees spent a substantial portion of time engaged in commercial activities. The limited exception to jurisdiction carved out in NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra, 440 U.S. 490, 99 S.Ct. 1313, 59 L.Ed.2d 533, is not applicable to this case.

III. WEI as a Successor Employer.

A new owner of a business must recognize and bargain with a representative of employees covered by a collective bargaining agreement if found to be a "successor employer." NLRB v. Burns International Security Services, Inc., 406 U.S. 272, 281, 92 S.Ct. 1571, 1579, 32 L.Ed.2d 61 (1972); Kallmann v. NLRB, 640 F.2d 1094, 1100 (9th Cir. 1981). A successor employer is one who conducts essentially the same business as the former employer, and a majority of whose work force are former employees, or would have been former employees absent an unlawful refusal to hire. Kallmann, supra. A successor employer commits an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain with the previously recognized union unless it can show either that the union in fact no longer represents a majority of the members of the bargaining unit, or that there are circumstances affording a reasonable basis for good-faith doubt about the majority. NLRB v. Edjo, Inc., 631 F.2d 604, 607 (9th Cir. 1980). There is substantial evidence in the record supporting the Board's finding that WEI is Handlery's successor. It retained all of the bargaining unit employees. It continued to operate the Center's hotel facilities and its commercial leasing operations. The unit employees continued to work at the same location performing the same tasks.

A successor employer is ordinarily free to set initial terms and conditions of employment without first bargaining with the incumbent union. Where, however, it is perfectly clear that the successor plans to retain substantially all the employees, the successor must consult with the union before altering terms and conditions. Burns International Security Services, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 406 U.S. at 294–95, 92 S.Ct.at 1585–86, 32 L.Ed.2d 61; Kallmann, 640 F.2d at 1102. When the successor does not evince an intention to modify the pre-existing terms before expressing willingness to rehire incumbents, the employer must consult with the union before altering employment terms. Bellingham Frozen Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 674, 678–79 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 941, 67 L.Ed.2d 110, 111 (1981).

Here it was perfectly clear that WEI intended to retain all of Handlery's engineers at their previous jobs. WEI was required to consult with the employees' bargaining representative before altering the terms of the pre-existing contract. WEI admittedly paid wages to the engineers which were lower than those prescribed by Handlery's contract. It also admittedly discontinued contributing to the employees' fringe benefit trusts. It took these steps without prior notice or bargaining with the Union. WEI violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally altering terms and conditions of employment.

IV. Adoption of the Handlery Contract.

A successor employer is not required to observe the terms of its predecessor's contract. A sucessor may choose to accept its predecessor's agreement. Burns International Security Services, Inc., 406 U.S. at 291, 92 S.Ct. at 1584; Kallmann, 640 F.2d at 1103. See also Audit Services, Inc. v. Rolfson, 641 F.2d 757, 763 (9th Cir. 1981).

In determining whether parties agreed to a contract, the Board is not bound by technical questions of traditional contract interpretation. The Board is free to use general contract principles adapted to the collective bargaining context to determine whether the two sides have reached an agreement. NLRB v. Electra-Food Machinery, Inc., 621 F.2d 956, 958 (9th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Donkin's Inn, Inc., 532 F.2d 138, 141–42 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 895, 97 S.Ct. 257, 50 L.Ed.2d 179 (1976). We review the Board's finding as to the existence of an agreement as a question of fact, governed by the substantial evidence standard of review.

In this case, the ALJ credited the testimony of the Union witnesses that Cerullo spoke in terms which would lead a reasonable person to conclude that agreement had been reached. The ALJ also relied upon WEI's subsequent actions. It apparently acquiesced in Brown's statement that he and Rose had reached agreement on contract terms. WEI brushed aside Brown's questions about the wages the engineers were receiving. It failed to indicate an inability to reach an agreement for over two months. The ALJ found this inconsistent with the belief that only negotiations were underway. The ALJ interpreted the discussions regarding the non-discrimination clause as a gratuitous, post-agreement concession by Brown to Rose, rather than an indication that WEI had not bound itself to the Handerly contract.

WEI does not contend that a clear preponderance of the evidence requires reversal of the ALJ's credibility determinations. Those determinations, along with WEI's post-agreement conduct, constitute substantial evidence supporting the finding that WEI adopted Handlery's contract. By failing to implement the terms of that contract, WEI violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSION

The Board properly asserted jurisdiction over WEI. Substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that WEI is a successor employer. Because it was perfectly clear that WEI intended to retain the engineers,

1356

WEI violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1) by altering terms and conditions of employment without consulting with their representative. Substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that WEI adopted Handlery's contract. Its failure to abide by the contract's terms violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1).

The Board's order is ENFORCED.

NLRB v. Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc.

662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir.), September 21, 1981;
rehearing denied October 13, 1981; certiorari denied 455 U.S. 989—251 NLRB 1083

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before CAMPBELL, BOWNES and BRYER, Circuit Judges

900

LEVIN H. CAMPBELL, Circuit Judge: Bernard Lamoureux, an activist in the Teamsters' two unsuccessful campaigns to organize Wright Line's employees, was discharged from his job as a shop inspector, ostensibly because he submitted an inaccurate record of the times at which he performed inspections on December 29, 1977. Upon Lamoureux's complaint, the Board found that Wright Line had discharged him because of his union activity, in violation of section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Board ordered Wright Line to reinstate Lamoureux with back pay. We enforce the Board's order.

I.

Wright Line manufactures computer storage products to the specifications of customers, including government agencies. Lamoureux began working for Wright Line in 1966 and, with the exception of a period between 1971 and 1973, was employed there continuously until his discharge on December 30, 1977. The Board found, with substantial record support, that Lamoureux's work, throughout this period unitl December 29, 1977 was satisfactory or better. For the last two years of his employment, he worked in the company's Inspection Department, inspecting completed parts for quality and conformity to specifications. This position required that he keep records on two forms: the Inspection Report, which stayed with the blueprint for the inspected part, and the Daily Activity Sheet, on which he recorded the time of each inspection and which he submitted to his supervisor after each day's work.

In 1976, Lamoureux contacted Teamsters Local 170 and initiated an organizational drive among Wright Line's employees. The Board supportably found that Lamoureux was visibly active in the union campaign. An election was held on August 27, 1976, and Lamoureux served as an alternative observer for the union, which lost the election. A second campaign was conducted in the fall of 1977, and Lamoureux was again active. An election was held on October 20, 1977; the union lost again. The Board supportably found that Wright Line management conducted an aggressive (although not necessarily unlawful) campaign against the union, and that management was well aware of Lamoureux's activism, certain supervisors having made "gratuitous remarks" to him about it.

The Board found, on the basis of substantial evidence, that Lamoureux's discharge occurred as follows: on the morning of December 29, 1977, Plant Superintendent Southard asked Supervisor Forte to check on Lamoureux, reporting that he had seen Lamoureux entering the men's room carrying a newspaper. Forte went to Lamoureux's two assigned departments and walked between them until Lamoureux appeared some 35 minutes later. Forte then returned to his office, saying nothing to Lamoureux, and noted the times of Lamoureux's absence. Forte had made no attempt to locate Lamoureux, neither looking in the men's room nor using the plant's page system, although Lamoureux's job included several tasks which would require him to leave his departments for short periods. Later the same day, Forte had occasion to be in Lamoureux's department and did not find him there. About 30 minutes later he found Lamoureux at a workbench inspecting a part. Forte again made a record of the incident but did not ask Lamoureux to explain.

The next morning, Fort checked Lamoureux's Daily Activity Sheet and noted Lamoureux report that he had made several inspections during the time when Forte had failed to find him in his departments. Forte presented this information to his own supervisor, who stated that this indicated a "dischargeable offense." The two consulted higher officials, who told them that they "could discharge" Lamoureux if his account substantiated the charge. Forte prepared a written report of the incident, had Lamoureux's final paycheck prepared, and then summoned Lamoureux to a meeting with himself and two others. Confronted with the charge, Lamoureux admitted that "the times weren't accurate and they never were," stating that "if you want them right to the second, I can put them right to the second," and asserting that the real reason for the confrontation was his union activity. The supervisors denied this charge and discharged Lamoureux, saying that they no longer considered him trustworthy.[1]

II.

Section 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3), provides that,

> (a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer
> (3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any terms or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization.

This provision is supplemented by section 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c), which authorizes the Board to take remedial action, with the following limitation:

> No order of the Board shall require the reinstatement of any individual as an employee who has been suspended or discharged, or the payment to him of any backpay, if such individual was suspended or discharged for cause.

Section 8(a)(3) imposes a prohibition on employers which is simple to state but often difficult to apply in practice: they may not discharge an employee bacause of his union activity; but they may and should apply their usual rules and disciplinary standards to a union activist just as they would to any other employee. Hence, in a given discharge case it must be decided whether the employer acted because of the employee's union affiliation, or whether he acted because of some factor unrelated to the employee's union status. Local 357, International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 667, 675, 81 S.Ct. 835, 839, 6 L.Ed.2d 11 (1961) (test is "true purpose" or "real motive").

[1] The Wright Line managers did not then and do not now contend that Lamoureux did not actually perform any of the inspections he reported. Their complaint was and is only that he "falsified" his report of the timing of his inspections.

Often, of course, there are competing explanations of why an employee was fired. Board counsel will point to evidence of antiunion motivation. The employer will cite some instance of misconduct, and will deny having been motivated by any other consideration. In such a situation, the Board needs to determine not only whether the asserted misconduct occurred, but whether, even so, it effectively produced the discharge. The employer will doubtless lose if the asserted misconduct is shown not to have occurred. But suppose it occurred? In such event, Board counsel will argue that it was insufficient cause for discharge—that a non-activist would have been retained notwithstanding the offense. The employer, on the other hand, will deny this, and will insist, moreover, on his right, as the employer, to determine what conduct is or is not acceptable.

The Board's approach to these cases—sometimes, although without complete accuracy, termed "mixed motive" cases—has been the source of a continuing controversy among the circuits and between the Board and this court. In the present case, the Board has taken a new approach. Relying on Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471(1977), and precedent from this circuit, the Board announced the following rule: general counsel must first "make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that [the employer's opposition to] protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's [discharge] decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct." 251 NLRB No. 150, at 20-21. Applying that test here, the Board found that the prima facie case had been made and that Wright Line failed to prove that it would have taken the same action regardless of Lamoureux's union activity. Wright Line challenges the Board's new approach and its application here as contrary to the provisions of the statute and beyond the powers of the Board in that it places the burden of persuasion on the employer. We are thus called upon to pass on the validity of the Board's new rule as well as on its application to this record.[2]

We start by observing that the Board's new rule seems better than its old one. Previously the Board would find a violation of section 8(a)(3) and order reinstatement whenever it concluded that the discharge was even partially motivated by opposition to union membership. Under this approach, a discharge was improper even if it would have occurred absent the illegal motivation, e.g., the employee may have committed an infraction so serious that any employee—union or non-union—would have been fired. This partial motivation test—as the Board now acknowledges—placed "the union activist in an almost impregnable position once [anti-]union animus has been established." Activists could not be discharged for conduct that would be unforgivable in the case of another employee. The result was to immunize union activists against legitimate discipline for genuine offenses, and to deprive employers of the freedom to apply their own rules uniformly to all their employees. See NLRB v. Wilson Freight Co., 604 F.2d 712 (1st Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666 (1st Cir. 1979); Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 595 (1st Cir. 1979); Hubbard Regional Hospital v. NLRB, 579 F.2d 1251 (1st Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Rich's of Plymouth, Inc., 578 F.2d 880 (1st Cir. 1978); Stone & Webster Engineering Co. v. NLRB, 536 F.2d 461 (1st Cir. 1976); NLRB v. Fibers International Corp., 439 F.2d 1311 (1st Cir. 1971); NLRB v. Billen Shoe Co., 397 F.2d 801 (1st Cir. 1968); NLRB v. Lowell Sun Publishing Co., 320 F.2d 835 (1st Cir. 1963).

In response to the Board's handling of these cases, we have repeatedly urged the Board to go beyond the employer's obvious wish to be rid of an activist and to inquire into the question of actual cause, giving serious consideration to the employer's legitimate business reasons for discharging the employee. See e.g., NLRB v. Lowell Sun, 320 F.2d at 841 (Aldrich, J., concurring) (employer's knowledge that discharge will have pleasing result not to be confused with actuating motive). We have expressed this concern by insisting that the Board find the protected activity to be the "dominant motive" for the discharge. See, e.g., NLRB v. Fibers International, 439 F.2d 1311; NLRB v. Lowell Sun, 320 F.2d 835 (Aldrich, J., concurring); NLRB v. Whitin Machine Works, 204 F.2d 883, 885 (1st Cir. 1953) (reinstatement warranted if protected activity "weighed more heavily" than other factors); and cases cited in these opinions. Elaborating on the meaning of this test, we have held that the Board may order reinstatement only after finding that the discharge would not have occurred in the absence of the protected activity. NLRB v. Fibers International, 439 F.2d at 1312 n.1 & 1315.

[2] Our review of the Board's factual findings is limited to determining whether they are supported by sustantial evidence. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). But the Board's adoption of the Mt. Healthy test, to the extent that it establishes a new standard or set of legal presumptions, is a ruling of law which we review for legal error, giving due deference to the Board's expertise in interpreting the act it administers.

The Supreme Court's decision in Mt. Healthy v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471, followed by Givhan v. Western Line C[illegible]lidated School District, 439 U.S. 410, 99 S.Ct. 693, 58 L.Ed.2d 619 (1979), seemed to us to lend strong support to our analysis in the Fibers International case.

In cases since Mt. Healthy, we have relied on its expression of the "but for" standard, abandoning our earlier "dominant motive" language. Statler Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 902 (1st Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666, 671 (1st Cir. 1979); Coletti's Furniture, Inc. v. NLRB, 550 F.2d 1292 (1st Cir. 1977). We came to recognize that the existence or not of a casual link between union activity and the employee's injury—or, as section 8(a)(3) puts it, the existence of anti-union "discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment"—was most accurately determined by asking whether the discharge would have occurred "but for" the protected activity. If the discharge would have occured absent the protected activity, it is clear no unfair practice existed since a bad motive without effect is no more an unfair labor practice than an unexecuted evil intent is a crime. While Mt. Healthy involved employee activity protected by the Constitution rather than by the NLRA, it presented issues of causation, harm and remedy very similar to those raised in the labor context, and the Court expressed the same concerns that we have voiced in labor cases.[3] The lower court in Mt. Healthy, like the Board in past labor cases, had ordered reinstatement on a finding that the protected activity was one of two reasons for the decision to discharge the employee. The Court's dissatisfaction with the result was exactly what ours had been: that the employee who engaged in protected conduct would thereby be placed in a better position than he would have held if he had not done so, and his employer's freedom to apply legitimate performance standards would be impaired by the activist's favored position. Id., 429 U.S. at 285–87, 97 S.Ct. at 575–76. To avoid these results while protecting the employee's rights, the Court ruled that reinstatement should be ordered only upon a finding that the employee would not have been discharged but for the protected conduct. In labor cases, as in constitutional cases, we think the "but for" test is the correct substantive standard for evaluating the propriety of a reinstatement order.[4]

Wright Line does not appear to quarrel with this substantive test. Its challenge is to the Board's apparent adoption of Mt. Healthy's allocation of the burdens of proof. Mt. Healthy held that once the plaintiff had shown his protected activity to have been a "substantial" or "motivating" factor, "the court should have gone on to determine whether the Board [of Education] had shown by a preponderance of the evidence that it would have reached the same decision as to respondent's reemployment even in the absence of the protected conduct." Id., 429 U.S. at 287, 97 S.Ct. at 576. See also Givhan v. Western Line, 439 U.S. at 416, 99 S.Ct. at 697. Wright Line contends, citing section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act,[5] the Board's regulation 101.10(b),[6] and section 7(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act,[7] that the Board lacks authority to place any burden of proof on the employer. Wright Line argues that DuRoss, "Toward Rationality in Discriminatory Discharge Cases: The Impact of Mt. Healthy Board of Education v. Doyle Upon the NLRA," 66 Georgetown L.J. 1109 (1978).

[4] We have applied the same substantive test to evaluate a claim for reinstatement by an employee allegedly discharged in violation of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act. Loeb v. Textron, 600 F.2d 1003, 1019 (1st Cir. 1979).

[5] Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c), provides in part:

> If upon the preponderance of the testimony taken the Board shall not be of the opinion that the person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any such unfair labor practice, then the Board shall state its findings of fact and shall issue an order dismissing the said complaint.

these provisions require the Board to prove the employer's guilt by a preponderance of the evidence, and that the Board's burden-shifting approach instead requires the employer to prove his innocence.

We have no difficulty accepting the Board's formulation that some kind of a "burden" devolves upon the employer once the general counsel has made a prima facie showing that protected conduct was a motivating or substantial factor in the discharge decision. 251 NLRB No. 150, at 20–21. Indeed, in Statler Industries v. NLRB, this court approved the general causation analysis expressed in the Board's Wright Line opinion. 644 F.2d at 905. On further reflection, however, we disagree with the Board on the narrow issue of defining the exact nature of the burden which the employer thus acquires. Section 10(c), as well as the Board's own regulation, make clear that the general counsel must prove the employer's guilt by a preponderance of the evidence to warrant a finding that an unfair labor practice has occurred.[8] We think the only burden which may be acceptably placed on the employer is a "burden of production," that is a burden of coming forward with credible evidence to rebut or meet the general counsel's prima facie case. This, in effect, is the position we took recently in other cases although without actually characterizing the employer's burden as one of "production" rather than "persuasion." NLRB v. Amber Delivery Service, 651 F.2d 57 (1st Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Cable Vision, 660 F.2d 1 (1st Cir. 1981). We said in those cases that once the general counsel has established a basis for finding an improper motive, the employer must merely "come forward with enough evidence to convince the trier of fact that, under the circumstances, there is no longer a preponderance of evidence establishing a violation." NLRB v. Amber Delivery Service, 651 F.2d at 69; NLRB v. Cable Vision, at 8.

Professor Wigmore distinguishes between the burden of rebutting a prima facie case and the burden of persuading the trier of fact on the ulitimate issue in a case by a preponderance of the evidence as follows:

> ["A"] 'prima facie' case * * * need not be overcome by a preponderance of the evidence, or by evidence of greater weight; but the evidence needs only to be balanced, put in equipoise, by some evidence worthy of credence; and, if this be done, the burden of the evidence is met and the duty of producing further evidence shifts

[6] 29 C.F.R. § 101.10(b) provides in part:

> The Board's attorney has the burden of proof of violations of section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act.

[7] Section 7(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 556, provides in part that "Except as otherwise provided by statute, the proponent of a rule or order has the burden of proof."

[8] The Board relied on NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S.C. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967), in which the Court held that "once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which would have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him." Id., at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797. Great Dane, which involved a challenge to an overall policy of the employer rather than to a single discharge, is inapposite here. Where an overall policy concededly does discriminate against protected activity, the Board must balance the employer's justification against the employee's interest, and it may fairly require the employer to demonstrate the genuineness and strength of its asserted business reason. But here the issue is whether the discharge was in fact discriminatory—whether it was caused by protected activity or whether some other factor was operative. Great Dane has no application. See L. Janofsky, "New Concepts in Interference and Discrimination under the NLRA," 70 Colum.L.Rev. 81, 96 (1970).

The Board also invokes the portion of section 10(c) quoted at the beginning of this section, regarding discharges for cause, citing Congress' rejection, in drafting this provision, of proposed language barring reinstatement unless the "weight of the evidence shows that such individual was not suspended or discharged for cause." H.R. 3020, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., § 10 (1947). Quoting passages from debate on this provision, the Board argues that Congress intended to keep the burden of showing cause where Congress understood that it had been—on the employer. 93 Cong.Rec. 6677–78 (remarks of Senator Taft); 93 Cong.Rec. 7683 (remarks of Senator Ball). Wright Line argues, citing other passages of debate and quoting the Conference Report on the bill, that Congress did indeed intend to keep the burden where it was—on the Board. H.R. Conf. Rep. No. 510, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 55 (1947); 93 Cong.Rec. 6677–78 (colloquy between Senators Taft and Pepper). We find the legislative history as well as the statutory language inconclusive on the question of burden of proof. This provision of section 10(c) served to reaffirm the substantive standard that was already implicit in section 8(a)(3) and that we have repeatedly urged on the Board: reinstatement is not warranted if the discharge was actually the result of "cause" rather than of unlawful discrimination, even though "cause" might coincide with union activity to which the employer is hostile. See NLRB v. Eastern Massachusetts Street Ry. Co., 235 F.2d 700, 709 (1st Cir. 1956) ("The purpose of this provision is to make it abundantly clear that the Board is not to interfere with the exercise by employers of their traditional right to discharge employees for adequate cause."). The question of burden of proof is addresed only in the "preponderance" language of the preceding sentence of section 10(c); that provision requires the general counsel to prove the violation by a proponderance of the evidence.

back to the party having the burden of proof. * * *."

9 Wigmore on Evidence § 2487, at 282 (3d ed. 1940), quoting Speas v. Merchant's Bank & Trust Co., 188 N.C. 524, 125 S.E. 398 (1924).

Put another way, the general counsel's initial, prima facie showing creates a kind of presumption that an unfair labor practice has been committed. At this point, the employer risks losing his case unless he rebuts the presumption with evidence of his own. The Board may properly recognize this by stating that the employer (who alone has access both to the reason he discharged the employee and any corroborative evidence) now comes under a "burden" to produce evidence of a "good" reason for the discharge. The imposition of this limited burden, however, does not shift to the employer the burden of proving that an unfair labor practice has not occurred. Rule 301 of the Federal Rules of Evidence very aptly describes the scope of the duty involved in rebutting presumptions in civil cases as "the burden of going forward with evidence to rebut or meet the presumption," and distinguishes this duty from "the burden of proof in the sense of the risk of nonpersuasion, which remains throughout the trial upon the party on whom it was originally cast." Fed.R.Evid. 301. Thus, the employer in a section 8(a)(3) discharge case has no more than the limited duty of producing evidence to balance, not to outweight, the evidence produced by the general counsel.

The Board may properly provide, therefore, that "Once [a prima facie showing] is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct." 251 NLRB No. 150, at 20-21 (footnote omitted). The "burden" referrred to, however, is a burden of going forward to meet a prima facie case, not a burden of persuasion on the ultimate issue of the existence of a violation.[9]

We recognize that the Supreme Court's language in Mt. Healthy appeared to place an affirmative burden of persuasion on the employer. We further recognize that this court's acceptance of Mt. Healthy in some previous cases may have suggested that we, too, saw the burden upon the employer as in all situations, a burden of persuasion.[10] A closer look at Mt. Healthy, however, indicates a critical difference between that case and most labor cases. This difference does not affect the substantive utility of the "but for" analysis there employed, but does affect the nature of the employer's burden.

In Mt. Healthy, the employer conceded that he had fired the employee for speech activity which was later found to be fully protected under the first amendment. Thus, the "but for" test was not used, as it is in the typical labor case, as a part of the process of deciding whether a violation of protected rights had occurred. Rather, the "but for" test applied only after such a violation had been proven by the employer's own admission. The employer's claim, then, was a true affirmative defense to a rehiring order—i.e., the employer contended that notwithstanding his violation of the Constitution reinstatement was improper as a remedy because the employee had also been involved in an altercation with another teacher, an argument with cafeteria employees, and an incident in which he made obscene gestures to female students. The employer argued that these incidents, which were totally independent of the protected speech activity, justified the employee's dismissal notwithstanding the fact that the employer had violated the employee's constitutional rights.[11] The employer's claim was [9] The Board appears to recognize that the general counsel must always establish the existence of an unfair labor practice by a preponderance of the evidence, but then confuses the issue by mislabeling the employer's burden as an "affirmative defense." 251 NLRB No. 150, at 18 n. 11. The employer's duty, however, is merely a burden of producing rebuttal evidence and thus in no way resembles a true affimative defense. Moreover, the Board's Reference to its own "prima facie case" may suggest that the general counsel should prevail upon a showing of something less than a preponderance of evidence that the counsel's version of disputed facts is the true one. Let there be no mistake here either. The burden of persuasion on all issues of disputed facts rests at all times with the general counsel.

[10] Statler Industries, 644 F.2d 902 (1st Cir. 1981), for example, suggested that an employer in a section 8(a)(3) discharge case bears the burden of persuasion in proving that there would have been no discharge but for an employee's protected activity. Id., at 905 n.4. On this narrow issue regarding the burden of proof, we disaffirm our previous ruling and adopt the analysis set forth in this opinion. Also, to the extent that NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666 (1st Cir. 1979), can be read to impose a burden of proof on the employer, it, too, is hereby overruled. Nevertheless, we do hold that the Board is justified, after a prima facie showing by the general counsel, in requiring the employer to produce evidence showing "that it had a good reason, sufficient in itself, to produce the discharge." Id., at 671.

[11] A similar claim might, on rare occasions, be raised in some labor cases. For example, where an employer fires a person for union activity, thus a true affirmative defense which went to the appropriateness of the remedy being applied rather than to the existence of a violation in the first instance.

By contrast, in the typical labor case (and in the present case), the employer vigorously disputes the determining reason for the discharge. These cases therefore do not involve true affirmative defenses going to the appropriateness of the remedy, nor would the "but for" analysis be employed to determine the existence of such an affirmative defense. Rather, the "but for" test is in such cases a convenient formula for deciding whether or not an unfair labor practice has actually occurred—i.e., for deciding if the determining motive of the discharge was anti-union animus or some valid business reason. The "but for" standard requires a determination by the Board, based on all the evidence, that, wholly apart from an alleged illegal motive, the employer would (or would not) have discharged the employee for the conduct ascribed to him by the employer. If the discharge would have taken place irrespective of the anti-union motive, no unfair labor practice took place: if the discharge would not have taken place, it is clear that the determining reason for the discharge was the protected activity, not the reason given by the employer.[12] With respect to this ultimate question of a determining causal link between the bad motive and the discharge, the burden of persuasion remains always with the general counsel. In the course of its inquiry, however, the Board and the ALJ are entitled to place a burden of production on the employer in the manner already described once a sufficient prima facie showing of illegal motive is made by the general counsel. Cf. Texas Department of Community Affairs v. Burdine, 450 U.S. 248, 101 S.Ct. 1089, 67 L.Ed.2d 207 (1981) (stating that burden of persuasion on the issue of discriminatory intent in Title VII cases remains always with the plaintiff).

It may be said by way of concluding our discussion on this point, that labels concerning burdens of "persuasion" and "production" are not, as a practical matter, likely to be very important in most of these cases. Decision will usually turn on a weighing of all the evidence. But this weighing, under the Board's new formulation, will include a careful consideration of the employer's "good" reason as well as of the general counsel's evidence of improper motive. This approach will assure that due consideration is given to all facets of the case.

III.

Applying these principles to Wright Line's discharge of Bernard Lamoureux, we find substantial evidence to support a conclusion by the Board, on the preponderance of the evidence, that Lamoureux was discharged because of his union activity.[13] We therefore affirm the Board's finding that Wright Line violated the Act in discharging Lamoureux, and that Lamoureux is entitled to reinstatement with back pay.

As background to the discharge, the general counsel presented evidence that Lamoureux was a leading union advocate and that Wright Line management was aware of Lamoureux's role. The evi-in clear violation of section 8(a)(3), but a few days later discovers the employee had, unknown to anyone, been embezzling money, the employer may be justifiably required to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that a reinstatement order for his unfair labor practice is inappropriate. The employer there is not defending on the ground that the discharge was properly motivated, but rather on the theory that, notwithstanding the commission of an unfair labor practice, he should not have to take the particular person back. Cf. NLRB v. Savin Business Machines Corp., 649 F.2d 89, 93 (1st Cir. 1981) (employee's participation in robbery after unlawfully motivated discharge would have great bearing on right to reinstatement). It should be emphasized, however, that this is the rare case. Typically, employers and the general counsel point to the same or to related evidence and ascribe difference inferences of motivation. In this more normal situation, the general counsel must prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the employer had an illegal motivation and that the employer would not have fired the employee anyway for a valid business reason.

[12] Our disagreement with the Board may reduce to this: the Board apparently feels that the Act is violated by a showing of anti-union sentiment in connection with a discharge. It would then impose an affirmative defense upon the employer to negate the violation. In our view, by contrast, the Act is violated only when an employer with anti-union animus discharges an employee he would not have fired "but for" the employee's union activity. We think that even employers who do not particularly like unions nevertheless comply with the law so long as they treat all their employees—union and non-union—alike.

[13] Although the Board arrived at their conclusion by the use of a standard with which, in some respects, we disagree, we see no reason to remand this case for new findings. The ALJ in this case conclusively found that the company's alleged legitimate reason for discharging Lamoureux "has no validity at all" and "was false." There is substantial evidence to support these findings. Moreover, the company here, unlike the school board in Mt. Healthy and Givhan v. Western Line Consolidated School District, 439 U.S. 410, 99 S.Ct. 693, 58 L.Ed.2d 693 (1979), did not allege a series of wholly distinct events, some of which were unrelated to protected activity and which might "admit of the argument" that the employer would have discharged Lamoureux despite his union activity. Id., at 417 n.5, 99 S.Ct. at 697 n.5. Thus, no remand is necessary in this case.

dence showed that management was aggressive in its opposition to the union and that management's hostility was on occasion directed at Lamoureux in particular.[14] The general counsel also presented evidence of the circumstances surrounding the discharge itself. These circumstances, taken together and in the light of this background, support the Board's inference that the company was watching Lamoureux for any transgression that might provide an opportunity for discharge, and that it seized on Lamoureux's otherwise trivial offense to effectuate its true purpose of getting rid of an activist.

The evidence showed that Southard had asked Forte to check on Lamoureux, who was entering the men's room with a newspaper, even though this conduct violated no company rule and even though Lamoureux had no history of laxity to warrant suspicion. Forte's "checking" consisted of measuring and documenting Lamoureux's absence; it did not include looking in the men's room or paging Lamoureux, even though Lamoureux's job was such that he might have been absent for a legitimate purpose. When Forte found Lamoureux after another absence later in the day, he did not ask for an explanation, although he apparently considered the absence significant enough to merit recording. From these facts, the Board could reasonably infer that Southard and Forte were primarily interested in building a case against Lamoureux rather than simply assuring that he attend properly to his work.

The events following Forte's review of Lamoureux's time report also support the inference of impropriety. Rather then confronting Lamoureux directly, as might be expected of a supervisor who discovers an apparent transgression by an otherwise satisfactory long-term employee, Forte immediately consulted higher officials. These managers' first response was that the offense was "dischargeable"; they made the decision to discharge Lamoureux even before discussing the matter with him. By the time Lamoureux was called in, Forte had prepared his final paycheck and drafted a memorandum for the file. When Lamoureux finally received a chance to explain, his defense apparently fell on deaf ears. He conveyed no inability or unwillingness to make accurate time reports; rather his response suggested that he had not done so because he had not considered it important, and that he would do so if desired. Nevertheless, he was not warned or reprimanded, but discharged. From this and other evidence, mentioned hereinafter, the Board could reasonably infer that the inaccurate time report was seized upon to justify action taken for another reason.

This inference might have been overcome had there been evidence establishing that Wright Line would have fired employees in Lamoureux's position (whether or not union activists) for this sort of infraction. For example, it might have been proven that Wright Line was a consistently strict employer who commonly fired employees for rule violations no more serious than this, or else that this was in fact a violation very detrimental to its business which warranted discharge. Had this been done—had it been established that apart from union activity, Lamoureux would have been discharged for making such a time report—a finding for the employer would have been indicated. But no such conclusion was required on this record. Wright Line relies on its rule against "knowingly altering or falsifying production time reports."[15] It emphasizes its use of Daily Activity Reports to verify performance of inspections, to evaluate individual inspectors, and to monitor staffing levels. But the Board concluded, with ample support in the record, that the time of each inspection, as opposed to the fact that each was done and the number done in a day, had no bearing on any of these calculations and received no notice from management. Lamoureux testified, and the Board was entitled to believe, that he had never been instructed to record times exactly, that he had never heard of any employee being critized for inaccurate reporting of times, and that the general practice among inspectors was to record times in "round figures." The Board could conclude from the evidence that Lamoureux's offense affected no significant inter- 909 est of his employer, and no interest that Wright Line had treated as significant.[16]

[14] There was testimony that the company distributed reproductions of newspaper articles derogatory to the Teamsters Union, including one article relating the murder indictment of an official of another Teamsters local. There was also evidence of a letter to employees in which the company president stated that Wright Line's "chances for survival and growth would be seriously hurt by the presence of a union," and evidence of three incidents during the 1977 campaign involving Lamoureux. On one such occasion, Supervisor Forte called Lamoureux to his office and charged him with "pressuring someone to vote union"; Forte later retracted the statement. On another occasion, Forte saw Lamoureux counting his pay and asked "What's that? Union campaign funds?" In a third incident, a foreman told Lamoureux that "Everybody knows you're the union kingpin." Wright Line contends that the Board's reliance on these incidents is improper, since the Board has not alleged that any of them involved an unfair labor practice by the company, and since some may involve expression protected by the first amendment. We have held, however, that anti-union statements "plainly within [management's] rights * * * do lend a significance to otherwise ambiguous events when the question is whether a given course of conduct was actuated by anti-union animus." NLRB v. Lowell Sun, 320 F.2d at 840. The incidents cited, whether lawful or not, do not prove that Lamoureux was discharged because of his union activity. But they do show that the company knew of his activity and was displeased by it; they thus provide a relevant background for analyzing the circumstances of the discharge.

[15] The rule, which also prohibits falsifying "payroll records, or punching another employee's timecard without supervisory approval," provides that a first infraction "may" be punished by discharge or by any lesser disciplinary infraction, such as suspension or a warning. Of course, where an employer enforces a valid rule in an even-handed manner, there is usually no violation of the Act. See Texas Instruments v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 822 (1st Cir. 1981) (finding that employee violation of valid rule prohibiting disclosure of confidential information justified discharge because such activity is not protected by section 7).

Wright Line asserts that Lamoureux's "falsehood" proved him untrustworthy, and therefore unworthy of the reliance it must place on its inspectors. Clearly a showing of dishonesty would cause most employers to discharge an employee. The Board could reasonably doubt, however, that an employer would lose its trust in such a long term, satisfactory employee on the basis of an inaccuracy that cost the employer nothing and gained the employee nothing. Lamoureux's time report, under these circumstances, suggests no intention to falsify; at worst it demonstrates carelessness on a matter of little significance.

Further, the evidence showed that Wright Line's past practice in handling similar offenses had been quite different. The Administrative Law Judge found, based on testimony regarding the time required to perform inspections, that reports submitted by other inspectors contained "easily discernible" inaccuracies; yet no other inspector was ever disciplined in any way for inaccurate time reports. There was also evidence of an incident in which Wright Line's Chief Inspector had another employee punch her time card, a violation of the same rule. See note 15, supra. Even though such conduct strongly suggests deliberate falsification to cover an unexcused absence at the employer's expense, the Chief Inspector received only a warning; she was not discharged. There was evidence that Wright Line had discharged two employees for dishonesty, but both instances involved conduct amounting to outright theft from the company. One of these employees, an accountant, had embezzled funds, while the other, a saleman, had falsified his reports so as to collect unearned commissions. On this evidence, the Board was warranted in perceiving a difference between Wright Line's responses to Lamoureux's offense and its handling of comparable incidents of misconduct. The Board could reasonably infer from this that some other factor was involved in Lamoureux's case; and the background of Lamoureux's activism and the company's animus could be thought to supply the missing factor.

Further support for the Board's conclusion as to Wright Line's motivation comes from the ALJ's incredibility judgments. To rebut the inference of improper motive, Wright Line presented the testimony of three of the officials involved in the discharge. Each related his own view of the incident, denying any concern for Lamoureux's "untrustworthiness," as shown by his false time report. The ALJ stated that, from the demeanor of the witnesses as well as from "the record as a whole * * * I do not believe that they were truthful in revealing the 'real reason' for Lamoureux's discharge." The ALJ's evaluation of Forte's testimony is particularly specific. He found that Forte appeared generally honest, until questioned about Lamoureux's discharge. "Here, being a generally truthful man, he showed physical signs of disassembling." The ALJ's credibility judgments must stand unless they are unreasonable, which these are not. Under these circumstances, the witnesses' untruthfulness strengthens the inference of unlawful motive. Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966).

On this record, the Board was justified in finding that the general counsel had proven, by a preponderance of the evidence, that Wright Line discharged Lamoureux because of his union acitivity, in violation of section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

The petition for enforcement is granted.

[16] It is, of course, the employer's judgment of the importance of time records, and not the Board's judgment or our own, that matters. An employer is entitled to make and enforce his own rules, however foolish they may appear to the Board, as long as he does not base personnel decisions on union status. See, e.g., Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d at 603. Nevertheless, where the issue is what motivated a decision to discharge, the apparent insignificance of a particular rule, along with the employer's histroy of treating it as unimportant, support an inference that something more was involved than just a breach of that rule.

Atlas Metal Parts Co., Inc. v. NLRB

660 F.2d 304 (7th Cir.), September 22, 1981—252 NLRB 205

On petition to review Board Order

Before PELL, Circuit Judge, MARKEY, Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals,* and WOOD, Circuit judge.

MARKEY, Chief Judge: Atlas Metal Parts Co., Inc. (Atlas) petitions to review, and the National Labor Relations Board (board) Cross-petitions to enforce, the board's order of September 17, 1980. The board found Atlas guilty of violating Sections 8(a)(1), 8(a)(3), and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act. We modify.

BACKGROUND

Negotiations

Atlas is a small shop, employing 35 persons in the preparation of metal parts for other manufacturers. In 1956, it recognized Local 806, Allied Industrial Workers of America, AFL-CIO (Union) as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees. Atlas and Union entered into successive collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent (the 1977 contract) covering March 1, 1977 to March 1, 1978.

Bargaining on a new agreement began February 1, 1978,[1] when Union proposed 24 changes in the 1977 contract. On February 15, Atlas countered with 36 proposed changes. During the next six weeks, the parties met five more times, engaging in the give and take of collective bargaining.

All contracts since 1957 contained a union security clause, requiring employees to join the Union and to maintain membership therein after 45 days of employment. Beginning in 1967, the contracts also provided for checkoff of union dues. Atlas wished to eliminate the security and checkoff provisions and to replace them with an affirmative freedom of choice provision concerning Union membership.[2]

By April 3, Atlas had retreated from 34 of its original demands and the only issues separating the parties were union security and checkoff.

On April 6, the employees struck. The parties met five times during the 13-week strike. At the first meeting, on April 20, Union submitted and Atlas agreed to four new proposals seeking guarantees for striking employees. Union security and check-off continued, however, to separate the parties.

No progress was made on May 1 and 16. Union increased its wage demand on June 6, and its accident/sickness benefits demand on June 30. Atlas countered by reintroducing several original proposals on June 30.

By letter dated July 11, Union advised it was terminating the strike as of July 14, and offered on behalf of all striking employees to return to work on July 17. Atlas responded that it would recall returning strikers on a seniority basis as work became available. It did not offer to terminate replacement employees to make room for returning strikers.

On August 4, Union wrote to Atlas, requesting the names, dates of hire, and classifications of all active employees, and the names of employees who resigned or were terminated since the strike began. Union's letter included: "The Union further requests to know whether the Company has contracted out work, to whom and for how long. We are further requesting copies of any agreements of subcontracting." Union advanced no reasons for its requests. On August 7, Atlas replied that it would comply with the first two requests. Concerning the third, Atlas said, "with respect to contracting out work, the Company has done this for many years."

The parties met on seven more occasions between August 4, 1978 and February 13, 1979. During that period, Union dropped its proposals for union security and check-off. Atlas adhered to several of its original proposals.

Between April 3, 1978 and February 6, 1979, Atlas took these unilateral actions on the dates indicated:

*The Honorable Howard T. Markey, Chief Judge, United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, is sitting by designation.

[1] Events described in the text occurred in 1978 unless otherwise stated.

[2] Atlas' proposed clause reads: The Union and the Company agree that whether an employee belongs to the Union or doesn't belong to the Union is a matter of personal choice for each individual employee. Employees do not have to belong to the Union or pay a fee to the Union in order to work at the Company.

1. An April 3, 1978 wage increase of 7½ per cent to all employees;
2. A May 1, 1978 increase in accident and sickness benefit from $84 to $91 per week;
3. An August 1978 work rule change—suspension of the third step in the progressive disciplinary procedures for absences (namely, 3-day layoffs);
4. An October 1, 1978 wage increase to all employees of 3½ per cent;
5. An October 1, 1978 elimination of the AIW Pension Fund and unilateral grant of a wage increase in lieu thereof;

6. A February 6, 1979 implementation of a general wage increase of 4 per cent;
7. A February 6, 1979 increase of shift differential from 20 cents to 22 cents per hour;
8. A February 6, 1979 increase of life insurance coverage from $4,000 to $10,000.
9. A February 6, 1979 institution of payment for employees' safety glasses and increase from $5 to $7 in the allowance for safety shoes; and
10. A February 6, 1979 increase in direct payments to employees in lieu of payments to the AIW Pension Fund from 17 cents to 22 cents.

Employee Behling

Behling was a Union signatory to the 1977 contract and chairman of the 1978 bargaining committee. Before the strike, he worked as a tool and die maker. After the strike he was reinstated as janitor-utility man, the best job then available. In late August, he applied for but was denied assignment as a truck driver. On September 10, he became a die grinder, at the established pay rate for that job. When Behling performed die-making tasks thereafter he was paid at the higher die-making rate.

Barr's Remark to Behling

In August, Behling was talking with two other employees just before quitting time. Supervisor Barr, standing about 30 feet from Behling, yelled at him to stop talking about union business on company time.

Employee Rigdon

Rigdon testified that in February, after he had succeeded in getting a job rerated by filing a grievance, supervisor Barr "told me that I should stop filing a grievance on jobs. And if I did that, I would make more money and things would run a lot smoother. And if I did not, he would give me * * * dirty jobs which means bad-rated jobs". Rigdon testified that Barr repeated the statement in early March, after Rigdon had been successful in another grievance. According to Rigdon, Barr's assistant, Peltier, approached him and told him "basically the same thing as [Barr] told me in the morning".

Proceedings

On September 29, complaints were issued based on charges filed by the Union under Sections 8(a)(1), 8(a)(3), and 8(a)(5) of the Act. A hearing was held on May 7–10, 1979 before an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ). In his December 13, 1979 decision, the ALJ found that: (1) Atlas violated Section 8(a)(5) by negotiating without intent to reach agreement, by taking unilateral actions during negotiations, and by refusing to furnish information relevant and necessary to Union's representative function; (2) the strike was caused and prolonged by Atlas' bad faith bargaining; (3) Atlas violated Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) by delaying employee Behling's reinstatement to the tool room until September 10, by reducing his wages at that time, and by denying him the position of truck driver; and (4) Atlas violated Section 8(a)(1) by promulgating a discriminatory rule against talking about the Union and by threatening employee Rigdon.

On September 17, 1980, the board affirmed the ALJ's findings and further found that Atlas violated Section 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) by discriminatorily denying reinstatement to unfair labor practice strikers who had unconditionally offered to return to work.

OPINION

An order of the board will be enforced by this court if there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole supporting it. N.L.R.B. v. Truck Drivers, Oil Drivers, Etc., 630 F.2d 505, 507 (7th Cir. 1980) and cases cited therein. We will not lightly disregard the evaluation of facts by the board "as one of those agencies presumably equipped or informed by experience to deal with a specialized field of knowledge, whose findings within that field carry the authority of an expertness which courts do not possess and therefore must respect." Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). Due deference to the findings of the board, however, does not mean abdication of our duty of judicial review. Id. at 490; N.L.R.B. v. Truck Drivers, Oil Drivers, Etc., 630 F.2d at 507; Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. N.L.R.B., 592 F.2d 595, 602 (1st Cir. 1979). We are not empowered to rubber-stamp the board's order when, as here, review of the record shows that major portions of that order simply are not supported by substantial evidence. N.L.R.B. v. Adam & Eve Cosmetics, Inc., 567 F.2d 723, 727 (7th Cir. 1977).

Bad Faith Bargaining

The Board's emphasis on Atlas' having agreed to union security and checkoff in prior contracts suggests the view that those provisions thus became sacrosanct and not subject to negotiation in future contracts. A "once in, forever in" concept, however, has no basis in logic or law. Indeed, the board's position would encourage employers to oppose union security, checkoff, and similar union-desired provisions in initial contracts, fearing that "once in", such provisions would be "forever in".

An employer is entitled to advance a position sincerely held,[3] notwithstanding the employer's having taken a different position at an earlier time. N.L.R.B. v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co., 572 F.2d 1343, 1348 (9th Cir. 1978). Union security and checkoff are mandatory subjects of bargaining, and "[a] party * * * is entitled to stand firm on a position if he reasonably believes that it is fair and proper or that he has sufficient bargaining strength to force agreement by the other party". N.L.R.B. v. Advanced Business Forms Corp., 474 F.2d 457, 467 (2d Cir. 1973). As stated by this court in Capitol Aviation, Inc. v. N.L.R.B.., 355 F.2d 875, 877 (7th Cir. 1966):

> [T]hat the Union offered repeated modifications of its demand for a union security clause did not operate, as the Board seems to believe, to make Capitol's stand on freedom of choice for individual employees improper.
> The Board considered that Capitol's firm position on the union security and contract term issues outweighed its flexibility on more than 80 other issues, which the Board dismisses as equivalent to "concessions here and there".

Here, the board disregarded Atlas' concessions on 34 of its 36 proposals initially advanced. On the eve of the strike, Atlas was willing to reach agreement on all issues except union security and checkoff. With respect to those two issues, "refusal to bargain cannot be equated with 'refusal to recede from an announced position' advanced and maintained in good faith". Church Point Wholesale Grocery Co., 215 N.L.R.B. 500, 502 (1974), affirmed sub nom., Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union, AFL-CIO v. N.L.R.B., 538 F.2d 1199 (5th Cir. 1976).[4]

Moreover, Atlas presented uncontradicted evidence that its proposed clause on freedom of choice is virtually identical to the clause agreed to by another local of Union in a contract with another employer.[5]

Ignoring the evidence, the board arrived at a finding of bad faith by characterizing Atlas' freedom of choice proposal as "unreasonable, redundant and inflammatory" and as "predictably unacceptable" to the Union.

In Chevron Oil Co. v. N.L.R.B., 442 F.2d 1067, 1072 n. 10 (5th Cir. 1971), a company's good faith was evidenced in part by its having successfully negotiated contracts containing the challenged provisions with three other affiliates of the same union. Similarly, in Cagle's Inc., 588 F.2d 943, 234 N.L.R.B. 1148, 1158 (1978), enforced in part, 588 F.2d 943 (5th Cir. 1979), the board held: "The Union having accepted this provision in the Macon contract, it cannot be said that Respondent's offer to incorporate it in the contract then being bargained for with the Union was of a type that 'no self-respecting union * * * could reasonably be expected to accept' ".

[3] Throughout bargaining, Atlas consistently asserted the same reason for wanting to eliminate union security and checkoff, viz., so that employees would have a free choice concerning Union membership.

[4] The contrast between the instant facts and those in N.L.R.B. v. Wright Motors, Inc., 603 F.2d 604 (7th Cir. 1979), relied on by the board, is illuminating. There, in finding bad faith, this court emphasized that the employer had made no bona fide concessions on substantial issues and no defense of its extreme proposals, adhered to for six months.

[5] In an August 22, 1977 agreement between S–B Manufacturing Co., Ltd. and Union's Local 659, the pertinent clause reads:

> Neither the Company nor the Union will discriminate against or coerce or fine or discipline any employee because the employee:
> . . . . .
> 2. Belongs to the Union, or
> 3. Doesn't belong to the Union.
> Employees do not have to belong to the Union or pay a fee to the Union in order to work at the Company.

Compare Atlas' proposed clause in note 2, supra.

During the strike, Union increased its demands on wages and accident/sickness benefits, and Atlas responded by reintroducing several original proposals. The board condemned only the action of Atlas, ignored the conduct of Union, and disregarded the effect on the parties' relative economic strengths of Atlas' successful weathering of the strike. It is not illegal for a party to take advantage of a shift in economic strength in a bona fide attempt to obtain agreement on original proposals seen as furthering its best interest. Here, after the strike, it was not illegal for Atlas to use it dominant bargaining position in seeking contract terms most favorable to it.

The courts and the board have recognized that an employer's successful weathering of a strike changes the bargaining parties' positions. In N.L.R.B. v. Alva Allen Industries, Inc., 369 F.2d 310, 318 (8th Cir. 1966), the court found no bad faith bargaining where the parties had reached agreement on about 80% of the issues, were apart on wages and union security when the employees struck, and negotiations continued but the employer remained adamant on union security, because "it is only natural that the Company, sensing its strong position, will bargain with increasing toughness and will be less inclined to make concession to the Union." Similarly, in O'Malley Lumber Co., 234 N.L.R.B. 1171, 1179 (1978), the board said: "Where an employer's economic power increases through the successful weathering of a strike, it is not unlawful for an employer to use its new-found strength to secure contract terms that it deems beneficial".

We hold that the board's finding of bad faith bargaining by Atlas under Section 8(a)(5) is not supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole, and accordingly deny enforcement of that portion of the board's order.

Unilateral Changes

The board found that Atlas violated Section 8(a)(5) by unilaterally instituting changes in wages and other terms of employment without bargaining to impasse. That finding, however, rested on the board's unsupported finding of bad faith bargaining. Having bargained in good faith to impasse before instituting unilateral changes, Atlas was entitled to make those changes consistent with its last proposals during bargaining. United Fire Proof Warehouse Co. v. N.L.R.B., 356 F.2d 494, 497 (7th Cir 1966). Enforcement of the portion of the order relating to unilateral changes must therefore be denied.

Subcontracting Information

The courts have held certain types of information, for example, wage data on unit employees, so intrinsic to the core of the employer-employee relationship as to be presumptively relevant. Emeryville Research Center v. N.L.R.B., 441 F.2d 880, 887 (9th Cir 1971); Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 347 F.2d 61, 69 (3d Cir. 1965). Unless the presumption is rebutted in such cases, an employer must provide the re quested information. Conversely, when the requested information is not ordinarily pertinent to a union's role as bargaining representative, but is alleged to have become pertinent under particular circumstances, the union has the burden of proving relevance before the employer must comply. San Diego Newpaper Guild v. N.L.R.B., 548 F.2d 863, 867 (9th Cir. 1977).

Here, the board found that Atlas violated Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to furnish the requested information on subcontracting. Before us, the board is content to rely on the conclusory statement that "information as to subcontracting is presumptively relevant, such information is prima facie required to be produced and, rather than the Union being required to show the relevance of its request, the Company bears the burden of showing a lack of relevance". We disagree. We are cited to no evidence, and the record contains none, indicating that information on subcontracting is so intrinsic to the employer-employee core relationship as to make it presumptively relevant in all cases. That such information may be relevant under special circumstances seems clear but is of no moment here where no such special circumstances have been shown. Union made no effort to explain the relevance of the information sought in its letter of August 4, 1978, and no explanation was forthcoming thereafter. Absent some showing of a basis for holding the requested information so intrinsic as to be presumptively relevant, or a union showing of relevance, enforcement of that part of the order relating to a refusal to supply information must be denied.

Reinstatement of Strikers

The right to reinstatement of economic strikers differs from that of unfair labor practice strikers. An employer's responsibility to reinstate economic strikers is limited to the employer's legitimate staffing requirements. Chauffeurs, Teamsters & Helpers "General" Local No. 200, AFL v. N.L.R.B., 233 F.2d 233, 238 (7th Cir. 1956). Upon an unconditional offer to return to work, unfair labor practice strikers are entitled to immediate reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions. N.L.R.B. v. Lyon & Ryan Ford, Inc., 647 F.2d 745, 754 (7th Cir. 1981).

The board found that the strike was caused and prolonged by Atlas' bad faith bargaining, making it an unfair labor practice strike. Accordingly, the board found Atlas obliged to offer immediate and full reinstatement to returning strikers, and held its failure to make room for them by terminating replacement employees a violation of Sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3). We disagree. As above set forth, Atlas bargained in good faith before and during the strike. Hence there was no unfair labor practice and Atlas was entitled to treat returning strikers as economic strikers. There is no evidence that it failed to do so.

The board erroneously labelled Behling an unfair labor practice striker. Because he was an economic striker, Atlas was not required to ensure his immediate return to the tool room by discharging a replacement employee. Moreover, Atlas exercised legitimate business judgment in classifying him as a die grinder, not a die maker, when he did return to the tool room. Atlas President Fenlon testified without contradiction that, during the strike, Atlas began using a new type die not producible in its plant, and that there was correspondingly less work in the tool room. As the record shows, changed business conditions eliminated the need for full-time die makers and no one was employed in that position after the strike.

Finally, the board erred in finding a violation in the refusal to offer Behling a job as truck driver. An employer not motivated by anti-union animus may freely exercise its business judgment in hiring decisions, and the board should not substitute its judgment for the employer's. N.L.R.B. v. Wells Fargo Armored Service Corp., 597 F.2d 7, 11 (1st Cir. 1979). Here, Atlas was aware in late August that a spot would open soon for Behling in the tool room, where he had worked previously and wished to return. No warrant appears for requiring the training of two employees for the truck driver job. On September 10 Behling moved into the tool room. On the facts of record here, those parts of the order relating to reinstatement cannot be enforced.

Barr's Remark to Behling

Substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the board's Section 8(a)(1) violation determination based on Barr's remark to Behling in August. As the board found, there was no previous rule against talking in Atlas' plant. Hence Barr's promulgation of a discriminatory rule prohibiting employees from talking about union matters constituted a violation.

Threats to Rigdon

Substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports the board's Section 8(a)(1) violation determination based on the threats to Rigdon. There were conflicts in the testimony of Rigdon, Barr, and Peltier. Nonetheless, the board properly accepted the view of the ALJ, who evaluated the demeanor and credibility of all the witnesses.

Conclusion

We modify the board's order[6] by deleting paragraphs 1(a), 1(b), 1(c), 1(e), 2(a), 2(b), 2(c), 2(d),

[6] The board added paragraph 1(c), 1(e), and 2(d) to the ALJ's recommended order. We designate the resultant combination "the board's order".

2(e), 2(f), and 2(g) thereof. We expect that the board will appropriately amend the "Notice to Employees" to be posted at Atlas' plant.

Enforcement is granted in part and denied in part.

MODIFIED, AND AS MODIFIED, ENFORCED.

Before CUMMINGS, Chief Judge, CUDAHY, Circuit Judge, and WYATT, Senior District Judge*

CUMMINGS, Chief Judge: The National Labor Relations Board has petitioned us pursuant to Section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) (29 U.S.C. § 160(e)) to enforce its May 20, 1980, order against the Eldorado Manufacturing Corporation (the Company) and the United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO (the Union).[1] The order requires the Company to offer reinstatement with back pay to two discharged employees, Jerry Miller and Allen Davidson, with the Union jointly and severally liable with the Company for reimbursement of the lost wages. The Union was also required to notify the Company that the Union has no objection to the reemployment of Miller and Davidson. Both the Company and the Union were directed to post certain notices. We deny enforcement because the discharges were justified by the misconduct of the two former employees.

The Company operates a small plant in Eldorado, Illinois, that produces valves for machinery. Its eleven production and maintenance employees are represented by the Union. Their contract is administered at the basic level by an employee-elected bargaining and grievance committee consisting of the shop steward and two committeemen.

Since at least the summer of 1978, the eleven employees were divided into two antagonistic groups. One group (the Davidson-Miller faction) was led by Allen Davidson and Jerry Miller and included employees Tom Horton, Gordon Donnelly, Jeff Beam and Leon Wiseman. The other group (the Pennell-Cox faction) consisted of Bud Pennell, Bob Cox, Ivan Butler, Charlie Daniels and Fred Anderson. The Davidson-Miller faction was openly hostile and vulgar to members of the other faction and engaged in such conduct as:

> "abusive, obscene and vicious language, feigned vomiting gestures; breaking the other faction's coffee cups; intentionally wasting company-provided coffee so that the other faction could not drink coffee; and breaking a Company chair so that employee Cox could not sit on it while operating his machine in the plant" (App. 57).

Davidson also destroyed a part from Cox's motorcycle. According to Davidson, his group's behavior was caused by the other group's "taking sides with the company" (Tr. 202–203). Davidson admitted that the Pennell-Cox faction did not engage in comparable conduct (Tr. 202–203). Davidson also admitted that from time to time, Plant Manager Herschel Hiller heard complaints about Davidson's and Miller's misconduct and warned them especially that their jobs were in jeopardy if they persisted in such conduct.

In November 1978, the Davidson-Miller faction initiated a recall of Ivan Butler, a member of the Pennell-Cox faction, as shop steward. The employees voted to replace Butler with Leon Wiseman, then a member of the Davidson-Miller faction, and elected Davidson and Horton, another member of the Davidson-Miller faction, to serve as his committeemen.

On February 13, 1979, the employees began a strike against the Company over the terms of a new contract. The strike concluded on April 2, 1979, with the execution of a new two-year contract. The new contract was negotiated by the employees' bargaining and grievance committee (Wiseman, Davidson and Horton) with the assistance of Union Representative Richard Blackburn. During the strike, Miller and Davidson became dissatisfied with Wiseman's performance as steward.

*The Honorable Inzer B. Wyatt, Senior Judge of the Southern District of New York, is sitting by designation.

[1] Only the International Union is a party to this case. No complaint was filed against the Local Union by the Board's General Counsel. The Board's decision and order are reported at 249 NLRB No. 88.

Miller felt that Wiseman was not picketing enough, and Davidson thought that Wiseman was not taking a sufficiently strong position in the contract negotiations. Antagonism between the Davidson-Miller faction and Wiseman, who by this time was taking his coffee breaks with the Pennell-Cox faction, was aggravated by the so-called "key incident." Prior to the strike, several employees had keys to the plant so that they could begin work even if Plant Manager Hiller arrived late. During the strike, some employees, including Wiseman, agreed among themselves not to accept keys when they returned to work. Thus, if Hiller were late, the employees could leave and collect four hours' "call-in" pay. However, shortly after the strike ended, Wiseman accepted a key from Hiller and showed it to Miller. Miller threatened that if Wiseman used the key Miller would see to it that the door would not open again. Three or four days later, the lock on the door was jammed and had to be replaced, even though Wiseman had returned the key to Hiller.

After the strike the Davidson-Miller group increased its disruptive and abusive behavior and now included Wiseman as one of its targets. Davidson admittedly yelled at Plant Manager Hiller, greased the other group's tools and lathes, broke their coffee cups and sought to prevent them from drinking coffee, physically harassed them and called them "suck ass" and "company sucks." Miller admittedly greased the handles of Wiseman's and other employees' machines, gave Wiseman "the finger," feigned "sucking and vomiting sounds at Wiseman," held his nose when Wiseman walked by, called Wiseman a "company suck" and threatened to slash Wiseman's and Pennell's automobile tires. He also told Plant Manager Hiller that he did not operate the plant correctly. Davidson had received several warnings from Hiller concerning his efforts to prevent the Pennell-Cox group from drinking coffee (Tr. 201–202).

In mid-April, Miller and Horton circulated a petition to remove Wiseman as shop steward and replace him with Davidson. The petition was put aside when majority support was not forthcoming.

On April 27, Davidson filed a grievance claiming that Plant Manager Hiller had on the previous day performed some bargaining unit work. At Davidson's request, Wiseman called a grievance meeting with Hiller. At the meeting, Pennell, who had been with Hiller at the time of the disputed events, supported Hiller's claim that he had not done bargaining unit work. Davidson then went to the lunchroom and placed sand in Pennell's salt shaker. On April 30, at a second grievance meeting called at Davidson's insistence and concerning the same matter, Hiller accused Davidson of being a troublemaker and stated that the Davidson-Miller group was raising petty matters. Contemporaneously, Miller drew two extremely obscene pictures of Wiseman, one with Union Representative Blackburn and the other with Hiller. At Miller's suggestion, Davidson and Jeff Beam, one of Davidson's supporters, hung the drawings at Wiseman's workplace. A few days later, Pennell, who had worked for the Company for 20 years, told Hiller that he, Pennell, could not continue to work for the Company in view of the disruptive situation there.

On May 4, Bob Cox demanded a shop meeting concerning a dispute between him and Davidson about the operation of a machine tool. Hiller agreed with Cox's position and told Davidson to stop causing trouble. Davidson thereupon told Hiller that if he addressed Davidson in the future, Davidson wanted his union representative present. When Hiller pointed out that Wiseman was present, Davidson retorted, "I said any time, Jack."[2] At that point Hiller gave Davidson a written warning slip for disobedience. Also on May 4, Davidson threatened Cox by raising a broom at him. Miller stated in the hearing before the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) that approximately one week before his discharge he also was warned by Hiller concerning his troublemaking (Tr. 58–59).

On May 7, the employees held a union meeting at the plant with Union Representative Blackburn present. Davidson called the meeting in an attempt to oust Wiseman as shop steward. According to Davidson, Wiseman was lax in calling grievance meetings. When a majority of those present refused to vote Wiseman out, Davidson and Horton resigned from the grievance committee. Pennell and Cox were elected to replace them. Shortly thereafter, Miller admitted to Pennell that Miller was not operating his lathe at full speed and was going to see "that the door is shut on this place." Pennell told Hiller of this threat. On May 10, possibly as a protest to the new grievance committee, Miller, Davidson and Horton went to the table occupied by the Pennell-Cox faction during lunch and dumped soda pop all over the table and spat soda thereon.

[2] Hiller's first name is Herschel.

On the morning of May 11, Miller again smacked his lips, held his nose and made other vulgar gestures and faces at Wiseman, causing Wiseman to become pale and sick-looking. Wiseman then decided to ask Plant Manager Hiller for a vacation and accordingly asked grievance committee members Cox and Pennell to accompany him to Hiller's office. Thereupon, a one and one-half to two-hour meeting took place with Hiller. At that meeting Wiseman complained to Hiller that he needed a two-week vacation immediately to avoid a nervous breakdown because the Davidson-Miller behavior was affecting his work and personal life so much that he did not even know if he could return to the Company after his vacation. He told Hiller of the continuous abuses to which he had been subjected in the five weeks after the strike ended on April 2. Cox and Pennell agreed that the harassment had gotten out of hand. Both Pennell and Cox said they would quit if the chaotic conditions in the plant were not corrected. One of the three told Hiller that Anderson and Butler were also fed up and wanted to quit. Both Anderson and Butler previously had complained to Hiller about the actions of Davidson and Miller (Tr. 318–319). All participants in the meeting denied that the three employees present asked Hiller to discharge Davidson and Miller.

After the conclusion of an ensuing meeting with Miller and Davidson, Hiller discharged them on the ground that they had harassed Company employees to the extent of disrupting the work force. He explained at the September 1979 hearing on the complaint before the ALJ that essential senior employees would otherwise have left the Company.

After Miller and Davidson learned that they were being terminated, they sought the assistance of the grievance committee, and Wiseman arranged a meeting for them with the committee and Union Representative Blackburn on May 15. At that meeting, Davidson and Miller admitted that they were responsible for harassing the plant employees. Blackburn told Miller and Davidson that they did not have a good chance of being reinstated, but that he would talk with Hiller and, if unsuccessful, would "go through the [grievance] procedure." Davidson said that he wanted to write his grievance (Tr. 153) and had the necessary grievance forms (Tr. 229) and both he and Miller understood the grievance procedure (Tr. 525), but Miller stated that he had secured other employment on May 11 and consequently did not want his job back. Blackburn asked Davidson not to file a grievance for about a week so that Blackburn could talk to Hiller first. Both Davidson and Miller were familiar with the grievance machinery.

A few days later, Blackburn and the Union attorney spoke to Hiller, who refused to reinstate Davidson and Miller. After trying unsuccessfully to reach Wiseman, Blackburn called Cox and told him to tell Wiseman to notify Davidson and Miller that Hiller would not agree to take them back and that they could go ahead with their grievances. Wiseman subsequently spoke to Davidson and inquired if he had the necessary grievance forms. Davidson said he did and requested from Wiseman the Local Union's number, which was 14812 (General Counsel Exhibit 2 at p. 14). Later, when Wiseman stopped at Davidson's home to give him the requested number, Davidson said he didn't need it. His next move was in July when he filed his initial charges with the Labor Board. As the ALJ found,

> "there was no 'attempt' by the discriminatees to file written grievances and there was no refusal by the Union to accept them" (App. 20).

On the basis of the foregoing record,[3] the ALJ concluded after a hearing that the Union violated Section 8(b)(2) and (1)(A) of the Act by causing the discharges of Davidson and Miller because of their intra-union activity; that the Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act by failing to notify Miller and Davidson that it was willing to process their grievances; and that the Company had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Miller and Davidson at the Union's demand. The Board affirmed the ALJ's decision and adopted his recommended order with two minor modifications.

[3] As in Midwest Stock Exchange, Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board, 635 F.2d 1255, 1263 (7th Cir. 1980), our discussion of the facts follows the Administrative Law Judge's findings where based on substantial evidence but not when based on scintilla evidence or when contrary to the record.

II

Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to

"restrain or coerce * * * employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 * * *" of the Act.[4] Section 8(b)(2) makes it an unfair labor practice for "a labor organization or its agents * * * to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection 8(a)(3)." Subsection 8(a)(3) provides in pertinent part that it is an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment * * * to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization." Thus it is unlawful for a union or its agents to cause an employer to discharge an employee because of his opposition to the union leadership or its policies. e.g., Local No. 444, Iron Workers v. National Labor Relations Board, 426 F.2d 229, 230 (7th Cir. 1970). Here the Board concluded that the Union committee such an unlawful act on the basis of findings that Wiseman, acting as an agent of the Union, delivered an ultimatum to Hiller to discharge Davidson and Miller because of protected intra-union activities. These findings are not supported by substantial evidence.

First, as the Supreme Court explained in Carbon Fuel Co. v. Mine Workers, 444 U.S. 212, 217, 100 S.Ct. 410, 414, 62 L.Ed.2d 394, to hold a union liable for the acts of its agents, "it must be clearly shown * * * that what was done was done by their agents in accordance with their fundamental agreement of association."[5] The Court added that to establish a union's liability under the doctrine of respondeat superior evidence must be offered that the "International Union instigated, supported, ratified, or encouraged" the activity in question. 444 U.S. at 218, 100 S.Ct. at 414, quoting with approval 582 F.2d 1346, 1351 (3d Cir. 1978) in the same case. In the present case, there is nothing in the record to show that Wiseman, Pennell and Cox were acting "in accordance with their fundamental agreement of association" or that the Union "instigated, supported, ratified or encouraged" the discharges. These three employees were elected by their fellow employees rather than designated by the Union under the collective bargaining agreement and were present at the May 11 meeting as individuals on behalf of themselves and other employees distressed by Davidson's and Miller's misconduct. Indeed, far from the Union's endeavoring to cause the discharges, its agent Blackburn attempted to have Miller and Davidson reinstated four days after the discharges took place.

Second, the record does not support the Board's finding that Wiseman presented Hiller with an ultimatum to discharge Miller and Davidson. Indeed, all four participants in the meeting testified to the contrary and the unrebutted evidence shows that the resolution of the discipline problem was left with Hiller. The fact that Wiseman commented to employees Horton and Beam after the meeting that "he had to do it" does not support an inference that he demanded their discharges since it is entirely compatible with his testimony and the testimony of others that he had simply reached the point where he felt he had to complain about the continuing harassment.

Finally and most importantly, the record does not support the finding that Wiseman, Pennell and Cox sought to have Davidson and Miller punished because of protected intra-union activities. The complaints of Wiseman, Pennell and Cox concerned the manner in which Davidson and Miller had chosen to vent their contempt for the Pennell-Cox faction. The Board, however, found that Miller's and Davidson's misconduct was "not so obstreperous or obstructive as to prevent Wiseman from performing his job as Steward" (App. 12) and that their offensive and vulgar behavior did not justify the action taken by Wiseman, Pennell and Cox (App. 17). We cannot agree. While employees are afforded considerable leeway in their expression of disagreement with union or employer policies, this case does not present an isolated moment of intemperate behavior or misconduct committed in the course of internal union functions, but a continuing pattern of petty, vulgar and disruptive acts in the workplace that goes well beyond the scope of protection afforded by the Act. See Sullair P.T.O., Inc. v. National Labor Relations Board, 641 F.2d 500 (7th Cir. 1981); National Labor Relations Board v. Truck Drivers, Oil Drivers, Etc., 630 F.2d 505 (7th Cir. 1980), certiorari denied sub nom. Gilmer v. Truck Drivers, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 1740, 68 L.Ed.2d 225; American Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 521 F.2d 1159 (2d Cir. 1975); National Labor Relations Board v. Red Top, Inc., 455 F.2d 721 (8th Cir. 1972); Indiana Gear Works v. National Labor Relations Board, 371 F.2d 273 (7th Cir. 1967). The ALJ acknowledged that Davidson's and Miller's acts had created anarchy and could not be condoned but concluded that a violation of the Act had nevertheless occurred because motivation for the action of Wiseman, Pennell and Cox "was based in part upon discriminatory elements" (App. 17, emphasis supplied). However, the Board itself has rejected the "in part" test for discriminatory discharges and adopted the test developed by the Supreme Court in Mt. Healthy City School Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 97 S.Ct. 568, 50 L.Ed.2d 471. See Wright Line, A Div. of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150, 105 LRLM 1169 (1980); see also Sullair P.T.O., Inc., supra; Stein Seal Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 605 F.2d 703 (3d Cir. 1979); Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. National Labor Relations Board, 592 F.2d 595 (1st Cir. 1979). Under the Mt. Healthy test, a prima facie case of discrimination is rebuttable by a showing of justification. Here the record overwhelmingly shows that the discharges were justified. Therefore, even assuming that the Union requested the discharges, there was no violation of Sections 8(b)(2) and (1)(A).

[4] Section 7 of the Act provides:

> "Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 8(a)(3) of this Act." 29 U.S.C. § 157.

[5] This quotation from Carbon Fuel Co. came from an opinion of Chief Justice Taft in Coronado Coal Co. v. Mine Workers, 268 U.S. 295, 304, 45 S.Ct. 551, 554, 69 L.Ed. 963.

The dissent contends that the May 11 meeting was a "misuse of Union * * * power." We disagree, for Union representatives can be and here were proper vehicles for communicating employee dissatisfaction to management, even concerning the disruptive actions of other employees. There was no unfair labor practice because the complaints of the Union representatives were entirely legitimate.

III

As follows from the foregoing discussion, the Board's finding that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3)[6] of the Act by discharging Miller and Davidson is also unsupported by substantial evidence. The ALJ found that Plant Manager Hiller discharged the two employees principally because of Wiseman's demand, but was receptive to the demand because he was annoyed by Davidson's having complained that Hiller had performed bargaining unit work. The ALJ acknowledged that Hiller would have been justified in discharging Miller and Davidson for misconduct, but found that the discharges were not so motivated since Hiller had previously acquiesced in the misconduct by not disciplining or discharging Miller and Davidson earlier.[7] This finding is contrary to the uncontroverted evidence that Hiller spoke to Miller and Davidson on several occasions about their misconduct both before and after the strike and that Hiller did not previously take formal disciplinary action because he believed the situation would "settle down" after a new contract was signed. Thus rather than indicating anti-union bias, Hiller's failure to act against Davidson and Miller earlier shows exceptional tolerance of intra-union disagreement. In fact, the situation after the strike deteriorated to the point where Hiller believed he was faced with a choice of losing valuable senior employees or letting Miller and Davidson go.

The Board in its brief argues that there "were no out-of-the-ordinary occurrences in the shop between May 7, the date of the Union meeting at which Wiseman's ouster was sought, and May 11, when Wiseman and the [two other] Union committeemen demanded that Hiller fire Miller and Davidson" so that the "inference is compelling" that the discharges were motivated by Davidson's and Miller's participation in protected activities (Br. 20–21). However, the Board (and the ALJ) conveniently overlook the facts that Wiseman had known about the attempt to oust him since mid-April, that some time between May 7 and May 11, Pennell reported to Hiller that Miller was not operating his lathe at full speed and intended to see "that the door is shut on this place,"[8] that on May 10, Miller and Davidson poured and spat soda pop on the table at which the Pennell-Cox faction was eating; and that the May 11 meeting was immediately precipitated by Miller again making obscene gestures directed at Wiseman.

[6] Section 8(a)(1) provides:

[7] For example, the ALJ recognized that Miller's threat to see "that the door is shut on this place" would justify Miller's discharge under Tama Meat Packing Corp., 230 NLRB 116 (1977) if Hiller had acted on it immediately, instead of discharging Miller four days later (App. 16).

"(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

"(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1).

Section 8(a)(3), as noted in the text, supra, provides in pertinent part:

"(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

"(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3).

The Board's case against the Company rests at bottom on the apparent notion that blatant misconduct once tolerated at all must be tolerated forever. However, as this Court has previously stated, "[t]here must be room in the law for a right of an employer somewhere, sometime, at some stage, to free itself of continuing, unproductive, internal, and improper harassment." National Labor Relations Board v. Truck Drivers, supra, 630 F.2d at 509. To ascribe any motive to these discharges other than a long overdue intolerance of Davidson's and Miller's offensive and disruptive acts would be to indulge in unwarranted speculation. Neither the Board nor this Court can decide cases on such a basis. Midwest Stock Exchange v. National Labor Relations Board, 635 F.2d 1255 (7th Cir. 1980). Accordingly, we hold that the Company discharged Miller and Davidson for good cause and did not violate Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

IV

Finally, we cannot agree with the Board that the Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by failing to notify Miller and Davidson that it was willing to process their grievance over the discharges. Liability for failure to process discharge grievances cannot attach unless the grievances would have been meritorious and unless the Union's failure to process was in bad faith. Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight Co., 424 U.S. 554, 570, 96 S.Ct. 1048, 1059, 47 L.Ed.2d 231, Vaca v. Sipes, 386 U.S. 171, 87 S.Ct. 903, 17 L.Ed.2d 842. The grievances here were, as discussed above, not meritorious because the discharges were for just cause based on serious misconduct and therefore not a violation of the collective bargaining agreement. In addition, there was no bad faith shown on the part of the Union.

Following the May 11 discharges, Wiseman scheduled a meeting for Miller and Davidson on May 15 with himself, the two other grievance committeemen, and Union Representative Blackburn. At that meeting, Blackburn told Davidson and Miller that they had little chance of being reinstated, but that he would talk to Hiller and that if Hiller would not agree to reinstatement Blackburn would process their grievances. Miller stated that he had another job and did not want to file a grievance. Davidson indicated that he wanted to write his grievance and had the necessary grievance forms and Blackburn knew that Davidson was familiar with the grievance procedure. Within a few days, Blackburn spoke unsuccessfully to Hiller and then informed Wiseman (through Cox) that Davidson and Miller could file their grievances. It is true that Wiseman never relayed this message to Miller, but it was plainly unnecessary to do so since Miller had already stated that he did not want to file a grievance.[9] While Wiseman did not relay Blackburn's message to Davidson in exact terms, apparently because he simply assumed that Davidson was going ahead with the grievance, he did contact Davidson to inquire if he had the necessary grievance forms. Davidson said that he did and that he did not need the Local Union's number, which he had previously requested from Wiseman. Since Blackburn had already told Davidson and Miller that he would process their grievances if his efforts to have Hiller to agree to reinstatement failed and since Davidson knew that Hiller had not agreed to reinstate him, it would be absurd for us to conclude, as the Board would have us do, that Davidson believed the Union would not process his grievance. Yet, as the ALJ found, Davidson never filed a written grievance and did not contact Blackburn or any other union official about doing so. Because the Union never refused to accept the grievance and would in any event have been justified in doing so, it was erroneous for the Board to conclude that the Union violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) for bad faith handling of Davidson's and Miller's grievances.

Here the Board has saddled the Company and Union with joint and several liability to make whole any loss of wages sustained by Miller and Davidson (App. 24–25, 26). By analogy to suits under Section 301(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act (29 U.S.C. § 185(a)), such liability should be imposed only if the discharges were contrary to the collective bargaining contract and if the Union breached its duty of fair representation. Hines v. Anchor Motor Freight, Inc., 424 U.S. 554, 570–571, 96 S.Ct. 1048, 1059, 47 L.Ed.2d 231.[10] Neither factor was present here. Likewise, the record does not show that any Section 7 rights of Miller and Davidson were responsible for their discharge. Enforcement will be denied.[11]

CUDAHY, Circuit Judge, dissenting: There is no question that substantial evidence supports the Board's order here. The majority has simply elected to credit, rely on or emphasize other evidence or to draw different inferences from the evidence than the Board and has quite flagrantly substituted its judgment for that of the Board.[1]

The majority says that, "The Board's case against the Company rests at bottom on the apparent notion that blatant misconduct once tolerated at all must be tolerated forever." At 1214. This is not the point at all; the point is that plant manager Hiller hardly raised a hand against Davidson and Miller, leading Union "radicals," until the leaders of the newly dominant "conservative" faction met with him for two hours to demand the ouster of their rivals and adversaries. Recently there had been much bad blood between shop steward Wiseman and the Davidson-Miller element, and Wiseman switched factions to the Cox-Pennell contingent. There is certainly abundant evidence, applying Mt. Healthy or any other relevant test, to support a conclusion that the principal and proximate (if not the only) cause of the discharges of Davidson and Miller was the urgings of shop steward Wiseman and grievance committee members Cox and Pennell, which met with the prompt and sympathetic acquiescence of plant manager Hiller.[2] After all, Davidson and Miller were not fired, or seriously threatened with firing for misconduct with other employees, see note 1, supra, until immediately after Wiseman, Cox and Pennell—the Union powers—closeted themselves with Hiller for almost two hours.[3]

In fact, before May 1979, in the four and a half years of his being plant manager, Hiller had never discharged an employee or even issued a warning or formal reprimand because of misconduct in the shop. The Administrative Law Judge and the Board concluded that, "employee discipline, whether management-imposed or self-imposed, in the plant, at all material times, was anarchic * * * [but that] Hiller [knew] of these derelictions in his shop, but openly ignored the situation on the ground that either it would improved [sic] or abate." App. at 15. Hiller even failed to take action when informed that Miller was not operating his machine at full speed and that Miller threatened to shut the Company down, App. at 16, actions that would have clearly justified discharging Miller.

[10] This rule was recently reiterated in United Parcel Service, Inc. v. Mitchell, —— U.S. ——, ——, 101 S.Ct. 1559, 1563–64, 67 L.Ed.2d 732, and Clayton v. International Union, U.A.W., —— U.S. ——, ——, n.15, 101 S.Ct. 2088, 2096, n.15, 68 L.Ed.2d 538.

[11] All arguments not expressly discussed in this opinion have, nevertheless, been duly considered. They have been found either wanting in merit or insufficiently important to warrant extended discussion. Their discussion would not have altered this decision.

[1] For example, the Administrative Law Judge and the Board found that, "[a]lthough the evidence shows that the Miller-Davidson faction (of which Wiseman was a member until after the strike ending April 2, 1979) appeared to be the more aggressively vulgar, there is no dispute on this record that each faction behaved badly to and irritated the other." App. at 4.

The Administrative Law Judge and the Board also noted that, > [Hiller's] one act of disciplining Davidson, on May 4, for insubordination, stemmed not from Davidson's misconduct with co-employees (which was the gravamen of Wiseman's and Pennell's complaints), but rather from a direct confrontation with Hiller himself. Miller's conduct with respect to Hiller, in any event, in no way precipitated Wiseman's demand for Davidson's and Miller's discharges and I reject Hiller's assertion at the hearing that it was an underlying cause for the two discharges.

App. at 18 (emphasis supplied).

[2] The Board concluded that

> Hiller discharged Miller and Davidson only because of the urging of Respondent-Union, which urgings found an entirely sympathetic ear in Hiller because of Hiller's desire, as a matter of Respondent-Employer's interest, to rid itself [sic] of two employees who were continually showing dissatisfaction and causing him 'aggravation' because of his alleged contract violations in doing unit work.

App. at 16 (emphasis supplied). This analysis at the very least supports the view that, without the urgings directed at the Company by the Union leaders, there would have been no firings. The Company, therefore, has not carried its burden under Mt. Healthy.

"[T]he District Court should have gone on to determine whether the [employer] had shown by a preponderance of the evidence that it would have reached the same decision as to [the employee's] reemployment even in the absence of the protected conduct." Mt. Healthy City Board of Ed. v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 287, 97 S.Ct. 568, 576, 50 L.Ed.2d 471 (1977).

[3] The analysis of the testimony by the Administrative Law Judge (and the Board) is that, > whereas Wiseman specifically denied that he asked for their discharges, I credit Cox that Wiseman threatened to quit because of the abuse from 'those two,' naming Davidson and [Miller] and I have credited Horton and Beam who testified, without contradiction, that later on the same date, May 11, after Miller and Davidson had been discharged, Wiseman told them 'I had to do it.' This has no reference, in my estimation, other than to the fact that Wiseman had urged Hiller to discharge Miller and Davidson.

App. at 15.

Wiseman, Cox and Pennell, who demanded the discharges, were the only Union officials ordinarily on the premises. It is, therefore, disingenuous in the extreme to suggest that they were not agents of the Union, fully clothed with apparent authority. They were the Union for all practical purposes at Eldorado.[4] This case is important because, as perceived by the Board and based on the evidence, the Company did the bidding of the Union in destroying what had become its dissident faction. The majority seems to be unconcerned about the import of this dangerous collusion, provided there is evidence that the faction destroyed is uncouth and obnoxious.

To me the misuse of Union and Company power[5] to violate the rights of employees who at the time are in ill favor with the shop steward (whom they have tried unsuccessfully to replace) and the grievance committee (which has been turned over to their rivals) is of controlling significance in this case. Whether the employees fired were incidentally irritating and obnoxious should not be determinative. We should not allow concern for factory decorum to blind us to injustice in the abuse of power. Of course, under other circumstances, it might have been acceptable to fire Davidson and Miller for misconduct. But here no one appears to have thought of that course until the victims had a falling out with the shop steward and Davidson and Horton were replaced by their adversaries as committeemen. Company power should not be used as an instrument of Union politics.

There is also substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that the Union failed to accept and process the Miller and Davidson grievances when Union representative Blackburn committed the matter to the tender loving care of Wiseman—a prime antagonist of the terminated duo.[6]

I therefore respectfully dissent.

[4] The Board stated that

> The uncontradicted evidence shows that these three employees [Wiseman, Cox and Pennell] and their predecessors represent the unit (together with the Union business agent Richard Blackburn, where matters concern negotiation of terms of a collective-bargaining agreement) in collective bargaining and individual unit employees in their grievances with Respondent-Employer pursuant to the terms of the collective-bargaining agreements between Respondents.

App. at 3 n. 1. This state of facts established a prima facie agency of the three to act for the Union in matters of discharges and grievances.

[5] The majority's defense of "Union representatives * * * [as] proper vehicles for communicating employee dissatisfaction to management, even concerning the disruptive actions of other employees," at 1213, conveniently ignores the spectacle of the Company's ultimate weapon of discharge in the service of Union power directed at a competing Union faction. Substantial evidence and inferences properly drawn from it support the Board's view.

[6] The Board found that, although Miller said at a grievance meeting on May 15, 1979, that he did not want his job back, he also said he wanted his backpay. The majority is therefore incorrect in its assumption that Miller had abandoned his grievance. App. at 31-32 n. 4.

NLRB v. Greyhound Lines, Inc.

660 F.2d 354 (8th Cir.), September 25, 1981—251 NLRB 1638

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before HENLEY and ARNOLD, Circuit Judges, and BECKER,* Senior District Judge

HENLEY, Circuit Judge: This case is before the court on application of the NLRB for enforcement of its order against Greyhound Lines, Inc. (the Company), based on findings that Greyhound violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1947 (the Act), as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., by suspending two employees, Benner and Jenson, because they issued a press release announcing the intent of employee drivers to strictly obey the speed limit over the Labor Day weekend.

Benner, one of the Company's drivers and a local union official in Minneapolis, met with other drivers at a rest stop in Wisconsin in mid-July, 1979. The drivers discussed the pressures they were experiencing meeting time schedules under the new 55 mile-per-hour speed limit. They also discussed a recent company announcement, rescinded shortly thereafter, that three new driver jobs would require successful bidders to work seven days a week without overtime pay. They considered the possibility of adhering without exception to the 55 m.p.h. speed limit over the Labor Day weekend to protest these matters. Benner later discussed this idea with Jenson, a union steward based in Minneapolis, but no action was taken at that time.

*The Honorable William H. Becker, United States Senior District Judge, Western District of Missouri, sitting by designation.

On August 7, Benner noticed a letter on the drivers' bulletin board urging support for a group of approximately forty Salt Lake City drivers who had received discharge notices as a result of a wildcat strike. Thinking that this might rekindle interest in the "slowdown," Benner and Jenson, after a brief investigation, concluded that drivers approved the proposed action. On August 20 or 21, they prepared an interview-type press release announcing a planned observance of the 55 m.p.h. speed limit over the Labor Day weekend. On August 25, Benner saw another posted letter concerning the dismissal of the Salt Lake drivers. Benner contacted people who were said to have confirmed the information in both letters although, in fact, only six of the drivers were actually dismissed and they were later reinstated with suspensions. On August 26, Benner distributed the following press release to the media:

> Head: GREYHOUND DRIVERS TO SET LABOR DAY PACE
> Greyhound drivers nationwide will drive strictly within the 55 mile-per-hour speed limit through the Labor-Day weekend to save fuel and set an example for other drivers.
> Several members of the State Highway Patrols have commended the drivers for this effort.
> It is well known that on rare occasions Greyhound drivers will slip over the 55 mph limit to accommodate their passengers after departure delays, bus breakdowns, inclement weather and other unexpected delays.
> Veteran-driver and Union Steward, Jerry Jenson said "over 350 drivers interviewed last week from coast to coast unanimously supported the plan which is expected to result in some connecting departure delays."
> Jensen declined to comment when asked if the "Slowdown" had anything to do with a recent attempt to work regular-run drivers seven days a week without overtime, the dismissal of 36 drivers three weeks ago in Salt Lake City who were protesting alleged contract violations, or with Greyhound's numerous runs that are impossible to operate within the 55-mph speed limit.

On September 6, Benner and Jenson received disciplinary notices with fourteen-day suspensions for "words or acts of hostility to the Company, or words or acts which result in damage to the Company's reputation, property or services and for divulging affairs of the Company without approval."

The NLRB issued a complaint on October 12, 1979, charging respondent with violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. On September 8, 1980, the Board affirmed the findings and conclusions of the ALJ that the Company, by disciplining Benner and Jenson, had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The Board further adopted the ALJ's order to cease and desist the unfair labor practice, rescind the disciplinary notices, award back pay to Benner and Jenson, and post an appropriate notice. In resisting enforcement of this order, the Company contends that the Board's finding that respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) is not supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole.

In discussing respondent's contention, we must bear in mind the proper standard of review, as stated by this court in NLRB v. Brown & Root, Inc., 311 F.2d 447 (8th Cir. 1963).

> It is not the function of this Court to try the case de novo or to substitute its own appraisal of the evidence for that of the Board. If the Board has conceived the law correctly, if it has not acted arbitrarily or capriciously, and if its findings are supported by 'substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole,' they are conclusive and binding on this Court even though we might have made different findings upon an independent consideration of the same evidence.

311 F.2d at 451, citing 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) and Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). See Osceola County Co-Operative Creamery Ass'n v. NLRB, 251 F.2d 62, 63–64 (8th Cir. 1958).

It is argued by respondent that not all concerted activity is protected by Section 7. Among the unprotected categories of activities are those "characterized as 'indefensible' because they * * * show a disloyalty to the workers' employer which * * * [is] unnecessary to carry on the workers' legitimate concerted activities." NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 17, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 1104, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962). See NLRB v. Local Union No. 1229 (IBEW), 346 U.S. 464, 477, 74 S.Ct. 172, 179, 98 L.Ed. 195 (1953). Respondent concedes that employee communications to the public may be protected, that is, "defensible," if they are directly related to an ongoing labor dispute, are not a disparagement of the Company's reputation or the quality of the Company's product, and are not maliciously motivated. See Local 1229, supra; Allied Aviation Service Co. of New Jersey, Inc., 248 N.L.R.B. No. 26, 103 L.R.R.M. 1454 (1980), enf'd, 636 F.2d 1210 (3d Cir. 1980); Stephens Institute, 241 N.L.R.B. No. 133, 101 L.R.R.M. 1052 (1979). It is respondent's position that the press release issued by Benner and Jenson does not fall within this range of protected communications.

First, respondent argues that there was no ongoing labor dispute. There was no evidence that any grievance had been filed, although grievance procedures under the collective bargaining agreement were in effect at that time. However, there were statements by the Board that Benner had complained unsuccessfully to the Company on several occasions regarding the schedule problems. 29 U.S.C. § 152(9) defines labor dispute as including "any controversy concerning terms, tenure or conditions of employment." (Emphasis added.) Given this broad definition, we conclude that the Board's finding is supported by the evidence of discussions and actions preceding and in preparation for the proposed "slowdown" over the Labor Day weekend in protest of company policies and actions.

Second, respondent contends that even if there existed an ongoing labor dispute, the press release was not a communication directly related to the dispute and was therefore unprotected. The reason stated in the press release itself for the "slowdown" was to save fuel and set an example. Respondent submits that the only reference in the press release of employee grievances was in the fifth paragraph and that Jenson's refusal to comment on the matters mentioned therein should not be considered a "communication" relating to the dispute. The Board, however, takes the position that by refusing to comment, Jenson was indirectly conveying the employees' message that the proposed "slowdown" was, in fact, a protest against the enumerated company actions and policies.

In Allied Aviation, the Board stated that "the touchstone [is] not whether the communication constituted a virtual carbon copy of the specific arguments raised with the respondent, but [is], rather, whether the communication was a part of and related to the ongoing labor dispute." 103 L.R.R.M. at 1456 (emphasis in original). Regardless of the reasons stated in the release itself, it is clear from the discussions and actions preceding the release that the "slowdown" was in protest of the enumerated grievances, and it is likely that the reference to the grievances in the last paragraph of the release would suggest such a relationship to the reader. We therefore find substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that the press release was related to the ongoing dispute.

Third, respondent contends that the press release constituted a public disparagement of the Company's product and reputation and was therefore unprotected. See Local 1229, 346 U.S. at 474, 74 S.Ct. at 177; Allied Aviation, 103 L.R.R.M. at 1456. Respondent asserts that the statement regarding expected connecting departure delays indicates to the public that Greyhound's service would be inadequate over the holiday weekend. The press release also implies that Greyhound condones or encourages exceeding the speed limit in order to avoid or to minimize delays, although, in fact, Greyhound provides in the Drivers' Rule Book that drivers must obey all posted speed limits and "]w]hen late, stay late." (Emphasis in Rule Book.) Respondent argues that the statements and accompanying insinuations constitute a disparagement of Greyhound's services and reputation.

The Board, on the other hand, characterized the reference to expected delays as a simple statement that, as a result of the drivers' strict observance of the speed limit to protest the Company's actions, some delays might occur. The Board found that the release did not contain any insults or negative insinuations about the Company's services or integrity with respect to its customers.

In comparing the statements in the press release to others that have been found protected and unprotected, we cannot disagree with the Board's finding that the statements fall short of an unprotected disparagement. Compare Allied Aviation, supra (letters to customers that employer's procedures were unsafe, protected), and Community Hospital of Roanoke Valley, Inc. v. NLRB, 538 F.2d 607 (4th Cir. 1976) (statement in television interview that hospital was understaffed, protected), with Local 1229, supra (handbills criticizing employer's local programming, unprotected).

Finally, respondent argues that the release is not protected because it was maliciously motivated. See Allied Aviation, 103 L.R.R.M. at 1456. As evidence of malice, respondent relies on Benner's statement that "things would really be screwed up if we held to 55 for any period of time." Respondent also points out that the press release contained false statements regarding the alleged dismissal of the Salt Lake drivers and the seven-day work week proposal, which had been rescinded before the release. This disregard for the truth, respondent contends, is additional evidence of Benner's and Jenson's malicious motive.

The Board again viewed the actions challenged by respondent in a different light. Benner's statement was interpreted as merely a prediction of the potential effectiveness of the proposed "slowdown" rather than as evidence of an intent to harm the Company. The Board further found that Benner had attempted to confirm the dismissal of the Salt Lake drivers and was relying on the information he had received from people in Salt Lake City. We cannot say the Board's finding of no malicious motive is not supported by the record.

We recognize that the "lines defining [Section 7 rights] have of necessity been painted with broad strokes." Hugh H. Wilson Corp. v. NLRB, 414 F.2d 1345, 1347 (3d Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 935, 90 S.Ct. 943, 25 L.Ed.2d 115 (1970). Nevertheless, upon a de novo review of the circumstances in this case, we might well have reached a different decision. It is difficult to understand, for example, why Benner, a union official, and Jenson, a union steward, would not initially pursue relief through union procedures. An effort to communicate with the Company might have, at the very least, prevented the false statements concerning the dismissal of the Salt Lake drivers and the seven-day work week from being included in the release.

As stated earlier, however, we are constrained by the applicable standard of review from substituting our own judgment for that of the Board and are required to uphold the Board's findings if they are supported by substantial evidence of the record as a whole and if the Board has not acted arbitrarily or capriciously. Upon examination of the record in this case, we are unable to say that the Board's findings do not meet this standard.

Accordingly, the order of the Board will be enforced.

NLRB v. Charles H. McCauley Associates, Inc.

657 F.2d 685 (5th Cir.), September 28, 1981–248 NLRB 346

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before GODBOLD, Chief Judge, FRANK M. JOHNSON, JR. and ANDERSON, Circuit Judges

GODBOLD, Chief Judge: This is a § 8(a)(1) and (3) case involving a single employee, Richard Beck. The Board seeks enforcement of its order. Up to 1979 Beck had worked for Charles H. McCauley Associates, Inc., an architectural firm, for about seven years as a draftsman. The company's volume of work, and hence its work force, had materially declined during the 1970's.

In January 1979 Beck talked with fellow employee Tate about improving working conditions, particularly with respect to the frequency of wage increases. Beck asked Tate what he thought the company's response would be if someone tried to organize a union.

In February 1979 Beck had a similar conversation with fellow employee Conville. They also discussed the termination of another employee, and Beck asked "what's going to happen to us?" Beck noted that the company had once been large but had become small, and he expressed concern for employees' continued tenure. Beck told Conville that "somebody might try to organize a union one day" and asked Conville what he thought of this.

There is no evidence that any of these conversations between Beck and fellow employees came to the attention of management.

During February Beck had discussions with the company concerning terms of a proposed new written employment agreement, which Beck thought contained errors. The agreement was changed to accord with Beck's contentions and he signed it.

In late February Beck prepared an inter-office memorandum addressed to the company's officers and supervisors—the chairman of the board, president and vice president—in which he requested a meeting with these three persons. Before he submitted the memo Beck showed it to Tate and said he was going to hand it in and request a meeting. Beck told Tate that he was ready to have a meeting with the officers "to discuss better working conditions and better wages and better benefits and see what they would think about it for you and I and all the rest of the employees." Beck asked Tate whether he would like to accompany him into the meeting and told Tate that if the company was not willing to be fair and give them a better contract he [Beck] "was going to bring up the possibility of trying to possibly get an outside third party to come in and try to bargain for [them]."

Beck submitted his memorandum to the company officials, and shortly thereafter he met with them. Tate did not attend. Following is what occurred at the meeting under the facts as found by the Board. Beck expressed concern over the reduction in force of the company and expressed fear for his job security. He expressed objections to the wage agreement that he had earlier signed, contending that it was unfair, one-sided, incorrect and inadequate and that he and his fellow employees needed something better. He asked for a written employment contract that would guarantee him a job for as long as the company was in operation and he did his work. Beck complained about what he felt were unfair actions by the company in laying off more experienced and better educated draftsmen while retaining others with less experience and seniority. He asserted that the company had reduced the hours of some draftsmen while allowing others to work full weeks and even overtime. He questioned the company's practice concerning wage increases and objected to the absence of cost of living increases and to the necessity for employees to specifically request an increase or threaten to leave the company in order to get a raise. He objected to revisions in the company's retirement plan, to the failure to absorb increases in employees' health insurance premiums, and to the discontinuance of the practice of giving Christmas bonuses. He asked for reinstitution of a four and one-half day work week rather than the five day work week in effect and said that other employees wanted the same thing but would not come in and request it. Beck stated that he was seeking a better contract for all employees, not just for himself, that he wanted a fair contract and better benefits for all the employees.

The board chairman told Beck the company would consider his points. To Beck's request for a written contract guaranteeing him a job as long as the company operated and he did his work, the president responded that "union or no union, neither you nor [I] as president, nor any other employee was going to get the type of employment contract that [Beck] wanted." Beck then stated that there was a failure of communication, that he was going to discuss with fellow employees the matters he had raised and see if he could get their thoughts together on a contract to submit to the company. The chairman forbade Beck to discuss with other employees the matters that had been discussed in the meeting. When Beck repeated that he was going to talk with other employees about the things discussed in the meeting the chairman again told Beck that he was forbidding it and that if Beck had such discussions the company would consider terminating him.

Beck told the officers that the company left him no alternative except to contact the local union representative to come in and try to bargain. The chairman responded by forbidding Beck to contact any type of union representative and stating that the company "will not tolerate a union," and saying that neither Beck nor any other employee would have the type of contract that Beck wanted, that the matters they had discussed would not be discussed with any union representative. When the chairman asked Beck whether he was serious in what he had said he would do, Beck responded that he had to try to get some job security for himself and his fellow employees. The chairman then discharged Beck on the spot. At this meeting there was no mention of any deficiency in Beck's work or behavior.

The company's version of the meeting was along the following lines. Beck expressed concern for his job security and asked for a written contract guaranteeing him employment as long as there was work and he did his job. Beck insisted he would get a written contract or seek union assistance. The president told him that union or no union there would be no written contract. Management insists that Beck only sought a written agreement covering himself, but they acknowledge that he mentioned health benefits, pension rights and wage increases for himself and other employees.

The company contends that Beck was chronically absent from work and tardy and was a marginal employee from whom it would not accept unreasonable personal demands. The demands made in the meeting were the straw that broke the camel's back.

The initial issue is whether Beck was engaged in activity that is protected by the National Labor Relations Act. The company urges that he was not engaged in protected activity but rather was seeking solely 688 personal gain and had neither the support of his fellow employees nor authority to represent them. "[I]ndividual griping and complaining are not protected concerted activity." NLRB v. Buddies Supermarkets, Inc., 481 F.2d 714, 717–19 (5th Cir. 1973); Southwest Latex Corp. v. NLRB, 426 F.2d 50, 56 n.3 (5th Cir. 1970). "[I]t must appear at the very least that it was engaged in with the object of initiating or inducing or preparing for group action or that it had some relation to group action in the interests of the employees." Buddies at 718. Under the facts as found by the Board, Beck, in addition to demanding a lifetime contract for himself, sought improvement of various working conditions for all employees in areas of health benefits, pension rights, wage increases, bonuses and lay-off policy. When management rejected his requests he expressed an intention to discuss the problems with other employees. Before Beck went to the meeting he had discussions, described above, with other employees concerning some of the matters that he later brought up in the meeting. Unlike purely personal complaints in Buddies and Southwest Latex these were complaints advanced on behalf of all employees though without their express support. They were clearly a predicate for possible group activity, unlike the actions of troublemakers in Buddies. The Board's determination that Beck was engaged in concerted activities is supported by substantial evidence and is not inconsistent with Fifth Circuit precedent. The company's arguments to the contrary are essentially attacks on credibility determinations and on inferences drawn by the Board.

The Board order must be enforced insofar as it requires the company to notify employees that it will not forbid union activities, not threaten to discharge (or discharge) employees for union activities and not interfere with or restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their § 7 rights.

The evidence adequately supports the Board's findings of violation of § 8(a)(1) and (3). The Board made out a prima facie case, and the burden shifted to the company to establish that the same action would have been taken in the absence of protected conduct. Wright Line, a Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150, 105 LRRM 1169 (1980). Unquestionably Beck had a bad record for tardiness and had been warned about it. He was, however, permitted to make up lost time on Saturdays and Sundays. The Board found that the discharge was not based upon his tardiness. It found that the company had tolerated Beck's attendance problems and had never considered them serious enough to warrant an official reprimand. Moreover at Beck's salary review some six months previously, although tardiness was discussed, Beck was given a raise. Tardiness was not mentioned at the meeting at which Beck was fired.

The Board found that Beck's description of the meeting most accurately described what occurred. No basis is shown for our interfering with this credibility determination. Having made this credibility choice, the Board concluded that Beck's attendance problems were neither the sole reason nor any significant part of the reason for his discharge.

Based on its findings the Board correctly found that Beck was entitled to reinstatement. The company asserts that the Board erred in refusing to accept as evidence on the charges of unfair practices an offer of reinstatement that it says was sent to Beck a month after his discharge. This was not error. Reinstatement was not relevant to the unfair practice proceedings except as discussed below with respect to the remedy.

The letter allegedly sent to Beck offering reinstatement, and Beck's reply, are before us only as exhibits tendered but not admitted. In the interest of judicial and administrative efficiency we comment upon them because they may affect further proceedings. The company asserts that the offer of reinstatement was drafted by an NLRB field attorney and, with inconsequential changes, was sent to Beck. This tendered exhibit offers "immediate, full and unconditional reinstatement" without reprisals and with payment of lost pay. The purported reply by Beck declines to accept unconditional reinstatement and refers to conditions that, in a previous letter, Beck has imposed on his reinstatement.

This passage of correspondence, if proved genuine, affects not only compliance proceedings but the remedy. The remedy ordered by the Board requires the company to post a notice that it will offer Beck immediate and full reinstatement without loss of seniority or other rights and privileges and make him whole for lost earnings. If Beck has been offered reinstatement, as appears likely, and he has refused it, as also appears likely, there is no basis for requiring the company to publicly promise to do what it already has done. Before proceeding with the remedy the Board should settle this issue, and if it finds reinstatement has been offered and refused there should be deleted from the notice required to be posted the reference to offering Beck reinstatement. Also, if reinstatement has been offered and refused, Beck should be entitled to back pay for only the period of approximately one month between the discharge and the reinstatement offer.

The Board order is ENFORCED in part and the case is REMANDED to the Board for further proceedings.

Irvin H. Whitehouse & Sons Co. v. NLRB

659 F.2d 830 (7th Cir.), September 28, 1981—252 NLRB 997

On petition to review Board Order

Before PELL, Circuit Judge, MARKEY, Chief Judge,[*] and WOOD, Circuit Judge

831

PELL, Circuit Judge: This case is before the court on the petition of Irvin H. Whitehouse & Sons Co. (Whitehouse) to review and set aside a final order of the NLRB (the Board) issued against Whitehouse on September 20, 1980. The Board has cross-applied for enforcement. The Board's decision and order, reported at 252 N.L.R.B. No. 140 (1980), found that Whitehouse had violated § 8(a)(1) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), by the discriminatory discharge of and refusal to rehire two employees, and ordered make-whole pay and the posting of appropriate notices. The issue presented by the case is whether the arbitration provision of the parties' collective bargaining agreement was sufficient to create an implied no-strike obligation as to safety disputes.

I.

Whitehouse is a union-shop painting contractor located in Louisville, Kentucky. Its local collective bargaining agreement requires it to enter into and abide by local collective bargaining agreements wherever it performs work. From May to December 1977, White house was engaged as a subcontractor performing work in El Paso, Illinois. Pursuant to its local collective bargaining agreement Whitehouse entered a Memorandum of Understanding with Painters' Local Union No. 157 which had jurisdiction over the El Paso site.

A. The Collective Bargaining Agreement.

The collective bargaining agreement gives the authority to "adjust disputes and grievances that may arise," and "to interpret this agreement so as to give force and effect to the intent, purpose and meaning of this agreement," to a Joint Local Trade Board (the Trade Board). The contract provides that disputes and grievances shall be referred for resolution first to the Trade Board, and ultimately, should the Trade Board fail to agree, through several steps to final and binding arbitration by a third party. The contract provides for enforcement of the decisions of the Trade Board and arbitrator by assessment of liquidated damages, penalties prescribed by the agreement for particular violations, or, in case of violation by a contractor, by designation of that contractor as an "unfair contractor." The contract also contains an "Occupational Safety Clause," which provides that the parties "will cooperate in the prevention of accidents and in protection and promotion of the safety and health of employees." This clause does not specify penalties for its violation, although other clauses specify fines or prescribe specific corrective action for their violation.

---

[*] Howard T. Markey, Chief Judge of the United States Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, is sitting by designation.

B. The Refusal to Work.

Between May and July 1977, Whitehouse employee Delmar Cook made several safety complaints to Whitehouse's Project Director at the El Paso site, Harold Arnold. Some of these complaints were acted upon and corrected; for example, after Cook complained that ladders did not have rubber shoes to prevent slipping, lifts were brought in to replace the ladders. Cook also complained about the lack of protective gloves after employee Albert Davidson suffered chemical burns on his hands from paint thinner. Arnold originally refused to provide gloves, but when Cook threatened to contact the Union Business Agent, Arnold relented and provided the gloves. Arnold did not remedy the other conditions complained of, which related to fire hazards in the trailer which Whitehouse maintained at the site for use as an office, storage area, and changing and cleanup room for the painters.[1]

On July 19, Arnold passed out timecards to the employees for them to check the number of hours worked the previous week. Cook noted that he had been credited for only two hours for the day on which he drove Davidson to the hospital for burn treatment. Cook contended that he should have been paid for four hours. Arnold disagreed. Cook refused to sign his timecard. Cook called the Union Business Agent to complain that evening. The Business Agent in turn called Arnold, who remained adamant. Shortly after Arnold informed Cook of this conversation at the side the next day, July 20, Cook told his fellow employees he was ill, and left the job site without informing Arnold.

Before Cook reported for work the next day he filed an OSHA complaint against Whitehouse, based on the uncorrected violations he had previously complained of to Arnold. When Cook reported for work that day, Arnold chastised him for failing to report to him before leaving the previous day. Cook reiterated his complaints about working conditions.

Cook then asserted that he would not work in the unsafe conditions. Davidson agreed with Cook, and the two employees changed from their painting clothes back into their street clothes. Arnold warned them that he would not take them back if they walked off the job, but the employees left the job site. They attempted to return the next day, and on three subsequent occasions, but were refused admittance. Whitehouse subsequently replaced them with two other union painters.

C. Post-Refusal Proceedings.

An OSHRC inspector visited the job site the day after Cook and Davidson walked off the job, and cited Whitehouse for the violations alleged in Cook's complaint, but did not impose a fine. After Whitehouse refused to reinstate the two employees, the Union filed charges with the Trade Board alleging that Whitehouse had refused to correct safety violations at the site, and had violated the contract by failing to accept Cook and Davidson for further employment. The Trade Board imposed a $250 fine for each violation, but did not order affirmative relief.

D. The NLRB Proceedings.

An Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) found that Whitehouse had violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging and refusing to reinstate Cook and Davidson for engaging in protected concerted activity, specifically, a walkout to protest Whitehouse's failure to correct unsafe working conditions.[2] The Board affirmed in a two to one decision, holding that the parties did not intend the contract's arbitration provision to extend to the Occupational Safety Clause, and that implication of a no-strike clause which would render the walkout unprotected was improper. In ascertaining the intent of the parties the Board relied primarily upon the perceived inadequacy of the contract's remedial provisions as to safety violations, and the parties' reliance upon OSHRC to settle safety disputes as evidence that they relied upon extra-contractual means of seeking safety-related remedies. Member Penello dissented, noting that the contract provided for enforcement of its provisions in a final and binding manner, and therefore met the Supreme Court's test for implying a no-strike obligation.

[1] Cook's other complaints specified the lack of a no-smoking sign in the trailer, open cans of thinner and paint, lack of fire extinguishers, and dangerous proximity of welding to naphtha drums stored just outside the trailer.

[2] The ALJ also found a violation of § 8(a)(3) of the Act. The Board reversed, finding no anti-union animus.

Whitehouse contends the Board erred in concluding that the arbitration provision did not extend to safety disputes and therefore did not create an implied no-strike obligation. It urges that the contract provisions give rise as a matter of law to an implied no-strike obligation, and that any strike or walkout in violation of that obligation was unprotected, and that the employees could therefore be lawfully discharged for breaching that obligation.

II.

Determination of whether the arbitration provision of a collective bargaining contract extends to safety disputes, and thus gives rise to a no-strike obligation as to those disputes, requires construction of the contract under accepted principles of traditional contract law, and in light of the basic policy of national labor legislation favoring the arbitral process as a substitute for economic warfare. Local 174, Teamsters v. Lucas Flour Co., 369 U.S. 95, 105, 82 S.Ct. 571, 577–78, 7 L.Ed.2d 593 (1962). In Lucas Flour and in Gateway Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 414 U.S. 368, 94 S.Ct. 629, 38 L.Ed.2d 583 (1974), the Supreme Court established the principles governing the existence and scope of implied agreements not to strike.

We note preliminarily that although interpreting a written instrument is a matter of law in which we are not obliged to follow the interpretation of the Board, see, e.g., Celanese Corp. v. NLRB, 291 F.2d 224, 226 (7th Cir. 1961), cert. denied, 368 U.S. 925, we generally exercise our usual deference to the Board's expertise in this regard. Moore v. Sunbeam Corp., 459 F.2d 811, 817 & n.10 (7th Cir. 1972). Such deference is limited in this situation, however, and extends only insofar as the Board interpretation is supported by the language of the agreement and relevant and necessary extrinsic evidence. W-I Canteen Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 738, 747 (7th Cir. 1979).

The first requisite for implication of a no-strike obligation is that the contract impose upon both parties the duty of submitting to final and binding arbitration. Lucas Flour, 369 U.S. at 105, 82 S.Ct. at 577–78; Gateway Coal, 414 U.S. at 374–75, 94 S.Ct. at 635. As noted above, this collective bargaining agreement required referral of both parties' grievances and disputes to the Trade Board for resolution, and ultimately to an arbitrator if the Trade Board could not agree. The contract is explicit as to the effect given to the arbitration decision: "When a decision is reached either by the * * * Trade Board, by the conciliator or by the arbitrator, such decision shall be final and binding upon all parties." This agreement thus satisfies the first element of the Lucas Flour-Gateway Coal test.

The second element required for inference of a no-strike obligation as to a particular matter is that the matter be one which it has been agreed will be covered by the compulsory terminal arbitration. Lucas Flour, 369 U.S. at 106, 82 S.Ct. at 578. The Gateway Coal decision addressed itself to this question in precisely the context posed by the instant suit, i.e., whether a dispute over safety was governed by an arbitration provision. The Court first noted the broad language of the arbitration clause, which reached "any local trouble of any kind aris[ing] at the mine." 414 U.S. at 376, 94 S.Ct. at 636. The Court held, "On its face, this contractual language admits of only one interpretation: that the agreement required the union to submit this dispute to arbitration for resolution by an impartial umpire." Id. The Court then rejected the reasoning of the Court of Appeals, which had enforced the Board's order on the basis of a putative public policy disfavoring arbitration of safety disputes. On the contrary, the Court held, the presumption of arbitrability first enunciated in the Steelworkers[3] trilogy applies to safety disputes in the same manner as it does to other areas of potential management-labor dispute. The presumption of arbitrability over such disputes is so strong, the Court went on to hold, that in the absence of any express provision excluding a particular grievance from arbitration, "only the most forceful evidence of a purpose to exclude the claim from arbitration can prevail." 414 U.S. at 376 n.10, 94 S.Ct. at 636 n.10. We find this reasoning applicable and controlling in the present case.

While the agreement at issue here did not contain the "any local trouble" phrase construed in Gateway Coal, it did grant the Trade Board the broad power to adjust disputes and grievances that might arise between the parties, and to interpret the contract so as to give effect to its purposes. As noted above, this contract explicitly provides for the protection of promotion of the safety and health of employees. The specific inclusion of such aims as one of the purposes of the contract is perhaps more compelling evidence of the parties' intent to arbitrate such disputes than is the sweeping, but more general language of Gateway Coal. Construing the contract as a whole and in light of the presumption of arbitrability, see Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 279, 76 S.Ct. 349, 356, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956); W–I Canteen, 606 F.2d at 745, we find the contract unambiguously and on its face includes safety disputes within the scope of the arbitration provisions. Nor is there the type of express exclusion from arbitrability the Gateway Coal Court held would be required to negate such an inference. We hold therefore that the arbitration provision of the collective bargaining agreement does extend to disputes over safety, and that the Board erred by ruling to the contrary. We are unpersuaded by the Board's reasoning to the contrary.

The Board held that the presumption of arbitrability was rebutted by the fact that the health and safety clause was silent on the amount of liquidated damages to be levied for its violation, and failed to provide any affirmative remedial alternative to imposition of a fine. The Board reasoned that since the agreement's remedial provisions were not explicitly linked to the safety clause, there was "doubt as to the parties' intentions with respect to arbitration of safety grievances." [4] Slip Op. at 4. We believe the analysis of dissenting Member Penello is the more appropriate expression of the law as enunciated by the Supreme Court:

> My colleagues in the majority conclude that the contractual provision limiting remedies for violations of the agreement to fines or liquidated damages constitutes inadequate consideration upon which to predicate an implied no-strike agreement under the Supreme Court's decision in Lucas Flour. They would adopt the [ALJ's] finding that there was no quid pro quo present from which a no-strike agreement could be implied under Gateway Coal. Therefore, in the absence of a no-strike agreement rendering the walk-out unprotected, the majority finds that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Cook and Davidson for engaging in a protected strike over unsafe working conditions. I disagree. There is nothing in either Lucas Flour or Gateway Coal to support the majority's conclusion that the Supreme Court would consider the adequacy of the remedies in the arbitration clause of the contract to have any bearing upon whether a no-strike obligation would be implied, and the majority has cited no cases in support of this novel proposition.
> I see no reason to create an additional criterion for determining whether the parties intended that a no-strike agreement be implied when there is no support for this proposition in either case law or national labor policy. The Supreme Court expressed no concern in Lucas Flour or Gateway Coal as to the actual mechanics of the system by which the parties elected to enforce their agreement, so long as the system ultimately resolved disputes in a final and binding way. This is in accord with the strong national policy favoring the arbitration of labor disputes as a substitute for industrial strife.

Slip Op. at 10, 13–14. (Footnotes omitted.) We further note that the Court was explicit in Gateway Coal that "[d]outs should be resolved in favor of coverage," 414 U.S. at 380 n.10, 94 S.Ct. at 638 n.10 (quoting United Steelworkers v. Warrior & Gulf Navigation Co., 363 U.S. 574, 583, 80 S.Ct. 1347, 1353, 4 L.Ed.2d 1409 (1960)). We believe the collective bargaining agreement, read as a whole, reflects on its face a desire to insure labor peace and avoid resort to economic weapons by submitting disputes over issues within its confines to final and binding arbitration.

[4] Some clauses of the contract explicitly link themselves to the arbitration procedure, while the Occupational Safety Clause does not. Whatever tenuous negative implication might be gleaned from this omission does not rise to the level of the express negation required by Gateway Coal, 414 U.S. at 380 N.10, 94 S.Ct. at 638 n. 10.

We hold, therefore, that the contract, read as a whole and in light of the presumption of arbitrability, unambiguously provides for arbitration of safety disputes. In light of the traditional contract principle, see Lucas Flour, 369 U.S. at 105, 82 S.Ct. at 577–78, that extrinsic evidence of the intent of parties to a contract need only be considered when the provisions of the contract itself are ambiguous, we need not reach the question whether the Board erred in its weighing of such matters. We do note, however, that as Member Penello points out in dissent, the Board's finding of reliance on extra-contractual resolution of safety disputes is contradicted by the behavior of the parties in this suit, for the Union did submit its safety grievance to the Trade Board for resolution. Any inference to the contrary of the arbitrability of safety disputes is highly speculative and unsupportable in light of the well-settled presumption of arbitrability.

III.

Once a determination is made that a dispute is subject to arbitration, the obligation not to strike over that matter is considered to be coterminous. Gateway Coal, 414 U.S. at 382, 94 S.Ct. at 639. Coterminous interpretation means that if the subject of a work stoppage is covered by the arbitration provisions of the contract, then the stoppage violates the no-strike clause. Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. General Teamster Local Union 326, 624 F.2d 1182, 1185–86 (3d Cir. 1980). The walkout by Cook and Davidson thus violated the contractually-imposed obligation not to strike over safety matters, but rather to submit them to the arbitration process. Gateway Coal, 414 U.S. at 380–87, 94 S.Ct. at 638–41; see Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling at 1185–86.

A work stoppage carried out in violation of a no-strike clause is not protected activity under the Labor Act, and may give rise to discharge, Atkinson v. Sinclair Refining Co., 370 U.S. 238, 246, 82 S.Ct. 1318, 1323–24, 8 L.Ed.2d 462 (1962); Moore v. Sunbeam Corp., 459 F.2d 811, 816 (7th Cir. 1972); Artim Transportation System, Inc. v. NLRB, 396 F.2d 359, 365 (7th Cir. 1968), regardless of whether the no-strike obligation is expressed in the contract or implied from the duty to arbitrate, Inland Steel Co. v. Local Union No. 1545. United Mine Workers, 505 F.2d 293, 299 (7th Cir. 1977), overruled in part on other grounds, Zeigler Coal Co. v. Local Union No. 1870, United Mine Workers, 566 F.2d 582 (7th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 436 U.S. 912, 98 S.Ct. 2253, 56 L.Ed.2d 413 (1978). Because Cook and Davidson walked out in violation of the implied obligation not to strike over safety disputes, Whitehouse did not violate § 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging and refusing to rehire them.

The Board asserts that employee protests over safety are always protected activity, relying on NLRB v. Washington Aluminum, 370 U.S. 9, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962) (employees refused to work in 11 degree weather; no no-strike obligation); Brown & Root, Inc. v. NLRB, 634 F.2d 816 (5th Cir. 1981) (employees wished to wait for rain to stop before working with electrical equipment); Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 618 F.2d 1009 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 859, 66 L.Ed.2d 801 (1981) (employees refused to operate crane after observing unsafe condition; collective bargaining agreement provided for such temporary cessation); NLRB v. Modern Carpet Industries, Inc., 611 F.2d 811 (10th Cir. 1979) (employees refused to handle radioactive lead; no no-strike obligation); NLRB v. Leslie Metal Arts Co., 509 F.2d 811 (6th Cir. 1975) (employees walked out when threatened by another employee; no no-strike obligation); Union Boiler Co. [v.], 213 N.L.R.B. 818, enforced, 530 F.2d 970 (4th Cir. 1975) (no no-strike obligation). These cases are all distinguishable from the instant situation in that they are either situations in which a safety hazard suddenly arose and presented an immediate threat, or in which no arbitration provision existed for resolution of safety disputes and the parties were required to fall back upon their economic weapons. The instant case does not present a situation where employees temporarily ceased work until a novel and immediately threatening situation was corrected, but rather one in which employees chose to protest the existence of conditions which had apparently existed from day one of the job by withholding their services completely. This was a method of protest they had given up in return for binding arbitration. We find that Gateway Coal is virtually indistinguishable from this case, and thus regardless of whether a temporary work stoppage is ever justified by sudden and immediate danger to employees, that the walkout in this situation was unprotected.

For the foregoing reasons we grant the petition to review and set aside the order of the NLRB, and deny the Board's cross-application for enforcement.

REVIEW GRANTED; ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

NLRB v. Decibel Products, Inc.

657 F.2d 727 (5th Cir.), September 30, 1981—248 NLRB 1337

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before THORNBERRY, COLEMAN and AINSWORTH, Circuit Judges

COLEMAN, Circuit Judge: On June 1, 1979, Decibel employees at its Dallas plant voted 82 to 58 in favor of representation by UAW. Decibel challenged certain election procedures but the National Labor Relations Board certified the Union as the exclusive representative of the workers.

Claiming that Union certification was improper, Decibel refused to bargain with the UAW. On December 10, 1979, UAW filed an unfair labor practice charge against Decibel. The Board investigated the charge and at the culmination of its administrative process, on April 22, 1980, found Decibel to be in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Sections 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. 151 et seq. It ordered Decibel to bargain with the UAW. The Board seeks enforcement of this order.

For the reasons stated post, we deny the Board's petition to enforce. We set aside the certification. We remand with the instruction that the Board consider all the evidence in the record, and that it reconsider the Regional Director's report in the light of that evidence.

The issue presented in this case has recently been confronted and decided by the Sixth Circuit in N.L.R.B. v. North Electric Company, Plant No. 10, 644 F.2d 580 (1981). We agree with the reasoning applied and the result reached in that case.

In the instant case, Decibel argued that improper election practices infected the election and that a new election should be held. It contended that when an N.L.R.B. official in charge of the election carried the ballots, during the counting process, to a private office for the purpose of making a telephone call, outside the view of election observers, she destroyed the secrecy of the ballot box and thus fatally tainted the election. It was further contended that Union partisans, wearing T-shirts displaying the words "Vote UAW" and "Vote Yes UAW", paraded back and forth in view of the voters, creating a circus atmosphere, amounting to illegal electioneering near polling stations, citing Clausen Baking Company, 134 N.L.R.B. 111 (1961). Finally, it is contended that a Union observer held up a clenched fist to voters, tending to create an atmosphere of fear and compulsion.

For the reasons immediately to follow, we do not reach the merits of these arguments. We find ourselves unable to do so because in its consideration of this case the Board considered nothing but the Regional Director's report. It did not review the record. See N.L.R.B. v. North Electric Company, Plant No. 10, supra.

Decibel's objections had been made the subject of an administrative investigation. Based upon the investigation and upon affidavits submitted by Decibel, the Regional Director for the N.L.R.B. made a determination against the Company, which was submitted to the Board by the Director's report. In deciding whether to affirm or reverse the Regional Director's decision the panel reviewed nothing but the report. It did not review the affidavits which had been submitted by Decibel and did not examine the entire record compiled by the Regional Director. It denied Decibel a hearing. Instead, it granted the motion of the General Counsel for a summary judgment, overruling Decibel's objections.

We do not agree with the Board argument that in remanding this case for a consideration of the complete record we are in conflict with our prior decision in Birmingham Ornamental Iron Company v. National Labor Relations Board, 615 F.2d 661 (5th Cir., 1980). In that case the panel held that the objections filed by the employer were so lacking in factual detail that they might be denied both by the Regional Director and the Board entirely without recourse to the administrative record, that is, to any part of it. The panel then proceeded to hold that it did not need "to decide whether, if sufficient factual allegations are stated in the exceptions to the District Director's report to meet these requirements, the provisions of section (g) require the inclusion of the affidavits in the Regional Director's file as a part of the record on review".

The panel then observed that "the failure to include affidavits as applied to the Regional Director is not a per se basis for setting aside the District Director's report", citing N.L.R.B. v. Dobbs House, Inc., 613 F.2d 1254 (5th Cir., 1980), another case in which the decision of this question was pretermitted.

Leaving aside whether the foregoing statement was necessary to the Birmingham decision, we need not go so far here as to say that we are laying down a per se rule. What we do note is that as in National Labor Relations Board v. North Electric Company, supra, there were allegations here of threats and intimidation of the voting employees, as well as a most unusual handling of the ballot box during the counting process.

In keeping with the rationale of North Electric we hold that in this case the Board should have had the entire record before it while considering its decision.[1] In our opinion, to hold otherwise would deny the employer procedural due process and would countenance an abuse of discretion by the Board.

Enforcement denied, without prejudice.

Certification of the Union set aside.

Remanded to the Board with instructions that along with the Regional Director's report it shall also consider the entire record compiled in connection with the report.

IT IS SO ORDERED.

THORNBERRY, Circuit Judge, specially concurring: Although I do not disagree with the majority's result in this case, I am troubled by its reliance on NLRB v. North Electric Company, Plant No. 10, 644 F.2d 580 (6th Cir. 1981). In North Electric, the Sixth Circuit held that "it is an abuse of discretion for the Board to adopt the report of the Regional Director without reviewing the evidence relied upon by the Regional Director." Id. at 584. Further, the North Electric court held that the Regional Director must transmit the entire record to the Board in order to facilitate the Board's review of the evidence. Id. at 583, 584. In short, the court established a per se rule under 29 C.F.R. § 102.69(g).

As I understand the majority, we do not and cannot accept the per se rule of North Electric. In Birmingham Ornamental Iron Company v. NLRB, 615 F.2d 661 (5th Cir. 1980), this Circuit held that "the failure to include affidavits as applied to the regional director is not a per se basis for setting aside the district director's report." Id. at 667 (emphasis in original), citing NLRB v. Dobbs House, Inc., 613 F.2d 1254 (5th Cir. 1980). I agree, however, that "if sufficient factual allegations are stated in the exceptions to the district director's report . . . the provisions of section (g) require the inclusion of the affidavits in the regional director's file as a part of the record on review." 615 F.2d at 667. In this case, the allegations of vote counting improprieties and of intimidation of the voting employees are sufficient to require the transmission of the record to the NLRB for Board consideration.

Hi-Craft Clothing Co. v. NLRB

660 F.2d 910 (3d Cir.), October 1, 1981—251 NLRB 1310

On petition to review and cross application for enforcement of Board Order

Before ALDISERT and WEIS, Circuit Judges, and RE, Chief Judge*

911

WEIS, Circuit Judge. The National Labor Relations Board ordered reinstatement of a supervisor who had been discharged because of his threat to institute Board action against his employer. Despite the fact that the National Labor Relations Act excludes supervisors from its ambit, the Board contends that enforcement of the right of access to its procedures justifies an expansive interpretation of its authority. We reject that statutory interpretation and, concluding that the Board had no jurisdiction, deny enforcement of its order.

[1] In the ultimate, by considering nothing but the Regional Director's report, the Board allowed the Director to decide the case instead of making its own determination, based on the record as a whole.

*Honorable Edward D. Re, Chief Judge of the United States Court of International Trade, sitting by designation.

James J. Jiorle charged that he had been dismissed by his employer, Hi-Craft Clothing Company, in violation of § 8(a)(4) of the Act. After a hearing, an Administrative Law Judge recommended that Jiorle be reinstated with back pay. A three member panel of the Board, one member dissenting, adopted the ALJ's recommendations.

At the hearing, the parties stipulated that Jiorle was a supervisor. The ALJ resolved some factual disputes about events that had occurred, and found that the controversy centered on whether Hi-Craft had promised to pay Jiorle a $1,000 annual bonus when he was hired. For two years in succession, Jiorle received only $500, and he was convinced that Hi-Craft was reneging on its agreement. When the company proposed a profit sharing arrangement instead of the bonus, he became indignant and said he was "going to the Labor Board" to see what could be done to help him. Once the company owners realized that Jiorle was serious, he was discharged.

The ALJ found that the reason for Jiorle's termination soon became known to the other employees, and that Hi-Craft could reasonably have expected this to occur. Although acknowledging that as a supervisor Jiorle was not entitled to protection under the National Labor Relations Act, the ALJ held that the company's action produced a coercive effect on the employees' right of free access to the Board and in their exercise of other guarantees provided by the Act. The ALJ also accepted General Counsel's alternative argument that even supervisors should be protected when seeking to invoke the Board's processes. The Board agreed with the latter point, relying on its earlier decision in General Services, Inc., 229 N.L.R.B. 940 (1977), enf. denied, 575 F.2d 298 (5th Cir. 1978),[1] and said that "it is the Board's function, and not the employer's, to decide whether the individual is covered by the Act and his claim has merit."

Dissenting Member Truesdale pointed out that in the General Services case, a divided Board had in effect adopted a subjective approach by extending protection to a supervisor who was unsure of his status. As the dissenting opinion noted, this was contrary to the objective standard used in other areas, such as those in which the Board determines whether an employer violated § 8(a)(3) by discharging an alleged supervisor. In that line of cases, subjective good faith is irrelevant—the parties proceed at their own risk. The dissent also observed that "access to the Board is not an incantation that can somehow transform a supervisor into an employee and confer statutory rights upon a class of individuals that Congress has expressly excluded from the Act's coverage."

In addition to its contentions that factual matters were improperly resolved against it, the employer on appeal argues that the Board had no jurisdiction to act because the supervisor was acting only on his own behalf. In seeking enforcement, the Board contends that promoting unimpeded access to its processes requires that any person seeking assistance be protected—including a supervisor who is not otherwise covered by the National Labor Relations Act. In conclusion, the Board urges that its interpretation of the Act be accepted as "permissible if not actually required."

I

We begin with the question often presented in administrative appeals—the deference a reviewing court should accord to an agency's statutory interpretation. The respect required in a given case may be determinative of the outcome, for if great weight is given to an agency's interpretation, it must be given effect even if the court would have decided otherwise in the first instance. NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254, 260, 88 S.Ct. 988, 991, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968). The reviewing court's role is an uncertain one despite the fact that the Administrative Procedure Act provides that "the reviewing court shall decide all relevant questions of law, [and] interpret constitutional and statutory provisions * * *." 5 U.S.C. § 706 (1976).

[1] In its opinion the Board cited the decision in its own reports, but failed to indicate that the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in an unpublished opinion, disagreed with the Board's reasoning and refused to enforce the order. Incomplete citations of this nature are misleading to the reader and are subject to justifiable criticism.

The failure to cite the Court of Appeals decision may be an indication of the Board's feeling that it should apply its own rulings on a national basis, and that it therefore will not defer to the reviewing courts. The theory may be that the Board would prefer to have uniform agency rulings in effect across the country despite contrary court holdings. This is an approach similar to that adopted by the Internal Revenue Service and the Postal Service. Indeed, in at least one instance, the Board has refused to abide by a ruling from this court in a subsequent case in which the same legal point was at issue. Allegheny General Hospital v. NLRB, 608 F.2d 965, 968–69 (3d Cir. 1979).

We suggest that in most situations, a far better approach for an administrative agency would be to accept the first ruling of a court of appeals on a particular point or else seek reversal in the Supreme Court or a statutory change by Congress. To shop in a number of courts of appeals in hopes of securing favorable decisions is not only wasteful of overtaxed appellate resources but dissipates agency energies as well. This shopping practice should be subjected to searching and critical review. See Goodman's Furniture Co. v. United States Postal Service, 561 F.2d 462, 465 (3d Cir. 1977) (Weis, J., concurring); cf. American Medical International, Inc. v. HEW, No. 79-1460, slip op. at 10–13 (D.C. Cir. Aug. 14, 1981).

Early in the history of American administrative law, the Supreme Court took a restrictive view of the respective functions of agency and reviewing court. In Federal Trade Commission v. Gratz, 253 U.S. 421, 427, 40 S.Ct. 572, 574, 64 L.Ed. 993 (1920), the Court said, "The words 'unfair method of competition' are not defined by the statute and their exact meaning is in dispute. It is for the courts, not the commission, ultimately to determine as a matter of law what they include." That flat statement, however, eventually gave way to an approach that gave deference to an agency on the theory that it was the instrumentality created by Congress to carry out a policy expressed in broad statutory terms. Thus, in 1948, the Court in another FTC case said that it would give "great weight to the Commission's conclusion" that certain conduct was an "unfair method of competition." FTC v. Cement Institute, 333 U.S. 683, 720, 68 S.Ct. 793, 812, 92 L.Ed. 1010 (1948).

Application of this deferential standard, however, has not been consistent, even with respect to particular agencies. The acceptance given decisions of the NLRB by the Supreme Court has hardly been steadfast, and the passage of time has not revealed a trend toward one preferred position. In Bayside Enterprises, Inc. v. NLRB, 429 U.S. 298, 303, 97 S.Ct. 576, 580, 50 L.Ed.2d 494 (1977), for example, the Court acquiesced in the Board's contention as "a reasonable interpretation of the statute," consistent with the Board's prior holdings and the Secretary of Labor's construction, even though the issue could have, with equal reason, been resolved either way.

Similarly, NLRB v. Hearst Publications, Inc., 322 U.S. 111, 131, 64 S.Ct. 851, 860, 88 L.Ed. 1170 (1944), said a Board determination that "specified persons are 'employees' under this Act is to be accepted if it has 'warrant in the record' and a reasonable basis in law." Accord NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254, 88 S.Ct. 988, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968). In Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 501, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2473, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978), the Court cautioned "[t]he judicial role is narrow: The rule which the Board adopts is judicially reviewable for consistency with the Act, and for rationality, but if it satisfies those criteria, the Board's application of the rule, if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, must be enforced." (footnote and citations omitted).

On the other side are cases such as NLRB v. Insurance Agents' International Union, 361 U.S. 477, 499, 80 S.Ct. 419, 432, 4 L.Ed.2d 454 (1960), where the Court declined the opportunity to expound a detailed delineation of the respective functions of court and agency, and said, "We think the Board's resolution of the issues here amounted not to a resolution of interests which the Act left to it for case-by-case adjudication, but to a movement into a new area of regulation which Congress had not committed to it. Where Congress has in the statute given the Board a question to answer, the courts will give respect to that answer, but they must be sure the question has been asked."

In American Ship Building Co. v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300, 85 S.Ct. 955, 13 L.Ed.2d 855 (1965), the Court refused to yield to the Board's finding of an unfair labor practice when an employer "locked out" its employees after a bargaining impasse had been reached. The Court was "unable to find that any fair construction of the provisions relied on by the Board in this case can support its finding of an unfair labor practice. Indeed, the role assumed by the Board in this area is fundamentally inconsistent with the structure of the Act and the function of the sections relied upon." Id. at 318, 85 S.Ct. at 967. See also NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672, 100 S.Ct. 856, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980).

Further citations to cases on the topic would only serve to confirm Judge Friendly's observation in Pittston Stevedoring Corp. v. Dellaventura, 544 F.2d 35 (2d Cir. 1976), aff'd sub nom. Northeast Marine Terminal Co. v. Caputo, 432 U.S. 249, 97 S.Ct. 2348, 53 L.Ed.2d 320 (1977), that it is time to recognize that there are two lines of Supreme Court decisions on the subject which are analytically in conflict "with the result that a court of appeals must choose the one it deems more appropriate for the case at hand." Id. at 49 (footnote omitted).

After the Supreme Court affirmed the Dellaventura case without referring to Judge Friendly's comments, Professor Kenneth Culp Davis wrote, "The Supreme Court evidently has made a deliberate choice to let its two lines of cases continue to stand." Thus, "[t]he answer to the question whether the Court will use the rational basis test on a problem of applying law to established or undisputed facts is yes and no, with no guide as to when it is yes and when it is no." [2] K. Davis, Administrative Law of the Seventies 311–12 (1980 Supp.).

A canvass of the authorities at least makes one point clear. A reviewing court may not simply abdicate its responsibility by mumbling an indiscriminate litany of cases that extends "great deference to administrative conclusions." There is more to the judicial role. "Reviewing courts are not obliged to stand aside and rubber-stamp their affirmance of administrative decisions that they deem inconsistent with a statutory mandate or that frustrate the congressional policy underlying a statute." NLRB v. Brown, 380 U.S. 278, 291, 85 S.Ct. 980, 988, 13 L.Ed.2d 839 (1965).

In determining what degree of deference is appropriate, an appraisal of several factors should be made. In some cases, a distinction has been made between whether the issue is factual or legal. If the latter, then one may expect less deference to the agency and a more independent review by the courts. The difficulty that emerges, however, is that it is not always easy to detect the line between legal and factual issues in an administrative proceeding. See generally, W. Gellhorn & C. Byse, Administrative Law 251–57 (7th Ed. 1979). In most instances, the matter is one of "mixed law and fact."

The law-fact test has been criticized as being "too simplistic," United States v. The J. B. Williams Co., 498 F.2d 414, 431 (2d Cir. 1974), quoting Artvale, Inc. v. Rugby Fabrics Corp., 363 F.2d 1002, 1005 (2d Cir. 1966), and Professor Davis maintains that in recent years there has been a deemphasis in the distinction between the two. He comments that the majority and the dissenters on the Supreme Court may reach opposite conclusions by choosing between the two tests without explaining why either is correct. K. Davis, Administrative Law of the Seventies § 30 (1976).

Nevertheless, utilization of the dichotomy still has some value and in a situation where there are no factual disputes, there is a tendency toward a less inhibited approach by the courts. Thus, in Consumer Product Safety Commission v. GTE Sylvania, Inc., 447 U.S. 102, 120, 100 S.Ct. 2051, 2062, 64 L.Ed.2d 766 (1980), the Court refused to accept an administrative agency interpretation, saying, "This case presents a narrow legal issue that is readily susceptible of judicial resolution."

At times, the nature of the question determines the standard to be applied. If the issue falls outside the area generally entrusted to the agency, and is one in which the courts have a special competence, i. e., the common law or the constitutional law, there is little reason for the judiciary to defer to an administrative interpretation. Piper v. Chris Craft Industries, 430 U.S. 41 n.27, 97 S.Ct. 949 n.27 (1977); Institute for Scientific Information, Inc. v. United States Postal Service, 555 F.2d 128, 132 (3d Cir. 1977).

Even if the question does involve interpretation of a statute which is considered within the "specialized" knowledge of an administrative agency, the courts are still not free to relinquish their responsibility of judicial review. As the Court said in American Ship Building Co., "The deference owed to an expert tribunal cannot be allowed to slip into a judicial inertia which results in the unauthorized assumption by an agency of major policy decisions properly made by Congress." 380 U.S. at 318, 85 S.Ct. at 967. Blind acceptance of agency "expertise" is not consistent with responsible review.

[2] The extent to which courts should substitute their judgment for that of an agency is an underlying problem which has not adequately been resolved and cannot be done here. Professors Davis and Jaffe present diverging views on this point.

In Davis' assessment, the Supreme Court's continuance of inconsistent lines of cases is an indication of the Court's preference for its own unguided discretion in each case. This unacknowledged discretionary power, according to Davis, however, is not necessarily undesirable. K. Davis, Administrative Law of the Seventies 312 (1980 Supp.).

Professor Jaffe, on the other hand, is of the opinion that judicial review of administrative action should be "cautionary," and advocates a "clear purpose" of the statute as the standard of review to be employed. According to Jaffe, "What it means very simply * * * is that where Judges are themselves convinced that a certain reading, or application, of the statute is the correct—or the only faithful—reading or application, they should intervene and so declare. Where the result of their study leaves them without a definite preference, they can and often should abstain if the agency's preference is 'reasonable.'" L. Jaffe, Judicial Control of Administrative Action 572 (1965). For a discussion and critique of these views, see Perfecting the Partnership: Structuring the Judicial Control of Administrative Determinations of Questions of Law, 31 Vand.L.Rev. 91, 116–19 (1978).

When the agency diet is food for the courts on a regular basis, there is little reason for judges to subordinate their own competence to administrative "expertness." For example, the issues in social security disability cases are hardly unfamiliar to judges who try or review personal injury tort cases on a regular basis.

Recognition that an agency is not the exclusive repository of technical expertise may, in part, account for the Supreme Court's reluctance on occasion to accept the SEC's interpretation of the Securities Acts, a field in which the courts are often the forum for disputes between private litigants. As Justice Powell wrote in International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers of America v. Daniel, 439 U.S. 551, 566, n.20, 99 S.Ct. 790, 800, n.20, 58 L.Ed.2d 808 (1979), "deference is constrained by our obligation to honor the clear meaning of a statute, as revealed by its language, purpose and history. On a number of occasions in recent years, this Court has found it necessary to reject the SEC's interpretation of various provisions of the Securities Acts." (citations omitted).

When, however, an agency has been entrusted with wide discretion in a technical area, such as the Truth in Lending Act, and Congress has specifically designated the agency as the primary source for the interpretation and application of the statute, a different standard often applies. There, "judges ought to refrain from substituting their own interstitial lawmaking for that of the [agency], so long as the latter's lawmaking is not irrational." Ford Motor Credit Co. v. Milhollin, 444 U.S. 555, 568, 100 S.Ct. 790, 798, 63 L.Ed.2d 22 (1980).

Another important facet of administrative interpretation comes to the fore when the agency construes its own authorization statute. There the Court has been less inclined to be influenced by administrative constructions. In Southeastern Community College v. Davis, 442 U.S. 397, 99 S.Ct. 2361, 60 L.Ed.2d 980 (1979), the restrictive approach is apparent:

> "Although an agency's interpretation of the statute under which it operates is entitled to some deference, 'this deference is constrained by our obligation to honor the clear meaning of a statute, as revealed by its language, purpose and history.' Teamsters v. Daniel, 439 U.S. [551, 556] n.20, 99 S.Ct. 790, 800 n.20, 58 L.Ed.2d 808 (1979) * * *. [E]ven if HEW has attempted to create such an obligation [of affirmative action] itself, it lacks the authority to do so."
> Id. 442 U.S., at 411-12, 99 S.Ct., at 2369-70 (emphasis added).

In FCC v. Midwest Video Corp., 440 U.S. 689, 99 S.Ct. 1435, 59 L.Ed.2d 692 (1979), the same reservation was expressed. "Though the lack of congressional guidance has in the past led us to defer—albeit cautiously—to the Commission's judgment regarding the scope of its authority, here there are strong indications that agency flexibility was to be sharply delimited." Id. at 708, 99 S.Ct. at 1445. See also Volkswagenwerk Aktiengesellschaft v. FMC, 390 U.S. 261, 272, 88 S.Ct. 929, 935, 19 L.Ed.2d 1090 (1968).

The more intense scrutiny that is appropriate when the agency interprets its own authority may be grounded in the unspoken premise that government agencies have a tendency to swell, not shrink, and are likely to have an expansive view of their mission. Not surprisingly, therefore, an agency ruling that broadens its own jurisdiction is examined carefully.[3]

When the agency has participated in the legislative activity leading to its authorization, generally more respect will be accorded the administrative interpretation. If the construction is longstanding, it is often considered more authoritative because those who have had matters before the agency have come to rely upon its interpretation, NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., 416 U.S. 267, 274-75, 94 S.Ct. 1757, 1761-62, 40 L.Ed.2d 134 (1974). Needless to say, however, if the construction is erroneous, mere repetition will not make it correct. See FMC v. Seatrain Lines, Inc., 411 U.S. 726, 745, 93 S.Ct.

[3] As one commentator aptly observed: "It is basic that an administrative agency is a creature of statute, and can only act within the jurisdiction conferred by its enabling act. Although the courts will respect authorized agency action, an assumption of jurisdiction or action that is ultra vires and beyond the scope of the delegated authority will be set aside." II

It is against this background that we reach the issue in this case. Section 8(a)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to discharge or otherwise discriminate against an employee because he has filed charges or given testimony under the Act." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(4) (1976). Section 2(3) says that "employee" shall include any employee * * * but shall not include * * * any individual employed as a supervisor * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) (1976).

A straightforward reading of these two portions of the statute leads to the conclusion that Jiorle, an admitted supervisor, is not protected, since he is expressly excluded under the definitional section. The Board, however, contends that the anti-discrimination section of the Act should be given a liberal construction to effect its purposes and relies upon NLRB v. Scrivener, 405 U.S. 117, 92 S.Ct. 798, 31 L.Ed.2d 79 (1972), and Nash v. Florida Industrial Commission, 389 U.S. 235, 88 S.Ct. 362, 19 L.Ed.2d 438 (1967).

In Scrivener, the Supreme Court sustained the Board's position that § 8(a)(4) protected an employee who had given a written statement to a field examiner but had not filed a charge or testified at a formal hearing. Finding the approach to § 8(a)(4) generally to have been a liberal one designed to keep open channels of information to the Board, and finding no substantial countervailing considerations, the Court accepted that interpretation.

The Board places much emphasis on the board language used in Scrivener and Nash in discussing § 8(a)(4), especially where the Court says that "all persons" must be free from coercion in reporting unfair labor practices to the Board. 389 U.S. at 238, 88 S.Ct. at 365. Although those cases did extend the scope of § 8(a)(4)'s protection beyond the precise wording of the statute, they did so for the benefit of an employee—an individual clearly within the Act's coverage.

More closely related is an earlier case from the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, where the court enforced an order requiring reinstatement of a supervisor who had testified before the Board on behalf of protected employees, Oil City Brass Works v. NLRB, 357 F.2d 466 (5th Cir. 1966). The court found that the retaliation imposed on the supervisor infringed the ability of employees to have him testify on their behalf and, accordingly, trenched upon the free exercise of their right to "a congressionally provided, effective administrative process." It was this interference with the employees' § 7 rights that violated § 8(a)(1).

Several differences, however, exist between the Oil City Brass Works situation and that presented here. The court of appeals based its decision on the fact that employees' rights were affected, not just those of the supervisor. Secondly, the remedy was necessary because of a violation of § 8(a)(1), not § 8(a)(4) as in the case at hand. The issue confronting us—that of the right of a supervisor to invoke the protection of § 8(a)(4) with respect to a charge of his own, unrelated to employees of the company, thus has not been addressed by an appellate court in a published opinion.

The Board here relied on its own case, General Services, Inc., in finding a violation of the Act. There, a man named McCracken, unsure of his status as a supervisor, filed a charge asserting that he had been dismissed because of union activity. A Board investigation revealed that he was indeed a supervisor and therefore had no remedy. However, the Board concluded that, for purposes of § 8(a)(4), he was to be considered an "employee" and the company could not refuse to reinstate him because he had initiated a charge. The opinion recited that the Taft-Hartley Amendment, which removed supervisors from the definition of "employees," did not change the wording of § 8(a)(4). Since supervisors in pre-Taft-Hartley days were within § 8(a)(4), therefore, the Board majority held that they continued to be so after the amendments of 1947. Significantly, the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, which had decided Oil City Brass Works, refused to enforce the order of reinstatement.

B.

Because of the lack of authority in this area, we must conduct our own analysis of the legislative history and of related Board and Court precedent to determine whether the Board's conclusion can be justified. This necessitates a consideration of the remedial nature of § 8(a)(4) and the restrictive definition of employee that excludes supervisors in § 2(3).

In its early years, the Board followed a wavering course in determining whether supervisory personnel came within the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act. In Packard Co. v. NLRB, 330 U.S. 485, 67 S.Ct. 789, 91 L.Ed. 1040 (1947), the Court upheld the Board's contention that it had jurisdiction over supervisors. Congress disagreed, and promptly enacted the Taft-Hartley law amending the National Labor Relations Act.

The Senate and the House reports made it very clear that "[s]upervisors are management people * * *. They abandoned the 'collective security' of the rank and file voluntarily, because they believed the opportunities thus opened to them to be more valuable to them than such 'security.'" H.R.Rep.No. 245, 80th Cong., 1st Sess., 16–17 (1947). In disapproving the Board's interpretation, the House Report commented: "What the bill does is to say what the law always has said until the Labor Board, in the exercise of what it modestly calls its 'expertness,' changed the law: That no one, whether employer or employee, need have as his agent one who is obligated to those on the other side, or one whom, for any reason, he does not trust." Id. at 17 (emphasis in original).

In NLRB v. Bell Aerospace Co., the Court reviewed this legislative history and rejected the Board's ruling that the agency had jurisdiction because certain buyers were not managerial employees. The Board was instructed to apply a more limited definition in keeping with the intent of the Taft-Hartley amendment to exclude managerial personnel. 416 U.S. at 289, 94 S.Ct. at 1769. Thus, in delineating the category of persons excluded, the Court construed the Amendment liberally. Beasley v. Food Fair of North Carolina, Inc., 416 U.S. 653, 661–62, 94 S.Ct. 2023, 2027–28, 40 L.Ed.2d 443 (1974), employed a similar philosophy. There the Court held that remedies granted by the state to supervisors for discharges because of union membership were preempted by the Taft-Hartley Act.

In a third case, Florida Power & Light Co. v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 417 U.S. 790, 803–05, 94 S.Ct. 2737, 2743–45, 41 L.Ed.2d 477 (1974), the Court once again emphasized the statutory limitation by holding that the Board could not prevent a union from disciplining its supervisory members for performing bargaining unit work during a strike.[4] The majority did note a number of cases in the courts of appeals where the Board action in favor of supervisors had been approved, but only in instances where the discharges were found to have interfered with employee rights. When only the supervisor's interests are at stake, it is clear that the intent of the Taft-Hartley Amendments is to deny jurisdiction to the Board.

Although the ALJ accepted the theory that the employer's action inspired such fear that employees would hesitate to invoke their own rights, the Board does not rely on that approach and does not press it on appeal. In any event, that premise at best is of dubious validity, as the opinion in Oil City Brass Works convincingly demonstrates.

C.

The legislative history and decisional law demonstrate convincingly that we should reject the Board's assumption of jurisdiction in this case and its quest for this court's "deference" to agency expertise. What is present here is an unadorned legal issue and, for present purposes, undisputed facts. This is not a question of the Board applying a broad statutory term to a specific set of facts, but is a case of straightforward statutory construction.

Although the Board is granted wide discretion because of its special competence in dealing with labor problems, there are limitations on that power when the agency is engaged in construing its own authority. In this instance, moreover, the Board's interpretation of §§ 2(3) and 8(a)(4) was not a longstanding one, but was of recent origin.

On a plain language basis, the thrust of the statute is clear: Section 2(3) excludes supervisors from the protection of the Act. Even were there an ambiguity, the legislative history makes it clear that Congress was in earnest in excluding such persons from coverage. The limited exception that Oil City Brass Works permitted does not exist here. No rank and file employees' interests were even tangentially at stake, but only Jiorle's personal grievance.

[4] In American Broadcasting Co. v. Writers Guild of America, 437 U.S. 411, 98 S.Ct. 2423, 57 L.Ed.2d 313 (1978), the Court did hold that the Board could prevent a union from disciplining supervisory members because of supervisory work performed during a strike. The rationale was that the union was interfering with employer rights of loyalty of managerial employees granted by § 8(b)(1)(B).

Once Jiorle's status was conceded, there was only one course for the Board to follow and that was to dismiss the claim. The Board had no authority to grant relief to Jiorle, just as a court has no power to adjudicate once it determines that it lacks jurisdiction over the merits. Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Risjord, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 669, 66 L.Ed.2d 571 (1981). The Board's power came to an end when its lack of jurisdiction became a matter of record. Devoid of power to adjudicate the merits of the underlying grievance because of the supervisor's status, it may not assert a power to protect its process—an abstract right to encourage, vindicate, or protect the right of access to its procedures.

The right of access to the federal courts for vindicating federal rights is more highly prized than access to any other federal institution. The article III courts constitute the citadel for the vindication of rights and privileges guaranteed by the Constitution, statutes, administrative regulations, and case law. But unless we have jurisdiction to adjudicate the underlying specific case or controversy, we cannot manufacture jurisdiction for the sole purpose of vindicating an abstract right of access to the court system. If an article III court cannot assume jurisdiction to protect an abstract right, a board which is the creature of limited statutory authority, a fortiori, cannot be said to possess such extensive power. Consequently, we will grant the petition for review and will deny the Board's petition for enforcement.

North Suburban Blood Center v. NLRB

661 F.2d 632 (7th Cir.), October 1, 1981—251 NLRB 733

On petition to review and cross application for enforcement of Board Order

Before Pell and Sprecher, Circuit Judges, and East,* Senior District Judge

Pell, Circuit Judge: North Suburban Blood Center (NSBC or Center) has petitioned this court, pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(f), to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board (Board or NLRB) which determined that the Center had violated 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (5) by refusing to bargain with the union certified as the collective bargaining representative of the petitioner's full and regular part-time distribution driver and dispatch employees,[1] and directed the Center to bargain with the union. The Board has cross-applied for enforcement of its order.

The union sought certification as the exclusive bargaining representative of NSBC's driver and dispatch employees pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 159(c). At the representation hearing before the Board's Regional Director, the Center objected to this unit definition as contrary to a Congressional directive to avoid undue proliferation of bargaining units in health care institutions. The Regional Director rejected NSBC's contention and determined that the Center was not a health care institution under § 152(14) of the Act. On that basis, he refused to apply considerations regarding the proliferation of bargaining units and directed an election. Ultimately, after the election, the Regional Director certified the union as the exclusive bargaining representative of the Center's drivers and dispatchers. After the Center refused to bargain, the union filed the unfair labor practice charges here at issue. The sole question decided in this appeal is whether the North Suburban Blood Center is a health care institution within the meaning of 29 U.S.C. § 152(14).[2]

The Nature of the Employer's Business

The North Suburban Blood Center is a nonprofit entity formed by thirteen hospitals in Chicago's north and northwest suburbs to meet the total blood requirements of the participating hospitals. NSBC represents the consolidation of the internal blood bank operations of the hospitals which established the Center with their own funds to serve more efficiently and economically the blood needs of all of the hospitals jointly. Soon after NSBC was established, it was incorporated as a separate nonprofit organization, but it still retains organizational connections with the thirteen hospitals. The Center's Board of Directors is comprised of a hospital administrator or physician of each individual hospital, and a blood bank director or pathologist from each hospital serves on NSBC's Medical Advisory Board. The president and medical director of the Center is a physician licensed in Illinois and certified by the American Board of Pathology.

*William G. East, Senior District Judge for the District of Oregon, is sitting by designation.

[1] The Board's Decision and Order is reported at 251 N.L.R.B. No. 98 (1980). This decision was based upon findings made by the Board's Regional Director in the prior representation hearing.

[2] Because of our disposition of the case we need not address the disputed issue of the propriety of the Board's inclusion of two on-call drivers in the bargaining unit.

Donor recruiting and blood collection, processing, storage, inventory control, and distribution, previously performed separately by each hospital, are now consolidated into a unified operation carried out by the NSBC. The Center obtains blood from donors at its own facility located in Glenview, Illinois, at hospital facilities it uses,[3] or through exchange agreements with blood banks serving other hospitals. In addition to acquiring blood, the Center purchases blood-related supplies in bulk for the hospitals.

The Center maintains laboratories for testing, processing, and preparing blood at the Glenview facility. In addition, the Center's administrative vice-president, Dan Connor, testified that NSBC operates a reference and consultation laboratory to which the hospitals can send problem cases when "they want to cross-match [blood] . . . and for whatever reason they have difficulty having the cross-matching compatible because the donor or the patient may have some irregular antibodies because of the previous transfusions * * *. [At the reference laboratory] we screen it against various known antiserums and then screen the donor for blood to come up with compatible blood for that patient that will not result in a transfusion reaction."

Other functions performed by the Center include diagnostic testing of patient specimens, consultation by the Center's Medical Director with physicians regarding particular patients, and the provision of blood and blood products for specific patients when requested by a physician from one of the hospitals. The Center can perform a plasma extraction procedure known as a "plasma freeze."[4] Center employees also draw blood from "autologous" donors—those who come to have blood drawn for their own use, such as persons with rare blood types whose blood is extracted for their own future surgery. In addition, some people come to the Center for "therapeutic phlebotomies," which involve the removal of excess red blood cells, at the order of their attending physicians. In these cases, the blood removed is not used for later transfusions. Such donors are really receiving treatment as patients, although these treatments constitute a very small percentage of the Center's overall activity. Finally, NSBC's medical director treats any donors experiencing complications at the Center.

Status of Health Care Institutions Under the Act

Prior to the 1974 amendments to the National Labor Relations Act (Act), nonprofit hospitals were explicitly exempted by § 152(2) from the Act's definition of "employers" subject to the Act's coverage. Although blood banks were not statutorily exempt from the Act, the Board occasionally had declined to assert jurisdiction over blood banks when it determined that the blood bank was "intimately related" to the patient care at the exempt hospitals.[5] In 1974, Congress removed the nonprofit hospital exemption from § 152(2) and added a new subsection 152(14), which reads: "The term 'health care institution' shall include any hospital, convalescent hospital, health maintenance organization, health clinic, nursing home, extended care facility, or other institution devoted to the care of sick, infirm, or aged persons." Although nonprofit hospitals now are subject to the Act's coverage as health care institutions, a determination that an entity is a health care institution requires unions of those organizations to abide by particular provisions added to the Act in 1974 designed to minimize disruption of patient care services.[6] [3] Some of the hospitals have not retained any blood donor facilities on premises. Others maintain space for the Center's use, but NSBC provides its own equipment and staff. Still other hospitals use their own facilities and staff, but operate under the ultimate direction of the Center.

[4] This procedure involves extracting a person's blood, which is then centrifuged to separate the blood elements—white and red blood cells, plasma, and platelets. Depending upon the needs of the person, some portion of the blood is removed and the rest returned. The entire process consumes from one to three hours.

[5] In Inter-County Blood Banks, Inc., 165 N.L.R.B. 252 (1967), the Board declined to assert jurisdiction over a blood bank which primarily serviced nonprofit hospitals then exempt from the Act because it found, under the particular facts of the case, that the employer's operations were "intimately related to the operations of the hospitals to which it supplies blood for the treatment of patients * * *." Id. at 253. There, the blood bank maintained 13 donor centers most of which were located in hospitals served by the blood bank. The hospitals supplied the space at no charge, but the blood bank operated the donor centers with its own equipment and staff. In American National Red Cross, 211 N.L.R.B. 587 (1974), however, the Board asserted jurisdiction where the operation of the employer's blood program occurred off the hospitals' premises and served both exempt and nonexempt hospitals. The Board found that the employer's operations were unlike those found intimately connected with exempt hospitals in Inter-County. We express no opinion as to the appropriateness of such findings under prior law or under the 1974 amendments, but only cite these examples to illustrate the status of blood banks under Board decisions prior to the 1974 amendments to the Act.

A major purpose of the 1974 amendments was to minimize "the potential for increased disruption of health care delivery resulting from increased labor activity by employees of health care institutions now that their activities were protected" by the Act. *NLRB v. The Board's Decision

Although we would not approve the automatic denial of health care institution status to an employer merely because it was a blood bank, neither do we conversely read the Act as amended categorically to require that every blood bank be classified as a health care institution. The facts of each case will vary, and each case must be reviewed individually. The Board's findings in any case must be upheld if supported by substantial evidence. American

[6] A proviso to Section 158(d) pertaining to bargaining for a new contract where a previous contract is in effect but about to expire contains notice requirements which are increased by thirty days for health care institutions. This section also extends the period during which strikes and lockouts are prohibited by 30 additional days for health care institutions. Finally, when bargaining for an initial contract, parties to a dispute must participate in state and federal mediation services, and must give 30 days notice of the dispute to these services if a health care institution is involved.

Subsection 158(g) requires ten days notice to the institution and the Federal Mediation Service before strikes or picketing are allowed at a health care institution. Section 169 allows employees of such institutions to pay dues to nonreligious charitable funds in lieu of union dues if that person's religion "has historically held conscientious objections to joining or financially supporting labor organizations." Finally, § 183 allows the Director of the Federal Mediation Service to convene an impartial Board of Inquiry to assist in resolving labor dispute impasses involving health care institutions where "a threatened or actual strike or lockout * * * [will] substantially interrupt the delivery of health care in the locality concerned * * *."

[7] Rep. Erlenborn underlined Congress' concern for avoiding undue disruption of health care services.

> I think much credit is to be given to the House and Senate sponsors of the legislation this year in recognizing the unique situation of the health care industry and the damage that can occur to a community if there is an unwarranted interruption of the health care delivery services, particularly if that interruption comes without sufficient notice to accommodate the community by providing alternative health care delivery during the period of the strike.

120 Cong.Rec. 16,902 (1974).

The Regional Director relied upon the authority of Sacramento Medical Foundation Blood Bank, 220 N.L.R.B. 904 (1975), and San Diego Blood Bank, 219 N.L.R.B. 116 (1975), to deny health care institution status to NSBC. Sacramento Blood Bank was an independent nonprofit corporation serving the blood requirements of approximately forty hospitals and health care institutions in the area. The Board's decision in that case did not reveal whether the blood bank performed any services beyond recruiting donors, testing, processing, and distributing blood. The Board's entire analysis of health care institution status in that case was a one-sentence footnote stating that "[w]e also rely on San Diego Blood Bank, supra, in finding that the Employer is not a health care institution within the meaning of the 1974 health care amendments (P.L. 93-360)." 220 N.L.R.B. at 904.[8]

In San Diego Blood Bank, 219 N.L.R.B. 116 (1975), the employer was an independent nonprofit corporation 80% of whose services supplied the blood needs of five nonprofit hospitals, and which overall served twenty-nine hospitals. As in Sacramento Blood Bank, the Board did not reveal whether the San Diego blood bank provided any services other than the recruiting of donors, and the processing and distribution of blood. In San Diego, the Board devoted a single paragraph to determining the health care institution issue:

> We also find that the Employer is not a health care institution within the meaning of the 1974 amendments. The legislative history makes it clear that the special provisions of the Act applicable to health care institutions relate to "patient care situations" and not "purely administrative health connected facilities." See 120 Cong.Rec. H4594 (daily ed., May 30, 1974); 120 Cong.Rec. S7310 (daily ed., May 7, 1974). Since supplying blood to hospitals obviously does not involve patient care, blood banks are not health care institutions within the meaning of the amendments.

219 N.L.R.B. at 116 n.17.

The parties have not cited, nor has this court found, any other Board cases which would shed more light on the issue, nor does it appear there are any Court of Appeals decisions determining the status of blood banks under the 1974 amendments.

The Regional Director's reliance, in the case at bar, on Sacramento Medical Foundation Blood Bank and San Diego Blood Bank is not compelling because (1) the record shows that the NSBC carried on activities beyond the recruitment of donors, processing, and distribution of blood, and (2) in any event, the Board's superficial analysis in those cases illustrates its disregard for Congress' concern to promote stability in patient care delivery through the 1974 amendments. While we recognize that Congress vested the Board with the responsibility for developing federal labor policy in the health care field, Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 501, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2473, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978), the Board cannot ignore Congressional intent. See NLRB v. Mercy Hospital Association, 606 F.2d 22, 24 (2d Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 971, 100 S.Ct. 1665, 64 L.Ed.2d 248 (1980); St. Vincent's Hospital v. NLRB, 567 F.2d 588, 590 (3d Cir. 1977).

The legislative history indicates that the crucial factor in the definition of health care institutions is patient welfare:

> The scope of the application of the amendment is meant to include patient care situations and is not meant to include purely administrative health connected facilities. As an example, an insurance company specializing in medical coverage would not fall under the scope of these amendments, but would remain under general coverage of the act. An administrative facility or operation within a hospital, however, would be within the scope of the amendments as there would be a connection directly and indirectly with ongoing patient care. The crucial connection is the welfare of the patients and such connection would in certain cases be mere geographical proximity to ongoing patient care.

120 Cong.Rec. 13,559 (1974) (remarks of Sen. Taft).

In the instant case, the Regional Director found that "no patient care occurs at the facility." He noted, for example, that the only persons who had participated in the "plasma freeze" procedure up to the time of the Board hearing had been staff members and not patients, and that although money had been set aside to establish an outpatient transfusion service for hemophiliacs, this program was not yet in operation. It is true that as of the date of the hearing, only staff members had actually participated in the plasma freeze procedure, but Dr. Farrales, the Center's Medical Director, also indicated that this process was evolving through its start-up phase: "[t]here have been freezes done at North Suburban where we did it on donors. We had donors from our staff. The machine has been purchased. The room has been set and so we are in the process of developing." The Regional Director ignored the existence of autologous donors who have blood extracted for their own future use. In oral argument, the Board characterized these people as healthy persons, not patients, and reasoned that in the event of a labor dispute, autologous donors could simply reschedule their blood extraction. Although rescheduling might ordinarily be possible, we can envision situations where the donor's operation has to be performed in the immediate future.

The Board's requirement that patient care physically occur at the Glenview facility, in any event, sidesteps the purpose of the Act's amendments. The legislative history indicates that geographical proximity may convert a purely administrative facility into a health care facility if located within a hospital because then "there would be a connection directly and indirectly with ongoing patient care." 120 Cong.Rec. 13,559 (1974) (remarks of Sen. Taft). But the converse does not necessarily follow. The fact that NSBC is located apart from any one hospital, precisely because it is designed to serve thirteen hospitals, cannot a fortiori deprive it of health care institution status if the Center is in fact integrally related to patient care and not purely administrative. The fact that patients are not generally treated at the facility does not itself mean that the Center is purely administrative if in fact a disruption in services would seriously impair patient welfare, the central concern of the amendments.

We reject the Board's argument that the nature of a blood bank's services is analogous to those of pharmaceutical suppliers or hospital laundry services in that all these enterprises supply essential goods and services but do not provide "patient care." While a strike at a pharmaceutical supplier or laundry service could force a hospital to seek alternative sources of supply involving some inconvenience and possibly a greater price, a labor disruption at NSBC could have a much more serious impact since blood is a crucial commodity which may not always be as fungible as other items.[9] A steady supply of blood of the required types is absolutely crucial to patient welfare. The hospitals in this case maintain no significant independent stockpiles of blood. Moreover, as previously discussed, the Center in this case provides consultation and other services beyond the collection, processing, and distribution of blood. NSBC is a nonprofit organization which, in reality, is simply a consolidation of the separate blood banks of the thirteen hospitals, each of which is represented on the Center's Board of Directors. The blood services provided in this case logically deserve the greater protections against labor disruption provided by Congress in the 1974 amendments.[10]

For the reasons expressed herein, the petition to set aside the Board's order is granted and the Board's cross-application for enforcement is denied. Because we find that the Center is a health care institution within the meaning of the Act, the Board must follow Congress' directive against the undue proliferation of bargaining units in the health care industry when considering the appropriate bargaining unit in any further proceedings. Mary Thompson Hospital, Inc. v. NLRB, 621 F.2d 858 (7th Cir. 1980).

PETITION TO SET ASIDE GRANTED; ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

[9] In the context of product liability law, for example, several states have recognized the unique nature of blood as a product and have acknowledged by legislation the critical need to assure patients an unimpeded blood supply. These states have declared the supply of blood to be a service, and not a sale, in order to avoid strict liability for contaminated blood. See, e.g., Cal. [Health & Safety] Code § 1606 (West); Mich.Stats.Ann. § 14.15 (9121) [M.C.L.A. § 333.9121].

[10] Because we are addressing the wholly unique situation of blood services, we are not persuaded by the Board's comparison of NSBC with the laboratories in Boston Medical Laboratory, Inc., 235 N.L.R.B. 1271, 1271 n.2 (1978), and Damon Medical Laboratory, Inc., 234 N.L.R.B. 333, 334 n.1 (1978), where the Board found the testing of human medical specimens not to involve patient care for purposes of the 1974 amendments. Boston Medical relied upon Damon which, in turn, had based its ruling upon San Diego Blood Bank and Sacramento Medical Foundation Blood Bank, stating that laboratory operations are "analogous" to blood banks. While we would not consider such a glib comparison to be compelling, we express no opinion as to the propriety of the Board's findings in Boston Medical or Damon, or likewise, the similar findings in Center for Laboratory Medicine, 234 N.L.R.B. 387, 387 n.3 (1978), cited by the Union, in which the Board also relied upon Damon.

NLRB v. Metal Container Corporation

660 F.2d 1309 (8th Cir.), October 7, 1981—249

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Ross and Arnold, Circuit Judges, and Hanson,* Senior District Judge

Arnold, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board petitions this Court for enforcement of its order of June 12, 1980, ordering Metal Container Corporation to cease and desist from refusing to bargain collectively with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 1 (IBEW), as the exclusive bargaining representative of the production-support electricians at its Arnold, Missouri plant. The company's refusal to bargain is based on its contention that a separate unit of maintenance electricians at this facility is inappropriate and that the only appropriate unit is a "wall-to-wall" production-and-maintenance unit. We enforce the Board's order.

I.

Metal Container Corporation's facility at Arnold, Missouri, manufactures two-piece aluminum beer cans for its parent company, the Anheuser-Busch Corporation. The Arnold facility is a high-speed, totally automated plant with three computer-controlled production lines, each of which has the capacity of making 800 cans a minute. The plant operates 24 hours a day, seven days a week. This is a new plant with no prior bargaining history.[1] The Arnold facility is the newest of three beer-can manufacturing facilities operated by the Company, the other two being located in Jacksonville, Florida, and Columbus, Ohio. Employees in those two plants, which also use the two-piece manufacturing process, are represented on a plant-wide, "wall-to-wall" basis with no separate craft units.

Nationwide, 71 out of 72 can plants using the two-piece process[2] have wall-to-wall production-and-maintenance units. The one two-piece plant with a separate electricians' unit is located in St. Louis, Missouri, and this separate unit is an extension of the bargaining structure already in place at a three-piece plant operated by the same company, American Can Corporation.[3] In the plants which manufacture cans using the three-piece process, there is a history of separate craft units. The three-piece process is not a high-speed or highly integrated manufacturing procedure. It is not a continuous-flow process, and various phases of production can be interrupted without adversely affecting other phases. Jobs are more compartmentalized. The two-piece process, on the other hand, is a completely automated, continuous-flow manufacturing process. The equipment is closely coupled in a continuous line, and all production equipment is controlled by a central computer. Raw materials fed into machines emerge twenty-five minutes later as finished beer cans complete with lithographed labels.

The IBEW represents approximately 800 maintenance electricians in the St. Louis, Missouri, area. Three electrician bargaining units represented by the IBEW are at three-piece can plants, and the fourth is at the two-piece American Can plant where a separate bargaining unit was established by agreement of the parties. The union maintains an apprenticeship program.

The production-support electricians at the Arnold facility spend approximately 80% of their time doing preventive maintenance on the production line. The maintenance is scheduled by the electrical supervisor days or even weeks in advance and is done in accordance with a written check list. There was conflicting testimony as to the degree of skill required to perform this job. The electrical engineer described the work as repetitive and routine. Members of the proposed unit testified that it required a high degree of skill and knowledge of the electrical field. While performing preventive maintenance, the electricians work alone, although they may talk with the production workers in attempting to determine how a machine is operating and whether there is any malfunction or trouble. There was testimony that 50% of this preventive maintenance work is non-electrical or requires a combination of skills involving mechanical, pneumatic, hydraulic, and electrical systems. The other 20% of the electricians' time is spent in the separate electrical shop making repairs, on the production line troubleshooting, or making repairs in other parts of the plant.[4]

*The Hon. William C. Hanson, Senior United States District Judge for the Northern and Southern Districts of Iowa, sitting by designation.

[1] Four other unions petitioned for plant-wide production-and-maintenance units. The United Steelworkers of America and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen, and Helpers intervened in the representation proceeding in support of the company's contention that only a wall-to-wall unit was appropriate. They are not parties to this enforcement proceeding.

[2] The two-piece process produces a seamless can with an integral bottom and an aluminum top. The older three-piece-can process produces a can with a separate bottom which is assembled by the customer.

[3] Before the hearing officer the parties stipulated that the separate electricians' unit at the new American Can plant in St. Louis was formed by agreement of the parties without Board sanction or approval.

The company does not require journeyman status or licensing of applicants. Company officials testified that they looked for basic electrical skills plus experience in other areas such as mechanical, hydraulic, and pneumatic systems. Experience in another high-speed manufacturing process is also considered valuable. The plant's electrical engineer who participated in the interviewing process testified that applicants were questioned about their electrical knowledge, and that the four electricians hired were "highly skilled."

The electricians are supervised both from within and from outside their craft. Their preventive-maintenance schedules are prepared by the electrical supervisor, and he and the electrical engineer are in the plant available to supervise or give technical advice to the electricians from 8 to 5 Monday through Friday. Since the plant operates continuously, however, some of the electricians on the night shift may not see either the electrical supervisor or the engineer for two or three weeks at a time. The two shifts are over-lapped by thirty minutes for a joint meeting of incoming and outgoing workers. The meetings provide continuity and allow those who have just finished their shift to brief those coming on about possible problems. These meetings are conducted by the production supervisor, and the electricians are required to attend. While working on the production line doing maintenance, the electrician is not closely supervised and essentially works alone, but if supervision is needed, it is provided by the shift superintendent. The shift superintendent has the authority to countermand the electricians' written instructions and also to discipline them up to and including dismissal, though this authority is rarely exercised. The two electricians assigned to each shift work separately, not together, and come in contact with production workers frequently.

Both the physical layout and the personnel structure of the plant are designed to foster an integrated work environment in which all employees, both production and maintenance, work together to maintain the uninterrupted operation of the production line. The company has a program for cross-training employees in aspects of production outside their regular assignments. The cross-training has a limited effect on the electricians' craft status. Employees in other classifications have not been trained to do major electrical work; and the production-support electricians, after initial training, will work on the production line only in emergencies. On days known as "maintenance day" one of the three lines is closed down for complete inspection and maintenance. On those days, the electricians will work with other employees in teams. Only electricians perform major electrical repair work.

All conditions of employment and fringe benefits are uniform for hourly employees throughout the plant. All use the same entrance and punch the same timeclock. Production-support electricians have the top pay scale for hourly employees, and have a separate wage scale and progression rate.

After a hearing, the Regional Director issued his decision and direction of election in which he found that the electrician unit petitioned for by the IBEW was an appropriate unit, and that it would be separately certified if the maintenance electricians voted for the IBEW in the required election.[5] The company filed with the Board a request for review of the decision, which was denied for failure to raise substantial questions requiring review. At the election on October 31 and November 1, 1980, the production-support electricians voted four to nothing in favor of IBEW representation.

[4] The electricians are responsible for maintenance and repair of all electrical equipment in the plant, not just the production line. When there is a malfunction on the line, the computer signals the area where the problem is occurring. It is then up to the electrician to diagnose the problem. Defective parts are quickly removed to prevent shutting down the line. Repairs are then made either in the shop or, if necessary, the part is returned to the manufacturer for repair.

[5] The electricians had the choice of voting for separate representation, or for representation in the production-and-maintenance unit, or for no union.

After certification of the IBEW by the Regional Director, the company refused to bargain. (Bargaining has commenced with the union representing the production-and-maintenance unit). On January 2, 1980, the IBEW filed an unfair-labor-practice charge against the company, which the Board upheld on summary judgment. This enforcement procedure followed.

II.

Although the company makes numerous arguments challenging the Board's characterization of the evidence and alleged failure to weigh competing factors, we think that this case hinges on one basic question: Whether the highly integrated nature of the company's operation has destroyed the community of interest necessary to support the designation of a separate craft unit.[6]

Both section 9(b) of the National Labor Relations Act[7] and a long line of Board precedents recognize that the special interests of skilled craft employees may warrant a separate bargaining unit for such employees. See, e. g., Atlantic Richfield Co., 231 N.L.R.B. 31 (1977). The Board and the courts have developed a "community of interest" analysis to guide the Board in selecting viable bargaining units that will effectuate the section 7 policy of employee self-determination. See, e. g., NLRB v. J. C. Penney Co., 559 F.2d 373, 375 (5th Cir. 1977). The most common community-of-interest factors are "such factors as bargaining history, operations integration, geographic proximity, common supervision, similarity in job function, and degree of employee interchange."[8] Ibid. Craft-unit determinations are made on a case-by-case basis after a weighing of all relevant factors, and no rigid test can or should be devised. Mallinckrodt Chemical Works, supra, at 398.

Review of the Board's unit certification is limited to a determination of whether the decision is arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or lacking in substantial evidentiary support. NLRB v. Target Stores, Inc., 547 F.2d 421, 423 (8th Cir. 1977). To set aside a Board certified unit, the employer must show that the designated unit is a not appropriate. It is not enough to show that another kind of unit would have been more appropriate. NLRB v. J.C. Penney Co., supra, 559 F.2d at 375. A reviewing court may not "displace the Board's choice between two fairly conflicting views, even though the court would justifiably have made a different choice had the matters been before it de novo." Hy-Vee Food Stores, Inc. v. NLRB, 426 F.2d 763, 764 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 879, 91 S.Ct. 120, 27 L.Ed.2d 116 (1970), quoting Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

The Regional Director weighed the relevant factors as follows (citations omitted):

> In view of the record as a whole, including the fact that there is no history of bargaining in a plant-wide unit including the production support electricians at the Employer's Arnold, Missouri, Facility, although there is a plant-wide unit history of bargaining at the Employer's two other facilities and at 71 2-piece can plants in the United States, and a separate maintenance electrician craft unit history of bargaining in 4 can plants in the St. Louis Metropolitan Area, one of which is a 2-piece can plant, the fact that the IBEW has a specialized experience representing maintenance electricians, the fact that the production support electricians are highly skilled electricians, exercise substantial independent judgment in the performance of their work, and are the only classification which performs major electrical repair work, and the fact that production support electricians are primarily supervised within their own craft lines, and despite the integrated nature of the Employer's operation, the fact that production support electricians will rou-

[6] A true craft has been defined as a unit consisting of "a distinct and homogeneous group of skilled journeymen craftsmen, working as such, together with their apprentices and/or helpers. To be 'a journeyman craftsman,' an individual must have a kind and degree of skill which is normally acquired only by undergoing a substantial period of apprenticeship or comparable training." American Potash & Chemical Corp., 107 N.L.R.B. 1418, 1423 (1954).

[7] 29 U.S.C. § 159(b), in part, provides: "The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure the employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this subchapter, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant, or subdivision thereof * * *."

[8] When a union seeks to carve out a unit of craft workers from a previously established collective-bargaining unit, the Board is guided by Mallinckrodt Chemical Works, 162 N.L.R.B. 387, 397 (1966). While not controlling in a non-severance situation, the Mallinckrodt test has been applied by the Board in determining whether an appropriate craft unit should initially be established. Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 170 N.L.R.B. 46 (1968).

tinely perform work not traditionally categorized as electrical, the production support electricians' contact with other employees, the similarity of their benefits and working conditions with those enjoyed by other employees, the Employer's policy of cross-training employees, the lack of a requirement that production support electricians be journeymen, and the fact that the production support electricians may receive some supervision from outside their craft, I find that the production support electricians constitute an appropriate craft unit.

After reviewing the evidence presented to the Regional Director, we are convinced that the production-support electricians at the company's Arnold plant have retained sufficient characteristics of a separate craft unit to justify the Board's certification under our limited scope of review. There is no rigid rule that a high-speed industrial environment automatically destroys a separate community of interest among craft workers. The Board addressed this contention in Atlantic Richfield:

> Where * * * there is no history of bargaining on a more comprehensive basis, neither the integrated nature of a production process nor the fact that skilled employees must coordinate their operations with other employees in achieving maintenance goals is, in itself, sufficient to preclude the formation of a craft unit.

Atlantic Richfield Co., supra, 231 N.L.R.B. at 32. Integration of a manufacturing process is one factor to be considered in unit determinations.

> But it is not in and of itself sufficient to preclude the formation of a separate craft bargaining unit, unless it results in such a fusion of functions, skills, and working conditions between those in the asserted craft group and others outside it as to obliterate any meaningful lines of separate craft identity.

E.I. DuPont de Nemours and Co., 162 N.L.R.B. 413, 419 (1966). We think the Board has permissibly found that the Arnold plant's mode of operation has not so fused "functions, skills, and working conditions" as to preclude a separate craft unit. We rely particularly on the fact that the electricians are the only plant employees who make major electrical repairs and have primary responsibility for the electrical maintenance of the entire plant. Plant officials testified that at the first sign of trouble on the line the electrician is the first person called, because he has the greatest skill in diagnosing production malfunctions. There is ample evidence that the electricians exercise independent judgment in determining when, where, and in what order repairs will be made. The electricians' supervisors seemed to take pride in the sophisticated combination of skills required to keep the electrical components of the computer-controlled production line running smoothly. The fact that the electricians do most of their electrical work in the production area does not prevent them from being a "distinct and homogeneous group of skilled journeymen craftsmen." While the electricians are required to have knowledge of mechanical, pneumatic, and hydraulic components, they use these skills within the context of their primary function at the plant—electrical maintenance. The requirement that they have other skills in addition to electrical knowledge does not diminish the fact that the core requirement for the job was extensive training and/or experience as electricians.[9]

Metal Container cites three cases as governing Board precedent. Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co., Container Division, 192 NLRB 553 (1971); Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., 177 NLRB 682 (1969); Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co., 16–RC–4263 (1966) (unreported decision). In each of these cases the Board denied separate craft units in plants using the two-piece process. Metal Container contends that the Board's decision in the present case is an arbitrary departure from these precedents. When the Board departs from prior precedent without explanation, its decisions have been held arbitrary as a matter of law. NLRB v. Meyer Label Co., 597 F.2d 18 (2d Cir. 1979).

After reviewing the Board's decisions in these three cases, we conclude that none of them represents inescapably conflicting Board precedent. In the 1971 Schlitz case the electrical and electronic repairmen worked with production employees 85 to 90% of the time, shared common work benches, frequently interchanged job functions, and were not required to have any special education or experience for the job. In the 1966 Schlitz case the electricians seeking separate craft status were hired "to perform a broad spectrum of overall maintenance functions," and their duties were found by the Board to be "not sharply distinguishable from those performed by other maintenance employees." [10] In Kaiser, a separate lithographers' unit was requested. The lithographers worked directly on the production line, were not separately supervised, spent a substantial amount of time on nonprinting tasks, and used a dry-offset process which required less skill than traditional lithographic printing. We cannot say that the facts in these three cases are "indistinguishable from the facts present here," as the Second Circuit found in Meyer Label Co., supra, 597 F.2d at 20. None of the Board's decisions involving two-piece can plants rules out the appropriateness of a separate craft unit in all such plants. Each plant has its own characteristics, and, while the overwhelming trend in the industry, nationwide, is toward wall-to-wall production-and-maintenance units,[11] that is but one factor to be considered by the Board when it focuses upon a particular plant and its employees.

[9] All four electricians hired at the time of the hearing had extensive training and experience which will not be recounted here. The lack of a formal apprenticeship or training program does not bar a craft determination when extensive experience is required. No other class of employees is required to have electrical knowledge.

Metal Container also calls our attention to a recent Board decision denying a separate electricians' craft unit in another highly integrated manufacturing industry. Procter & Gamble Paper Products Co., 251 N.L.R.B. 77 (1980). Several factors distinguish the Procter and Gamble decision. There the Board found that 50% of the electrical work in the plant was performed by over 200 other technicians who had some electrical skills. While the Procter and Gamble electricians were the most highly skilled electricians in the plant and spent 100% of their time doing electrical work, they worked in teams with other maintenance and production workers and did not function as a separate group. There was also movement in and out of the unit, with production workers moving into the electrician jobs. Here, in contrast, all four electricians were hired as electricians, they are responsible for all the major electrical repair work, they do not work in teams except on "maintenance day," and there has been no movement into or out of the class. On the whole, this case is closer, on its facts, to other craft unit certification cases in which the Board has certified a separate craft unit. Lianco Container Corp., 177 N.L.R.B. 907 (1969) (only electricians in the unit perform electrical work; no aprenticeship but electrician experience required); Atlantic Richfield Co., 231 N.L.R.B. 31 (1977) (unit employees hired as skilled employees, no transfers out of unit, most electrical work done by unit employees); Anheuser-Busch, Inc., 170 N.L.R.B. 46 (1968) (experience and license required; highly integrated production line does not obliterate separate craft identity).

In summary, we hold that there is substantial evidence in the record as a whole to support the Board's conclusion that the production-support electricians at the company's Arnold facility are an appropriate collective-bargaining unit. We base that conclusion on the fact that despite the highly integrated nature of the plant's operation the electricians are highly skilled, highly paid workers who exercise independent judgment and who are primarily supervised from within their own craft. We recognize, of course, that a plant-wide unit would also have been appropriate. When two or more units are appropriate, employee choice is a relevant factor. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 156, 61 S.Ct. 908, 914, 85 L.Ed. 1251 (1941).

Accordingly, we enforce the Board's order.

ROSS, Circuit Judge, concurring: In my opinion, the decision of the Board to certify IBEW as the representative of a separate unit (of four electricians) is both unwise and in direct opposition to the practice of 71 of the 72 plants engaged in wall-to-wall production using the two-piece process, including Metal Container's other two plants. (See pp. 1310 and 1311 of this opinion.)

[10] Only one paragraph of the 1966 Schlitz decision is devoted to the petition for a separate electricians' unit. There is insufficient information from which to make a detailed comparison with the present case.

[11] In response to our post-argument order of June 16, 1981, the Board has filed an analysis of the 73 two-piece can manufacturing plants known to have bargaining units. Relevant information was unavailable for 36 of the plants. In 26 plants a wall-to-wall unit was stipulated to by the parties and approved by the Board. Several units were established by Board decisions in which separate craft status was not an issue. In five cases the Board denied separate craft status. Three of these cases involved lithographers, one was a request for a separate maintenance unit, and the other was the 1966 Schlitz case discussed above. The three lithographer cases and the maintenance case are of limited relevance to the issue of the appropriateness of a separate electricians' unit. In another Schlitz case, No. 12-RC-1126 (1961) (unreported decision), the Board found a separate unit of electricians appropriate and capable of severance from a maintenance unit.

Inasmuch as consistency in making such unit determinations is neither followed by the Board nor required under many of the applicable cases, I find myself having to agree that the substantial evidence rule has been minimally complied with here even though its application is an affront to ordinary logic and common sense. The practical result will be to give the IBEW unit of only four employees an inordinate amount of leverage in contract negotiations even though a substantial majority of the 110 production employees may have ratified a negotiated labor agreement.

Robert J. Wilson, Reg. Dir. v. Liberty Homes, Inc.

664 F.2d 620 (7th Cir.), October 7, 1981; rehearing and rehearing en banc denied February 1, 1982—500 F. Supp. 1120

On petition for injunctive relief under Section 10(j)

Before BAUER and CUDAHY, Circuit Judges, and BARTELS, Senior District Judge*

623

CUDAHY, Circuit Judge: This case is before the court on the appeal of Liberty Homes (the "Company") and the cross-appeal of the National Labor Relations Board (the "Board") from an order of the United States District Court for the Western District of Wisconsin. The district court's order granted, in substantial part, and denied, in part, a petition for a temporary injunction filed on behalf of the Board by Robert J. Wilson, Regional Director of the Eighteenth Region of the Board (the "Regional Director") pursuant to Section 10(j) of the National Labor Relations Act (the "Act"). 29 U.S.C. § 160(j) (1976). On April 30, 1980, the Board issued a complaint charging that the Company had coercively interrogated and threatened its truck driver employees concerning their Union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act; discriminatorily subcontracted for the performance of the truck drivers' over-the-road delivery work and discharged the drivers in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act; and unlawfully refused to recognize and bargain with the drivers' exclusive bargaining representative in violation of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. The Board also authorized the Regional Director to file a petition requesting affirmative injunctive relief against the Company pursuant to Section 10(j) of the Act pending the resolution of the Board's unfair labor practice charges.[1]

624

Following an evidentiary hearing on the Regional Director's petition, the district court concluded that there was reasonable cause to believe that the Company had violated Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(5) of the Act and that the requested injunctive relief on these counts was just and proper. As a result, the court issued an order requiring the Company to resume its trucking operations, to offer reemployment to the nine discharged truck drivers and to recognize and bargain with the Union. However, finding no reasonable cause to believe that the Company had committed an independent Section 8(a)(1) violation, the district court refused to order the Company to cease and desist from engaging in further interrogations, threats and discriminatory discharges. The Company now appeals from the issuance of the affirmative injunctive order, and the Board cross appeals from the denial of the cease and desist order. We affirm that portion of the district court's order which directs the Company to restore its driving operations at the Dorchester plant, to offer reinstatement to the nine discharged drivers and to bargain with the Union. We reverse the district court's denial of the cease and desist order and remand with instructions to issue an order providing such relief.

*The Honorable John R. Bartels, Senior United States District Judge for the Eastern District of New York, is sitting by designation.

[1] Shortly before the date of issuance of this opinion, Respondent informed this court that the National Labor Relations Board had recently issued its decision and order dismissing these unfair labor practice charges on the merits. Liberty Homes, Inc., 257 N.L.R.B. No. 169 (Sept. 17, 1981). Respondent argued that this order of the Board dismissing the Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(5) charges confirmed its position that the district court had erred in issuing its temporary injunction. (The Board upheld, however, the Section 8(a)(1) charge.) We have considered the Board's decision and order on the merits of the unfair labor practice charge (as requested by Respondent) but do not find that decision dispositive of the issue before us—whether the district court's finding of reasonable cause was clearly erroneous. See Hendrix v. International Union of Operating Engineers. Local 571, 592 F.2d 437, 442–43 (8th Cir. 1979).

In light, however, of the Board's action exonerating Respondent on the merits, we have, in a subsequent unpublished order, directed that our opinion and judgment in this case be vacated as moot and that the cause be remanded to the district court with directions to dissolve the injunction under the authority of Sears Roebuck & Co. v. Carpet Layers, Local Union No. 419, 397 U.S. 655, 90 S.Ct. 1299, 25 L.Ed.2d 637 (1970). See ——— F.2d ——— (7th Cir. 1981).

I

The Company, headquartered in Goshen, Indiana, is engaged in the manufacture, sale and distribution of mobile homes in eight plants throughout the country. The instant dispute arose at the Dorchester, Wisconsin plant, where the Company employed nine truck drivers to transport mobile homes manufactured there to dealers in other states. These drivers were not represented by any labor organization.

In 1973, the Union (Chauffeurs, Teamsters, Warehousemen and Helpers, Local No. 446, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America) attempted to organize the drivers and filed a petition with the Board for a representation election. Shortly thereafter, the Company began to subcontract the shipment of mobile homes manufactured at the Dorchester plant to independent carriers and discharged all of the drivers. The Union filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board alleging that the Company violated Sections 8(a)(1), 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(5) of the Act. Although there was insufficient evidence for the Regional Director to conclude that the Company's decision to subcontract was motivated by antiunion animus, he issued a complaint charging that the decision to subcontract was unlawfully accelerated by the advent of the Union. The complaint was dismissed, however, after the Company and the Union entered into an informal settlement agreement which included backpay for the discharged drivers. See Record at 120–24.

Approximately two years later, the Company decided to resume its trucking operations at the Dorchester plant and to limit the use of common carriers to an "as needed" basis. By July of 1979, the Dorchester plant had hired nine drivers and operated a fleet of 14 gasoline powered trailer trucks. During 1979 alone, the Company equipped four of these trucks with expensive new radial tires and purchased two brand new trailer trucks for use at the Wisconsin facility. In addition, the Company installed a second 10,000 gallon gasoline storage tank to insure the availability of fuel for its carrier fleet.

During the spring of 1979, the drivers became increasingly concerned about their working conditions and began to discuss the possibility of union representation. Driver Merlin J. Ramker informed Tom Potts, the Company supervisor responsible for driving assignments, that the drivers were "disgusted with the way management was handling things" and would have to join the Union if things did not change. Record at 66–67. Potts warned Ramker that it would be a "critical mistake" for the drivers to seek representation "because all it would do was create problems." Record at 67. In early September, Ramker was called into Potts' office and questioned by the supervisor about a union organizing campaign among the drivers. Ramker denied any knowledge of union activity despite the fact that the drivers were seriously discussing union representation at that time. Record at 68.

Potts also approached Kenneth Ploeckelman for information on the drivers' union meetings. Ploeckelman, originally hired by the Company in 1970, had been active in the drivers' 1973 attempt to secure union representation. He was dismissed with the other drivers involved in that campaign when the Company decided to subcontract its carrier work. Ploeckelman was the only one of those dismissed drivers who was subsequently rehired by the Company when it resumed carriage operations in 1975. Like Ramker, Ploeckelman told Potts that he knew nothing about a union organizing effort and further commented, "I know what will happen if we join." Record at 50.

Potts similarly questioned Loren J. Metz, an acquaintance of Potts who had been hired as a driver for the Company on July 17, 1979. In mid-August, Potts called Metz at home and asked if he knew anything about a union meeting scheduled for that evening. Although Metz said no, Potts advised him "as a friend, don't go." Record at 74. On a different occasion, Metz was given a message to report to Potts' office before leaving work. Again, Potts pumped Metz for information on any union meetings or activities. Potts suggested that Metz "could move up the ladder faster as a driver" if he did not attend these meetings. He also warned that "the Company would never go along with * * * a Union." He figured there would be "a different way of transporting the homes." Record at 85. When Potts discovered several weeks later that Metz had signed a Union authorization card, Potts chastised Metz for failing to keep Potts informed about union activity. Record at 83.

On September 23, 1979, all of the drivers except Metz attended a lengthy meeting with Union business agent, Jerome Hansen, and signed authorization cards which designated the Union as their collective bargaining agent. Hansen obtained a signed card from Metz the following morning and then arranged a meeting with William Zabrosky, manager of the Company's Wisconsin Division and chief operational officer at the Dorchester plant. Hansen informed Zabrosky that the drivers had unanimously designated the Union as their collective bargaining agent and requested that the Company voluntarily recognize and bargain with the Union. Record at 31. Zabrosky explained that he did not have the authority to grant recognition and added that the Union's request was rather "ironic" because the Company was "looking into eliminating the transportation department * * * and negotiating for outside carriers to haul their mobile homes." Record at 32. Hansen indicated that Zabrosky's response was strangely reminiscent of the 1973 situation and asked if Zabrosky was again about to fire the employees. Zabrosky said he would prefer to use the word "terminate." Id.

Zabrosky reiterated that he was "gathering information from outside carriers" to determine whether it would be more profitable for the Company to subcontract the hauling work at the Dorchester plant. Record at 33. He showed Hansen a letter from his files dated March 1, 1979, which contained the proposed cartage rates of a carrier awaiting ICC approval for interstate hauling. After observing that no contract had been signed, Hansen stated that it appeared as if the employees would be fired, "the same as they were in 1973." Record at 34. Zabrosky repeated that he would prefer to use the word "terminate." Id.

On September 26, 1979, the Union filed a petition with the Board seeking a representation election among the driver employees. The Regional Director conducted a hearing on the matter on October 12, 1979. On the basis of Company testimony given at that hearing, the Regional Director concluded that the Company's decision to subcontract its hauling operations preceded the drivers' designation of the Union as their collective bargaining agent. He therefore dismissed the Union's petition on the grounds that "it would not effectuate the policies of the Act to conduct an election at this time." Co. Ex. 2 attached to Answer to Section 10(j) petition. Although the Company offered to bargain with the Union regarding the effect of the subcontracting decision on the drivers, the Union refused to "negotiate [the drivers'] jobs away." Record at 38.

The Company terminated all nine drivers on November 2, 1979. The trailer trucks based at the Dorchester plant were then towed to other Company facilities for use in their continuing hauling operations.[2] In the meantime, the Union filed unfair labor practice charges with the Board alleging that the Company had violated Sections 8(a)(1), 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(5) of the Act by coercively interrogating and threatening the employees concerning their union activities, by discriminatorily deciding to subcontract its hauling work and to discharge the drivers and by unlawfully refusing to bargain with the drivers' exclusive bargaining agent, the Union. These charges were subsequently dismissed, however, due to insufficient evidence. The Union appealed the dismissal to the General Counsel's Office of Appeals. On April 9, 1980, after a full review of the matter, the General Counsel sustained the Union's appeal and remanded the case to the Regional Director for the issuance of a complaint. Shortly after the complaint issued on April 30, 1980, the Regional Director obtained Board authorization to file a petition in the district court for temporary injunctive relief pursuant to Section 10(j) of the Act.

The court conducted a hearing on the Regional Director's petition on May 30, 1980, and issued its decision on the basis of the record developed there. The court found that the Regional Director had reasonable cause to believe that, prior to the drivers' union activities, the company intended to continue delivering its mobile homes with its own trucks and drivers and that the Company's decision to subcontract that work and to discharge its drivers was motivated, at least in part, by its antipathy to union representation of its drivers in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the Act. The court further found that reasonable cause existed to believe that a majority of the drivers had designated the Union as their collective bargaining representative and that the Company violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union while engaging in conduct making a fair representation election impossible. Accordingly, in order to restore the status quo ante and preserve the Board's ability to remedy these violations, the court ordered the Company to resume its trucking operations at the Dorchester plant, to recall its discharged drivers and to recognize and bargain with the Union.

[2] At the time of the hearing before the district court, five of the trucks were being used at the Company's Thomasville, Georgia plant, and five were in use at its Kansas plant. The three trucks sent to the Syracuse, Indiana plant had been sold, and one of the trucks had been wrecked. Record at 116.

Although the District court found that supervisor Potts questioned several employees about their organizing efforts and warned them against supporting the Union, the court found insufficient evidence to support a finding of reasonable cause to believe that Potts' activities were coercive within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Hence, the court concluded that an order directing the Company to cease and desist from coercively interrogating, threatening and discriminatorily discharging its truckdriver employees was unnecessary, because "the conduct which petitioner seeks to enjoin is already made illegal by the Act, and the Act provides an adequate procedure for redressing violations." Wilson v. Liberty Homes, Inc., 500 F.Supp. 1120, at 1128 (W.D. Wis. 1980).

Both the Company and Board filed timely appeals. Although the district court denied the Company's request for a stay pending appeal, the court granted the Company's motion for an additional thirty days to comply with the order. This court similarly refused to stay the injunction pending the outcome of this appeal.

II

Section 10(j) of the Act vests the Board with the discretion to petition the district court for appropriate temporary relief upon the issuance of a complaint (against either an employer or a labor union) charging an unfair labor practice. The court is then empowered to grant "such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper." 29 U.S.C. § 160(j) (1976).[3] This section, added to the Act in 1947, was designed to permit the courts to alleviate the harm which may befall the victims of unfair labor practices during the considerable time gap between the filing of a complaint by the Board and the issuance of its final decision. Muniz v. Hoffman, 422 U.S. 454, 466, 95 S.Ct. 2178, 2185, 45 L.Ed.2d 319 (1975) (quoting S.Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 8 (1947)). Under this statutory scheme, the issues before a district court in a Section 10(j) proceeding are: (1) whether there is "reasonable cause" to believe that the party in question committed the alleged unfair labor practice(s); and (2) whether the relief requested is "just and proper."

A. Reasonable Cause

A Section 10(j) proceeding is ancillary to the unfair labor practice case from which it stems. The purpose of such a proceeding is to preserve or restore the status quo and prevent the frustration of national labor policy pending the resolution of the charges before the Board. Levine v. C & W Mining Co., 610 F.2d 432, 436 (6th Cir. 1979); Squillacote v. Meat & Allied Food Workers, Local 248, 534 F.2d 735, 741–42 (7th Cir. 1976); Angle v. Sacks, 382 F.2d 655, 659–60 (10th Cir. 1967). As a result, the district court is not permitted to decide the merits of the underlying unfair labor practice claims. Humphrey v. International Longshoreman's Ass'n, 548 F.2d 494 (4th Cir. 1979); Squillacote v. Graphic Arts International Union Local 277, 513 F.2d 1017 (7th Cir. 1975). Instead, the court must determine whether there is reasonable cause to believe that the elements of an unfair labor practice are present and that the legal theory upon which the Regional Director proceeds is substantial and not frivolous.

[3] Section 10(j) of the Act provides:

> (j) The Board shall have power, upon issuance of complaint as provided in subsection (b) charging that any person has engaged in or is engaging in an unfair labor practice, to petition any district court of the United States (including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia) within any district wherein the unfair labor practice in question is alleged to have occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Upon the filing of any such petition the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person and thereupon shall have jurisdiction to grant to the Board such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper.

29 U.S.C. § 160(j)(1976).

Squillacote v. Graphic Arts International Union, 540 F.2d 853, 858–59 (7th Cir. 1976).

Although Section 10(j) does not describe or define this "reasonable cause" standard, the courts agree that the evidentiary burden on the Regional Director in a 10(j) proceeding is not as great as the burden on the Board in an enforcement action. If the evidence viewed in the light most favorable to the Regional Director [4] could reasonably support a finding that a violation of the Act has occurred,[5] the Regional Director has discharged his "relatively insubstantial" burden,[6] and the district court may grant appropriate relief. Since the district court's "reasonable cause" determination is a factual finding, it may not be disturbed on appeal unless clearly erroneous. Squillacote v. Graphic Arts International Union Local 277, 513 F.2d 1017 (7th Cir. 1975); Fed.R.Civ.P. 52(a).

In the instant case, we conclude that the district court's determinations with respect to the Sections 8(a)(1), 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(5) claims are not clearly erroneous. The evidence adduced at the hearing before the district court establishes reasonable cause to believe that the Company violated Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(1) of the Act by subcontracting for the delivery of mobile homes manufactured at its Dorchester plant and by discharging all nine of the drivers employed at that plant in retaliation, at least in part, for their union activity. The record equally supports the court's finding that there is reasonable cause to believe that the Company's unlawful conduct rendered a fair election impossible so that the Company's refusal to bargain with the Union on the basis of authorization cards signed by each of the drivers violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. After carefully reviewing the evidence in this case, however, we find that there was also reasonable cause to believe that Supervisor Potts coercively interrogated and threatened several drivers concerning their union activity in violation of Section 8(a)(1).

1. The Section 8(a)(3) Claim

Section 8(a)(3) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice to discriminate with respect to tenure of employment for the purpose of discouraging membership in a labor organization. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1976). Section 8(a)(1) makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976). It is well settled that an employer violates both of these sections by "subcontracting part of an integrated business and dismissing the persons employed therein if the action is motivated at least in part by anti-union considerations." NLRB v. Townhouse T.V. & Appliances, Inc., 531 F.2d 826, 828–29 (7th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. George Roberts & Son, Inc., 451 F.2d 941, 945–46 (2nd Cir. 1971); NLRB v. National Food Stores, Inc., 332 F.2d 249 (7th Cir. 1964).

As the district court noted, the employer's motivation for subcontracting its operations and discharging the drivers thus becomes the critical element in the controversy. For, a violation of Section 8(a)(3) occurs only if the Company knew that the drivers were engaged in union activity prior to the time the subcontracting decision was made and if the employer's motive for terminating the drivers was to punish them for seeking union representation. Alton Arlan's Dept. Store, Inc. v. NLRB, 355 F.2d 513 (7th Cir. 1966). We agree with the district court that there was reasonable cause to believe that both of these conditions were met in the instant case.[7] [4] The Regional Director should be given the benefit of the doubt when disputed issues of fact are determinative of the existence of reasonable cause in a Section 10(j) proceeding. Squillacote v. Graphic Arts International Union, 540 F.2d 853, 858 (7th Cir. 1976); Seeler v. Trading Port, Inc., 517 F.2d 33, 37 (2d Cir. 1975); Danielson v. Joint Bd. of Coat, Suit & Allied Garment Workers' Union, 494 F.2d 1230, 1245 (2d Cir. 1974).

[5] See Squillacote v. Graphic Arts International Union, 540 F.2d 853, 858 (7th Cir. 1976). We find no merit in the Company's argument that the Squillacote "could support" standard is inapposite here because Squillacote involved the issuance of a mandatory injunction under Section 10(l) rather than a discretionary injunction under Section 10(j). In deciding whether to grant injunctive relief, the district court should apply the same standards in 10(j) cases as it does in 10(l) cases. Squillacote v. Meat & Allied Food Workers, Local 248, 534 F.2d 735, 743 (7th Cir. 1976); Seeler v. Trading Port, Inc., 517 F.2d 33, 36 (2d Cir. 1975); *Boire v. [7] The Company claims that the Regional Director has the greater burden of proving by substantial evidence on the record as a whole that

The record indicates that the Company was aware of the Union organizational campaign during its infant stages in the summer of 1979. Supervisor Potts questioned at least three different drivers on several occasions about rumors of Union meetings. He advised these men that union representation was a "critical mistake" and warned of the consequences of such a decision. Regardless whether Potts' activities constitute an independent violation of the Act, they nevertheless demonstrate the Company's knowledge of the employees' union activity and the Company's animus toward that activity.

Although the Company maintains that it had been considering the elimination of the Dorchester transportation department for several months before the Union's September demand for recognition, the Company made no commitments to outside carriers until after the Union filed its unfair labor practice charges in late October. The Company produced no books, records, proposals, statements or memoranda to substantiate the testimony of its Wisconsin Division manager that the decision to subcontract was made in mid-August.[8] The only proposal from an outside carrier produced by the Company in support of its position was dated March 1, 1979, and was submitted by a carrier that lacked the legal authority to transport the mobile homes interstate. The Company even concedes that it did not pursue this matter beyond the carrier's submission. In addition to this document, the Company produced copies of its visitors register which indicated that representatives of two common carriers had visited the Dorchester plant in May and August. In view of the fact that the services of these carriers had been used by the Company on an "as needed" basis in the past and that it was a common practice for carrier representatives to make business courtesy calls, the visitors register can hardly be regarded as strongly persuasive evidence that the Company either was considering subcontracting or had decided to subcontract its Dorchester transportation work to outside carriers before the Union's bargaining request.

Finally, there is no indication in the record that Company supervisors informed any of the Dorchester employees before the Union's bargaining demand of the possibility that the Company would once again subcontract its driving work. Moreover, the Company's conduct in the months immediately preceding the Union's demand evidenced a contrary intent. Thus, while the Company claims it was losing money on the Dorchester hauling operation because its gasoline powered trucks could not economically transport the mobile homes manufactured at the Wisconsin facility, the Company purchased two new gasoline powered trucks for the Dorchester plant, installed a new 10,000 gallon gasoline storage tank to fuel its trucks, outfitted four of the trucks with new radial tires and hired 5 drivers.[9]

The timing of the Company's sudden, unannounced decision to subcontract, occurring so abruptly on the heels of the Union's demand for recognition, is itself strong evidence of an illegal motive. See NLRB v. Sutherland Lumber Co., 452 F.2d 67, 69 (7th Cir. 1971); Angwell Curtain Co. v. NLRB, 192 F.2d 899, 903 (7th Cir. 1951). When this evidence is combined with Potts' clear reflection of the Company's antipathy toward the unionization of the drivers and the Company's strikingly similar response to the 1973 unionization effort, the district court properly determined that there was reasonable cause to believe that the Company's decision to subcontract its hauling operations and discharge the drivers violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

the Company's actions were motivated by anti-union animus. NLRB v. Charles Batchelder Co., 646 F.2d 33 (2d Cir. 1981). This burden, however, is applicable only to a determination of the merits of a Section 8(a)(3) claim. "In a Section 10(j) or 10(l) case, the court need not, indeed should not, make a finding of employer motivation. It need only find a reasonable cause for belief that there was such a motivation." Eisenberg v. Wellington Hall Nursing Home, Inc., 651 F.2d 902 (3d Cir. 1981).

[8] Like the district court, we do not feel compelled "to accept as true the self-serving statements of [the Company's] representatives merely because they are uncontradicted," particularly when the record as a whole casts reasonable doubt on the accuracy of these statements. Wilson v. Liberty Homes, 500 F.Supp. 1120 (W.D. Wis. 1980). Accord, Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966).

[9] The five drivers were hired by the Company on the following dates:

Peter J. Marchinek—February 26, 1979
Merlin J. Ramker—February 26, 1979
Arthur B. Streu—April 20, 1979
Roger C. Kell—May 14, 1979
Loren J. Metz—July 17, 1979

2. The Section 8(a)(5) Claim

Section 8(a)(5) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) (1976). The duty to bargain arises when a labor organization becomes the designated representative of the affected employees. Linden Lumber v. NLRB, 419 U.S. 301, 95 S.Ct. 429, 42 L.Ed.2d 465 (1974). Under ordinary circumstances, a union demand for recognition based upon signed authorization cards from a majority of the employees does not create a duty to bargain. Id. at 305, 95 S.Ct. at 432. Thus, the Company's refusal in the present case to voluntarily recognize and bargain with the Union does not, by itself, constitute an unfair labor practice.

When an employer has committed unfair labor practices which render a fair election unlikely, however, authorization cards comprise the most reliable measure of the employees' preference on the representation issue and thus support a duty to bargain. Id. at 301, 95 S.Ct. at 430; NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 610, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1938, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). By subcontracting its hauling operation and dismissing all nine drivers, the Company has effectively destroyed the proposed bargaining unit and obviated the possibility of holding an election at all. Even if the Board resolves the refusal to bargain issue in the Union's favor, the possibility of conducting a fair election in this environment is remote. Although the Board must ultimately determine whether the Company's actions constitute unfair labor practices sufficient to give rise to a duty to bargain, the district court properly determined that there was reasonable cause to believe that the Company's refusal to bargain in this case violated Section 8(a)(5).

3. The Section 8(a)(1) Claim

Section 8(a)(1), which prevents employers from interfering with, restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their right to organize, does not per se prevent an employer from questioning employees about unionization. NLRB v. C & P Plaza Dept. Store, 414 F.2d 1244 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1058, 90 S.Ct. 756, 24 L.Ed.2d 754 (1969). Employee interrogation only rises to the level of an 8(a)(1) violation if the questions asked, when viewed from the employee's perspective, could reasonably coerce or intimidate the employee with regard to union activities. NLRB v. Gulf-Wandes Corp., 595 F.2d 1074 (5th Cir. 1979); NLRB v. Douglas Division, Scott & Fetzer Co., 570 F.2d 742 (8th Cir. 1978). The test is not whether the employee was actually coerced, but whether the questions would tend to coerce. NLRB v. Varo, Inc., 425 F.2d 293 (5th Cir. 1970). In determining the effect of an employer's interrogation on an employee, the courts should consider, inter alia, (1) the background of the employer-employee relationship, (2) the questioner's identity, (3) the nature of the information sought, (4) the place and method of the interrogation and (5) the truthfulness of the reply. NLRB v. Donald E. Hernly, Inc., 613 F.2d 457 (2d Cir. 1980); First Lakewood Association v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 416, 418 (7th Cir. 1978); Florida Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 529 F.2d 1225 (5th Cir. 1976).

In the instant case, the district court found that a Company representative, Tom Potts, interrogated several of the drivers and warned them against supporting the Union. The court indicated, however, that the extent to which these questions were coercive depended largely upon the manner in which the drivers perceived Potts' authority within the Company. Since the district court was unable to determine the extent of Potts' actual or perceived authority, the court could not find reasonable cause to believe that an 8(a)(1) violation had occurred.

We have carefully reviewed the record, however, and conclude that the district court's finding was clearly erroneous. The Company stipulated that Potts was a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. In addition, there is evidence which indicates that Potts had significant control over the shipment of mobile homes manufactured at the Dorchester plant. As dealer relations manager, Potts was primarily responsible for assigning the drivers to their respective runs. Since the drivers were paid by the "loaded mile," Potts played a central role in the remuneration of the employees he questioned. Under these circumstances, it would be reasonable for the drivers to assume that Potts had some influence in the Company's decisions reflecting the cost and profitability of the Dorchester hauling operations.

Moreover, the record clearly indicates that the drivers perceived that they were threatened by Potts' interrogations and warnings. After Potts twice cautioned Ramker that it would be a "critical mistake" for the drivers to unionize, Ramker, who had contacted the Union on behalf of the drivers, falsely denied any knowledge of union activity.[10] Driver Kenneth Ploeckelman, the only employee rehired after the Company's 1973 decision to subcontract, also falsely denied any union involvement. Ploeckelman assured Potts that "[he knew] what would happen if [the drivers] joined [the Union]." The drivers' apparent desire to withhold Union information from Potts (more than likely fueled by memories of the Company's reaction to the 1973 union organizing effort) strongly suggests a fear of reprisal from the Company for such activity. Section 8(a)(1) was designed to prevent the occurrence of precisely this type of employer coercion and intimidation. As a result, we conclude that there is reasonable cause to believe that the Company violated this section of the Act.

B. Just and Proper Relief

Once the district court determines that there is "reasonable cause" to believe that the Act has been violated, Section 10(j) permits the court to grant "such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper." 29 U.S.C. § 160(j) (1976). This court has indicated that three factors must be considered when determining the appropriateness of Section 10(j) relief: (1) traditional equitable considerations such as the need to preserve or restore the status quo; (2) the need to prevent frustration of the basic remedial purposes of the Act; and (3) the degree to which the public interest is affected by a continuing violation. Squillacote v. Meat & Allied Food Workers, Local 248, 534 F.2d 735, 744 (7th Cir. 1976). Appellate review of relief fashioned by the district court upon a finding of reasonable cause is limited to a determination whether the district court abused its discretion in granting such relief. Id. at 743–44.

In the instant case, the district court ordered the Company to restore its trucking operation, to offer reinstatement to the truck drivers and to recognize and bargain with the Union pending the resolution of the unfair labor practice charges under consideration by the Board. After reviewing the record in light of the three factors outlined above, we cannot conclude that the district court abused its discretion by fashioning this type of temporary relief in this case. On the contrary, we believe that the court should also have issued an order instructing the Company to cease and desist from engaging in further violations of the Act. Although these remedies may appear stringent, we agree with the district court that "allowing [the Company's] allegedly illegal conduct to continue until the Board acts would create a substantial risk of devastating and permanent harm of the sort that 10(j) of the Act was intended to prevent." Wilson v. Liberty Homes, 500 F.Supp. 1120, at 1129 (W.D.Wis.1980).

1. The Restoration-Reinstatement Order

The district court's order directing the Company to resume its trucking operations at the Dorchester plant and to rehire the nine discharged drivers was appropriate relief in the instant case. Where the court has reasonable cause to believe that particularly flagrant unfair labor practices have been committed, just and proper relief includes any remedy ordinarily fashioned by the Board in an unfair labor practice proceeding, despite the fact that a final decision by the Board is still pending. Morio v. North American Soccer League, 632 F.2d 217 (2d Cir. 1980). In cases involving discriminatory conduct, the Board has traditionally ordered restoration of the status quo ante unless the wrongdoer can demonstrate that such a remedy would endanger its continued viability. Hood Industries, Inc. 248 NLRB 597, 103 LRRM 1540 (1980); Lion Uniform, Janesville Apparel Division, 247 NLRB No. 112, 103 LRRM 1264 (1980); C–F Air Freight, Inc., 247 NLRB No. 60, 103 LRRM 1156 (1980), enf'd by unpublished order, 636 F.2d 1203 (2d Cir. 1980).

Here, the Company has failed to demonstrate that the district court's restoration orders threatens its viability. Upon discontinuing the Dorchester hauling operation, the Company merely transferred the trucks to other locations and continued to use them in active service. It is no more expensive to return the trucks to the Dorchester plant than it was to remove them in the first place.[11] Moreover, the Company chose to dispose of the trucks while unfair labor practice proceedings were pending and a resumption order was a foreseeable risk. The Company cannot now complain that the risk subsequently materialized to its detriment.

[10] As this court noted in Jays Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 573 F.2d 438 (7th Cir. 1978):

> [U]ntruthful or noncommittal responses [are] evidence of the employees' anxiety over management's reaction to their union activity. Anxiety is symptomatic of fear and it is unlawful to question so as to instill fear. See Self-Reliance Ukrainian American Cooperative Association v. NLRB, 461 F.2d 33, 36 (7th Cir. 1972).

Id. at 444.

We are also not persuaded by the Company's claims that it cannot operate the Dorchester transportation department safely and efficiently with gasoline powered trucks. The Company uses identical trucks to haul mobile homes manufactured at its other plants, and common carriers employed by the Company use gasoline powered trailer trucks on many occasions for the same purpose. Record at 118-19. In the absence of documentary evidence to support the Company's contention,[12] we cannot conclude that temporary restoration of the hauling operation would cause substantial and potentially devastating hardship to the Company.

On the contrary, we find that the restoration order issued in this case is essential to restore the status quo and to assure the efficacy of the Board's final order. Unless interim relief is provided, there is a strong likelihood that if and when the Board does order the Company to resume its trucking operations, the delay inherent in the Board's processes will cause that order to be ineffective. The Company may have sold or otherwise disposed of the trucks, and the drivers, entitled to reinstatement, may have moved or secured other employment. A restoration order issued by the Board under these circumstances might be regarded as unduly burdensome to the employer and unenforceable. See Jays Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 573 F.2d 438 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 859, 99 S.Ct. 176, 58 L.Ed.2d 167 (1978); NLRB v. Townhouse T.V. & Appli- ances, Inc., 531 F.2d 826 (7th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. American Mfg. Co., 351 F.2d 74 (5th Cir. 1965); NLRB v. Major, 296 F.2d 466 (7th Cir. 1961). As a result, the Board would be unable to provide an adequate remedy to the discharged drivers, and the Company would be allowed to frustrate the policies of the Act by escaping legal sanctions for its unlawful conduct.

The harm caused by a failure to grant interim relief in this case would also extend to the Union and to unionism in general. As the district court noted:

> [The] Union will be harmed because the unit it once represented will have been irremediably dissipated. Unionism in general will be harmed because these drivers, having suffered as a consequence of their association with a union may decide to avoid any involvement with unions in the future. Moreover, truck drivers and other employees at [Company] plants throughout the country may take this incident as a warning * * * that if they choose to deal with the Union, they risk severe retaliation for which the Board can provide no effective remedy.

Wilson v. Liberty Homes, 500 F.Supp. 1120, at 1128-1129 (W.D.Wis.1980).

Finally, we note that absent a restoration order, any other interim relief would be of little value to either the employees or the Union. Any bargaining conducted following the dispersal of the trucking fleet would appear only in theory to involve negotiations for the resumption of the trucking operation and the reinstatement of the drivers. In such bargaining, the Union would no longer represent any active bargaining unit; the base of Union support would be scattered to the four winds. Negotiations about conditions of employment under these circumstances would be academic. On the other hand, if trucking operations have been restored in the interim, the Company will have a real economic incentive to negotiate about the terms of its retention, and the Union will have a substantial membership as a base for meaningful bargaining.

After considering all of these factors, we believe that the economic and operational impact of the restoration order on the Company is not weighty in comparison with the damage inflicted, in the absence of such an order, on the employees, the [11] The Company dispersed a fleet of 14 trucks. Ten of them were transferred to other locations, three were sold and one was wrecked. While it seems possible for the Company to substantially resume its operations by merely transferring the ten remaining trucks back to the Dorchester plant, the district court calculated the maximum capital outlay required to restore the fleet to its full strength. Assuming that the purchase price of a trailer truck unit is approximately $15,000 (as did the district court), four trucks would cost the Company $60,000. In view of the size of the Company, the extent of its operations and the nature of the violations purportedly committed here, we do not believe that this figure, which does not take into account the benefit the Company received upon the original sale of the trucks, represents an unfair or unduly burdensome expenditure requirement. In any event, the Company may be able to restore trucking operations at Dorchester without buying any new trucks (through leasing, transfer of trucks from other locations or other means). Further, the Company may not need 14 trucks at Dorchester to restore operations and to absorb the terminated drivers.

[12] See note 6 supra.

Union and the Board (through loss of its effectiveness). Restoration of the status quo ante, even if it requires the Company to resume a business activity which it has forsaken, is not too strong a response to these allegedly flagrant improprieties. Therefore, we conclude that the district court did not abuse its discretion by issuing an interim restoration-reinstatement order here.

2. The Bargaining Order

The district court's order directing the Company to recognize and bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective bargaining agent of the Dorchester drivers is also proper relief. The Board generally issues "a bargaining order to remedy a Section 8(a)(5) violation where an employer has committed independent unfair labor practices which make the holding of a fair election unlikely." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 610, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1938, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). Such an order is also appropriate relief in a Section 10(j) proceeding. Morio, at 218. As the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit explained in Seeler v. Trading Port, 517 F.2d 33 (2d Cir. 1975):

> [W]hen the Regional Director makes a showing, based on authorization cards, that the union at one point had a clear majority and that the employer engaged in such egregious and coercive unfair labor practices as to make a fair election virtually impossible, the district court should issue a bargaining order under Section 10(j). In such a case, the election process has been rendered so meaningless by the employer that the authorization cards are a clearly superior gauge of employee sentiment. A bargaining order then becomes a just and proper means of restoring the pre-fair labor practice status quo and preventing further frustration of the purposes of the Act.

Id. at 40.

In the instant case, all nine drivers executed Union authorization cards prior to the Union's request for recognition. After refusing either to recognize or to bargain with the Union, the Company subcontracted its hauling operations and discharged the drivers. The district court concluded that there was reasonable cause to believe that the Company's actions constituted unfair labor practices sufficiently egregious to prevent the possibility of a fair election and ordered the Company to bargain with the Union pending a final decision by the Board. We agree with the district court that in the absence of such an order, > [t]he basic remedial purpose of the Act is apt to be frustrated in two ways. First, in the time it takes for the Board to finally rule on these charges and obtain enforcement of any consequent orders, support among the truck drivers for the Union may have eroded; erosion of support for the Union in turn may unfairly diminish the Union's bargaining strength if and when [the Company] is compelled to bargain with it. Second, the longer [the Company] is permitted to avoid negotiating with the Union, the longer the truck drivers will be denied the benefits of a collective bargaining agreement. This is an especially important consideration since the benefits the drivers seek are not economic only, but also concern the safety of their working conditions. Moreover, since a bargaining order requires only that [the Company] bargain, and not that it reach any particular agreement, [the Company will not suffer any irreparable harm from such an order.

Wilson v. Liberty Homes, 500 F.Supp. 1120, at 1131 (W.D.Wis.1980).

This court enforced a bargaining order under almost identical circumstances in NLRB v. Townhouse T.V. & Appliances, Inc., 531 F.2d 826 (7th Cir. 1976). In that case, we observed that > the Company discharged every driver because of his union activity and destroyed the bargaining unit by contracting out its work. No conduct more drastic, or more likely to have lingering, ineradicable effect can be imagined. Accordingly, the Board did not abuse its discretion in concluding that the Union's authorization cards provide a more reliable measure of the employees' desires than would an election, and that a bargaining order would best effectuate the policies of the Act.

Id. at 830. Although this case involves Section 10(j) relief rather than enforcement of a final order of the Board, our position on the nature of the Company's conduct and the propriety of a bargaining order has not changed. We do not believe that the district court abused its discretion by directing the Company to recognize and bargain with the driver's Union.[13]

3. The Cease and Desist Order

Finally, the district court declined to issue an order directing the Company to cease and desist from further coercing, interrogating, restraining or discriminating against its employees in violation of the Act. The court concluded, "the conduct which [the Regional Director] seeks to enjoin is already made illegal by the Act, and the Act provides an adequate procedure for redressing violations. Accordingly, it is unnecessary to enjoin such conduct." Wilson v. Liberty Homes, 500 F.Supp. 1120, at 1128 (W.D.Wis.1980). We believe that this conclusion misinterprets the nature of Section 10(j) relief, and, as a result, the district court abused its discretion in denying the cease and desist order.

Unfair labor practices may always eventually be remedied by the Board. If the mere availability of ultimate unfair labor practice sanctions were held to obviate the need for interim relief, there would be no need for Section 10(j). Congress determined, however, that there may be circumstances in which interim relief, including a cease and desist order, may be necessary to prevent further violations of the Act pending resolution of the charges by the Board.

In the instant case, there is no guarantee that the Company will not resume its unlawful conduct when the employees exercise their right to bargain collectively under the district court's injunction. Any new unfair labor practice charges would have to be litigated through new, and probably lengthy, Board proceedings. Hence, the Company could continue to intimidate the employees and hamper effective union representation during the court imposed negotiations. An order enjoining the Company from committing future violations of the Act imposes no undue hardship on the Company and provides an effective means of eliminating the possibility of additional unlawful conduct.

Accordingly, we affirm the district court's order directing the Company to resume its trucking operations at the Dorchester plant, to reinstate the nine discharged drivers and to recognize and bargain with the Union as the driver's exclusive bargaining representative. We reverse the district court's order denying the Regional Director's request for a cease and desist order and remand with direction to enter such an order.

Beverly Enterprises, d/b/a Beverly Manor Convalescent Centers v. NLRB

661 F.2d 1095 (6th Cir.), October 8, 1981—242 NLRB 751

On petition to review Board Order

Before LIVELY and KEITH, Circuit Judges, and RICE,* District Judge.

RICE, District Judge: Beverly Enterprises (Beverly), a California corporation, operates one of its convalescent care centers in Petoskey, Michigan. The Petoskey center is capable of providing 24-hour basic and skilled nursing services for up to 120 resident patients.

In this case, Beverly seeks review of an order by the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) directing Beverly to cease and desist from refusing to bargain with the certified exclusive collective bargaining representative of certain employees at the Petoskey home. Beverly admits the refusal to bargain but maintains that the Board's order should be set aside because the bargaining unit certified by the Board, upon which the order is predicated, is incorrect. By cross-application, the Board seeks enforcement of its order.

[13] We find no merit to the Company's argument that an employer is under no obligation to bargain about "the decision to cease operations where a business shutdown is motivated by economic considerations." Co. Br. at 27. The Company confuses a decision to shut down a business operation with a decision to remain in business but to subcontract for the performance of a portion of the work formerly done by bargaining unit employees. While the former is not a mandatory subject of bargaining (at least where there is no anti-union animus), the latter is. First National Maintenance Corp. v. NLRB, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 2573, 69 L.Ed.2d 318 (1981); Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 85 S.Ct. 398, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964); NLRB v. Townhouse T.V. & Appliances, Inc., 531 F.2d 826, 830–31 (7th Cir. 1976).

*The Honorable Walter H. Rice, Judge, United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

Beverly's Petoskey facility is a one-story structure divided into three residential wings. The residents at the home are assigned among the wings according to the degree of care they require. Patients in the new south wing generally require more care than those in the north wing, and patients in the south wing generally require less care than those in either the new south or north wings.

The nursing staff at Petoskey consists of seven registered nurses (RNs), seven licensed practical nurses (LPNs), one graduate nurse (GN), and approximately thirty-five aides and orderlies. The nursing service department operates on three shifts with staff assignments made among the wings during each shift in order to achieve a level of coverage appropriate for the time of day and required degree of patient care. For example, there is generally no more than one aide or orderly assigned to the south wing during any given shift, but there may be as many as four aides or orderlies and two nurses assigned to the new south wing during the same shift. Similarly, the nurses assigned to the new south wing are ordinarily RNs, although an LPN or the GN may be assigned there during the afternoon or night shift; the north wing nurses are ordinarily LPNs or the GN, but an RN may be assigned there on occasion.

Beverly uses a "charge nurse" system to oversee nursing care on the wings. Normally, the RNs, LPNs, and GN are all designated as charge nurses, and have the responsibility of overseeing patient care on the wings and during the shifts to which they are respectively assigned. When two nurses are assigned to a particular wing during a given shift, one of them will assume the role as the charge nurse. The charge nurse on the new south wing also oversees the south wing since there is ordinarily no nurse assigned to that wing. Moreover, if no nurse is assigned to the north wing, as has happened during certain shifts in the past, the new south wing charge nurse will oversee patient care on all wings.

The aides and orderlies answer to the charge nurse for their wing. The charge nurses ordinarily report directly to the Director of Nursing who, in turn, reports to the Administrator of the facility. The Administrator and the Director generally work weekday hours paralleling the day shift. When the Administrator and Director are away from the home, the new south wing charge nurse is the most responsible employee at the facility.

Beverly also employs a single Ward and Central Supply Clerk at Petoskey. The supply clerk is responsible for the medical supplies inventory and prepares billing data for patient charges. The clerk's office is located on the new south wing, which is physically remote from the administrative offices. Medical supplies are stored in a room on the north wing but, from time to time, the clerk releases supplied from the storeroom for inventory at the nurses station on the north and new south wings. Items of supply delivered to the nurses station have charge slips attached which are filled in with the patient's name when the items are used. The supply clerk maintains billing control through these slips and must contact the nurses regarding discrepancies. The nurses contact the supply clerk when in need of specific supplies. The supply clerk also assists the center's social worker in reviewing medical records, and fills in for the Administrator's secretary during absences.

II

In July, 1978, the United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union), filed two petitions[1] with the Board seeking certification as the exclusive bargaining representative for certain employees at the Petoskey center, including LPNs and the supply clerk. The petitions were consolidated and, on September 20, 1978, following three days of hearings, the Board's Regional Director issued a Decision and Direction of Election. In that Decision, the Regional Director determined that LPN charge nurses at Petoskey are not "supervisors" under the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., and that the Ward and Central Supply Clerk at Petoskey has a "substantial community of interest" with other service and maintenance employees. The Regional Director therefore concluded that LPNs and the supply clerk would be included in the bargaining unit. The Board denied Beverly's request for review of the Regional Director's decision.

[1] In one petition, the Union sought to represent "[a]ll service and maintenance employees including Licensed Practical Nurses * * *" but excluding "professional employees and supervisor at defined in the Act." In the second petition, the Union proposed a separate unit consisting solely of LPN's. The second petition was mooted by the parties' stipulation at the hearing that, if LPNs were not supervisors, it would be appropriate to include them in the first petition's unit.

The representation election was held on October 18, 1978. Thirty-one out of fifty-four ballots cast favored the Union, with one ballot challenged. Beverly's objections to the conduct of the election were overruled. The Union was certified by the Regional Director as the exclusive bargaining representatives of service and maintenance employees at Petoskey, including LPNs and the supply clerk, on December 1, 1978.

Thereafter, Beverly refused to bargain with the Union. On June 4, 1979, in unfair labor practice proceedings based upon Beverly's refusal to bargain, the Board declined to reconsider inclusion of the LPNs and supply clerk in the bargaining unit as certified in the 1978 representation proceedings. Since Beverly otherwise admitted its refusal to bargain with the Union, the Board issued its order directing Beverly to bargain.

This Court has jurisdiction over Beverly's petition for review, and the Board's cross-application for enforcement of the June 4, 1979, order pursuant to section 10 of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 160. Because Beverly admits its refusal to bargain but justifies its conduct solely upon the over-inclusiveness of the certified bargaining unit, our review is effectively and appropriately directed only to the correctness of the Regional Director's September 20, 1978, bargaining unit determination, upon which the Board's June 4, 1979, order is based.[2] See Boise v. Greyhound Corp., 376 U.S. 473, 476–77, 84 S.Ct. 894, 896–97, 11 L.Ed.2d 849 (1964).

III

Section 2(11) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 152(11), defines a "supervisor" as:

> * * * any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

The kinds of supervisory authority enumerated in section 2(11) are in the disjunctive but, regardless of the specific kind of supervisory authority at issue, its exercise must involve the use of true independent judgment in the employer's interest before such exercise of authority becomes that of a supervisor. NLRB v. City Yellow Cab Co., 344 F.2d 575, 580–82 (6th Cir. 1965); Eastern Greyhound Lines v. NLRB, 337 F.2d 84, 87 (6th Cir. 1964). Supervisors are not employees under the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 152(3), and no employer may be required to bargain with his supervisors, 29 U.S.C. § 164(a).

In 1974, Congress indicated its awareness of the difficulties in applying the section 2(11) definition of supervisor to professionals in the health care field. The problem in application is due to the fact that health care professionals often exercise certain kinds of supervisory authority in treating those under their care, but they do so in the exercise of independent professional judgment not always strictly "in the interest of the employer." Nonetheless, Congress declined to amend section 2(11) to exclude health care professionals from the definition of supervisor, as was suggested at the time of the 1974 NLRA Health Care amendments. Rather, the Senate Labor Committee report accompanying the 1974 law indicated that the proposed exclusion was thought "unnecessary because of existing Board decisions." S.Rep.No. 766, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. ———, reprinted in [1974] U.S. Code Cong. & Ad.News 3946, 3951. The Committee expressed its approval of pre-1974 Board Decisions in the following manner:

> The Committee notes that the Board has carefully avoided applying the definition of "supervisor" to a health care professional who gives direction to other employees in the exercise of professional judgment, which direction is incidental [to] the professional's treatment of patients, and thus is not the exercise of supervisory authority in the interest of the employer.
> The Committee expects the Board to continue evaluating the facts of each case in this manner when making its determinations.

The question of supervisory status is "a mixed one of fact and law." Cf. NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672, 691, 100 S.Ct. 856, 867, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980) (respecting the similar, judicially-crafted exception for "managerial" employees). However, as should be evident from the array of criteria within section 2(11), the inquiry is predominantly factual. Further,

[2] For this reason, where the meaning allows, we refer to the Board and Regional Director interchangeably.

> [e]veryday experience in the administration of the statute gives [the Board] familiarity with the circumstances and backgrounds of employment relationships in various industries, with the abilities and needs of the workers for self-organization and collective bargaining for the peaceful settlement of their disputes with their employers. The experience thus acquired must be brought frequently to bear on the question who is an employee under the Act. Resolving that question, like determining whether unfair labor practices have been committed, "belongs to the usual administrative routine" of the Board.

N.L.R.B. v. Hearst Publications, Inc., 322 U.S. 111, 130, 64 S.Ct. 851, 860, 88 L.Ed. 1170 (1944) (citations and footnote omitted). For this reason, the Board's factual findings are conclusive upon review "if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e), (f).

To the extent that the Board's conclusion upon its factual findings involve determinations of law, the Supreme Court has also said:

> Undoubtedly, questions of statutory interpretation, especially when arising in the first instance in judicial proceedings, are for the courts to resolve, giving appropriate weight to the judgment of those whose special duty is to administer the questioned statute. But where the question is one of the specific application of a broad statutory term [e. g., "supervisor"] in a proceeding in which the agency administering the statute must determine it initially, the reviewing court's function is limited.

Hearst Publications, supra at 130–31, 64 S.Ct. at 860 (citations omitted). Thus, in sum, "the Board's determination that specified persons are 'employees' [or 'not supervisors'] under this Act is to be accepted if it has 'warrant [support] in the record' and a reasonable basis in law." Id.

In the present case, the Regional Director recognized that the evidence at the representation hearing regarding the supervisory authority of LPNs was "somewhat contradictory." Specifically, the Regional Director pointed to conflicting testimony regarding the existence of LPN authority: (1) to independently call in extra help, approve overtime, approve absences, and release employees early; (2) to submit effective evaluations of employees which have a bearing on promotions or wage increases; and (3) to actually discipline employees, or submit effective disciplinary reports which have a bearing on the discipline actually given employees. Despite the conflicting evidence, the Regional Director concluded that the LPN's exercise of authority in the first category of supervisory activities is purely routine, involving no independent judgment, and that the LPN's participation in the evaluation and disciplinary process, within the second and third categories, is more in the nature of a reporting function, not amounting to effective recommendations of appropriate personnel action.

Beverly challenges the Regional Director's findings in each of these areas as "clearly erroneous." On balance, however, we think that Beverly seeks review of the Regional Director's credibility determination and his assessment of the conflicting evidence presented to him, rather than a review based on the sufficiency of support for what the Regional Director did find. The statute precludes Beverly's approach to these matters. We must defer to the findings below if supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, "even though we might have decided the matter differently ourselves had the matter been presented de novo." NLRB v. St. Francis Hospital, 601 F.2d 404, 422 (9th Cir. 1979).

For example, Beverly questions the Regional Director's treatment of an incident involving an employee who showed up for work late and in an intoxicated condition. The evidence indicated that an LPN ordered the employee to leave, saying something like "I do not want to ever see you again." Beverly says that this amounted to the discharge of the employee by that LPN, and the incident should, therefore, be viewed as an example of the supervisory authority of LPNs at Petoskey. However, the evidence also indicated that the center's Administrator was immediately informed of the incident, directed the LPN to document it, and then contacted the employee the next day to terminate him. The Regional Director reasonably concluded from this evidence that the Administrator discharged the employee, albeit upon the LPN's report, and that the LPN neither discharged him nor effectively recommended such action.

Similarly, Beverly questions the Regional Director's account of the Administrator's testimony indicating that LPNs have had certain kinds of supervisory authority, of the type within the first category, above, "if at all, only since May of [1978]." We do not think, as Beverly contends, that this account indicates a misunderstanding of the Administrator's testimony, or that it ignores the significance of present authority under the law. As we read the Regional Director's decision, that account, in context, does not accept the Administrator's testimony, but merely characterizes it in its best light for comparison with other evidence on the record submitted by Beverly, which evidence did not sufficiently show that there had been any change in LPN authority in May, 1978, contrary to the Administrator's testimony.

We need not detail Beverly's other contentions regarding LPN authority in the three categories enumerated above. Ultimately, the question is not whether the LPNs at Petoskey have authority to adjust other employee schedules in accordance with the vagaries of manpower needs. They certainly do, at least on occasion, and the Regional Director so found. The crucial question is whether the exercise of such authority is routine or involves independent judgment. The Regional Director found that in each instance, the exercise of authority was routine. This finding has warrant or support in the record taken as a whole and will not be disturbed. Similarly, the question is not whether the LPNs play any part in the employer's determination to retain, reward, or discipline other employees. The LPNs certainly do participate in these personnel actions, by submitting evaluations and disciplinary reports, and the Regional Director so found. The crucial question is whether the LPNs participation in these personnel actions amounts to effective recommendations that the retention, reward, or discipline be given. The Regional Director found that they did not. Again, these findings have warrant or support in the record and will not be disturbed.

IV.

The Board's conclusion regarding the nature of LPN authority, in the three categories of supervisory activity enumerated, above, is not the only subject of our review. The Regional Director also found, without dispute, that the LPNs at Petoskey have authority to independently assign and direct the work of aides and orderlies within their wings. But the Regional Director noted that the exercise of this authority is "based on the Charge Nurse's assessment of the employee's abilities and the needs of the patients." He further stated:

> In determining whether various nursing personnel are supervisors, the Board has cautioned that the Congressional directive to distinguish true supervisory authority from the "professional" judgment and discretion involved in patient care by RNs and LPNs must not be ignored. [Citation omitted] * * *. [T]he LPNs here make assignments of work, report infractions, write evaluations, in conjunction with their patient care responsibilities. On balance, I find the LPNs' duties to be primarily those concerned with patient care and their actions to be taken pursuant to that care, and not as the product of independent judgment.

As explained below, we have a substantial degree of difficulty in reconciling the ambiguities in this passage and, as a result, in understanding exactly what the Regional Director meant by it. However, we do think that its tenor and possible intended meaning reflect a basic misunderstanding or misapplication of the "Congressional directive" in 1974. For this reason, we cannot conclude that the Board's determination to include LPNs in the Petoskey bargaining unit has a "reasonable basis in law," and, therefore, the Board's order will not be enforced.

As the Regional Director correctly noted, it is the intent of Congress in the health care field that the Board "distinguish true supervisory authority from the 'professional' judgment and discretion involved in patient care * * *." The distinction must be made, not because professional care is a matter of routine involving no independent judgment, but because the independent judgment which is necessarily involved in patient care, even if otherwise supervisory in character, is not always strictly "in the interest of the employer." The exercise of proper independent professional judgment in directing employees, therefore, should not alone align the professional with his employer as a supervisor.

Although the Regional Director correctly stated the basic principle, his decision does not reasonably indicate that he correctly applied it; his articulated reasons do not support the result reached. Thus, it is at least ambiguous for the Regional Director to speak of the " 'professional' judgment and discretion involved in patient care" and then find that the LPNs are not supervisors because their supervisory activities are "concerned with patient care * * * and not * * * the product of independent judgment." Either the LPNs are not supervisors because they do not exercise independent judgment in their assignment and direction of the aides and orderlies, or they are not supervisors because they exercise independent judgment professionally, but not in the interest of the employer.

We conclude from the tenor of the Regional Director's decision that the did not accept either of these rationales but, instead, may have reached his determination to include LPNs in the bargaining unit simply because their supervisory activities in assigning and directing subordinate employees were "in conjunction with their patient care responsibilities." The Regional Director failed to clearly articulate whether he had determined that LPN activities respecting patient care either did not involve independent judgment, or did involve independent professional judgment not in the interest of the employer, thereby leaving the impression that he considered the "conjunction with patient care" alone sufficient for nonsupervisory status.

This characterization of the Regional Director's approach is also evidenced by other parts of his decision. As indicated in note 1, supra, the Union did not seek to represent any "professional employee" as defined in the NLRA. See 29 U.S.C. § 152(12). Accordingly, the general bargaining unit definition to which the parties stipulated, excluded professional employees. Although the parties did not stipulate to the supervisory status of RNs at Petoskey, the Regional Director excluded them from the unit as professional employees because that status "generally is accorded to RNs." Yet when the Regional Director discussed LPN authority to assign work, he spoke of the " 'professional' judgment and discretion involved in patient care by RNs and LPNs." (It is also interesting to note that the 1974 legislative history regarding the supervisory status of health care "professionals" mentions RNs, but not LPNs, contrary to the Regional Director's statement.) Thus, it would appear that the Regional Director might have excepted LPNs from supervisory status, not because they exercise discretion as professionals, but because a sort of "professional" judgment and discretion is ordinarily involved in patient care. In other words, the Regional Director might have included LPNs in the unit solely because of their patient care responsibilities, and not because any exercise of their discretion in caring for patients is not in the employer's interest.

The position taken by the Board, in opposition to Beverly's contention that the unit determination in this case constitutes substantial departure from Board precedents, is also very significant in this regard. The Board argues in brief that the precedents upon which Beverly relies for the indicated proposition "have only limited precedential value" because they were decided prior to the 1974 NLRA Health Care amendments. This argument reflects a clearly erroneous belief that the 1974 amendments somehow altered the pertinent law, or changed the way in which the Board should approach the question of the supervisory status of health care professionals.

The fact is that although Congress was requested to effect change in the law in this area in 1974, it specifically declined to do so. See, supra, at 1098–1099. Moreover, Congress specifically approved of the Board's pre-1974 decisions and pre-1974 analytical method of dealing with the supervisory classification of health care professionals. Thus, rather than diminishing the persuasiveness of the pre-1974 health care cases upon which Beverly relies, Congress' action in 1974 enhances the "precedential value" of those decisions.[3]

[3] We do not mean to suggest that a substantial similarity in circumstances between this case and any of the pre-1974 decisions upon which Beverly relies would be reason enough to conclude that the Board should have excluded the LPNs from the bargaining unit, herein, as it excluded other nurses in the pre-1974 cases. We are acutely aware that the question of supervisory status predominantely involves a factually intensive inquiry into the circumstances of each individual case, and that even a minor difference in the evidence (which would appear insignificant to a layman or to a court) might, in the Board's expert sense of things, properly be considered sufficient reason to reach a different outcome. For example, in Sherewood Enterprises, Inc., 175 N.L.R.B. 354 (1969), the Board determined that the nurses' evaluations and training reports of subordinates were uniformly the sole determinant of subordinate retention and merit pay increases. In the present case, the evidence indicates (as the Re-

1103

The Board's erroneous belief that the law regarding the supervisory status of health care professionals changed in 1974, further strengthens our conclusion that the Regional Director may have accorded nonsupervisory status to the LPNs in this case simply because their activities in assigning subordinates relates to patient care. This standard does not correctly state Congress' intent as evidenced by the 1974 legislative history. On the contrary, it extends the exception for the "direction [of] employees in the exercise of professional judgment * * * incidental to the professional's treatment of patients, * * * not * * * in the interest of the employer [,]" to effectively encompass nearly every activity by a health care professional who has authority to direct employees and also has patients under his care.

Congress obviously did not intend to broadly accord nonsupervisory status in the manner suggested by the Regional Director. As we have indicated, the exercise of professional judgment in directing employees when treating patients is not always the exercise of authority strictly in the interest of the employer. But, on the other hand, the exercise of professional judgment in directing employees and the interest of the employer are not always mutually exclusive. Thus, in Avon Convalescent Center, Inc., 200 N.L.R.B. 702 (1972), enforced per curiam, 490 F.2d 1384 (6th Cir. 1974), of which Congress implicitly approved in 1974, and upon which Beverly relies, herein, certain nursing home nurses were deemed to be supervisors because they assigned and responsibly directed other employees. In reaching this determination, the Board said:

> In a nursing home servicing elderly and sick patients whose critical needs may momentarily require variations in standard procedures, the nurse responsible for the supervision of other nurses or a shift or a section must obviously be prepared to exercise her discretion in utilizing her training and experience and assign and direct employees placed under her authority more than clerically or routinely. Furthermore, power to enforce important personnel policies, rules, and regulations is certain to require the exercise of independent judgment. Although the record does not establish that the nurses here in question hire, fire, or mete out discipline or directly recommend such action, their power to enforce major personnel policies and rules, short of such authority, is compelling evidence that their direction and assignment of employees is substantial and meaningful.

Id. at 706 (emphasis added).

We think that the Regional Director's decision in the present case, regarding the non-supervisory status of LPNs at Petoskey, suggests a sub silentio departure from the analytical method employed by the Board, pre-1974, and, therefore, a substantial deviation from the "Congressional directive" in 1974. It is incumbent upon the Board to distinguish between professional direction of employees and direction in the interest of the employer. The confusing and "conclusory rationales," NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672, 691, 100 S.Ct. 856, 867, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980), employed by the Regional Director in addressing that matter in this case, do not indicate that the distinction was made, but do indicate that the Regional Director simply decided that LPN activity "in conjunction with," "concerned with," or "pursuant to" patient care responsibilities necessarily would not be supervisory. This approach has no reasonable basis in the law.

Since we have determined that the Board's inclusion of LPNs in the Petoskey bargaining unit lacks an articulated, reasonable basis in the law, the Board's order that Beverly must bargain with that unit will not be enforced.

Further, although the exclusion of a number of votes equal to the seven LPNs at issue would not, mathematically, have altered the result of the representation elec-gional Director found) that the Director of Nurses only accepted the nurses' evaluations if they were not critical, and in the only case on record where a subordinate received a poor evaluation, the Director of Nurses sought out other information. This difference in the evidence is sufficient to reconcile the Board's determination in Sherewood that the nurses did effectively recommend personnel actions, with the determination that the LPNs do not effectively recommend such actions at Petoskey. Similarly, in Rosewood, Inc., 185 N.L.R.B. 193 (1970), the Board concluded that LPN charge nurses who occupied positions in a managerial heirarchy similar to Petoskey, were supervisors because of the effectiveness of their authority to, inter alia, recommend wage increases, discipline, hiring and discharge. The Court assumes that the factual effectiveness of the authority in Rosewood had support in that record taken as a whole, just as we conclude that the lack of such effective authority has support, herein.

But again, our concern is not with the Board's assessment of the evidence in this case respecting these kinds of supervisory activity, or with the Board's ability to distinguish the facts in the pre-1974 cases. Our concern is with the Board's present understanding of the applicable law, and the lack of an articulated, reasonable basis under the law for reaching the conclusion that LPNs at Petoskey do not assign or direct work as supervisors.

tion upon which the bargaining order is based, there is a substantial possibility that the exclusion of LPNs from the bargaining unit might have produced different votes by other unit members and thereby altered the election's outcome. For this reason, we do not think it appropriate for us to enforce the order with any modification of the unit definition, even if we would definitely conclude that LPNs should not be included in the unit. We conclude that the bargaining order must be set aside and the case returned to the Board for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

We find no error in fact or law in the Board's determination to include the supply clerk in a Petoskey bargaining unit which included LPNs. It is noted that, in 1974, Congress expressed its approval of the Board's "preventing proliferation of bargaining units in the health care industry," and, specifically, the Board's "trend toward broader units" in that field. S.Rep.No.766, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. ——, reprinted in [1974] U.S.Code Cong. & Ad.News 3946, 3950. Although the supply clerk at Petoskey might in the abstract, be considered more of a "clerical" employee [4] than a service or maintenance employee, the record is sufficient to establish a "community of interest" with other members of the unit (as the unit had otherwise been defined by the Regional Director) pursuant to this "Congressional directive."

Therefore, were it not for the fact that we question the lack of an articulated basis for including LPNs in the unit, we would defer to the Board's expert findings and conclusions in the matter of the supply clerk (which do have "warrant in the record and a reasonable basis in the law"). However, the Regional Director's decision is unclear as to whether the supply clerk should be included in the unit solely because of an alliance in interest with aides and orderlies in the unit,[5] or also because of the clerk's daily contacts with all nursing personnel at Petoskey [6] including the LPNs whose inclusion in the unit we question. In setting aside the order and returning the matter for further proceedings respecting the LPN's inclusion, we expect the Board to address this aspect of supply clerk's inclusion in the unit should the Board determine that LPNs are not to be included.

Enforcement of the June 4, 1979, order of the Board is denied. The order is set aside.

It is the order of this Court that the captioned cause be remanded to the Board with specific instructions that the Regional Director review the record of the proceedings leading to the September 20, 1978, Decision and Direction of Election in order to reconsider inclusion of the LPNs and the supply clerk in the bargaining unit, by making specific findings on the following questions:

1. Do LPN activities respecting patient care involve independent professional judgment? If not, LPNs are properly included within the bargaining unit.
2. If so, is that independent professional judgment exercised primarily in connection with patient care, not in the interest of his or her employer, or is it exercised in the interest of his or her employer?

If the second question is reached and answered that the independent professional judgment of a supervisory character is exercised primarily in connection with patient care, not in the interest of his or her employer, then, pursuant to the above opinion and the present state of the law, LPNs at Petoskey are properly included within the bargaining unit. On the contrary, should the second question be reached and answered that the exercise of the LPNs' independent professional judgment of a supervisory character is in the interest of his or her employer, and not merely in the interest of patient care, then, equally clearly, LPNs at Petoskey should not be included in the bargaining unit.

[4] The general bargaining unit definition to which the parties stipulated excludes "office clerical employees."

[5] The supply clerk wears the same uniform and badge, and receives approximately the same wage and benefits as aides and orderlies.

[6] Beverly's two challenges to the Regional Director's factual findings regarding the supply clerk are both related to the question of the extent of the supply clerk's contacts with other unit members. Both are without merit.

First, Beverly contends that the Regional Director erred in concluding that during the 40% of the time the clerk is not in her office, she is "on the various wings" in contact with other unit members. Beverly says that the 40% of the clerk's time is actually divided between the central storeroom, social worker's office and administrative offices. Unfortunately, the Regional Director did not conclude that 40% of the clerk's time is spent on the wings, but only 25% to 30%. This finding is supported by the Administrator's testimony. The remaining 10% to 15% of the clerk's time may well be spent in the other work areas Beverly identifies.

Second, Beverly contends that the Regional Director erred in finding that the supply clerk has an "accounting function" in common with other unit employees. Beverly says the other unit employees have no such function. But, again, the Regional Director did not reach the conclusion Beverly ascribes to him. The Regional Director found that the supply clerk "must work directly with [other unit members] to maintain proper accounting for supplies used * * *." In other words, regardless of the other employees' functions, the clerk's accounting function necessitates her contacts with them. This finding is supported by the record.

Should the Board, upon reconsideration, determine that LPNs are not to be included in the bargaining unit, the Board is to state, upon review of the hearing transcript, whether the supply clerk is to be included in the bargaining unit because of an alliance and interest with aides and orderlies in the unit alone, or also because of the clerk's daily contact with all nursing personnel at Petoskey. If the supply clerk's inclusion into the bargaining unit is strictly because of an alliance and interest with clerks and orderlines in the unit, the Board's original decision should be affirmed. On the contrary, should the Regional Director conclude that the supply clerk's inclusion in the bargaining unit was also because of daily contact with all nursing personnel at Petoskey, including the LPNs which, upon reconsideration, are found not to belong in the bargaining unit, the supply clerk's inclusion in the bargaining unit must be reversed or, at least, reconsidered.

Excavation-Construction, Inc. v. NLRB

660 F.2d 1015 (4th Cir.), October 8, 1981—248 NLRB 649

On petition to review Board Order

Before BRYAN, Senior Circuit Judge, and WIDENER and MURNAGHAN, Circuit Judges

1017

WIDENER, Circuit Judge: The petitioner-employer, Excavation-Construction, Inc. (Company) seeks review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) finding that it violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (5), by unilaterally implementing a change in the pay rate for Saturday work on its A-14 Rockville, Maryland project; that it violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) by discharging three employees engaged in a protected strike; that it violated §§ 8(a)(1) by interrogating Union Steward Gray about an upcoming union meeting; that it violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (5) by unilaterally increasing the pay rate from $8.30 per hour plus a benefits contribution of $.84 per hour to a straight wage of $9.14; and that the strike by Local 639 on August 14, 1978 was an unfair labor practice strike. The Board has applied for enforcement of its order under § 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). We deny enforcement.

The Company is engaged in general hauling and excavation work in the Washington, D.C. area. Teamsters Local 639 is the labor organization that has been recognized as the representative of its approximately 65 truck drivers.

In the spring of 1978, Local 639 began collective bargaining with a multi-employer bargaining association named Capital Area Trucking Association (Association) as well as with the Company on whose behalf the Association did not bargain. Prior to these negotiations, the Company was bound by a collective bargaining agreement between the Union and Construction Contractors Council. This prior contract contained provisions for time and a half pay for Saturday work without regard to other work done that week. In the negotiations with both the Association and the Company, the Saturday time and a half pay provision was an area of major dispute between the parties. The employers sought a make-up day provision, which is a provision allowing time and a half pay for Saturday except that in the event that inclement weather prevented normal work during the week, Saturday work would be paid at time and a half only for hours in excess of 40 during that week or 8 on the make-up day.

The negotiations between Local 639 and the Association concluded with a make-up day provision included. That provision was later rejected by the union members and the previous time and a half rate for Saturday was substituted.

In April 1978, Larry Campbell, the Company's General Manager, James I. Williams, Local 639 Vice President, and others met to begin negotiations on a new contract between the Union and the Company. As negotiations between Local 639 and the Association were ongoing at that time, the parties agreed to wait and see how those negotiations resulted. On May 19, negotiators for both sides met again, with the Union giving the Company a copy of the Association agreement, which at that point had not been ratified by the membership. That agreement contained a make-up day provision. Another meeting occurred on May 31, with the Company noting that it wanted a make-up day provision. Nothing definitive resulted, however, since the Association agreement had still not been ratified. A June 21 meeting resulted in nothing being decided. On June 23, the Association agreement was ratified absent the make-up day provision.

The Company claimed that it needed the make-up day provision because it had entered into a contract the previous May for the A-14 Metro project in Rockville, Maryland. That bid was made on the basis of a make-up day provision. Additionally, a supplemental collective bargaining agreement for other workers on that project contained language requiring time and a half pay if any other employees received the same.

On July 6, 1978, the Company sent a telegram to the President of Local 639 which stated:

> SUBJECT: METRO JOB-A-14
> DUE TO COMPETITIVE FACTORS, AND FOR OTHER GOOD AND SUFFICIENT ECONOMIC REASONS, IT IS THE INTENTION OF EXCAVATION CONSTRUCTION, INC. COMMENCING SATURDAY JULY 15 TO PAY STRAIGHT TIME FOR ALL HOURS WORKED EXCEPT TO THE EXTENT THAT EMPLOYEES WORK MORE THAN 40 HOURS IN ANY ONE WORK WEEK OR MORE THAN 8 HOURS IN ANY WORK DAY, BUT NOT BOTH. THIS MEANS NO PREMIUM PAY, AS SUCH, EXCEPT AS STATED. SHOULD YOU HAVE ANY QUESTIONS PLEASE CALL ME.

On July 11 another meeting occurred. The Company pointed out its problem with A-14 and stated that it would accept the Association contract if it had a make-up day provision for the A-14 project. Local 639 President George indicated that he just could not go to his members with such a request since they knew that everyone else would be getting premium pay. The Company asked for a concession the Union might accept but none was offered. The Union wanted the Association contract with no make-up day provision on A-14. The meeting ended with Union President George stating "I'll take it back to my people but I can tell you right now, they are not going to buy it."

On July 13, George sent a letter to Campbell protesting the Company's actions and stating that the Union would meet regarding the action of the Company as to the Saturday pay provision for A-14 as of July 15, which the Union considered unlawful unilateral action on the part of the Company. George also advised that a vote would be taken regarding a strike if the proposed change with respect to Saturday pay on A-14 was implemented. On July 14, the Company sent a telegram in reply which included its last and final offer, which was the terms of the Association contract with the exception of a make-up day provision for A-14. The Union met on the night of the 14th. After the Company's telegram was read to the members, the membership voted to reject the Company's last and final offer. The vote was 26-5. The following day, Saturday, July 15, the Company implemented the wage change for job site A-14.

Weekend work for the Company was voluntary, and no pressure was placed on employees to work on weekends. On Friday of each week, a determination was made as to how many employees would be needed to work the following day. Employees then voluntarily signed up to work. Once an employee had signed up, however, he was subject to dismissal if he did not show up for work. Employees did not know until their arrival at work on Saturday morning where they would be working. That decision was made by management on Friday night. Employees were notified of their Saturday job assignments by trip tickets placed in their respective mail slots.

On Saturday, July 15, drivers Robinson, Suggs, and Wellons reported for work after volunteering the day before. All three were assigned to job site A-14. Robinson was the first to arrive for work that day. Upon finding out his job assignment, he told Walter Jones, the truck superintendent, that he would not work A-14 because he had worked less than 40 hours that work week and therefore was not assured of receiving time and a half.[1] Robinson asked to work at any other job, but Jones stated that no other jobs were available. Suggs and Wellons arrived shortly thereafter, and, like Robinson, refused to work job A–14. All three stated that they would work anywhere else but not A–14.

[1] There is a conflict in the evidence as to whether the three workers had been told the day before that they would be paid time and a half. The Administrative Law Judge concluded that they had not been so told, and the Board accepted this finding.

The three men returned to work the following Monday. They were all asked why they had refused to work the previous Saturday. Wellons stated that on Friday night they were told by the Union not to work for straight time on Saturday. Each agreed, noting that they refused to work because they were not assured that they would get paid time and a half. All were then discharged for refusing to work on the A–14 job on the past Saturday.

Negotiations between the Company and Local 639 continued in August, with the Company still wanting a make-up day provision and the Union opposed. At an August 9 meeting the Company asked the Union if it wanted anything in return for a make-up day provision. The Union responded with a request for a $.50 per hour wage increase for all employees. These August talks additionally included a discussion of the three discharged employees, with the Company agreeing to reinstatement but no back pay. The Union also rejected a me-too offer.

On August 12, 1978, Campbell met with Union Steward Gray in Campbell's office. The two discussed the three discharged employees, with special attention paid to Suggs because Gray thought that he had gotten a bad deal from the firing. Campbell inquired as to whether a vote would be taken at the Union meeting scheduled for the next day. Gray stated that he did not know of any vote being taken at that meeting. Gray stated that he thought the meeting was going to deal with the three discharged employees and with a problem some of the employees were having regarding their pay. The meeting concluded after a discussion of the events leading up to the dismissal of the three drivers.

On August 13, 1978, the Company's employees belonging to Local 639 voted to strike. Among the reasons behind the strike which were discussed at that meeting were the failure of contract negotiations because of the Company's insistence on a make-up day provision and the dismissal of the three employees. The strike began the following day. On August 16, 1978, the Company advertised in Baltimore and Washington newspapers for replacements for the strikers. The Company advertised the pay at $9.14 per hour.[2]

On August 18, the Company and the Union met. The Company stated its intention to hire permanent replacements if the strike did not end. Campbell told striking workers the same thing on August 19. He spoke to the workers at the picket lines, inviting them to return to work and informing them that new workers would be hired if they did not return. He also told them that the health and pension benefits would not be paid but instead would be included in the pay checks. This $9.14 wage rate became effective on August 21. The Company had not paid premium pay for Saturday work on A–14 except for more than 40 hours per week or 8 hours per day beginning July 15th.

I Impasse

The Administrative Law Judge found that impasse had been reached before the Company changed the Saturday pay for A–14. Therefore, he concluded the change was not an unfair labor practice. The Board, however, disagreed, holding that no impasse existed when the Saturday wage rate was altered. Therefore, the Board found that the Company had committed an unfair labor practice in violation of § 8(a)(1) and (5).

We find that there is not substantial evidence to support the Board's decision. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). The evidence clearly shows that the make-up pay provision was the sticking point and centerpiece of the Association negotiations as well as the negotiations at issue here. The parties mutually deferred negotiations on the issue until the Association agreement was worked out, thus hoping to take advantage of the negotiations advanced there. Such deferment does not indicate a lack of negotiations or refusal to negotiate but merely a desire to take advantage of multi-employer negotiations progressing contemporaneously. A deferment of negotiations by mutual agreement, as here, is no evidence of unwillingness to negotiate. And it is acknowledged by all that the Company offered to accept the Association agreement with the exception of the Saturday pay provision. In addition, the make-up day provision was specifically discussed at negotiation sessions between the Company and Local 639 after the Association agreement was ratified. There, Union President George said that his members would not accept such a provision. In reality, they did not.

[2] Under the old contract between the Company and Local 639, the wage rate was $8.30 per hour plus $.84 per hour being paid for benefits. There is no dispute as to these facts.

At the time the Saturday overtime change was implemented, even if not when proposed, an impasse existed.[3] The Company had made its last and final offer which the Union had voted to reject. At that point, it cannot be said that there was a realistic possibility that negotiations would be fruitful. Taft Broadcasting Co., 163 NLRB 475 (1967), pet. for review den. sub nom. American Federation of Television and Radio Artists v. NLRB, 395 F.2d 622 (D.C. 1968). We especially note that there is no allegation made by the Board that the Company did not bargain in good faith; it only alleges that the Company did not bargain to impasse. There is not substantial evidence in the record to support the Board's conclusion that the Company changed the Saturday wage rate before impasse was reached. The Union had considered and voted to reject the Company's last and final offer before the Saturday wage change was implemented by the Company. Thus, the parties were at an impasse with the Union's rejection of the offer.

II Discharge of Employees

The Board adopted the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion that the three employees were improperly discharged in violation of § 8(a)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), because they were involved in protected concerted activity, and § 8(a)(3), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3), because of their union membership or activities. He found the Company had violated both §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3). In reaching such a conclusion, the Administrative Law Judge rejected the Company's contention that the workers were involved in an intermittent, partial strike unprotected by the Act. The Administrative Law Judge found that the three workers were involved in a one-day strike, not in an intermittent one. It is clear that the three men refused to work and only refused to work on the A-14 job. The question is whether such action was concerted activity protected under the Act.

Section 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157, guarantees employees the right to engage in concerted activity. An employer violates § 8(a)(1) of the Act when he discharges employees engaged in concerted activities protected by § 7. Such activities are generally protected by the Act unless they are unlawful, violent, in breach of a contract, or otherwise indefensible. NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 17, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 1104, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962); NLRB v. Waco Insultation, 567 F.2d 596 (4th Cir. 1977). There is no question here but that the refusal to work of the three discharged drivers was concerted. The Union meeting of July 14th decided that question. The only question left then is whether their refusal to work is protected. If it is, the Company violated the Act by discharging these employees, and enforcement would be proper. Work stoppages in protest of working conditions are protected by the Act. Washington Aluminum, supra.

This protection, however, does not extend to partial, recurrent, or intermittent work stoppages. G. C. Conn Ltd. v. NLRB, 108 F.2d 390 (7th Cir. 1939). In Conn, employees refused to work overtime because of a dispute regarding the rate and hours for overtime pay. Without giving the employer prior notice, the employees left the work place at the end of the regular work day even though overtime work was scheduled for that evening. There was evidence they intended to do the same each day until their demands were met. The next day those employees returned to work. All of the employees who signed a statement that they would not work overtime according to company rules were discharged. The court of appeals refused to enforce the Board's order that the employees were engaged in protected concerted activity, noting that the employees had two choices available to them regarding their wage dispute. They could continue to work and negotiate further or they could strike. They could not, however, do both. By doing both they would be working "upon terms prescribed solely by [themselves]." Conn at 397. The Act does not protect such conduct by employees.

[3] We need not consider whether an impasse existed prior to the 14th for it in fact existed at least with the Union's rejection of the Company's last and final offer at the Union meeting on July 14th.

This court followed Conn in Home Beneficial Life Ins. Co. v. NLRB, 159 F.2d 280 (4th Cir.), cert. den. 332 U.S. 758, 68 S.Ct. 58, 92 L.Ed. 344 (1947), a case indistinguishable on its essential facts from the case now before us. The employer in Home Beneficial had a rule that agents had to report to the office each morning before serving their respective routes. A group of agents advised the company that they would report on Wednesdays and Thursdays only, but not the other days. They were discharged when they did not report to the office in accordance with the company rule. We upheld the lawfulness of their discharge because they were seeking to set the terms of their own employment. In NLRB v. Mt. Clemens Pottery Co., 147 F.2d 262 (6th Cir. 1945), the Sixth Circuit reached a like result for employees who refused to work overtime, as did the Eighth Circuit in NLRB v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 157 F.2d 486 (8th Cir. 1946), for employees who refused to perform a part of their clerical duties.

The cases point to a distinction between single refusals to work over working conditions and recurrent refusals to perform a particular job. NLRB v. Gulf-Wandes Corp., 595 F.2d 1074 (5th Cir. 1979); First National Bank of Omaha v. NLRB, 413 F.2d 921 (8th Cir. 1969), the first being protected activity, the latter not being protected. Following this reasoning, the Administrative Law Judge stated that the men did not know at what rate they would be paid for working Saturday, July 15, and that they went to work that day to find out. If straight time had been paid, the men would refuse to work that day. In the future the men would simply not volunteer for weekend work, a permissible decision under company rules. Thus, he concluded the three employees were engaged in a one-day strike protected under the Act. The Administrative Law Judge noted that their return to work the next Monday showed that the strike was of limited duration. The holding of the Administrative Law Judge was upheld by the Board.

There is no basis in the record for such a conclusion. The union members, including the three affected employees, knew that A-14 would only pay straight time. Campbell met with the employees and told them of the proposed change on July 14. At the Union meeting on the night of the 14th, the Company's telegram was read in which it was stated, with unmistakable clarity,[3A] that straight time would be paid on the A-14 job, except for more than 40 hours that week or 8 hours that day. The members voted and specifically rejected those terms and agreed not to work weekends for straight time. As Union Steward Gray stated, "[w]e just made an agreement not to work on Saturdays and Sundays at straight time." Clearly, the employees knew what the Saturday wage rate would be for the A-14 job when they voted against accepting it. Additionally, we note the Administrative Law Judge, with the concurrence of the Board, rejected the three men's contention that they had been promised time and a half for working that particular Saturday.

Likewise, there is no substantial evidence in the record to support the conclusion that the men would simply not volunteer for weekend work from then on. Not only is there no evidence to that effect in the record, such a conclusion is inconsistent with the affected employees' own testimony. The men's only refusal was to work the A-14 job on weekends. They would work any other job. In fact, all three sought to work at another job site on the Saturday in question. The testimony is uncontradicted that the men would have worked overtime at any job site but A-14. There is nothing in the record from which it may be inferred that the refusal to work was confined to the particular Saturday in question. The vote at the union meeting the night before was not so limited. The men, then, were seeking to continue to work under terms prescribed by themselves alone, and were not engaged in a single, isolated, concerted protest against conditions of employment. Their activity is not protected by the Act.

III Interrogation of Gray

The conversation in question took place the day before the August 13 meeting at which the Union voted to strike. Campbell, of course, knew of the previous July meeting at which the Union voted to reject the make-up day provision concerning Saturday pay. It is obvious from the record also that everyone knew of the August 13 meeting. The entire conversation was tape recorded and transcribed, so we do not have to deal with problems of credibility as to what was said. The inquiry Campbell made of Gray concerning the August 13 meeting was this: "Do you know what the vote going to be tomorrow. I mean what's its going to be about?" Gray answered that he did not know of any vote tomorrow, that the meeting was going to be about the make-up day and apparently some complaints about some employees not getting paid due to sickness of one Jr., Jr. being a clerical or supervisory employee. The vast majority of the conversation concerned the three drivers who had been laid off and Gray's efforts especially to get the Company to put Suggs back to work, Gray being convinced that Suggs was operating under a misunderstanding in signing up for work on the Saturday in question, although the other two might not have been. There was no threat, expressed or implied, in the conversation, and even Gray in his testimony did not intimate such. Neither did the Board find any threat in the conversation. The only thing the Board takes exception to in the conversation is that Campbell wanted "to find out what the union was voting on," and that he gave no assurances to Gray against reprisals. An interrogation, not itself threatening, is not an unfair labor practice unless it meets certain fairly severe standards. NLRB v. Dorn's Transportation, 405 F.2d 706 (2d Cir. 1969). The proper inquiry in such a case, as held in Dorn's Transportation, is that set out in Bourne v. NLRB, 332 F.2d 47 (2d Cir. 1964). This circuit in NLRB v. Consolidated D Elec. Co., etc., 469 F.2d 1016 (4th Cir. 1972), n. 9, p. 1020, has also adopted the Bourne standards as the "test to be applied to an interrogation in passing on whether it will support a finding of impropriety under the Act." The Bourne, p. 48, standards are:

(1) The background, i.e., is there a history of employer hostility and discrimination?

(2) The nature of the information sought, e.g., did the interrogator appear to be seeking information on which to base taking action against individual employees?

(3) The identity of the questioner, i.e., how high was he in the company hierarchy?

(4) Place and method of interrogation, e.g., was employee called from work to the boss' office? Was there an atmosphere of "unnatural formality"?

Analyzing those standards against the facts here, we see that the Board has found a mere inquiry, without assurance against reprisal, to be an unfair labor practice although unaccompanied by threats of reprisal or otherwise. This is not consistent with Bourne and Consolidated D.

The Company had no history of employer hostility to unions or discrimination. In addition, it was guilty of no unfair labor practices in the dispute at hand. Cf. Winchester Spinning Corp. v. NLRB, 402 F.2d 299 (4th Cir. 1968).

Campbell did not appear to be and was not in fact seeking information from Gray upon which to base taking action against individual employees.

While Campbell was the General Manager of the Company, Gray was a Steward of the Union. Nothing in the conversation indicates that Campbell tried to exert any pressure on Gray to take any particular action with respect to any union activity in the conversation. Absent some kind of otherwise illegal conduct, we are of opinion there is no reason a company official may not talk to a union official about a labor dispute.

The conversation apparently took place in Campbell's office, but there was no atmosphere of unnatural formality shown by the transcript of the conversation or any testimony with respect to the meeting. Indeed, the parties have seemed satisfied to let the transcript speak for itself.

To Campbell's question as to what was going on, Gray answered, apparently truthfully, that the meeting concerned the make-up day and the complaint of some of the employees about not receiving pay due to the sickness of Jr. This is verified by Gray's testimony in his brief and only mention of the reason for the August 13 union meeting.

Thus, the Board's holding that a mere interrogation with no intimation of threat or reprisal, unaccompanied though it may be with no assurances against reprisals, is an unfair labor practice, is in error for it does not meet the standard of Bourne which has been adopted in this circuit by Consolidated D.

IV Pay Increase

The Board, in rejecting the opinion of the Administrative Law Judge, found that the Company had violated § 8(a)(5) of the Act when it changed from paying $8.30 per hour plus $.84 per hour in pension and hospitalization benefits contributions to paying a straight $9.14 per hour to replacements and offering the same to non-striking drivers during the strike by Local 639. The Administrative Law Judge, noting that the unfair labor complaint was not because of the change of form of the payment of wages but alleged to be "a wage increase for employees in excess of any offer made to the Union during contract negotiations," found that there was no wage increase. Only a change in the form of payment had occurred. Accordingly, the Administrative Law Judge would have dismissed this part of the complaint.

The Board, however, concluded that such a change represented a wage increase unilaterally granted in violation of § 8(a)(5). Further, the Board concluded that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling striking employees that they would be paid if they worked the $9.14 per hour with no hospitalization or pension benefits payments. The Board concluded that, since an offer did amount to a wage increase, the Company unlawfully offered increased wages to strikers if they would return to work.

Generally, it is an unfair labor practice for an employer to unilaterally make changes in the conditions and terms of employment subject to mandatory bargaining, including wages, either before or after the expiration of a collective bargaining agreement, at a time when the employer is under an obligation to bargain. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962); NLRB v. Cone Mills Corp., 373 F.2d 595 (4th Cir. 1967). While the Board is correct in noting that it may be held unlawful for an employer to unilaterally increase wages without first giving notice and conferring with the union on the matter, such wage increase did not occur here. The Board's complaint is that the Company unilaterally paid employees more than its best offer to the Union. There is no substantial evidence, based on the record as a whole, to support such a conclusion. The Company was paying the exact amount offered to the Union in negotiations. Finding no unlawful wage increase, we do not enforce the Board's order with respect to that matter.[4]

V Nature of the August Strike

The Board concluded that the strike by Local 639 on August 14, 1978 was an unfair labor practice strike, thus making unlawful the permanent replacement of strikers. Because we have previously determined that the Company had committee no unfair labor practices, the strike was an economic one not entitling the strikers to reinstatement. Radiator Specialty Co. v. NLRB, 336 F.2d 495 (4th Cir. 1964); NLRB v. United Brass Works, Inc., 287 F.2d 689 (4th Cir. 1961).

We are thus of opinion that the petition for review is well taken and the Board's request for enforcement of its order is not.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

Fun Striders, Inc. v. NLRB

658 F.2d 716 (9th Cir.), October 8, 1981—248 NLRB 182

On petition to review Board Order

Before HUG and FARRIS, Circuit Judges, and CLAIBORNE,* DISTRICT JUDGE

717

FARRIS, Circuit Judge: Fun Striders, Inc., petitions for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board finding that Fun Striders violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976), by discharging and refusing to reinstate four employees who Fun Striders believed had distributed certain literature during an unannounced employee work stoppage. See Fun Striders, Inc., 250 N.L.R.B. 520 (1980). Fun Striders contends that the NLRB erred (1) by finding the employees' distribution of communist-oriented literature to be protected activity and (2) by failing to apply a dual or mixed motive analysis to the discharges. The NLRB cross-applies for enforcement of its order. We set aside the order and refuse enforcement.

---

[4] An alternate reason we give for our decision is that the general law is that an employer has a right to unilaterally change terms and conditions of employment after it has bargained to impasse with a union. The fact that the union has gone on strike merely adds emphasis to the rule. In this case the Company did not change even the form of wages until August 21, a week after the strike had commenced on August 14, and more than a month after the parties had bargained to impasse on July 14. In the same or similar factual situations, at least the following cases which we follow have authorized increases in wages following bargaining to impasse. NLRB v. United Brass Works, Inc., 287 F.2d 689 (4th Cir. 1961); NLRB v. Yama Workcraft, Inc., 580 F.2d 942 (9th Cir. 1978); Gulf States Mfrs. Inc. v. NLRB, 579 F.2d 1298 (5th Cir. 1978).

I. THE DISPUTE

Fun Striders, Inc., is engaged in the manufacture of shoes and handbags. On August 24, 1978, in protest of the piece-rate set on a new shoe style, stitching department employees in one of its three plants stopped work. While the employees were on the picket line, members of the Progressive Labor Party appeared outside the plant selling their newspapers. The Party members offered to prepare and provide leaflets relating to the labor dispute. An employee, Carranza, accepted the offer, assisted in the preparation of a leaflet, and distributed it the next day. The leaflet urged employees to strike and to form a union. It also advocated "violent revolution," "destruction of all bosses," and "armed revolution of all the working class." Other leaflets of a similar nature were distributed by employees on the next two working days. At the conclusion of the protest, Atkins, the plant manager and an avowed anticommunist, refused to allow four employees (Carranza, Castro, Marin, and Ruiz) to return to work because he believed they were associated with the Party and had advocated the violent overthrow of the plant and its supervision.

On February 8, 1979, the Board's regional director issued a complaint alleging that the refusal to reinstate the four employees violated sections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Labor Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(3), (1) (1976). The administrative law judge held that Fun Striders had violated section 8(a)(1). As to the section 8(a)(3) charge, the judge found that Fun Striders did not act out of anti-union animus. Because such animus is an element of section 8(a)(3) violations,[1] he made no finding regarding the alleged violation of section 8(a)(3). The Board affirmed and ordered remedies including reinstatement, back pay, and notice posting. Fun Striders, Inc., 250 N.L.R.B. 520, 520 (1980).

II. SECTION 8(a)(1) VIOLATION

Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976), makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by [section 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976)]." Section 8(a)(1) was intended as a general definition of employer unfair labor practices. Violations of it may be either derivative, independent, or both.

A. Derivative Violation

A derivative violation is premised on a violation of sections 8(a)(2)–(5), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(2)–(5) (1976), which establish more specific categories of employer unfair labor practices. In general, a violation of one of these provisions will support a finding that section 8(a)(1) has been derivatively violated. See NLRB v. Swedish Hospital Medical Center, 619 F.2d 33, 35 (9th Cir. 1980) (dictum). Here, however, the Board failed to find a section 8(a)(3) violation. The Board's counsel is therefore precluded from justifying the section 8(a)(1) violation as a derivative violation.

B. Independent Violation

Section 8(a)(1) may also be violated by acts that do not violate the more specific provisions. Such a violation is established by showing:

(1) that employees are engaged in protected activities, American Ship Building Co. v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300, 308, 85 S.Ct. 955, 962, 13 L.Ed.2d 855 (1965);

(2) that the employer's conduct tends to "interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees" in those activities, see Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1080 (9th Cir. 1977) (quoting section 8(a)(1)) (interrogation); and

719

(3) that the employer's conduct is not justified by a legitimate and substantial business reason, see Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Manufacturing Co., 380 U.S. 263, 269, 85 S.Ct. 994, 999, 13 L.Ed.2d 827 (1965).

See generally 18B T. Kheel, Labor Law § 10.02[2] (1981).

[1] NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 33, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1797, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967). Although no proof of anti-union motive is required when the conduct is "inherently destructive" of employee rights, in such cases the employer may rebut the resulting presumption by proving that the challenged actions were motivated by legitimate business considerations. See id. Here, the administrative law judge's specific finding of a lack of anti-union animus resolved the motive issue in favor of the employer.

1. Protected Activity. The administrative law judge found that the distribution of the leaflets was protected activity. Fun Striders contends that the judge applied an incorrect legal standard in making this finding. It argues that the judge should have considered the political content of the leaflets. Distribution of literature that is purely political is an unprotected activity. E. g., Firestone Steel Products Co., 244 N.L.R.B. No. 148, 102 L.R.R.M. 1172 (1979) (state political campaign literature); Ford Motor Co., 221 N.L.R.B. 663, 666 (1975) (political campaign literature), enforced mem., 546 F.2d 418 (3d Cir. 1976); see also Ford Motor Co. (Rouge Complex), 233 N.L.R.B. 698, 705 (1977) (NLRB conceded Revolutionary Communist Party literature unprotected). Where, however, leaflets contain non-political matter as well as political matter related to employee interests, distribution is protected. Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556, 563–70, 98 S.Ct. 2505, 2511–14, 57 L.Ed.2d 428 (1978). The administrative law judge could properly conclude that distribution of the leaflets here was protected activity. See also Veeder-Root Co., 237 N.L.R.B. 1175, 1176–77 (1978).

2. Interference. Fun Striders does not dispute that its refusal to reinstate the employees interfered with distribution of the leaflets.

3. Business Justification. Fun Striders contends, however, that its refusal to reinstate was justified. It argues that the violent, communist nature of the material in the leaflet provided a legitimate business reason for its actions. It also asserts that the Board erred in finding a violation where Fun Striders' motives were entirely legitimate. While admitting that the legitimacy of Fun Striders' motive precluded a section 8(a)(3) violation, the Board contends that motive is irrelevant to the section 8(a)(1) violation.

Although anti-union motive is required in section 8(a)(3) violations, it is not an essential element of section 8(a)(1) violations. See Textile Workers Union v. Darlington Manufacturing Co., 380 U.S. 263, 269, 85 S.Ct. 994, 999, 13 L.Ed.2d 827 (1965). Nonetheless, motive is relevant.[2] In a section 8(a)(1) discharge case, if an employer demonstrates a legitimate, substantial business reason for the dismissal, "the burden shifts to the Board to establish that the primary motivation for the discharge was to penalize the employee for his [protected activity]." NLRB v. William S. Carroll, Inc., 578 F.2d 1, 4 (1st Cir. 1978); see Litton Dental Products v. NLRB, 543 F.2d 1085, 1087–88 (4th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. Elias Brothers Restaurants, Inc., 496 F.2d 1165, 1167 (6th Cir. 1974) (per curiam) ("motiv[ation] in part"); NLRB v. Fairview Hospital, 443 F.2d 1217, 1219 (7th Cir. 1971) (motive must be solely legitimate); *see also NLRB v. The leaflets urged the employees to engage in a violent struggle against management. Fun Striders reasonably believed that this advocacy threatened to inject violent confrontation into the plant. It had a legitimate and substantial business reason to keep those it believed had distributed the offending leaflets out of the plant by refusing to reinstate them. Once Fun Striders made this showing, the Board had the burden of proving that Fun Striders' true motive was to interfere with protected activity. Its failure to carry this burden led to the administrative law judge's specific finding that Fun Striders had no anti-union animus.[3]

Where, as here, the employer acts out of entirely legitimate motives, the business need to preserve peace precludes a finding that section 8(a)(1) has been violated by refusal to reinstate employees advocating violence. The result may differ in another case, where the employer's motives are mixed or in any event less clearly legitimate than here. The record before us, however, does not support the Board's determination that Fun Striders violated section 8(a)(1). Its order is set aside.

Enforcement denied.

[2] Our previous cases do not clearly define the relevance of employer motive in a section 8(a)(1) proceeding. See, e. g., Ad Art, Inc. v. NLRB, 645 F.2d 669 (9th Cir. 1980) (assuming, without deciding, that anti-union animus is required to find section 8(a)(1) violation); Stephens Institute v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 720, 726 (9th Cir.) (upholding findings that sections 8(a)(1) and (3) had been violated, without separate analysis, in a single paragraph discussing dominant motive test), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 358, 66 L.Ed.2d 217 (1980).

[3] In addition to its business motivation—preservation of non-violent conditions in the plant—Fun Striders also had a political motive—anti-communism. We see no reason why an additional motive (other than interference with protected activities) should undercut a legitimate and substantial business justification.

NLRB v. Winburn Title Manufacturing Company

663 F.2d 44 (8th Cir.), October 15, 1981—250 NLRB 108

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before HENLEY and MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judges, and COLLINSON, Senior District Judge*

44

HENLEY, Circuit Judge: This case is before the court on application of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order against Winburn Tile Manufacturing Company (the Company), based on a finding that the Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1947 (the Act), as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., by refusing to bargain with the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union (the Union). The Company admits its refusal to bargain, but contends that the refusal does not constitute an unfair labor practice because the representation proceedings were improperly conducted.

45

A representation election was conducted by secret ballot on July 3, 1979 at the Company's Little Rock, Arkansas, location. The result was 61 votes for the Union and 57 against. One ballot was void and eight ballots were challenged, three by the Company and five by the Union, a sufficient number to affect the results of the election.

A Regional Director conducted an ex parte administrative investigation and at least some evidentiary material was submitted by both sides. On August 15, 1979 the Director issued a report recommending that the Company's three challenges be sustained. With respect to the Union's challenges, the Regional Director recommended that the objections to the ballots of Albert James and Harvey Hall be sustained based on a finding that James and Hall were supervisors. It was further recommended that two of the Union's other challenges be overruled, thus leaving the Union with a two-vote margin and rendering moot the Union's fifth challenge of Aubrey Bean's ballot. The Company filed exceptions to the Regional Director's report and requested a hearing on the eligibility of Bean, James and Hall.

On December 12, 1979 the Board adopted the Regional Director's findings and recommendations, and certified the Union. In denying the Company's request for a hearing, the Board stated that the Company had raised no material or substantial factual issues which would warrant reversal of the Regional Director's recommendations. The Company refused to bargain, and on February 5, 1980 a complaint was filed charging the Company with unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8 of the Act. The Company filed a timely answer challenging the representation proceeding and requesting a hearing. The Board held that the Company was not entitled, in the absence of newly discovered evidence, to raise issues which had been considered by the Regional Director in the Section 9 representation proceeding. Finding no indication of newly discovered evidence, the Board granted summary judgment and issued the order it now seeks to enforce. In resisting enforcement, the Company asserts that it is entitled to a hearing on its objections to the representation proceedings. We agree.

We do not dispute the Board's statement that an issue which has been fully litigated in a representation proceeding may not be relitigated in a subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding absent new evidence. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162, 61 S.Ct. 908, 917, 85 L.Ed. 1251 (1941). The Board's reliance on Pittsburgh Plate Glass in the present case, however, is misplaced. In Pittsburgh Plate Glass, there was a full evidentiary hearing in the representation proceeding. The Supreme Court emphasized the employer's opportunity to introduce evidence, call witnesses and cross-examine the other party's witnesses, and concluded that "a single trial of the issue was enough." Id. at 162, 61 S.Ct. 917.

In contrast to Pittsburgh Plate Glass, there was no evidentiary hearing in the present case, either during the representation proceeding or the unfair labor practice proceeding. The ex parte procedure used in this case "falls far short of any litigated proceeding standard." NLRB v. Commercial Letter, Inc., 455 F.2d 109, 113 (8th Cir. 1972).[1] Furthermore, "[d]ue process demands that the right to a hearing on an unfair labor practice, granted by the National Labor Relations Act, not be circumvented by the ex parte investigatory proceedings established in the Board regulations for the certification proceedings." NLRB v. Commercial Letter, Inc., 455 F.2d at 114. We therefore find that Pittsburgh Plate Glass is not controlling in the present case. See Linn Gear Co. v. NLRB, 608 F.2d 791, 793 (9th Cir. 1979).

It does not necessarily follow, however, that summary judgment was improperly granted. The Company must still show that it was entitled to a hearing. The right to a hearing is established if "the requesting party [raises] substantial or material issues which, if proved, would warrant setting aside the election." Beaird-Poulan Division, Emerson Elec. Co. v. NLRB, 571 F.2d 432, 434 (8th Cir. 1978). The test for determining whether material factual issues exist has been set forth in N.L.R.B. v. Griffith Oldsmobile, Inc., 455 F.2d 867 (8th Cir. 1972).

> It is incumbent upon the party seeking a hearing to clearly demonstrate that factual issues exist which can only be resolved by an evidentiary hearing * * *. Mere disagreement with the Regional Director's reasoning and conclusions do[es] not raise 'substantial and material factual issues.' * * * To request a hearing a party must, in its exceptions, define its disagreements and make an offer of proof to support findings contrary to those of the Regional Director.

455 F.2d at 868–69, quoting NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, Inc., Frosty Morn Division, 379 F.2d 172, 178 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 958, 88 S.Ct. 338, 19 L.Ed.2d 364 (1967).

The Board asserts that the Company, in its exceptions to the Regional Director's report, failed to state specific controverted findings and offered no proof to support contrary findings, but merely questioned the Director's conclusions and inferences. Upon a careful reading of the record, we conclude that respondent has raised precisely the types of material issues warranting a hearing.

The Regional Director's report stated that James and Hall work in Winburn's vinyl division, which is housed in a separate building about one-fourth mile from the other buildings. The division employs twenty-seven people. The plant manager, Tyson Meneley, stated in his affidavit that because the plant is large, he relies on Hall and James to show new employees what to do and to perform certain other tasks.

As stated earlier, James' and Hall's ballots were challenged on the basis of their alleged status as supervisors. The Act defines supervisor as:

> any individual having the authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibly to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment.

29 U.S.C. § 152(11). The Company asserts that Hall and James were "leadmen" rather than supervisors; that is, they only had authority over routine matters and were not authorized to exercise independent judgment. The Board, however, adopted the Regional Director's conclusion that Hall and James were supervisors within the meaning of the Act.

Critical to the Regional Director's conclusion that Hall and James were supervisors were a number of factual determinations concerning James' and Hall's authority to perform the functions of a supervisor as defined by the Act. For example, although not specifically stated, the Director apparently found that Hall and James effectively recommended pay increases for certain employees. However, the Company took exception to this finding and offered proof that all employees automatically received raises after a six-week probationary period regardless of any unsolicited recommendations by Hall and James, and that any other raises were made on the basis of the plant manager's independent judgment.

The Regional Director also apparently found that Hall and James could effectively recommend discipline of employees. In taking exception to this finding the Company offered proof that on two occasions Hall's recommendations of discipline were not followed. The Company further objects that it was not given an opportunity to respond to allegations involving James' authority to discipline employees, and asserts that any disciplinary action was based on the independent judgment of Meneley, the plant manager.

In response to the Regional Director's finding that Hall and James could direct or assign the employees, the Company contends that any direction given was with respect to routine repetitive tasks and that no assignments were made without Meneley's authorization. The Company further asserts that Hall and James could not grant time off without Meneley's approval, nor were they authorized to initial time cards.

Several other specific findings by the Regional Director were controverted by the Company and several cases were cited which, if the Company's factual allegations are correct, would support a finding that Hall and James were not supervisors. See, e. g., NLRB v. Security Guard, 384 F.2d 143 (5th Cir. 1967); Westlake United Corp., 236 N.L.R.B. No. 139, 98 L.R.R.M. 1376 (1978).

Although the Company disagrees with the Regional Director's conclusion that Hall and James are supervisors, it is not true, as the Board argues, that the Company's disagreements are limited to the Director's inferences and conclusions. The Company has specifically controverted the subsidiary factual determinations made by the Regional Director and has offered proof which, if true, would rebut the evidence presented by the Union. It is clear that the determination of James' and Hall's status required the Director to resolve these material factual disputes and credibility conflicts. "[T]his court has held that the company must be afforded the opportunity to produce evidence that might rebut testimony of union witnesses or at least subject those witnesses to the 'cleansing rigors of cross-examination.'" Beaird-Poulan v. NLRB, 571 F.2d at 434, quoting NLRB v. Commercial Letter, supra. In contrast to the present case, see N.L.R.B. v. Griffith Oldsmobile, Inc., supra, wherein the only evidence presented was by the Company, and the "sole question for the Director was, therefore, what inferences and conclusions could be drawn from their testimony." 455 F.2d at 869.

The Board's adoption of the Regional Director's findings and recommendations in the representation proceeding effectively foreclosed the Company's right to a hearing under Section 9. The only choice at that point was to refuse to bargain and raise the issues in defense of a Section 8 unfair labor practice proceeding. See NLRB v. Skelly Oil Co., 473 F.2d 1079 (8th Cir. 1973). Upon a careful examination of the record, we find that the Company has raised material and substantial factual issues entitling it to a hearing.

We therefore deny enforcement of the Board's order and remand to the Board for an evidentiary hearing.

NLRB v. Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO, and its Local Union No. 1566

662 F.2d 1044 (4th Cir.), October 16, 1981—246 NLRB 747

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Widener and Phillips, Circuit Judges, and Williams, District Judge*

1045

Per Curiam: The National Labor Relations Board petitions for enforcement of an order against the respondent International Union and its Local for a violation of § 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(1)(A). We grant enforcement pursuant to § 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e).

This case arises from the respondents' refusal to sign an agreement which would have allowed Belding Corticelli Fiberglass Fabrics Co. to rehire Mrs. Virginia Overstreet. Belding Corticelli had fired Mrs. Overstreet for violating company absentee regulations, and could not rehire her without the Unions' acquiescence. She earlier had resigned from the Unions, and this led the Administrative Law Judge to conclude that the Local's refusal to sign the agreement was improperly motivated and thus an unfair labor practice. The ALJ made his finding, however, against only the Local and not the International, after finding it significant that the allegations in the complaint listed the International and Local as "respondent" and not as "respondents."

In addition to objecting to the ALJ's order, the General Counsel petitioned the NLRB to reopen the record prior to deciding the case so as to allow introduction of the full collective bargaining agreement between the Unions and Belding Corticelli rather than only excerpts which had been introduced by agreement. The NLRB allowed the record to be reopened and subsequently concluded that both the International and Local were responsible for the violation. The International now asserts that the NLRB abused its discretion in reopening the record and that enforcement of the Board's order should be denied against the International. There is no claim that the finding of a § 8(b)(1)(A) violation against the Local is incorrect.

*United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, sitting by designation.

The NLRB's rules and regulations provide:

> Upon the filing of timely and proper exceptions, and any cross exceptions, or answering briefs, as provided in § 102.46, the Board may decide the matter forthwith upon the record, or after oral argument, or may reopen the record and receive further evidence before a member of the Board or other Board agent or agency, or may make other disposition of the case.

29 C.F.R. § 102.48(b) (1980).[1] Courts generally have shown the same deference to the NLRB as to a district court in its decisions with regard to whether to reopen the record in a particular case, and will not upset the decision of the Board in those matters absent an abuse of discretion. See e. g., NLRB v. Jacob E. Decker & Sons, Inc., 569 F.2d 357, 363 (5th Cir. 1978); NLRB v. Yale Manufacturing Co., 356 F.2d 69, 71 (1st Cir. 1966); Metal Blast, Inc. v. NLRB, 324 F.2d 602, 604 (6th Cir. 1963); cf. NLRB v. Lloyd Wood Coal Co., 585 F.2d 752, 755 (5th Cir. 1978) (court ordered NLRB to reopen record because of abuse of discretion).

In the instant case, the Board reopened the record to allow introduction of the full collective bargaining agreement which was made between the employer and the "Textile Workers Union of America, AFL-CIO." The agreement was quite relevant to the underlying question because the Unions asserted that they would not allow Mrs. Overstreet to be rehired because that would violate the collective bargaining agreement. They offered no objection when parts of the collective bargaining agreement were introduced at the hearing, and, in fact, the excerpts were offered as a joint exhibit.[2]

We note that the International was an active participant in all the proceedings below. An assistant general counsel of the International represented both the International and the Local before the NLRB, and a regional vice-president of the International represented the Local.[3] Thus, not only was the International a party to the proceeding and represented, the two International officials were fully capable of protecting any interests of the International during the proceedings. Furthermore, while the International objected to reopening of the record by the Board to allow introduction of the full collective bargaining agreement, it has made no effort to offer any evidence disputing the agency relationship between the International and the Local. In fact, the International, before this court, offers no argument that, with the collective bargaining agreement as evidence, the NLRB could not properly find such an agency relationship. In view of the facts we have stated, we are of opinion the NLRB did not abuse its discretion in reopening the record to allow introduction of the full collective bargaining agreement. There is thus no reason to overturn its finding that the International was a full party to this proceeding and jointly responsible with the Local.

Pursuant to § 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, we grant enforcement of the order below, Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union, AFL-CIO and its Local Union No. 1566, 246 NLRB No. 115 (1980).

ENFORCEMENT GRANTED.

[1] In its brief, the International refers only to § 102.48(d)(1) which applies "after the Board decision or order." See also id. § 102.48(d)(2). In this case, reopening was sought before an order or decision by the Board which relies upon § 102.48(b).

[2] The general counsel has said the full collective bargaining agreement was not introduced at the hearing in an effort to save expense and time.

[3] According to the hearing transcript, the assistant general counsel of the International was at the hearing "appearing on behalf of ACTWU and its Local 1566." The regional vice-president was "appearing on behalf of ACTWU Local 1566."

Air Express International Corporation v. NLRB

659 F.2d 610 (5th Cir.), October 19, 1981; certiorari denied October 4, 1982—245 NLRB 478

On petition to set aside Board Order

Before GODBOLD, Chief Judge, MORGAN and

Henderson, Circuit Judges

612

Godbold, Chief Judge: Air Express International ("AEI") seeks to set aside the Board's order entered against it, and the Board seeks enforcement.

AEI is engaged in the business of air freight forwarding. Until February 9, 1978 its plant serving Atlanta's airport was located in East Point, Georgia. February 10, 1978 AEI acquired nationwide all of Trans-Air Freight System, Inc.'s ("Trans-Air") air freight forwarding business and moved its own Atlanta operation to Trans-Air's Atlanta facility located seven to 10 miles away in contiguous College Park, Georgia, consolidating the two Atlanta operations.

Just two months prior to this move Truckdrivers and Helpers Local Union No. 728 ("the union") was certified as the collective bargaining representative for the non-sales personnel at AEI's East Point facility.[1] Trans-Air's College Park facility was not unionized.

This controversy centers on AEI's decision to transfer only three of its East Point nonsales personnel to the new College Park facility, thereby discharging five members of the East Point bargaining unit, and AEI's refusal to recognize the union as the representative of the College Park employees. Also at issue is the discharge of a sixth East Point employee prior to the move, the alleged failure of AEI to bargain in good faith with the union over the effects of the move, and AEI's alleged acts of interrogation, threats of reprisal, promises of benefit, solicitation of employees not to engage in union activity or to give testimony to the Board, and creation of the impression of surveillance. An administrative law judge ("ALJ") found against AEI on virtually all charges and recommended that AEI be ordered to cease and desist from the various violations of §§ 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act ("the Act"), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3) and (5), that he had found, to offer reinstatement and back pay to the six discharged East Point employees, and to post the usual notice. The Board affirmed the ALJ's findings in all particulars except one,[2] adopted the recommended order (with minor variations), and rejected AEI's contention that it had been prejudiced by any bias of the ALJ.

I.

We focus first on the discharged employees. AEI contends that the five East Point employees who were not transferred to the new College Park facility were terminated[3] because it was decided as a business matter that the company needed to break up one of the employee groups and the employees of the less profitable operation should be let go with the hope that Trans-Air's more profitable customers would be retained.[4] Thus AEI argues that it had no illegal motive, or if there were such a motive that it would have made the same decision regardless. The Board found to the contrary. Its decision is based on substantial evidence. First, there is direct testimony by a former AEI sales employee that Frank O'Rorke, AEI's district manager stationed at East Point, told her over a series of conversations that the company was not going to allow the union in Atlanta, that it was going to get rid of the employees who voted for the union, and that "those guys * * * cut their throats" by bringing in the union. Second, circumstances speak as loudly as

[1] The election was held July 28, 1977, with a 5-1 vote for the union. The Board certified the union on December 14, 1977. Guards, supervisors, and confidential and professional (i. e., sales) employees were excluded from the bargaining unit.

[2] The Board ruled that Trans-Air's station manager at College Park was not acting for AEI when he made threats of reprisal prior to consummation of AEI's acquisition of Trans-Air. We agree with this ruling. As the Board discerned, the ALJ's conclusion to the contrary was based solely on speculation.

[3] Some controversy surrounds whether John Moore, one of these five, was in fact terminated. Moore was offered a position at the new plant but only as a supervisor. Moore had previously turned down a supervisor's position at East Point because it lacked the security of tenure that his rank-and-file position possessed. He again refused a supervisor's position at College Park, and thus was terminated for a time, although he did recant and agree one month later to come back on as a supervisor. The fact that Moore was offered another position does not ameliorate AEI's discriminatory refusal to retain Moore at his current position because Moore considered the new position less desirable and because the Board found upon substantial evidence that AEI, in offering Moore only a supervisor's position, was motivated by a desire to lessen the number of rank-and-file union supporters at College Park.

[4] AEI's contention that it was motivated by the East Point employees' refusal 10 months earlier to comply with changes in their shifts patently lacks merit. Only one employee actually refused a shift change, and only one other was opposed to the changes. Moreover, at the time of opposition to the changes no employee was disciplined or reprimanded in any way except for the station manager who was fired for giving in to the one worker's protest.

these words. Of the three East Point employees retained after the move one was the station manager, one was a vocal anti-union advocate, and the third was the replacement for Nella Ree Dunn, the employee who had been discharged prior to the move. By contrast, the five employees not transferred included all of the acknowledged union organizers and supporters at the East Point facility. Elsewhere in the country when AEI consolidated its operations with Trans-Air's not a single AEI employee was discharged except for two part-time workers. We have no difficulty in holding that the Board correctly found that these terminations violated § 8(a)(3) of the Act and in enforcing the orders of reinstatement and back pay.

We also enforce the Board's decision as it relates to Nella Ree Dunn. Dunn was secretary to district manager Frank O'Rorke. She was fired July 11, 1977, two and one-half weeks before the election, because O'Rorke suspected her of being the source of leaks of salary information that were causing dissension among the employees. Later, O'Rorke asserted as additional grounds for Dunn's dismissal her incompetence and slow business. The Board found these reasons to be disingenuous. There was no direct evidence that Dunn was responsible for the leaks, they took place well before Dunn's discharge, and salary information was commonly known and was not as a general rule kept in confidence. The later asserted grounds were found to be pretextual. Thus, the Board concluded that the real reason for Dunn's discharge was that O'Rorke suspected her of supporting the union. The evidence is substantial.

In its reply brief AEI raises for the first time the argument that Dunn is not protected by the Act because she is a confidential secretary. Without deciding the validity of this legal contention,[5] we hold that the ALJ correctly found Dunn not to be a confidential secretary. O'Rorke testified that June 8, the day he received the union's election petition, all confidential duties that Dunn might have had were withdrawn from her. Thus, at the time of her discharge one month later Dunn's position was admittedly non-confidential.

II.

AEI hotly contests the order directing it to bargain with the union at its College Park facility. The Board based this order on two alternative grounds: first, that the certification obtained December 14, 1977 at the East Point facility covered the College Park employees once AEI transferred its operations there February 10, 1978; second, that a Gissel[6] order was warranted because of the severity of AEI's illegal opposition to the union.

A Gissel bargaining order is typically invoked when a union that has only informal evidence of majority status is refused recognition; the order issues because a formal election either fails or is likely to fail because of the company's commission of unfair labor practices. Bargaining orders are also appropriate where recognition is withdrawn from a union that has been formally certified as the representative of a bargaining unit. See Peoples Gas System, Inc. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 35, 46–48 (D.C.Cir. 1980) (discussing the distinction). Certification carries with it an entitlement to one year's presumptive majority status, a presumption irrebuttable absent "unusual circumstances." Brooks v. NLRB, 348 U.S. 96, 75 S.Ct. 176, 99 L.Ed. 125 (1954); NLRB v. Auto Ventshade, Inc., 276 F.2d 303 (5th Cir. 1960). If an employer fails to honor properly a union's certification, then a non-Gissel bargaining order may issue to enforce the certification. See e. g., NLRB v. Burns International Security Services, Inc., 406 U.S. 272, 278–81, 92 S.Ct. 1571, 1577–79, 32 L.Ed.2d 61 (1972); NLRB v. Louisiana Bunkers, Inc., 409 F.2d 1295 (5th Cir. 1969). If the East Point certification extends to the College Park facility, then this is a withdrawal of recognition (non-Gissel) case. If not, then College Park is uncertified and we have a refusal of recognition (Gissel) case.

A union certification applies to the intangible construct known in labor parlance as a "bargaining unit" (or simply "unit"). A unit enjoys the ephemeral attributes of not being rigidly defined by any fixed location, size, or composition of personnel. Thus, the relocation of a unit, an increase or decrease in the size of a unit, or a complete turnover within a unit alone does not require a finding that a once-certified unit has ceased to exist. See Louisi-

King Radio Corp.*, 510 F.2d 1154, 1156–57 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 839, 96 S.Ct. 68, 46 L.Ed.2d 58 (1975) (increase); *NLRB v. But as with other metaphysical categories, these mutations by degree, if severe enough, shade into mutations by kind, and may result in eradication of a unit. In such cases, where changes in the characteristics of a unit result in its being classified as either a different unit or a nonunit, "unusual circumstances" have occurred so that a company is justified in withdrawing recognition from a union during the first year of certification. See Brooks v. NLRB, 348 U.S. at 98–99, 75 S.Ct. at 178 (unusual circumstances include radical fluctuation of unit size in a short time). The courts give a wide degree of discretion to the Board in its determinations of the composition and definition of units. E. g., Vicksburg Hospital, Inc. v. NLRB, 653 F.2d 1070 at 1074–75 (5th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Foodway, 496 F.2d 117, 119 (5th Cir. 1974) (arbitrary and capricious standard); NLRB v. Baton Rouge Water Works, 417 F.2d 1065 (5th Cir. 1969) (same).

With these principles in mind, we examine the facts to determine whether the College Park unit is a continuation of the East Point unit. AEI first contends that certification does not extend to College Park because a single-plant unit is no longer appropriate as a result of AEI's reorganization of its southeastern district. The Atlanta facility once comprised a single-plant district, but upon acquisition of Trans-Air AEI's southeastern district was restructured to include Atlanta and Charlotte. AEI contends that the Board may now only aggregate the employees at the Atlanta and Charlotte facilities into one unit rather than maintaining two separate units because labor management policy is formed only at this expanded district level. We do not agree. Restructuring AEI's regions is not the kind of change that amounts to an "unusual circumstance." To hold otherwise would allow any company to avoid a certification simply by shifting its management.

AEI next contends that as the result of the relocation of its East Point facility and its consolidation with the former Trans-Air facility, the College Park plant is a "new operation" and therefore not within the East Point certification. AEI argues that because 85% of its East Point business was international air freight whereas 85% of Trans-Air's business was domestic, upon merger of the two a new amalgam was formed. The company also points to the fact that the new facility is seven to 10 miles away on the opposite side of the airport and that its staff has doubled. Other facts support the Board's conclusion. AEI at its College Park facility continues to service only the Atlanta airport, it remains only in the air freight forwarding business, and but for its discriminatory termination of six employees a substantial percentage of its College Park employee complement would consist of former East Point workers.

The authorities cited by AEI are sufficiently distinguishable on their facts that the Board is not being arbitrary or illogical in declining to follow them here. In General Electric Co., 170 NLRB 1272 (1968), the Board found that the consolidation of two plants created a new operation under facts similar to those here: the new plant was 10 miles away and the product lines of the two old plants were similar. The critical factor, though, and the one that the Board focused on, was that only half of the employees in question at the old plant that was unionized transferred to the new facility. Similarly, in Electronic Products International Corp., 208 NLRB 350 (1974), the Board found that a relocated plant was a separate unit, but only two of the seven employees at the old plant accepted transfers, and they both quit within 30 days of the move. By contrast, here, as discussed below in this section of the opinion, it is presumed that all of the employees in the East Point bargaining unit would transfer.

Bearing in mind the deference we give to the Board in the question of the composition of a bargaining unit, we hold that the Board did not err in its unit determination in this matter. NLRB v. Baton Rouge Water Works, 417 F.2d 1065 (5th Cir. 1969) is analogous. There the Board held that a small rural water company acquired by Baton Rouge Water Works was an "accretion" to the Baton Rouge bargaining unit and thus was covered by union certification at Baton Rouge. We enforced the bargaining order even though the second facility was nine miles away, serviced rural customers rather than urban, had a separate day-to-day management, and was a separate legal entity. See also NLRB v. Foodway, 496 F.2d 117 (5th Cir. 1974) (acquiring company succeeds to duty to recognize existing union despite 24 distinguishing factors); Vernon Calhoun Packing Co., Inc., 173 NLRB No. 112 (1968), enforced without opinion, 436 F.2d 588 (5th Cir. 1971) (second plant is an accretion).

So far we have pretermitted the issue of whether former East Point employees comprise a majority of the College Park bargaining unit. Employee composition at the new facility is usually the most critical factor in characterizing a relocated or merged unit. The Board found after lengthy analysis that the bargaining unit at College Park consisted of 10 employees, and that if AEI had not discriminatorily discharged six of its East Point employees, then seven[7] of these 10 would be former members of the East Point bargaining unit. AEI counters that no majority exists because three College Park employees found to be supervisors are actually rank-and-file and there is no evidence that the six employees not transferred would in fact have moved if given the opportunity.

The Board's initial characterization of three of Trans-Air's former employees as supervisors was based on substantial evidence. There is testimony that two of these three had authority to hire or fire employees and all three exercised independent judgment in directing other workers. Each was in charge of the facility during his or her shift. This satisfies the Act's definition of supervisor. See NLRB v. Alamo Express, Inc., 430 F.2d 1032 (5th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 1021, 91 S.Ct. 584, 27 L.Ed.2d 633 (1971). The Board erred, however, in confining its inquiry to what the duties of these three were on the day of the move. Shortly after the move one of these three, Susan Doyle, was reclassified to "lead agent," allegedly because it was felt that there were too many supervisors.[8] In assessing the effects of a relocation or merger of a bargaining unit, a reasonable "shake down" period may be required in order for the new unit to stabilize. Cf. NLRB v. Houston Distribution Services, Inc., 573 F.2d 260, 266 & n.7 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1047, 99 S.Ct. 722, 58 L.Ed.2d 705 (1979) (accord where issue is successorship of acquiring company). The Board failed to allow for the possibility that Doyle's reclassification was part of such stabilization. If Doyle's status were critical to our decision, we should remand for further consideration. Our assessment of the composition of the bargaining unit does not change according to her status, however, and so we simply vacate the Board's decision as to Doyle and assume arguendo that she is not a supervisor.

We are left then with a bargaining unit of 11, composed of a majority of seven former East Point employees. AEI argues though that there is no evidence that the six discharged employees would have accepted a transfer to College Park if they had been given such an opportunity, citing Fraser & Johnston Co. v. NLRB, 469 F.2d 1259, 1264 (9th Cir. 1972) and Cooper Thermometer Co. v. NLRB, 376 F.2d 684, 689 (2d Cir. 1967). In the circumstances of this case, however, the Board is not required to affirmatively demonstrate that each discharged employee would have transferred absent his or her illegal termination. The Board may rely on the presumption that discriminatorily discharged employees remain on with the company. See NLRB v. Fabsteel Co., 587 F.2d 689, 695 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 442 U.S. 943, 99 S.Ct. 2887, 61 L.Ed.2d 313 (1979); NLRB v. Houston Distribution Services, Inc., 573 F.2d 260, 267 (5th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1047, 99 S.Ct. 722, 58 L.Ed.2d 705 (1979). The policy that gives rise to this presumption of continued employment is that a violator of the Act should not be allowed to benefit from its wrongdoing by placing the difficult burden on the Board of proving how individual employees might have acted under hypothetical circumstances. NLRB v. A. W. Thompson, Inc., 449 F.2d 1333, 1337 (5th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1065, 92 S.Ct. 1497, 31 L.Ed.2d 795 (1972).

The critical factor that distinguishes this case from those cited by AEI is that here the failure to transfer the employees in question was itself a violation of the Act. For example, in both Cooper Thermometer v. NLRB, 376 F.2d 684 (2d Cir. 1967) and Fraser v. Johnston, 469 F.2d 1259 (9th Cir. 1972), the courts refused bargaining orders because there had been no affirmative showing that a majority of employees at a relocated plant came from the old unionized plant, even though the relocation was accompanied by unfair labor practices. In both cases, however, the labor violations did not involve unlawful terminations but merely failure to bargain over the effects of the relocation. Without adopting the reasoning of these cases, we note that there is much less reason in such cases to presume that employees who did not transfer would have done so absent the particular violations.[9] [7] The seventh is Kathy Lee, the anti-union employee who was transferred.

[8] In addition to these three contested supervisors there were three other employees with the title of supervisor.

Relying on this presumption, we find there is substantial evidence to support the finding that the six discharged employees would have transferred to College Park absent their discharge, particularly since AEI has failed to develop any evidence to the contrary.[10] We hold, then, that the Board's determination of the size and composition of the College Park bargaining unit, although possibly flawed in one respect, is correct so far as is necessary for us to affirm the finding of continuation.

To summarize our reasoning with regard to the Board's bargaining order, in this case a certified bargaining unit has been merged and relocated and employees have been discriminatorily discharged in the process. Because the move was over a relatively short distance the Board could presume that the discharged employees would have transferred but for their termination, and that presumption has not been rebutted. We thus view the College Park bargaining unit as being composed of a majority of workers from the East Point plant, and this fact along with others adequately supports the Board's conclusion that College Park is a continuation of East Point.[11] Because the union has not enjoyed its full year of certification, we enforce the Board's bargaining order (as modified below). We need not address whether a Gissel order would be appropriate in this case.

III.

We come now to the findings of the Board that AEI was in violation of § 8(a)(5) for failing to bargain in good faith over the effects of the relocation.

The union and AEI met on three occasions to discuss the effects of the move. The Board found upon substantial evidence that at these meetings AEI improperly refused to supply the union a copy of its acquisition agreement with Trans-Air, that AEI's list of Trans-Air personnel given to the union was somewhat incomplete and inaccurate, and that AEI misrepresented its position by stating that it intended to terminate all East Point employees when in fact it intended to transfer Kathy Lee. We hold that these findings support the Board's order insofar as AEI is required to furnish to the union complete employee information and a copy of the acquisition agreement and is required to bargain in good faith in the future. The Board erred, however, in using the date of AEI's first failure to bargain in complete good faith (January 4, 1978) as the measure of the date to which its bargaining order was to be retroactive. The violations of § 8(a)(5) outlined above do not amount to a withdrawal of recognition. It was not until February 11, 1978, one day after the move, that AEI refused to recognize the union as the representative of its College Park plant. This date should measure the bargaining order because the union

[9] We note also that the presumption might not arise where a plant is relocated to an entirely different metropolitan area. For example, in Local 57, International Ladies' Garment Workers v. NLRB, 374 F.2d 295 (D.C. Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 980, 89 S.Ct. 2129, 23 L.Ed.2d 767 (1969), the court held that a bargaining order would not issue where a plant was moved to Miami from New York, but the court observed that this remedy has been used "where the move was of such a short distance that the Board could assume that, absent the unfair labor practices, workers would have followed the employer to the new site." Id. at 303.

[10] In a Gissel order case majority status is to be determined at the time the order issues. NLRB v. American Cable Systems, Inc., 427 F.2d 446 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 957, 91 S.Ct. 356, 27 L.Ed.2d 266 (1970). In this non-Gissel case, however, the composition of the bargaining unit is to be determined at the time of the relocation (or after a reasonable shake down period). Otherwise, the rule would be contrary to principles of fair play, see NLRB v. Auto Ventshade, Inc., 276 F.2d 303, 307 (5th Cir. 1960), and would create an undesirable incentive to delay through litigation. The difference exists between the two rules because in a Gissel case the issue is whether an extraordinary remedy is warranted while in this non-Gissel case the issue is simply whether the certification is to be given continued effect.

[11] We note that a majority of former workers at a new facility is not necessary to find a continuation of a bargaining unit after merger and relocation if other factors strongly support this conclusion, see Westwood Import Co., 251 NLRB No. 162 (1980) (the Board's practice in relocation cases accompanied by unfair labor practices has been that if "a majority or some significant portion of the unit employees at the new location" would have been from the old location but for such practices, then a bargaining order has issued) (emphasis added), nor would a majority be sufficient if these other factors were lacking, for instance if the business of the new plant were entirely different from that of the former. In each situation the issue remains whether in the light of all the facts the bargaining unit remains the "same" or is now a "different" one. We note also that whereas in simple relocation cases the Board has treated the employee composition factor as the determinative one, see Westwood, where a relocation is coupled with a merger and thus somewhat altered operations and structure, as here, the inquiry is more complex.

enjoyed effective recognition from December 14 when it was certified until February 11. We therefore vacate the Board's bargaining order and remand with directions to modify the order so as to allow the union to enjoy certified representative status only for the remainder of its certified year.[12]

IV.

We enforce the Board's order as relevant to the remainder of miscellaneous violations of the Act. Based on substantial evidence, the Board found that AEI discriminatorily threatened to withhold raises from some employees while granting and promising raises to others all in order to discourage union activity and weaken the pro-union majority, that AEI threatened employees with various other reprisals because of their support of the union, and that AEI created the impression of surveillance and otherwise interfered with the freedom of employee's union activities by interrogating employees about such activities, by warning of "harassment" from Board agents, and by soliciting employees not to testify before the Board.

Finally, we agree with the Board that there is not evidence of bias sufficient to reject the ALJ's findings.

ENFORCED in part, VACATED in part, and REMANDED in part with directions to modify.

[12] Thereafter, of course, the certification will remain in effect but subject to rebuttal or good faith doubt.

NLRB v. Mar-Len Cabinets, Inc.

659 F.2d 995 (9th Cir.), October 19, 1981—234 NLRB 523

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before BROWNING, Chief Judge, ALARCON, Circuit Judge, and HAUK,* District Judge

996

PER CURIAM: Prior to 1977, respondent Mar-Len Cabinets, Inc. was a non-party signatory to two master collective bargaining agreements between the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America and two employer associations, the first covering employees installing cabinets at various construction jobsites (the "outside agreement"), and the second covering employees manufacturing cabinets at respondent's shop (the "inside agreement").

When the master agreements expired, respondent sought to negotiate separate more favorable agreements with the union. The negotiations broke down. The union brought an unfair labor practice charge alleging respondent had violated § 8(a)(1) & (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) & (5), by instituting unilateral changes in the wages and working conditions of outside employees without first complying with the notice requirements of Section 8(d) of the Act, and by bargaining in bad faith with respect to a new inside agreement.

The National Labor Relations Board found in favor of the union, and now seeks enforcement of its order. We deny enforcement to the extent the order is based on a finding that respondent violated the notice provisions of the Act, but enforce it in other respects.

I. THE OUTSIDE AGREEMENT

The agreement between respondent and the union provided that a party desiring to change or cancel the agreement must give written notice to the other 60 days before the agreement expired. By letter dated March 4, 1977 Respondent informed the Union that it did not wish to continue to be bound by the master outside agreement, due to expire June 15, 1977. No notice was sent to state or Federal mediation services. No negotiations followed.

On March 22, 1977, the union notified the employer association parties to the master outside agreement that it wished to reopen the agreement. Copies of this notice were sent to state and Federal mediation services. A new master agreement was negotiated between the union and the employer associations. Respondent did not participate in these negotiations.

The union subsequently informed respondent that it considered respondent bound by the newly negotiated master agreement. The union took the position that respondent's March 4th notice was ineffective because respondent had not notified the mediation services. Respondent told the union it did not consider itself bound by the new master agreement and sought to initiate negotiations for a separate agreement. The union refused to negotiate.

On August 8, 1977, respondent notified state and Federal mediation services that a labor dispute existed. On August 19, 1977, respondent unilaterally adopted its proposed contract changes, raising the wages of its outside employees and abolishing union security.

The Board found respondent had violated its duty to bargain collectively under Section 8(a)(5), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5), by terminating the agreement without continuing its terms for 60 days after notifying the mediation services of the dispute, as required by Section 8(d), 29 U.S.C. § 158(d).[1]

Respondent challenges the Board's order on four grounds.

1. Respondent contends it was not required to wait 60 days after giving the 8(d)(3) notice before implementing its bargaining proposals because the waiting period is required only before a strike or lockout. Section 8(d)(4) provides that the party desiring to modify the contract continue "in full force and effect * * * all the terms and conditions of the existing contract * * *" until the waiting period has passed. 29 U.S.C. § 158(d)(4). This wording plainly prohibits a unilateral departure from the terms of the contract whether or not a strike or lockout follows, as the Senate Committee report on § 8(d) confirms: "Should the notice not be given on time * * * it becomes an unfair labor practice for an employer to change any of the terms or conditions specified in the contract for 60 days or to lock out his employees. Similarly, it is an unfair labor practice by a union to strike before the expiration of the 60-day period." S.Rep. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st Sess. 24 (1947) (emphasis added), reprinted in 1 NLRB, Legislative History of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 407, 430 (1948).

2. Respondent asserts the union's absolute refusal to bargain on the outside agreement relieved respondent of any obligation to bargain collectively, including any duty to notify the mediation services.

Respondent relies upon the dictum in Times Publishing Co., 72 NLRB 676, 683 (1947) that "a union's refusal to bargain in good faith may remove the possibility of negotiation and thus preclude the existence of a situation in which the employer's own good faith can be tested." The notice provision is not concerned with "good faith"; it is designed to give the mediation services time to intervene before disruptive economic action is taken by one of the parties. Amax Coal Co. v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 872, 889 (3d Cir. 1980). This purpose would be hindered, not served, if the duty to give notice disappeared when the non-initiating party refused to bargain. It is in just such a case that the need for mediation may be most pressing.

3. Respondent contends that by rejecting its cancellation notice the union became the "initiating party," and thus bore the burden of giving notice. Section 8(d) provides that "no party to [a collective-bargaining] contract shall terminate or modify such contract, unless the party desiring such termination or modification . . . (3) notifies the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(d) & (d)(3). This language places the burden of notifying the agencies on the first party seeking to terminate or modify the contractual arrangement. United Furniture Workers of America v. NLRB, 336 F.2d 738, 741 (D.C.Cir. 1964). The union's refusal to agree to the modification desired by respondent did not affect this obligation. Respondent's contention, like the argument rejected in United Furniture Workers, is to the:

---

[1] Section 8(d) provides in relevant part:

[W]here there is in effect a collective-bargaining contract covering employees in an industry affecting commerce, the duty to bargain collectively shall also mean that no party to such contract shall terminate or modify such contract, unless the party desiring such termination or modification—

(1) serves a written notice upon the other party to the contract of the proposed termination or modification sixty days prior to the expiration date thereof, or in the event such contract contains no expiration date, sixty days prior to the time it is proposed to make such termination or modification;

(2) offers to meet and confer with the other party for the purpose of negotiating a new contract or a contract containing the proposed modifications;

(3) notifies the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service within thirty days after such notice of the existence of a dispute, and simultaneously therewith notifies any State or Territory agency established to mediate and conciliate disputes within the State or Territory where the dispute occurred, provided no agreement has been reached by that time; and effect that the burden shifts in accordance with the twistings and turnings of the bargaining negotiations. Such a construction seems to us, however, to be fraught in the highest degree with the peril that the public interest in the emollient intervention of the mediation services will fall between the two stools of contending parties wholly intent upon the uncertain—and frequently fluctuating—fortunes of their negotiating positions. It is a peril which can be avoided by assigning a fixed and definite responsibility for notifying the public agencies. Congress has made that assignment and, not surprisingly, it is to the party who starts the process.

4. Finally, respondent argues it was relieved of its duty to notify the services because the union had already notified them. The Board's response is that the initiating party's duty to mail the required notices is absolute and can not be shifted.

The cases cited by the Board are not in point. They hold only that the initiating party must bear the adverse consequences if no notice is given, or the notice given is untimely. No court has held that the initiating party must send a second notice when the non-initiating party has already notified the mediation agencies.

Congress' principle concern in enacting Section 8(d) was to give the mediation services time to intervene in an effective manner. This goal would not be advanced by requiring the initiating party to give notice after the other party had done so.

The initiating party remains at risk, however, if the notice sent by the other party was ineffective to apprise the mediation services of the particular dispute. Amax Coal Co. v. NLRB, supra, 614 F.2d at 889. The Board did not reach this issue because it concluded that respondent's duty to notify could not be affected by any union notification. Therefore we will remand the case to the Board so it can rule on the effectiveness of the notification given to the mediation services by the union.

II. THE INSIDE AGREEMENT

A. Withdrawal of Recognition.

The Board found respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by unlawfully withdrawing recognition from the union and thereafter refusing to bargain with the union.

The union enjoyed a rebuttable presumption of majority support, NLRB v. Tahoe Nugget, Inc., 584 F.2d 293, 297 (9th Cir. 1978), and respondent's withdrawal of recognition established a prima facie case of unlawful refusal to bargain. NLRB v. Top Manufacturing Co., 594 F.2d 223, 224 (9th Cir. 1979). Respondent could rebut this presumption by showing either that the union had in fact lost its majority status or that its withdrawal of recognition was based upon a good faith doubt of the union's continued majority status. Ibid. The Board found respondent did not meet its burden.

Respondent points out that none of the employees joined in the picket line established by the union and that four of the six inside employees resigned from the union and returned to work. In addition, some employees expressed dissatisfaction with the union's failure to report bargaining developments and to respond to questions about the consequences of working behind the picket line. However, there was sufficient evidence supporting the Board's conclusions that the employees resigned from the union to avoid potential fines, not to oust the union as a bargaining representative, and that they crossed the picket line and returned to work as a means of preserving a continuity of income because of economic necessity, and not because they rejected union representation. See NLRB v. Top Manufacturing Co., 594 F.2d 223, 224–25 (9th Cir. 1979). The board was also justified in concluding that the expressions of dissatisfaction, taken in context, did not indicate repudiation of the union but only displeasure with the union's handling of the bargaining negotiations. Ibid.

The Board also concluded respondent's doubt of the union's majority status was not asserted in good faith. "Reasonable doubt as to majority status must only be asserted in good faith and may not be raised in the context of an employer's activities aimed at causing disaffection from the Union." Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 730 (9th Cir. 1980). The record supports the Board's finding that the resignations from the Union were a direct result of respondent's failure to fulfill its statutory obligation to bargain in good faith.

B. Failure to Bargain in Good Faith.

The Board found that "[r]espondent failed to bargain in good faith concerning the terms and conditions of employment for employees in the inside unit." This finding is supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole.

Respondent claims it was willing to negotiate further over its proposals, but "the strike ended the bargaining." See Neon Sign Corp. v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 1203, 1205 (5th Cir. 1979). Respondent, however, took the initiative in cancelling the last bargaining session, claiming the union had lost its majority support. We agree with the Board that "if the negotiations became truncated in a manner depriving Respondent of a full opportunity to bargain over non-economic matters, the fault lies primarily with Respondent."

The Board based its finding of bad faith upon the conclusion that respondent made proposals "with the object in mind of forcing a breakdown in negotiations." Respondent proposed an extremely strong "management rights" package that would have required the union effectively to abrogate its representation of the employees. Respondent proposed to establish a no-strike/no-picket policy; to abolish union security, the right of union representatives to visit the plant, and super-seniority for shop stewards; to deny the employees' rights to arbitration of grievances and to respect picket lines; and to relieve respondent of its duties to notify the union of new hiring, to hire first through the union hiring hall, and to contribute to the union pension fund.

We should be cautious in inferring motivation from proposal content since " '[t]here are too many reasons why an employer who is willing to contract with a union might wish to * * * maintain an open shop' " K-Mart Corp. v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 704, 706 (9th Cir. 1980) (quoting Cox, The Duty to Bargain in Good Faith, 71 Harv.L.Rev. 1401, 1419 (1958)). Nevertheless, proposal content supports an inference of intent to frustrate agreement where, as here, the entire spectrum of proposals put forward by a party is so consistently and predictably unpalatable to the other party that the proposer should know agreement is impossible.

Although the respondent proferred economic justifications in support of its "management rights" package, the Board found "the cost implications were so theoretical and marginal as to be pretextual." The economic justification offered in support of respondent's proposal to delete the union-security clause is illustrative. Respondent contended that the union was applying the clauses in an unlawful manner, and that retention of the clause could be expected to lead to litigation, and thus expense, for respondent. There was no convincing documentation showing that the union was applying the clause in an illegal manner. We have reviewed the record and agree with the Board that respondent was "grasping at straws" in speculating over the potential litigation cost of retaining the clause. These circumstances supported an inference of bad faith. "Patently improbable justifications for a bargaining position will support an inference that the position is not maintained in good faith. By the same token, 'adhering to an untenable legal position during the course of negotiations is inconsistent with the obligation to bargain in good faith.' " Queen Mary Restaurants Corp. v. NLRB, 560 F.2d 403, 409 (9th Cir. 1977) (quoting Fraser & Johnston Co. v. NLRB, 469 F.2d 1259, 1263 (9th Cir. 1972)).

The finding that the respondent did not bargain with the intent of reaching an agreement is also supported by events surrounding the withdrawal of recognition. When the union called a strike, respondent advised several employees they would have to resign from the union to return to work. Respondent typed a letter of resignation for one employee and furnished postage and mailed letters of resignation for two others. Contrary to respondent's contention, these events occurred prior to the last bargaining session at which respondent withdrew recognition.

Finally, the Board relied upon respondent's "declared objective of going 'nonunion.' " The Board found this "declaration" in a letter written by respondent to the union shortly before the master agreement expired. The letter stated, "we do not wish to continue in the union, however we are willing to sit at the bargaining table and bargain with you if you wish." Although the letter is ambiguous, we cannot say the Board's interpretation is improbable, especially in light of subsequent events. Accordingly, the Board properly considered the letter as evidence of bad faith.

ENFORCEMENT is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part, and the case REMANDED in part to the Board for further preceedings in accordance with this opinion.

ERVIN Circuit Judge: The Edward J. DeBartolo Corporation (DeBartolo) petitions this court to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) dismissing a complaint alleging that the handbilling activity of the Florida Gulf Coast Building Trades Council, AFL-CIO (the Union) at one of DeBartolo's shopping malls violated federal labor laws. Upon review, we deny the petition.

I. Background

DeBartolo, an Ohio corporation doing business in several states,[1] owns and operates East Lake Square Mall in Tampa, Florida. The mall is fairly large, having over eighty tenants, and it is with one of its larger tenants—the H. J. Wilson Company, Inc. (Wilson's)—that this labor dispute had its origins.

DeBartolo entered into a land lease with Wilson's, whereby Wilson's agreed to build a department store in the mall. Wilson's in turn hired H. J. High Construction Company (High) to construct the store. After construction had commenced, the Union became embroiled in a primary labor dispute with High over the payment of allegedly substandard wages and the provision of inadequate benefits to its employees. In order to publicize its discontent with the situation, the Union handbilled at the entrances to the mall in late 1979 and early 1980, ceasing only after the issuance of an injunction by a Florida state court. The Union passed out the handbills in an orderly manner and did not picket.

The handbills, requesting a total consumer boycott of the mall, read:

> PLEASE DON'T SHOP AT EAST LAKE SQUARE MALL PLEASE
> The FLA. GULF COAST BUILDING TRADES COUNCIL, AFL-CIO is requesting that you do not shop at the stores in the East Lake Square Mall because of The Mall ownership's contribution to substandard wages.
> The Wilson's Department Store under construction on these premises is being built by contractors who pay substandard wages and fringe benefits. In the past, the Mall's owner, The Edward J. DeBartolo Corporation, has supported labor and our local economy by insuring that the Mall and its stores be built by contractors who pay fair wages and fringe benefits. Now, however, and for no apparent reason, the Mall owners have taken a giant step backwards by permitting our standards to be torn down. The payment of substandard wages not only diminishes the working person's ability to purchase with earned, rather than borrowed, dollars, but it also undercuts the wage standard of the entire community. Since low construction wages at this time of inflation means decreased purchasing power, do the owners of East Lake Mall intend to compensate for the decreased purchasing power of workers of the community by encouraging the stores in East Lake Mall to cut their prices and lower their profits?

267

> CUT-RATE WAGES ARE NOT FAIR UNLESS MERCHANDISE PRICES ARE ALSO CUT-RATE.
> We ask for your support in our protest against substandard wages. Please do not patronize the stores in the East Lake Square Mall until the Mall's owner publicly promises that all construction at the Mall will be done using contractors who pay their employees fair wages and fringe benefits.
> IF YOU MUST ENTER THE MALL TO DO BUSINESS, please express to the store managers

*The Honorable W. Earl Britt, United States District Judge for the Eastern District of North Carolina, sitting by designation.

[1] This court has jurisdiction pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(f), as DeBartolo "transacts business" in Maryland by virtue of the operation of a mall and a shopping center there.

> your concern over substandard wages and your support of our efforts.
> We are appealing only to the public—the consumer. We are not seeking to induce any person to cease work or to refuse to make deliveries.

A few days after the Union commenced its handbilling, DeBartolo filed unfair labor practice charges. The Board's General Counsel then issued a complaint alleging that the handbilling urged a secondary boycott in violation of section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(ii)(B), which makes it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, when an object thereof is to force or require any person to cease doing business with any other person. The Union filed a timely response denying commission of an unfair labor practice, and upon joint motion of the parties, a hearing before an Administrative Law Judge was waived, with the Board making findings and conclusions upon a stipulated record.

The Board dismissed the complaint on the ground that the activity came within the ambit of the statute's "publicity proviso," which exempts from the statute's proscription > publicity, other than picketing, for the purpose of truthfully advising the public, including consumers and members of a labor organization, that a product or products are produced by an employer with whom the labor organization has a primary dispute and are distributed by another employer, as long as such publicity does not have an effect of inducing any individual employed by any person other than the primary employer in the course of his employment to refuse to pick up, deliver, or transport any goods, or not to perform any services, at the establishment of the employer engaged in such distribution[.] 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4).

Observing that no allegations had been made that the handbilling had the unlawful effect of inducing any individual employed by anyone other than High to refuse to work and concluding that the record established that the handbills were truthful and that the statutory requirement of a "producer-distributor" relationship had been met, the Board determined that the handbilling was protected publicity. On appeal DeBartolo raises three arguments against the Board's conclusions, each of which will be considered in turn.[2]

II. Truthfulness of the Handbills

DeBartolo first argues that the publicity proviso cannot shield the handbilling because one of the prerequisites to its application is that the message conveyed be truthful. The message of the handbills was untruthful, DeBartolo asserts, in three instances: (1) it urged a consumer boycott of all the stores in the mall, including those that were totally neutral; (2) it gave the erroneous impression that High was a "producer" of the products of DeBartolo and the mall's tenants other than Wilson's; and (3) it failed to identify High, the primary employer, by name.

These arguments were raised in briefs submitted to the Board, and the Board concluded that the first two contentions addressed legal issues unrelated to the truthfulness requirement and relevant instead to the proviso's "producer-distributor" requirement. We agree and hold our discussion of those issues in abeyance for Part III of the opinion.

The third contention the Board found relevant. It concluded, however, that the Union did not substantially depart from fact or intend to deceive by omitting High's name when it stated that it believed that Wilson's department store was being built by "contractors who pay substandard wages and fringe benefits." In so concluding, the Board relied upon the truthfulness test it had set forth in Local 537, International Brotherhood of Teamsters (Lohman Sales Co.), 132 N.L.R.B. 901, 906 (1961), in which it stated that the publicity proviso "does not require that a handbiller be an insurer that the content of the handbill is 100 per cent correct, and that where * * * there is no evidence of an intent to deceive and there has not been a substantial departure from fact, the requirements of the proviso are met."

The Board correctly applied the Lohman Sales standard to the facts of this case. Omission of [2] DeBartolo states in its brief that the Wilson's store has been completed and that High is no longer performing work at this location. We do not, however, consider the case moot. In labor cases, cessation of the challenged conduct does not assure that the underlying controversy will not be reopened or that the challenged conduct will not reoccur. See NLRB v. Raytheon Co., 398 U.S. 25, 90 S.Ct. 1547, 26 L.Ed.2d 21 (1970); Pet, Inc. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 545, 545 n.1 (8th Cir. 1981).

High's name in the handbill is, standing alone, not evidence of an intent on the Union's part to deceive the public about the labor dispute and does not, in any sense, depart from fact. Indeed, to hold otherwise would be tantamount to imposition of a per se requirement that the name or names of primary employer or employers appear in the handbills. This we will not do, in light of the Board's reluctance to make the statutory truthfulness requirement more stringent than its current expression in Lohman Sales and the dubious benefits to the public of such a rule. We therefore uphold the Board's conclusion that the handbill's message was a truthful one.[3]

III. Producer-Distributor Relationship

The second argument advanced by DeBartolo is that the publicity proviso did not protect the handbilling because the producer-distributor relationship required by the proviso did not exist between High and DeBartolo, and DeBartolo and the mall's tenants; it asserts that only the relationship between High and Wilson's can qualify as one between a producer and a distributor. We disagree and uphold the Board's conclusion that this relational requirement was fulfilled.

The proviso protects truthful publicity that advises the public "that a product or products are produced by an employer with whom the labor organization has a primary dispute and are distributed by another employer." In considering the proviso's producer-distributor requirement in the context of this case, the Board first traced the mutually beneficial relationship between, and interdependence of, DeBartolo and the mall's tenants, as evidenced by the terms of their lease agreements. It found that each tenant agreed to use its premises in a way that would not injure the mall's reputation or interfere with other tenants' businesses; that each tenant had to pay its share of the operating, maintenance, and repair costs for the mall's common areas, with its share to be reduced every time a new tenant moved in; that a tenant's minimum rent would increase by ten per cent when new department stores of certain size opened at the mall; that each tenant was required to join the mall's merchants' association and to take part in joint advertising projects; that DeBartolo would share in the commercial success of the mall by collecting from tenants percentage rents based on sales; and that DeBartolo had the right to exercise control over tenants' construction work, business hours, employees, signs, and equipment.

The terms of the lease agreements, in the Board's judgment, reflected "the symbiotic nature of the relationship between DeBartolo and its tenants." The symbiosis, in turn, supported the Board's conclusion that not only the High-Wilson's relationship but also the High-DeBartolo relationship and the relationship between High and the mall's tenants could be described as that of producer and distributor.

The Board concluded that High is a producer of the Wilson's store at the mall because, by its employees' labor, it adds value to the store. High is also a producer of the mall enterprise itself because, by helping to build the Wilson's store, it has applied capital, enterprise, and service to the mall enterprise and has thus added value to that enterprise. Both the Wilson's store and the mall enterprise itself, therefore, are products of High's labor.

Although the Board does not elaborate, its reasoning suggests that it considered DeBartolo and the mall's tenants to be distributors of both of High's products. DeBartolo and the tenants help "distribute" the new Wilson's store and its inventory by attracting shoppers, helping to maintain common areas, and participating in joint advertising. They help "distribute" the mall enterprise and the goods sold through that enterprise simply by conducting business.

In reviewing the Board's resolution of the producer-distributor issue, which presents mixed questions of law and fact, we are mindful of the limitations upon that review; we are to "accord great respect to the expertise of the Board when its conclusions [on a mixed question of fact and law] are rationally based on articulated facts and consistent with the Act." NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444

[3] Board Member Penello dissented from the Board's decision in this case because he found the stipulated record to be an insufficient basis upon which to decide the question of the handbill's truthfulness. He would have remanded the proceeding for a hearing on what he perceived to be factual questions surrounding the truthfulness issue.

We think that the Board majority acted properly in determining the issue. Application of the Lohman Sales test in this case required only legal determinations, i. e., whether omission of High's name from the handbill was evidence of intent to deceive, and whether the omission represented a substantial departure from fact. Remand was therefore not necessary.

U.S. 672, 691, 100 S.Ct. 856, 867, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980). The Board's construction of a labor statute, if reasonably defensible, moreover, should not be rejected merely because the courts might prefer another view of the statute. Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 497, 99 S.Ct. 1842, 1849, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979), citing NLRB v. Local Union No. 103, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, 434 U.S. 335, 350, 98 S.Ct. 651, 660, 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978). Indeed, that construction is entitled to considerable deference. NLRB v. Local Union No. 103, International Association of Bridge, Structural and Iron Workers, 434 U.S. at 350, 98 S.Ct. at 660. With these cautionary instructions in mind, we conclude that the Board's reasoned conclusions on the meaning and application of the producer-distributor language are rational and consistent with the proviso language. See NLRB v. Yeshiva University, 444 U.S. 672, 100 S.Ct. 856, 63 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980).

Board and judicial interpretation of the producer-distributor language, based in large part upon the legislative history of the proviso, clearly indicates that the language is not to be read literally but instead is to be broadly construed. In its leading decision Lohman Sales, the Board concluded that a wholesale distributor of cigarettes and other commodities—a middleman—was a producer of those goods within the meaning of the proviso because it added the value of its labor to these goods in the form of capital, enterprise, and service. In reaching that conclusion, the Board reviewed the legislative history of the proviso and decided that the words "product" and "produced" were not meant to be words of special limitation. Rather, it concluded that labor is the key characteristic of one who produces and, accordingly, that the Board need not attempt "to draw an uncertain line between those employers engaged essentially or only incidentally in the fabrication of products; between those employers who create a new product or embellish an old one; between products of the imagination and those that can be seen, touched, or smelled." 132 N.L.R.B. at 907. See Local No. 662, Radio and Television Engineers (Middle South Broadcasting Co.), 133 N.L.R.B. 1698 (1961) (radio station is producer of products it advertises).

The Supreme Court approved the Lohman Sales decision and rationale in NLRB v. Servette, Inc., 377 U.S. 46, 84 S.Ct. 1098, 12 L.Ed.2d 121 (1964). The Servette Court reviewed the legislative history of the proviso and the Board's Lohman Sales decision and concluded that Servette, as a wholesale distributor of specialty merchandise stocked by food chains, was a producer of that merchandise for purposes of application of the publicity proviso. In so holding, the Court noted that

> [t]he proviso was the outgrowth of a profound Senate concern that the unions' freedom to appeal to the public for support of their case be adequately safeguarded * * *. It would fall far short of achieving this basic purpose if the proviso applied only in situations where the union's labor dispute is with the manufacturer or processor * * *. There is nothing in the legislative history which suggests that the protection of the proviso was intended to be any narrower in coverage than the prohibition to which it is an exception, and we see no basis for attributing such an incongruous purpose to Congress. Id. 377 U.S. at 55, 84 S.Ct. at 1104.[4]

Other courts have applied the Servette rationale to give the proviso a similarly expansive scope. See, e.g., Great Western Broadcasting Corp. v. NLRB, 356 F.2d 434 (9th Cir. 1966) (television station, by virtue of its advertisement of goods and services, was a producer of those goods and services, even though court found incongruous the idea of a service being a product which is distributed).

These decisions—handed down soon after the 1959 passage of the proviso—quite clearly show that the proviso's producer-distributor language was not to be given a narrow or literal construction, for such an interpretation would often defeat its clear purpose of protecting labor's ability to publicize by means other than picketing its grievances to consumers. Economic realities made a broad reading necessary; employees work not only to produce tangible products but also to provide services and to add value to goods not directly produced by them.

[4] As the Court made clear in Servette and in the companion case NLRB v. Fruit and Vegetable Packers and Warehousemen, Local 760 (Tree Fruits), 377 U.S. 58, 84 S.Ct. 1063, 12 L.Ed.2d 129 (1964), the publicity proviso resulted from a compromise between the House of Representatives and the Senate in amending section 8(b)(4) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4), in 1959. The proviso was incorporated into the statute, even though it protected some coercive activity, because of the Senate's concern that the right of unions to exercise free speech and to appeal to the public be protected and that the revised section 8(b)(4) not offend the first amendment. When the Senate passed the compromise bill, Senator John Kennedy, who had presided over the conference committee, stated that the proviso preserved the right to appeal to consumers by methods other than picketing asking them to refrain from buying goods made by nonunion labor and to refrain from trading with a retailer who sells such goods.

> * * * We were not able to persuade the House conferees to permit picketing in front of that secondary shop, but we were able to persuade them to agree that the union shall be free to conduct informational activity short of picketing. In other words, the union can hand out handbills at the shop * * * and carry on all publicity short of having ambulatory picketing * * *. 105 Cong.Rec. 17898–99 (1959).

In no area has a generous interpretation of the language been more necessary than in the construction industry, as a construction company obviously does not produce tangible goods that are then literally distributed by a secondary employer. The Board has, accordingly, given liberal interpretation to the proviso in this context and has consistently held that construction contractors and subcontractors are producers within the meaning of the proviso and that their services are products, see Plumbers and Pipefitters Local Union No. 142 (Shop-Rite Foods, Inc.), 133 N.L.R.B. 307 (1961); Local 712, IBEW (Golden Dawn Foods), 134 N.L.R.B. 812 (1961), and that they are also producers of the "end product" to which their services contribute. See Local 73, Electrical Workers Union (Northwestern Construction of Washington, Inc.), 134 N.L.R.B. 498 (1961).[5]

As labor cases involving shopping center construction arose, the Board continued to give broad definition to the producer-distributor language of the proviso. In Local Union No. 54, Sheet Metal Workers (Sakowitz, Inc.), 174 N.L.R.B. 362 (1969), the Board held that a union's handbilling of certain downtown stores was protected under the proviso. The handbills asked for a consumer boycott of those stores because the heating and air conditioning subcontractor at a suburban shopping center at which the stores had leased space was paying substandard wages. The Board's conclusion allowed the stores to be handbilled even though they themselves had not hired the subcontractor and had no relationship with it except to pay for its services as part of their monthly rent. In Nashville Building & Construction Trades Council (Castner-Knott Dry Goods Store), 188 N.L.R.B. 470 (1971), the Board reasoned in similar fashion. In that case, simultaneous picketing and handbilling at a downtown store urging a consumer boycott because of that store's contract with an out-of-state nonunion construction company to build a new store for it at a shopping mall was held to be illegal secondary activity. Handbills had been earlier distributed at that store and others which planned to locate at the mall, however, requesting that consumers boycott those stores because the mall's owner had hired nonunion contractors to construct the mall, and no argument was made that those handbills were outside the scope of the proviso. In these shopping center cases it can be inferred that the construction contractors and subcontractors were producers of a certain work product and that the shopping center's stores were distributors of that product and thus could be handbilled by unions urging a total boycott of their businesses.

In light of precedent, the Board's interpretation and application in this case of the publicity proviso is clearly consistent with the Act and is rational. High produces certain products, i. e., the Wilson's store and the mall enterprise, and those products are in turn distributed by DeBartolo and the mall tenants, all of whom had a financial interest in High's work but had no direct relationship with High. That DeBartolo and the mall tenants are not involved in the primary dispute between High and Wilson's does not alter the conclusion: it was clearly Congress's intent to allow coercive pressure of neutral employers in the forms of union handbilling of consumers and other pure publicity. See NLRB v. Fruit and Vegetable Packers and Warehousemen, Local 760, 377 U.S. at 69–70, 84 S.Ct. at 1069–70. Furthermore, that High had no contract with either DeBartolo or the mall tenants is not of major significance; the handbilling should be protected under the publicity proviso even when there is no direct connection between the primary employer and the handbilled employer. See, e.g., Local Union No. 54, Sheet Metal Workers (Sakowitz, Inc.), 174 N.L.R.B. 362 (1969). High thus does not have to be contractually related to DeBartolo and the mall's tenants for DeBartolo and the tenants to be able to respond to union handbilling and, in turn, to apply pressure on Wilson's and High. We therefore uphold the Board's conclusion that the proviso's requirement of a producer-distributor relationship was met in this case.[6] [5] In a different procedural setting, a district court has reasoned in like manner and refused to enjoin handbilling by a union at a retail store owned by persons who had a financial interest in a construction project at which employees allegedly worked under substandard conditions. Squillacote v. Building and Construction Trades Council, 266 F.Supp. 971 (E.D.Wis. 1967).

The Eighth Circuit in Pet, Inc. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 545 (1981), has construed the producer-distributor requirement of the publicity proviso in a rather different fashion. In that case, the court reversed the Board's dismissal of Pet's complaint alleging that the United Steelworkers had engaged in an illegal secondary boycott. The union had struck one of the plants of Hussmann, a wholly owned subsidiary of Pet, and had also run advertisements in local newspapers and had handbilled in the St. Louis area urging the public to boycott Pet products and other Pet subsidiaries. The Board concluded that the union's handbilling and advertising activities were protected by the publicity proviso, because Hussmann, by its application of capital, enterprise, and service to Pet and to Pet's diversified enterprise, was a producer of all Pet enterprise products, in that the income it generated, goodwill it earned, and diversification it provided inured to the benefit of the entire enterprise. United Steelworkers of America (Pet, Inc.), 244 N.L.R.B. No. 6 (1979). The Eighth Circuit majority, however, concluded that the proviso did not cover the union's publicity because Hussmann could not be a producer of the products of Pet and its subsidiaries: Hussmann did not, within the normal meaning of the word "produce," produce Pet's products by benefit of its profits; it had only a highly attenuated connection with Pet's products; and it did not work on any of the Pet products. 641 F.2d at 549. The dissent in Pet, however, concluded upon review of the proviso's legislative history and statutory purpose that the Board's broad interpretation of the producer language of the proviso was in harmony with the congressional purpose of protecting all pure publicity by a union. It therefore would have denied Pet's petition for review.

The Board in the case at hand relied in part upon its reasoning in Pet in concluding that the handbilling fell within the scope of the publicity proviso.[7] To the extent that the Board's reasoning in that decision supports the conclusions reached in our case, we respectfully differ with the reasoning and conclusions of the Eighth Circuit majority in Pet and find more persuasive the reasoning of the dissent.

Our considered judgment is that the Board in the case before us correctly concluded that the proviso applied to the handbilling at the mall and that High is a producer, and DeBartolo and the tenants, distributors, within the meaning of the proviso.

IV. Location of the Handbilling

DeBartolo finally argues that, even if the publicity proviso covers the language of the handbill, the activity of handbilling on the mall premises violated the Act. This issue of the location of the handbilling appears to have been raised for the first time on appeal; the Board's decision makes no mention of this argument in its summaries of the parties' contentions, and it does not in any manner address or determine the issue. We therefore decline to consider it, in light of the command of section 10(e) of the Act that "[n]o objection that has not been urged before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). Finding no extraordinary circumstances to excuse DeBartolo, we cannot consider the argument. See NLRB v. Kotarides Baking Co., Inc., 340 F.2d 587 (4th Cir. 1965); NLRB v. Community Motor Bus Co., 335 F.2d 120 (4th Cir. 1964).

V.

Perceiving no merit in DeBartolo's contentions concerning the truthfulness of the handbills or the fulfillment of the publicity

---

[6] The Board's appellate counsel, intervenor Florida Gulf Coast Building Trades Council, and amicus Building and Construction Trades Department also argue for affirmance of the Board's dismissal of the complaint on first amendment grounds, that is, that the dismissal successfully avoids a first amendment conflict, or, alternatively, that the first amendment protects the handbilling. The Board, however, found it unnecessary to reach or pass upon the first amendment question, and, because the issue has not been addressed by the Board, we decline to do so. We cannot substitute Board counsel's rationale for that of the Board, NLRB v. Food Store Employees Union, Local 347, 417 U.S. 1, 94 S.Ct. 2074, 40 L.Ed.2d 612 (1974), because substitution of counsel's rationale or the court's own discretion for that of the Board threatens the integrity of the administrative process and is incompatible with the orderly function of the process of judicial review. NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 380 U.S. 438, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965). See SEC v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 67 S.Ct. 1575, 91 L.Ed. 1995 (1947).

[7] The Eighth Circuit had not denied enforcement of the Board's order in Pet at the time the Board decided this case.

proviso's requirements of a producer-distributor relationship, we deny DeBartolo's petition to set aside the Board's order.

PETITION DENIED.

BRITT, District Judge, dissenting: This matter was presented to the National Labor Relations Board upon stipulated facts, including the following:

> At all times material herein, East Lake Square Mall, located in Tampa, Florida, has been an operating shopping center mall, owned and operated by DeBartolo through its subsidiary, Eastlake Square Associates. At no time germane to this Complaint has DeBartolo operated a retail store at East Lake Square Mall, nor does DeBartolo own any of the property on which the Belk's is located. East Lake Square Mall has approximately 85 tenants employers which, at all times material herein, have leased space in which to operate their respective stores from DeBartolo * * *. Wilson's is a tenant of DeBartolo while Belk's is not. DeBartolo has no control over the method or means by which any tenant or Belk's operates its business, except as provided in the applicable lease, property, or maintenance agreement. Neither does any tenant or Belk's have any control over the method or means by which DeBartolo or any other tenant or Belk's does business. Method or means as used herein and hereinafter includes, but is not limited to wages, hours, as well as working conditions and other matters dealing with labor relations * * *.
> DeBartolo, through its subsidiary, Eastlake Square Associates, has entered into a land lease with Wilson's, whereby Wilson's will build a department store that will connect to, and become part of the already operating East Lake Square Mall. Pursuant to the terms of the lease, Wilson's is totally responsible for the construction of its store and will own the structure * * *. Wilson's has contracted with High, a general contractor, to build its department store. High has employed its own employees, as well as contracted with various sub-contractors to build Wilson's Department Store. High is not a tenant of DeBartolo, does not engage in the operation of retail stores and does not have a contract to lease or purchase any property in or adjacent to the East Lake Square Mall * * *.
> Neither DeBartolo, nor any tenant other than Wilson's, nor Belk's, has any contract or business relationship of any type with High. No tenant nor Belk's has any contract or business relationship with Wilson's.
> The handbilling took place at all four entrances to the Mall which . . . are all located on the private property of DeBartolo but are utilized as means of ingress and egress to the retail stores located in the Mall.
> If it were not for the fact that High was and is performing construction work on the Wilson's store, Respondent would have no dispute with DeBartolo, Belk's or any tenant in the Mall and would have no cause to handbill at East Lake Square Mall.
> At all times material herein Belk's has maintained and operated a retail establishment within Hillsborough County, Florida, which is more particularly located at East Lake Square Mall. That retail establishment is located on land which Belk's owns. That land is comprised of approximately 10.72 acres of property within a larger parcel of property otherwise known as East Lake Square Mall. The property owned by Belk's includes the land upon which the store structure stands and the adjacent sidewalks and parking area.
> The Wilson's and Belk's retail stores are competitor establishments. Belk's has no business relationship with Wilson's in any manner, and exercises no control over the construction of the Wilson's store to be located at East Lake Square Mall.
> Belk's has no contract with nor does it do business in any manner with High.
> The only business relationship between Belk's and DeBartolo is that Belk's pays DeBartolo for maintenance and security of common areas. Belk's does not in any way share or split its revenues from its East Lake Square Mall store with DeBartolo. Belk's pays no money or thing of value to any tenant in the Mall and has no business relationship with any of them, except as provided in any provision of the aforesaid lease, property, or maintenance agreements.

Between the dates of January 8, 1980, and January 17, 1980, Respondent Union handbilled at the entrances to Belk's retail store with the identical handbill to that previously distributed at the mall entrances. The handbilling took place at the three entrances to the store itself, all of which took place upon Belk's property * * *.

Neither DeBartolo, Belk's nor any tenant has the ability to remove High as the general contractor on the construction project of the Wilson's store at East Lake Square Mall.

Under these facts the majority concludes that "High is a producer, and DeBartolo and the tenants, distributors" within the meaning of the publicity proviso of the statute under consideration. 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4). Being unable to agree, I respectfully dissent.

A key element of the proviso is that the publicity must relate to a "product" which has been "produced by an employer with whom the labor organization has a primary dispute." Id. (emphasis added).

It is undisputed that as to Wilson the handbilling was proper. However, it requires a strained construction of the statute to say that the "mall enterprise itself" is the "product" of High's labor and that the mall owner and tenants distribute that enterprise "simply by conducting business." In my view no case has gone this far. The cases relied on by the majority are factually distinguishable. In one of these, N.L.R.B. v. Servette, Inc., 377 U.S. 46, 84 S.Ct. 1098, 12 L.Ed.2d 121 (1964), Respondent Servette was a wholesale distributor of certain items carried for sale by various retailers. The Union, involved in a dispute with Servette, distributed handbills at the retail stores asking patrons of the stores not to buy certain listed products distributed by Servette. The Supreme Court held that products "produced by an employer" included those distributed by a wholesaler such as Servette.

In Pet, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 641 F.2d 545 (8th Cir. 1981), the Eighth Circuit reversed a decision of the Board that one of Pet's wholly-owned subsidiaries (Hussmann) was a "producer" of Pet's products. I agree with the majority there, which said: "* * * we think it totally at odds with any normal interpretation of the word 'produce' to say that because Hussmann's profits inure to the benefit of Pet, Hussmann produces Pet's products. We find the connection between Pet's products and Hussmann to be highly attenuated." Id. at 549.

Whether the handbilling is an unfair labor practice under Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(B) of the Act or whether, as contended by Respondent, it is free speech protected by the first amendment, are matters not addressed by the Board. My vote is to reverse and remand to the Board for consideration of those important and dispositive issues.

East Bay Chevrolet d/b/a Time Chevrolet v. NLRB

East Bay Automotive Council v. NLRB

659 F.2d 1006 (9th Cir.), October 22, 1981—242 NLRB 625

On petitions to review Board Order

Before Anderson, Nelson, and Norris, Circuit Judges

1007

J. Blaine Anderson, Circuit Judge: East Bay Chevrolet, the Employer, seeks review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) which requires that any agreement reached between the Employer and the East Bay Automobile Council (the Council) shall be retroactive to July 26, 1977. The Council, on the other hand, petitions for review of the Board's order denying it costs and attorney fees. The Board has applied for the enforcement of its orders.

I. FACTS

The Employer is an automobile dealer engaged in the selling and servicing of new and used cars. The Council is an amalgamation of four separate unions formed for the purpose of negotiating collective bargaining agreements with automobile dealerships. The four crafts that compose the Council are auto mechanics, painters, car jockeys, and new and used car sales people.

The Employer was a member of the East Bay Motor Car Dealers Association (the Association), a multi-employer group which represented its members in collective bargaining with unions. In 1972, the Association and the Council entered into a collective bargaining agreement which, for the first time, covered the four crafts under one collective bargaining agreement. When that contract expired in 1974, another collective bargaining agreement was negotiated. That contract expired on May 31, 1977.

In April of 1977, after a change in ownership, the Employer notified the Council that it was withdrawing from the Association and would, henceforth, be conducting its collective bargaining on its own behalf. The Council acquiesced in this withdrawal and proceeded to negotiate with the Employer.

At their first negotiating session on July 5, 1977, the chairman of the Council requested that the Employer sign a prepared recognition agreement which stated that the Employer acknowledged the Council and its four constituent unions "as the sole and exclusive representative of its employees in a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining." (Excerpt of Record 23). After examining the document, the attorney for the Employer made several changes, including pluralizing the words "representative" and "unit." There was no discussion about the substantive effect of these changes. The recognition agreement as modified was signed and written proposals covering the four crafts were presented by the Council. No agreement was reached, but a second meeting was scheduled.

After the July 5, 1977 meeting, the attorney for the Employer filed a petition with the Board seeking an election to decertify the Automobile Salesmens' Union as the collective bargaining representative of the sales people. The basis for his actions was his receipt of a petition signed by all the sales people stating that they did not wish to be represented by the Automobile Salesmens' Union.

At the second bargaining session on July 7, 1977, the attorney for the Employer stated that the Employer could not bargain with the Council or with the Salesmens' Union because the petition had been filed with the Board and there was independent objective evidence that the Salesmens' Union did not represent the sales people. The Employer stated that it would continue to bargain as to the three other crafts. The Council and the representatives of the other Unions objected to this arrangement and the negotiations ended. Unfair labor practice charges were subsequently filed against the Employer.

In the meantime, the members of the Council struck the various automobile dealers in the Association as well as the Employer. On July 20, 1977, the Council ended its strike against the Association members when a new collective bargaining agreement was reached.

On July 26, 1977, the Employer and the Council agreed upon a "stop-gap" resolution to their dispute. The Employer entered into a collective bargaining agreement with the Council which was limited to the mechanics, painters, and car jockeys. In addition, a reservation agreement was executed. It provided that the collective bargaining agreement covering the three other crafts was without prejudice to the dispute concerning the representative status of the Salesmens' Union.

In the subsequent unfair labor practice proceedings, the Board ruled that the Employer had violated Sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(5) and (1), "by refusing to continue bargaining with the Council on a single-employer basis for a combined unit of its shop [auto mechanics, painters, and car jockeys] and sales employees. The Employer was ordered to immediately recognize and bargain with the Council in the four-craft unit. Further, the Board adopted the recommendation of the administrative law judge (the ALJ) and ordered that any contract reached between the Employer and the Council, "including monetary benefits to be derived therefrom, * * * be retroactive to July 26, 1977, the date the Respondent [the Employer] entered into the single three-craft contract and the reservation agreement." (Excerpt of Record 10). The Board also adopted the ALJ's recommendation and denied the Council's request for costs and attorney fees.

II. DISCUSSION

A. Retroactivity of the Agreement

In its petition for review of the Board's decision, the Employer does not challenge the Board's unfair labor practice determinations, nor does it contest the propriety of the Board's order to recognize and bargain with the Council in the four-craft unit. The Employer's sole objection concerns the Board's order requiring any contract agreed upon by the parties to be retroactive to July 26, 1977. The Employer principally contends that the Board's order impermissibly establishes a substantive contract term and therefore should not be enforced. We believe the Employer's objection is well taken.

The obligation to bargain collectively "does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession." 29 U.S.C. § 158(d); NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d 871, 884 (9th Cir. 1978). This provision in our labor laws is based upon the basic principle "that the National Labor Relations Act is grounded on the premise of freedom of contract." H. K. Porter Co. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99, 107, 90 S.Ct. 821, 825, 25 L.Ed.2d 146 (1970), quoting United Steelworkers v. NLRB, 389 F.2d 295, 300 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

> "While the parties' freedom of contract is not absolute under the Act, allowing the Board to compel agreement when the parties themselves are unable to agree would violate the fundamental premise on which the Act is based—private bargaining under governmental supervision of the procedure alone, without any official compulsion over the actual terms of the contract." (footnote omitted)

H. K. Porter, 397 U.S. at 108, 90 S.Ct. at 826. Therefore, the Board may not prescribe the substantive terms of a collective bargaining agreement, either directly or indirectly. See H. K. Porter, 397 U.S. at 106, 90 S.Ct. at 825; NLRB v. Tomco, 567 F.2d at 884.

In a case similar to the present, the Board recognized its limitations and refused a request that certain contract provisions be made retroactive. In Trustees of Boston University, 228 N.L.R.B. 1008 (1977), enforced, 575 F.2d 301 (1st Cir. 1978), vacated on other grounds, 445 U.S. 912, 100 S.Ct. 1271, 63 L.Ed.2d 597 (1980), the Trustees were found to have violated section 8(a)(5) of the Act by its refusal to bargain with the union. The union requested that the Board, in addition to the usual bargaining order, issue an order making all contract provisions involving salaries or fringe benefits retroactive because of the employer's frivolous objections and refusal to bargain. The Board declined to grant such extraordinary relief, stating that:

> "By its request for retroactivity of certain contract provisions, the Union in effect is asking the Board to establish the effective date of the contract with respect to these terms. Since the Board is without power to compel parties to agree to any such substantive provision of a collective bargaining agreement, we shall deny this request.[10]"
> "n. 10 H. K. Porter v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99 [90 S.Ct. 821, 25 L.Ed.2d 146] (1970)."

Id. at 1010. Thus, in Trustees, the Board acknowledged that the effective date of a collective bargaining agreement is a substantive provision and that it could not compel parties to agree to such a provision.

Here, the Board has ignored its holding in Trustees and the principles set forth in cases such as H. K. Porter and Tomco. The Board has ordered the Employer to recognize and bargain with the Council in the four-craft unit and "if an understanding is reached, embody such agreement in a signed, written contract which shall be retroactive in all respects to July 26, 1977." This order does precisely what the Board acknowledged it had no authority to do—it prescribes a substantive provision, the effective date of the contract, in a collective bargaining agreement.

The General Counsel presents several arguments to justify the enforcement of the order. First, General Counsel argues that the Board's order does not establish a substantive provision of a contract. We summarily reject this contention as the Board itself in Trustees has ruled otherwise.

General Counsel also argues that in previous cases, Board orders according retroactive effect to collective bargaining agreements have been upheld. While this court has enforced orders that have given retroactive effect to collective bargaining agreements, those cases are clearly distinguishable. There, collective bargaining agreements had already been negotiated and agreed upon. The issues in those cases were whether the employer was bound by the agreement or whether the employees were covered by the agreements. See, e. g., NLRB v. Lantz, 607 F.2d 290 (9th Cir. 1979); Authorized Air Conditioning Co. v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 899 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 950, 100 S.Ct. 1598, 63 L.Ed.2d 785 (1980); NLRB v. Don Burgess Construction Corp., 596 F.2d 378 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 940, 100 S.Ct. 293, 62 L.Ed.2d 306

(1979). After concluding that the employer was bound by contract or that the employees were covered by the contract, the Board ordered the employer to comply with the agreement. The retroactive order merely gave the employees the full benefit of the bargain that had already been agreed upon. The Board was not engaged in prescribing contract terms.

General Counsel further contends that even if the effective date of the contract is a substantive term, the principles of H. K. Porter are not violated. General Counsel argues that the Board may not impose terms which it believes the parties should have agreed to, but it may fashion a remedy based upon what the parties would have agreed upon but for the unfair labor practice. In essence, the General Counsel contends that we adopt the decision of the D.C. Circuit in I.U.E. v. NLRB, 426 F.2d 1243 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 950, 91 S.Ct. 239, 27 L.Ed.2d 256 (1970) (hereinafter referred to as Tiidee Products). In Tiidee Products, the employer's refusal to bargain was deemed to be a clear and flagrant violation of the Act. As a remedy, the Board had merely imposed a prospective bargaining order. The D.C. Circuit believed that a more meaningful remedy was warranted. The court ruled that a "make-whole remedy" could be imposed whereby the Board could award compensatory damages "based upon a determination of what the parties themselves would have agreed to if they had engaged in the kind of bargaining process required by the Act." Id. at 1253.

We have apparently never adopted or rejected the Tiidee Products decision; see Culinary Alliance & Bartenders Union, Local 703 v. NLRB, 488 F.2d 664, 666 (9th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 417 U.S. 946, 94 S.Ct. 3071, 41 L.Ed.2d 666 (1974). We decline to do so now as there is no indication that the Board intended to base its order upon the Tiidee Products decision. As the Supreme Court stated in NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., 380 U.S. 438, 443-444, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 1064, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965):

> "When the Board so exercises the discretion given to it by Congress, it must 'disclose the basis of its order' and 'give clear indication that it has exercised the discretion with which Congress has empowered it.' (footnote omitted) Phelps Dodge Corp. v. Labor Board, 313 U.S. 177, 197, 61 S.Ct. 845, 854, 85 L.Ed. 1271, 1284 * * * the integrity of the administrative process requires that 'courts may not accept appellate counsel's post hoc rationalizations for agency action * * *.' (citations omitted) For reviewing courts to substitute counsel's rationale or their discretion for that of the Board is incompatible with the orderly function of the process of judicial review. Such action would not vindicate, but would 'propel the court into the domain which Congress has set aside exclusively for the administrative agency.'" (citation omitted)

We have also considered the Board's decision in Trading Port, Inc., 219 N.L.R.B. 298 (1975). In this case, the ALJ stated that his recommended order was not greatly different from a Trading Port retroactive bargaining order. In Trading Port, the union commenced a campaign to organize the employees of the employer. The union was able to get a majority of the employees to sign union authorization cards; however, due to the employer's unlawful conduct prior to the Board certification election, the union was defeated. The Board determined that the pervasiveness of the employer's unfair labor practices had made the holding of a fair election impossible and, therefore, a bargaining order was warranted. The employer was ordered to recognize and bargain with the union. However, instead of the typical prospective bargaining order which operated only from the date of the Board's decision, the Board granted a retroactive bargaining order. The order provided that the employer's obligation to bargain with the union "commence[s] as of the time the employer has embarked on a clear course of unlawful conduct or has engaged in significant unfair labor practices to undermine the union's majority status." Id. at 301.

In fashioning the remedy, the Board was concerned that in some instances the prospective bargaining order "left unremedied an employer's unilateral changes in working conditions made after a union had established its majority status." Id. The retroactive bargaining order, it was hoped, would "'re-establish the conditions as they existed before the employer's unlawful campaign' and not place a union in a disadvantaged position." Id.

It is evident that the Trading Port bargaining order does not compel the parties to agree to any terms in the contract. It is only the obligation to bargain which is made retroactive. Thus Trading Port does not support the Board's order in this case.

We conclude that the Board's order establishing the effective date of the contract cannot be enforced as it compels the parties to agree to a substantive term of the contract. We, therefore, remand this portion of the Board's order to allow the Board to impose appropriate remedies.

B. Costs and Attorney Fees

The Council argues that the Board erred in not granting its request for litigation costs and attorney fees. We disagree. Congress has invested the Board with broad discretion in fashioning remedies to effectuate the policies of the Act in light of the circumstances of each case. NLRB v. Food Store Employees Union, Local 347, 417 U.S. 1, 8, 94 S.Ct. 2074, 2079, 40 L.Ed.2d 612 (1974); Graphic Arts International Union, Local No. 280 v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 904, 910 (9th Cir. 1979). The Board has adopted a policy of awarding litigation expenses only where the defenses asserted by the employer in refusing to bargain are totally without merit or frivolous. Hecks, Inc., 215 N.L.R.B. 765 (1974). We are satisfied that the Board did not abuse its discretion in affirming the ALJ's determination that the Employer had not engaged in litigation totally without merit. A defense like the one involved in this case, which rests upon a credibility determination, is not frivolous. Id.

The Council contends that the issue should nevertheless be remanded to the Board because it failed to discuss the issue. However, the request for costs and attorney fees was only ancillary to the major questions presented. Omission of a discussion of ancillary issues does not warrant remand. J. P. Stevens & Co., Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 881, 883 (4th Cir.), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 315, 66 L.Ed.2d 145 (1980).

III. Conclusion

The Employer's petition for review is GRANTED. The Board's petition for enforcement of the remedial order is DENIED. The case is remanded to the Board for reconsideration of a remedial order in light of this opinion.

The Board's order denying costs and attorney's fees to the Council is AFFIRMED.

Griffith Company; J.W. Hicks Construction Co. and Security Paving Co., Inc. v. NLRB

NLRB v. International Union of Operating Engineers, Local Union 12

660 F.2d 406 (9th Cir.), October 26, 1981; certiorari denied June 7, 1982—243 NLRB 1121

On petition to review Board Order

Before CANBY and REINHARDT, Circuit Judges, and HILL,* District Judge.

407

CANBY, Circuit Judge: This case returns for appellate review having been previously remanded to the Board for further consideration. 545 F.2d 1194 (9th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 854, 98 S.Ct. 171, 54 L.Ed.2d 125 (1977). The present petition raises several issues. The primary question presented is whether the construction industry's limited exemption from hot cargo agreements, § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(e), renders lawful a provision in a Master Labor Agreement which prohibits an employer from subcontracting work to any signatory subcontractor who is delinquent in required payments to a common employee fringe benefit trust. Secondary issues include: (1) whether these agreements can be enforced by economic coercion; (2) whether the union must reimburse the employers for any monies which were contributed pursuant to the contract provision; and (3) whether certain statements by the trust administrator and counsel for the fund to an employer constituted a threat by union agents to invoke the self-enforcement provision of the contract.

I

The relevant facts are recited in our previous decision 545 F.2d at 1195-96. They are summarized here for convenience. Griffith Company, J. W. Nicks Construction Company and Security Paving Company, Inc. (Griffith) are general contractors in Southern California. All are members of a construction industry trade association which negotiated a Master Labor Agreement (MLA) with Local 12 of the International Union of Operating Engineers. A large number of other contractors individually negotiated "short form" agreements with Local 12 which incorporated by reference most of the terms and conditions of the MLA.

---

*The Honorable Irving L. Hill, United States District Judge, for the Central District of California, sitting by designation.

The agreement establishes four employee benefit trusts pursuant to § 302(c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, 29 U.S.C. § 186(c)(5). Each trust is jointly administered by a Board of Trustees composed of members appointed in equal numbers by the employer groups and the union. The trust funds are managed by a hired administrator.

Contributions to each trust are pooled into one account. An employee's eligibility for benefits is not dependent on whether his employer has actually contributed to the trust. The employer's failure to contribute, however, decreases the total funds in the pool and thereby results in reduced benefits for all beneficiaries. As the size of the required trust payments has increased, so too has the number of employers who are delinquent in their payments. The union has employed various methods to combat the delinquency problem. The most recent 408 approach is manifest in paragraphs 15 [1] and 16 [2] of the MLA.

Firms which are delinquent in their contributions and are unable to reach a settlement with the trustees are placed on the fund's official delinquency list. Copies of this list are sent to the signatory contractors and the union. Paragraph 15 of the MLA provides that no employer shall contract any work to a delinquent subcontractor until the subcontractor has paid all delinquent amounts. Paragraph 16 provides that if an employer violates paragraph 15 by hiring a subcontractor then listed as delinquent, the employer is liable for all prior delinquency payments even if those payments were not incurred as a result of work done at the employer's worksite. If the subcontractor becomes delinquent after commencing work on the employer's project, the employer must terminate the subcontractor, and if the employer fails to do so, the employer becomes liable for all delinquencies incurred on the job by the subcontractor ten days after the subcontractor's name appears on the delinquency list. Paragraph 16 also permits the union to picket or strike to enforce these provisions.

In 1973, the trustees discovered that the Urban Pacific Construction Company, a firm which had signed a short form agreement with the union and was on the delinquency list, was doing work for Griffith. Griffith had notice of Urban Pacific's prior delinquencies at the time of contracting. The trust administrator, Mr. Majich, and his attorney informed the employer that if the delinquencies were not paid, the administrator would notify the union of its right to enforce paragraph 16 by economic action. Griffith refused to pay and the administrator notified the union.

Griffith then filed a complaint with the NLRB alleging that paragraphs 15 and 16 were an agreement to cease doing business with another employer in violation of § 8(e) [3] and that the statements by the trust officials were a threat to strike for secondary purposes in violation of § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B).[4]

[1] Paragraph 15 provides in pertinent part:

The Trustees of the Trust Funds through their Administrator, shall furnish each Contractors Association and the Union, with a list of delinquent Contractors each month. The Contractor agrees that he will not subcontract any portion of his job to any Contractor whose name appears on the delinquent list until such Contractor has paid all delinquent monies to the various Trust Funds * * *.

[2] Paragraph 16 provides:

In the event the Contractor subcontracts to any such delinquent Subcontractor, in violation of the foregoing, the Contractor shall be liable to the Trustees for all accrued delinquencies of the Subcontractor and shall withhold sufficient funds from monies due or to become due such Subcontractor and shall pay the sums over to the Trust Funds. If a Subcontractor becomes delinquent after commencing work for the Contractor, the Contractor shall be liable for all delinquencies incurred on the job after ten (10) days following the date of the delinquency list on which the Subcontractor's name first appeared. The Contractor shall terminate the contract of the Subcontractor who fails to properly correct his delinquency.

(a) Where the Contractor fails or refuses to make payments required under the above provisions, the Union shall have the right to withhold services from any or all jobs of such Contractor.

[3] § 8(e), 29 U.S.C. § 158(e) provides in pertinent part:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for any labor organization and any employer to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling, using, selling, transporting or otherwise dealing in any of the products of any other employer, or to cease doing business with any other person, and any contract or agreement entered into heretofore or hereafter containing such an agreement shall be to such extent unenforcible and void: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall apply to an agreement between a labor organization and an employer in the construction industry relating to the contracting or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction, alteration, painting, or repair of a building, structure, or other work * * *.

[4] § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4)(ii)(B) provides:

(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

(ii) to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce, where in either case an object thereof is—

The Board held the agreement was a primary provision intended to preserve union standards or union employment and therefore rejected the complaint.

This court found the agreements were secondary and accordingly reversed. The court remanded the case to the Board with instructions that it determine whether the clause was rendered lawful by the construction industry's limited exemption from "hot cargo" agreements.[5] It further instructed the Board to consider whether, if the clauses were unlawful, the union was required to reimburse the employers for any monies which were contributed pursuant to the contract provisions and whether certain statements by the administrator and the trust counsel constituted a threat by union agents to invoke the self-enforcement provisions of the delinquency clause.

On remand, the Board held that the delinquency clause, with the exception of the self-help provision, was within the scope of the construction industry proviso and the payments made pursuant to that clause were therefore legal. The Board also concluded that the trust officials were not acting as agents of the union in making the questioned statements. We agree with the decision of the Board and enforce its order.

II

In Pacific Northwest v. NLRB, 654 F.2d 1301 (9th Cir. 1981) this court, sitting en banc, held that a Master Labor Agreement containing a union signatory clause requiring an employer to subcontract only to subcontractors who employed members of a particular union was within the scope of the construction industry proviso. The court focused on the unique nature of the construction industry, where short-term hiring and the extensive use of subcontractors make it difficult to define the primary bargaining unit and serve to create a community of interests among all workers at the jobsite. The court rejected the position advocated here by Griffith that the 8(e) proviso was intended solely to prevent jobsite friction between union and nonunion workers. Instead, it adopted the view that where a collective bargaining relationship exists, an agreement which serves the community of interests at the jobsite is permitted. At 1318–1322. See also, 105 Cong. Rec. 17900, II Legislative History of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 [hereinafter Leg. Hist.] 1433, (Senator Kennedy).

We believe that paragraphs 15 and 16 of the MLA serve the community of interests at the jobsite and consequently fall within the proviso. Griffith would have us adopt the view that because the subject matter of the contract concerns delinquencies that may be unassociated with the general contractor's jobsite, the provisions are unrelated to the community of interests there. This argument takes entirely too restrictive a view of the construction industry proviso as interpreted by Pacific Northwest. When a general contractor engages a subcontractor who is delinquent in his trust fund payments, that subcontractor's employees may engage in a primary strike at the work site. Such a strike can cause exactly the type of dislocation at the jobsite that the construction industry proviso was intended to prevent. Moreover, because contributions to the pension system are pooled into one account, the delinquency of the subcontractor affects the welfare, through the pension benefits, of all employees at the jobsite. The provisions of the collective bargaining agreement under review here and their judicial enforcement are well calculated to serve the communal interests at the jobsite. We accordingly agree with the Board that these interests are protected by the construction industry proviso.

III

Paragraph 16 permits the unions to enforce the delinquency provisions by economic measures. The Board properly found that because the clauses were secondary they could not be enforced by self-help.

Although the 8(e) proviso exempts the construction industry from the prohibition against secondary boycott agreements, it does not exempt the industry from § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B), which forbids economic coercion to enforce such a boycott. NLRB,* 635 F.2d 859, 886 (D.C. Cir.1980), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 2058, 68 L.Ed.2d 357 (1981); Bricklayer's Local No. 2 v. NLRB, 562 F.2d 775, 787–88 (D.C.Cir.1977); NLRB v. Muskegon Bricklayers Union, 378 F.2d 859 (6th Cir. 1967).

Griffith argues, however, that because the self-help clause is invalid, the entire provision should be voided. We disagree. In NLRB v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, 405 F.2d at 162, this court held that only that part of a contract that exceeds the limits of the construction industry proviso is negated. We implicitly reaffirmed this view in Pacific-Northwest, where we upheld a union signatory clause but invalidated provisions for its enforcement by self-help.

IV

The Board concluded that neither the administrator nor his counsel was an agent of the union. The Board accordingly dismissed the contractor's claim that the union through its agents violated § 8(b)(4)(ii) by threatening to invoke the self-enforcement provisions of the MLA. The Board's decision is supported by substantial evidence.

Each trust was established pursuant to § 302(c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 186(c). That section requires the fund trustees to serve as independent fiduciaries and act solely in the interests of the beneficiaries. See Toensing v. Brown, 528 F.2d 69 (9 Cir. 1975). To ensure the independence of the trust, § 302(c)(5) requires that the employers and employees be equally represented in the trust administration. Courts and the Board have held that action by the trustees will be attributed to the union under the following fact situations:

(1) Where provisions of a collective bargaining agreement remove the discretion to administer the funds solely for the benefit of the employees. Local 80, Sheet Metal Workers (Turner-Brooks Inc.) 161 NLRB 229, 234 (1966); or

(2) Where the trustee's actions which are in question were directed by union officials. Jacob Transfers Inc., 227 NLRB 1231, 1232 (1977); or

(3) Where the trustee's acts which are in question are undertaken in their capacities as union officials rather than as trustees. NLRB v. Construction & General Laborers Union, 577 F.2d 16, 20 (8th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1070, 99 S.Ct. 839, 59 L.Ed.2d 35 (1979).

The above list summarizes holdings thus far made and may not include all possible factual situations in which trustee action will be attributed to the union.

None of the three fact situations listed above is present in the instant case. There is nothing in the collective bargaining agreement which permits the trustees to act on behalf of the union. The trustees are required to administer the funds solely for the benefit of the employees and Paragraph 16 provides that the union alone has the right to strike in order to enforce the provision of the MLA. There is also no evidence that the communication of Mr. Majich (which the company characterizes as a threat of a strike) was directed by any union official. Moreover, Mr. Majich is an employee of the trust and is not a union official and he had no connection with the union.

There is nothing in the facts which would support a finding of agency. Contrary to the contractor's assertions, the administrator and his counsel cannot be viewed as union agents merely because they attempted to secure prompt payment of delinquencies. The officials, under a duty to maximize trust assets for the beneficiaries, sought to fulfill this obligation by means short of filing suit for breach of contract. Viewed in this light, the actions by the administrator and his counsel threatening to inform the union of its rights to strike were not done on behalf of the union but were undertaken to protect the interests of the beneficiaries.[7]

[*] Indeed it appears that even Local 12 has conceded that the self-help provision is invalid.

Because the unions did not engage in the forbidden self-help to compel the contractors to comply with their contractual obligations, we conclude that the payments by the contractors to the pension funds were not exacted by unlawful means and therefore are not subject to reimbursement. Cf. Graphic Arts International Union Local 280 v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 904 (9th Cir. 1979); Sheraton Kauai Corp. v. NLRB, 429 F.2d 1352 (9th Cir. 1970)(reimbursement ordered where money received by illegal coercion).

V

This Court's en banc decision in Pacific-Northwest held that the scope of the 8(e) proviso extends to contractual provisions which further the common interest of workers at the jobsite. The delinquency clauses at issue clearly fit within the proviso as there interpreted. Further, there is substantial evidence to support the Board's determination that the trust administrator and his counsel were not agents of the union and that the union, therefore, did not threaten to invoke the self-enforcement provisions of the contract. However, the self-enforcement provisions are invalid under § 8(b)(4)(ii)(B).

Accordingly, we enforce the Board's order in its entirety.

NLRB v. Borg Warner Corporation; Baker Industries, Inc.; Wells Fargo Armored Service Corporation; Pony Express Courier Corporation

663 F.2d 666 (6th Cir.), October 28, 1981;
rehearing denied January 5, 1982; certiorari denied
June 7, 1982—245 NLRB 513

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Keith and Martin, Circuit Judges, and Duncan,* District Judge

667

Per Curiam: This case is before the court on application of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of the Board's order issued against Borg Warner Corporation and its subsidiaries Baker Industries, Wells Fargo Service Corporation, and Pony Express Courier Corporation on September 27, 1979 and reported at 245 N.L.R.B. No. 73.

The issues presented are: 1) whether the named corporations constitute a single employer for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) and whether Pony Express is the alter ego of Wells Fargo; 2) whether respondent violated section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to bargain in good faith with the Union concerning the effects of its decision to transfer courier work from Wells Fargo to Pony Express; 3) whether respondent violated section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by laying off five employees and constructively discharging another as a consequence of the transfer of courier work; and 4) whether respondent must recognize the Union as the bargaining agent for Pony Express.

With regard to the first issue, the Administrative Law Judge considered the following historical and technical interrelationship between Wells Fargo and Pony Express: Pony Express was incorporated in 1975 for the purpose of assuming much of Wells Fargo's courier service. That business involves the transfer of non-intrinsically valuable articles under low security circumstances. Wells Fargo remained a separate entity, offering primarily armored car services. However, both corporations are wholly owned subsidiaries of appellant Baker Industries which in turn is 97 percent owned by appellant Borg Warner. Furthermore, Pony Express and Wells Fargo share a number of top executive officers including the president, vice-president, secretary, and treasurer. Also, the vice-president for personnel, Mr. Hughes, renders labor advice for both corporations. Finally, the two corporations share common offices, post office boxes, and lockboxes. As an example of the close relationship between these two corporations, the Administrative Law Judge reviewed the details of the take-over by Pony Express of the Nashville and Knoxville courier operations. In this instance Wells Fargo vans were simply repainted and "sold" to Pony Express via a paper transaction. On these facts the Administrative Law Judge concluded respondents constituted a single employer and that Pony Express was the alter ego of Wells Fargo for purposes of the National Labor Relations Act.

*Honorable Robert M. Duncan, United States District Judge for the Southern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

The second issue, the section 8(a)(5) and (1) charge, arose out of Wells Fargo's tardy notice to the Union of its intention to transfer the Nashville and Knoxville courier operations. That decision was reached by the company in January of 1978, but Union officials were not notified until March 30, two days prior to the planned April 1 transfer. On March 31, the Union's counsel wrote the company suggesting certain measures which might be taken to minimize the adverse effects of the transfer on the Wells Fargo employees. The company's reply stated its mistaken belief that it had no obligation to bargain with the Union concerning the effects of the transfer decision. See First National Maintenance Corp. v. N.L.R.B., ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 2573, 69 L.Ed.2d 318 (1981). Thereafter the transfer was effected and although some additional discussions were had concerning the transfer effects, the Administrative Law Judge found that respondents by failing to give the Union timely notice, had made good faith bargaining impossible.

The consequences of the courier transfer complained of by the Union were the layoff of five employees and the constructive discharge of another. These dismissals occurred because Wells Fargo did not offer these employees jobs as part of the beginning of services at Pony Express. The underlying reason was illuminated by testimony of company officials which stressed the need to hold wages paid to Pony Express employees to levels below those then paid to Wells Fargo's unionized employees. This action, the Administrative Law Judge concluded, constituted illegal discrimination against union employees in violation of section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. This finding was made in the absence of proof of antiunion motivation on the strength of the Supreme Court's decision in N.L.R.B. v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1798, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967). There it was held that "if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was 'inherently destructive' of important employee rights, no proof of antiunion motivation is needed * * *." Refusing to transfer Wells Fargo courier employees to Pony Express without prior negotiation was conduct which, in the opinion of the Administrative Law Judge, was inherently destructive of employee rights.

The fourth and final issue concerns the Administrative Law Judge's order requiring respondents to bargain with the Union as the representative of Pony Express' Nashville and Knoxville employees. This order stems from the finding that Pony Express is the alter ego of Wells

Fargo. An employer's duty to bargain with an incumbent union devolves upon the nominally different entity which continues to operate the same business enterprise. N.L.R.B. v. Triumph Curing Center, 571 F.2d 462, 474 (9th Cir. 1978). Hence Pony Express is obliged to bargain with the union representing the Wells Fargo employees.

It is the opinion of this court that the Administrative Law Judge correctly decided all four issues. The motion of the Board to enforce is granted.

Pacemaker Yacht Company, a Division of Mission Marine, Inc. v. NLRB

663 F.2d 455 (3d Cir.), October 30, 1981—253 NLRB 828

On petition to review Board Order

Before SEITZ, Chief Judge, and ADAMS and GARTH, Circuit Judges

456

SEITZ, Chief Judge. Pacemaker Yacht Company (the Company) petitions for review of a final order of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) directing the Company to cease and desist from restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of rights protected by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976), and to reinstate employees who had been fired for striking. The Board has cross-applied for enforcement of its order. This court has jurisdiction under 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) & (f) (1976).

I.

In 1978, the Company and Teamsters Union 158 (the Union) were parties to a collective bargaining agreement covering employees at two plants in New Jersey. The agreement required the Company to contribute forty cents per hour worked by each employee to the Teamsters Health and Welfare Fund of Philadelphia and Vicinity—Local 158. The Fund retained an independent insurance carrier to underwrite employee health and welfare benefits. The Company was not involved in the administration of the Fund, and at all times fulfilled its obligation under the collective bargaining agreement.

In early 1978, the Fund failed to pay premiums to the insurance carrier, and consequently the underwriter refused to pay the claims of the employee beneficiaries. On June 20, 1978, most employees at both plants went on strike in protest of the Fund's delinquency. Throughout the day, Union officials advised striking employees that the work stoppage violated the collective bargaining agreement and urged them to return to work. The Company mailed a notice to all employees advising them that the strike violated Article X of the collective bargaining agreement, which prohibited "all strikes, picketing * * * or other interruption of the Company's operations," and stating that any employee who failed to report to the next shift would "be considered to have quit his job" and would be permanently replaced. One hundred and twenty-six employees who continued to strike after receiving this notice were discharged. The Union submitted a grievance on behalf of these employees, which proceeded to arbitration pursuant to the collective bargaining agreement. The arbitrator found that the strike violated Article X of the collective bargaining agreement but ruled that the discharge penalty was too severe, and ordered the Company to reinstate all strikers except those who instigated the strike. The Company complied with the award, and reinstated all but twenty employees who were identified as instigators in a subsequent grievance procedure.

The Union filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Company, alleging that the discharges restrained employees in their exercise of protected activity in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the Act. The administrative law judge dismissed the complaint, finding that the employees had waived their right to strike in Article X. The Board disagreed, and held that the no-strike clause in Article X did not waive employees' right to strike over the Fund's failure to pay insurance premiums. The Board examined the collective bargaining agreement and extrinsic evidence and concluded that "the union could not have made a clear and unmistakable waiver of the employees' right to strike to put pressure on the Fund since the parties never foresaw the possibility of such a situation." Pacemaker Yacht Co., 253 N.L.R.B. No. 95, 1980–81 Labor L.Rep. (CCH) ¶ 17,733, at 28,579. Consequently, the Board found that the discharges violated section 8(a)(1) and ordered the Company to reinstate the employees with full seniority and backpay. The Company petitioned for review of that order and the Board cross-applied for enforcement.

II.

The Company urges that the Board's order should not be enforced for three reasons. First, the Company disputes the Board's finding that the no-strike clause in Article X of the collective bargaining agreement did not constitute a waiver of the right to strike over the Fund's failure to pay premiums to the insurance carrier. Second, it argues that the Board erred in failing to defer to the arbitrator's award in accordance with the standards established in Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080 (1955). Finally, the Company contends that the strike was not protected activity under section 7 of the Act because the work stoppage involved a matter beyond its control. Because we find the waiver issue dispositive, it is unnecessary to address the Company's other arguments.

III.

Assuming, without deciding, that the strike at issue was protected activity under section 7 of the Act, we start with the proposition that generally employees may, through the collective bargaining process, waive the right to engage in this protected activity. Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 280, 76 S.Ct. 349, 356, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956). We have cautioned, however, that such a waiver must be "clear and unmistakable and that explicit language will not be read expansively." Delaware Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. General Teamsters Local 326, 624 F.2d 1182, 1187–88 (3d Cir. 1980).

In Delaware Coca-Cola, we held that a single, broad, generally-worded no-strike clause does not constitute a clear and unmistakable waiver of the right of employees to engage in a sympathy strike. 624 F.2d at 1187. Our holding was squarely grounded upon the application of the principle of coterminous interpretation to a single express no-strike clause. Under this rule of contract interpretation, a no-strike clause is presumed to be no broader than the arbitration clause in a collective bargaining agreement. See Gateway Coal Co. v. United Mine Workers, 414 U.S. 368, 382, 94 S.Ct. 629, 639, 38 L.Ed.2d 583 (1974). Underlying this presumption is the theory that a no-strike clause is generally a quid pro quo for an arbitration clause. See Textile Workers Union v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S. 448, 455, 77 S.Ct. 912, 917, 1 L.Ed.2d 972 (1957). In Delaware Coca-Cola, we were unable to find any extrinsic evidence indicating that the parties had intended the no-strike clause to be broader than the arbitration clause and thus held that since the sympathy strike was not arbitrable, it was not barred by the no-strike clause.

The principle of coterminous interpretation, however, is not a rule of law, but merely a tool of contract interpretation, see W-I Canteen Service Inc. v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 738, 744 (7th Cir. 1979), which "must be applied to the facts of each case," Delaware Coca-Cola, 624 F.2d at 1187.

The collective bargaining agreement at issue contained two separate no-strike clauses.

ARTICLE IX

GRIEVANCE PROCEDURE

9.1 Should difference arise between the Company and its employees or between the Company and the Union as to the interpretation or application of the provisions of this Agreement, there shall be no suspension or stoppage of work and an earnest effort shall be made to settle such differences immediately or in the manner described below. [grievance procedures follow]

ARTICLE X

NO STRIKES OR LOCKOUT

10.1 So long as this Agreement is in effect, the Company agrees that there shall be no lockouts and the Union agrees that there will be no strikes, picketing, slow downs, deliberate curtailment of production, work stoppages of any kind or other interruption of the Company's operations. In the event one or more employees fail to abide by the provisions of this article, the Company retains full right to take any disciplinary action it deems necessary, including discharge.

10.2 In the event that there is any disagreement as to whether or not the employee has participated in such conduct, then this shall be deemed to be a grievance to be settled in accordance with Article IX.

The Board acknowledged that "the no-strike clause embodied in Article X is more comprehensive in scope than that in Article IX, and was not given as a quid pro quo for the grievance and arbitration procedure * * *." Pacemaker Yacht Co., 1980–81 Labor L.Rep. (CCH) ¶17,733, at 23,580. Nonetheless, the Board concluded that the "absence of evidence that the parties either considered or discussed whether the no-strike clause would cover the situation which arose here indicates that no clear and unmistakable waiver of the right to strike over the Fund's inaction occurred." Id. Even apart from the general rule that courts "owe no particular deference to the Board" on matters of contract interpretation, Dow Chemical Co. v. NLRB, 636 F.2d 1352, 1358 (3d Cir. 1980), we believe that the Board erred as a matter of law in concluding that Article X did not bar the strike over the Fund's delinquency.

When limited by the principle of coterminous interpretation, a no-strike clause encompasses only arbitrable disputes. Therefore, a claim that the collective bargaining agreement waives the right to strike over a particular nonarbitrable dispute must be established clearly and unmistakably in order to rebut the presumption that the employees' waiver is no greater than the employer's obligation under the arbitration clause. When, however, a no-strike clause is not limited by the arbitration clause, the employer need not introduce evidence that the parties intended the no-strike clause to prohibit precisely the type of strike that actually occurred. All that is required is that a comprehensive waiver extending beyond the arbitration clause be "clear and unmistakable." See W-I Canteen Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 606 F.2d 738, 745 (7th Cir. 1979) (rejecting "a rigid requirement that a no-strike clause contain the specific term 'sympathy strike' " to waive employee's right to engage in sympathy strike, where no-strike clause expressly extended beyond arbitration clause).

An examination of the collective bargaining agreement, "read as a whole and in light of the law relating to it when made," Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 279, 76 S.Ct. 349, 356, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956), establishes such a clear and unmistakable waiver. First, the language of Article X plainly prohibits all "strikes, picketing * * * or other interruption of the Company's operations." It is apparent that the no-strike pledge in Article X was given in exchange for the Company's no-lockout pledge. It is also clear that the parties intended Article IX to bar strikes over arbitrable disputes and Article X to bar strikes over all other disputes. There is no reason not to give this language its "ordinary and reasonable meaning." Penn Packing Co. v. Amalgamated Meat Cutters, Local 195, 497 F.2d 888, 891 (3d Cir. 1974). Indeed, a contrary interpretation would seem to render the no-strike clause in Article X a nullity. Since the no-strike clause in Article IX alone bars strikes over arbitrable disputes, Article X must be construed to bar nonarbitrable disputes—including the unforeseeable disputes. We reject the Board's interpretation in favor of the "settled rule of contract interpretation that contract language should not be interpreted to render the contract promise illusory or meaningless." Retail Clerks Local 455 v. NLRB, 510 F.2d 802, 806 N.15 (D.C. Cir. 1975).

Extrinsic evidence provides additional support for our interpretation of the no-strike clause. Recognizing the "danger inherent in utilizing [evidence about the conduct of the parties at the time of the strike] because it may not reflect the parties' intention at the time of the execution of the contract," Delaware Coca-Cola, 624 F.2d at 1189, we note that the Union officials consistently advised employees that their action violated the no-strike clause in the collective bargaining agreement. The Union also apparently conceded this point before the arbitrator. Unlike the ambiguous extrinsic evidence considered in Delaware Coca-Cola, 624 F.2d at 1189–90, the statements of Union officials here, who had signed the collective bargaining agreement, leave little doubt that they regarded the strike as a violation of the collective bargaining agreement.

Although the Union's statements must be considered in light of the fact that the strike resulted from employee dissatisfaction over the Union's administration of the Fund, we believe they are entitled to some probative value. Cf. Iowa Beef Processors v. Amalgamated Meat Cutters, 597 F.2d 1138, 1144 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 840, 100 S.Ct. 79, 62 L.Ed.2d 52 (1979) (finding statements by union officials that strike violated no-strike clause probative of contractual intent where agreement required union to declare all strikes unauthorized).

Finally, the state of the law at the time the agreement was executed supports the inference that by including two separate no-strike clauses the parties intended to bar strikes over both arbitrable and nonarbitrable disputes. At the time the contract was negotiated, the principle of coterminous interpretation had been adopted by the Board and by at least one court. See Gary Hobart Water Corp. v. NLRB, 210 N.L.R.B. 742 (1974), enforced, 511 F.2d 284, 288 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 925 (1975).[1] From this we infer that the inclusion of two no-strike clauses, one expressly tied to the arbitration clause and one prohibiting all strikes, was intended to waive the employees' right to strike over unforeseeable disputes, including the dispute over the Fund's failure to pay insurance premiums.

The Board apparently seeks to engraft a new limitation on the well-established ability of employees to waive their right to strike. Implicit in the Board's opinion is the notion that a general no-strike clause may never waive the right to strike over unspecified, nonarbitrable disputes. Although some may read our decision in Delaware Coca-Cola this broadly, see Note, Express No-Strike Clause Agreements, 67 Va. L.Rev. 729, 746 n.82 (1981), we decline to do so. The practical consequence of the Board's position is apparent here. Because a strike over the Fund's delinquency was unforeseeable at the time of the contract negotiations, under the Board's view, employees would have been incapable of waiving the right to strike over this dispute at all. We believe there is no basis for limiting employees' ability to waive the right to strike over nonarbitrable disputes simply because they were unforeseeable at the time the contract was negotiated. Cf. United Steelworkers of America v. Warrior and Gulf Navigation Co., 363 U.S. 574, 578–80, 80 S.Ct. 1347, 1350–51, 4 L.Ed.2d 1409 (1960) (a collective bargaining agreement "is a generalized code to govern a myriad of cases which the draftsmen cannot wholly anticipate.").

[1] We do not view our decision today as inconsistent with subsequent Board decisions construing waiver provisions in collective bargaining agreements. In International Union of Operating Engineers (Davis-McKee), 238 N.L.R.B. 652 (1978), the Board held that a broad no-strike clause did not ban sympathy strikes. In that decision, however, the Board relied on the "presumption * * * that when the union gives up the right to strike in return for the employer's obligation to submit disputes to arbitration, it does so only with respect to those disputes which are arbitrable." Id. at 654. No such presumption is warranted here. This case resembles American Cyanamid Co., 246 N.L.R.B. No. 17, 1979–80 NLRB Dec. (CCH) ¶ 16,354 in which the Board found that the existence of two separate no-strike clauses "suggests that * * * the broad, no-strike provisions in the 'Strikes and Lockouts' article were not the quid pro quo for [the Union's] agreement to arbitrate disputes, but were an independent undertaking by the Union in return for Respondent's no-lockout pledge." Id. at 30,600.

Freedom of contract is the "fundamental premise" on which the National Labor Relations Act is based. H.K. Porter Co., v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99, 108, 90 S.Ct. 821, 826, 25 L.Ed.2d 146 (1970). Absent a contractual provision in irreconcilable conflict with federal labor policy, neither courts nor the Board may modify or nullify substantive contractual provisions. See Armco Steel Corp. v. NLRB, 344 F.2d 621, 624–25 (6th Cir. 1965).[2] The waiver of the right to strike over the dispute at issue here violates no principle of labor law and indeed may encourage industrial peace. See Mastro Plastics Co. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 280, 76 S.Ct. 349, 356, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956) ("[w]aivers [of the right to strike] contribute to the normal flow of commerce and to the maintenance of regular production schedules."). Moreover, to require specific enumeration in a no-strike clause of all possible nonarbitrable disputes that might result in a work stoppage would place an unjustified obstacle on the ability of employers to bargain for an across-the-board no-strike clause and on the employees' ability to gain concessions in return for such a pledge. An employer who bargains for such a clause would never be certain that employees would not strike over some unforeseeable dispute, and employees, in turn, would have less to offer during contract negotiations. No federal labor policy supports such a restriction on party autonomy in the collective bargaining process.

We thus hold that the general no-strike clause in Article X of the collective bargaining agreement, not limited by the arbitration clause, constitutes a waiver of the employees' right to strike over the Fund's failure to pay insurance premiums.

IV.

The Company's petition for review will be granted and the Board's cross-application for enforcement will be denied.

GARTH, Circuit Judge, concurring.

I am in complete agreement with Chief Judge Seitz's analysis and his conclusion that the broadly worded no-strike clause in Article X of the collective bargaining agreement constituted a waiver of the employees' right to strike in the circumstances of this case. I would not rest our decision on the resolution of the waiver issue, however, but would meet head-on the question the majority finds unnecessary to address: whether, in the first place, the strike was protected activity under section 7 of the Act. In this regard, I would hold that the use of economic weapons, such as a strike, against an employer is not protected under section 7 when the object of the employees' grievance is a matter beyond the employer's control or the employer's power to influence.

I.

Pacemaker in this case found itself caught in the crossfire between its employees and their union. The company had fulfilled its contractual responsibility of making contributions to the union's health and welfare fund, but the Fund—over which Pacemaker had no control—had failed to pay premiums to the Fund's insurance carrier, Republic National Life Insurance Co. As a result, Republic refused to pay the medical and hospital claims of employee beneficiaries.

[2] We are not confronted here with an asserted waiver of the right to strike over an employer's unfair labor practices. Cf. Mastro Plastics Co. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 76 S.Ct. 346, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956) (finding strong policy against unfair labor practices and the right of employees to select their own bargaining representatives precludes implied waiver of right to strike over unfair labor practices). We also note that in this case the employer does not seek to enjoin a strike under § 301(a) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 184 (1976). See Buffalo Forge Co. v. United Steelworkers, 428 U.S. 397, 96 S.Ct. 3141, 49 L.Ed.2d 1022 (1976).

The record discloses that the Fund, the Teamsters Health and Welfare Fund of Philadelphia and Vicinity—Local 158, was, practically speaking, twice removed from Pacemaker. Under its agreement with the union, Pacemaker, for each hour worked by each of its employees, paid forty cents to the Fund, which was an entity separate from the company and the union. It is conceded that Pacemaker at all times faithfully complied with this obligation. The Fund was responsible for selecting the insurance carrier and for paying the premiums for continued medical and hospital coverage of the employees. Thus, when the Fund failed to pay those premiums and Republic thereupon discontinued making benefits payments to the employees, Pacemaker was powerless to remedy the problem. The situation was well described by the union's lawyer, who told the Board's administrative law judge:

> The private insurance carrier stopped making payments to the employees, quite frankly, for failure on the part of the fund to make contributions to the private insurance carrier. Their position was that if we don't receive any money, we are not going to pay benefits.
> This caused a problem with the employees because the employees started getting contacts from various doctors and hospitals that the bills were not getting paid. The employees went to the union to try to resolve the problem. The union tried to make its best efforts to resolve the problem. Obviously, if the fund itself being a separate entity was not able to make the payments, then the union could not really do too much for the employees.

App. at 301a–302a. Clearly, if the union could not bring the situation under control, Pacemaker, which was still another step removed from the Fund, could not.

It was in this context that the employees became restive. As their dissatisfaction with the administration of the Fund grew, the company sought to have the union resolve the Fund's problems, but these endeavors were unsuccessful. When no signs of progress were forthcoming, Pacemaker's employees, in an attempt to put pressure on the union to remedy the Fund's delinquency, struck Pacemaker and demonstrated outside one of Pacemaker's plants as well as the union's headquarters. The strike—which, as we hold today, violated the no-strike clause of the collective bargaining agreement—forced the company temporarily to close both of its plants.

Thus, the record shows that the employees struck the company even though their grievance was not with Pacemaker, but was with the Fund. They inflicted a grave economic wound on their financially shaky employer (the company subsequently initiated Chapter XI bankruptcy proceedings) despite the fact that Pacemaker had no power to give them the relief they demanded and could not even influence the entity which did have that power.

II.

Section 7 of the Act provides that "[e]mployees shall have the right * * * to engage in * * * concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 157 (1976). However, employee activities aimed at improving terms and conditions of employment can lose their section 7 protection if carried out in a disruptive or otherwise inappropriate manner. See Emporium Capwell Co. v. Western Addition Community Org., 420 U.S. 50, 95 S.Ct. 977, 43 L.Ed.2d 12 (1975) (separate bargaining by minority group of employees would undermine principle of collective bargaining); NLRB v. Local Union No. 1229, IBEW (Jefferson Standard), 346 U.S. 464, 477–78, 74 S.Ct. 172, 179, 98 L.Ed. 195 (1953) (disloyal employees distributed leaflets disparaging quality of employer's product; "the means used by the [employees] * * * have deprived [them] of the protection of [section 7]"); Sullair P.T.O., Inc. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 500 (7th Cir. 1981) (employee's obscene language and disruptive behavior unprotected); Texas Instruments, Inc. v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 822 (1st Cir. 1981) (employees disseminated confidential wage information); National Vendors v. NLRB, 630 F.2d 1265, 1268 (8th Cir. 1980) (employees conducted disruptive meeting in company cafeteria); Abilities & Goodwill, Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 6, 9 (1st Cir. 1979) (employees struck over firing of high-ranking management official); Texaco, Inc. v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 812 (3d Cir.) (deliberately or maliciously false employee statements unprotected), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1008, 93 S.Ct. 442, 34 L.Ed.2d 302 (1972). See generally NLRB v. Pincus Bros., Inc.—Maxwell, 620 F.2d 367, 375–77 (3d Cir. 1980) (employee circulated leaflet disparaging employer).

"[T]he general rule adopted by the courts has been to look at a variety of factors, including the reasonableness of the means of protest, in order to determine if the employees' activities were protected." Abilities & Goodwill, supra, 612 F.2d at 9. As the court stated in Texas Instruments, supra, 637 F.2d at 830, "Not all conduct that can, in some general sense, be characterized as an exercise of a right enumerated in section 7 is afforded the protection of the Act * * *. [R]ights under section 7 must in each instance be understood in relation to the concrete facts of a particular case" (citations omitted).

The argument for denying employee actions protected status is even stronger when the actions of employees unnecessarily and unfairly inflict economic harm on an employer who is neither responsible for the complained-of condition nor has any power to correct it. See NLRB v. Bretz Fuel Co., 210 F.2d 392, 397 (4th Cir. 1954). As one commentator has written, "The argument that economic pressure should be unprotected [where the employer lacks interest or control] is * * * convincing." Getman, The Protection of Economic Pressure by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 115 U.Pa.L.Rev. 1195, 1221 (1967).

This observation is directly applicable to this case. Here Pacemaker's employees used the company as a pawn in a crisis not of the company's making and beyond its power to resolve. The company had to endure total disruption of its production processes even though the dispute that triggered the strike was entirely between the employees and the Fund. Cf. Harnischfeger Corp. v. NLRB, 207 F.2d 575 (7th Cir. 1953). As Professor Getman has argued, "Where * * * the employer is not a party to the controversy * * * there is no reason why he should be forced to permit his business to be used as a battleground." Getman, supra, at 1221.

The teaching of Eastex, Inc. v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 556, 98 S.Ct. 2505, 57 L.Ed.2d 428 (1978), a case cited by both parties, is not to the contrary. In Eastex, the most recent Supreme Court expression concerning protected activity, the Court held that an employer could not prohibit the distribution, in nonworking areas of the employer's property during nonworking time, of a union newsletter that, in part, urged employees to lobby against incorporation of "right-to-work" provisions into the state constitution and criticized a presidential veto of an increase in the federal minimum wage. The employees in Eastex did not strike the company. Rather, they filed an unfair labor practice charge against Eastex seeking the right to distribute the newsletter.

Eastex argued that the distribution of the newsletter did not come within the "mutual aid or protection" language of section 7 because the newsletter did not relate to a specific dispute between the employees and their own employer over an issue which the employer had the right or power to affect. Id. at 563, 98 S.Ct. at 2511. The Court rejected the employer's argument, finding "no warrant for [the company's] view that employees lose their protection under the 'mutual aid or protection' clause when they seek to improve terms and conditions of employment or otherwise improve their lot as employees through channels outside the immediate employee-employer relationship." Id. at 565, 98 S.Ct. at 2512. The Court observed that the subjects addressed in the newsletter could have a significant impact on the union's strength at the bargaining table and on the level of wages negotiated with the employer. Id. at 569, 98 S.Ct. at 2514.

It was in this special context, however, where half the newsletter's contents were clearly protected and where no strike occurred, that the Court rejected Eastex's "lack of control" argument. In doing so, the Court took pains to stress the limited nature of its holding. The Court observed, for example, that "the employer ha[d] not attempted to show that distribution [of the newsletter] would interfere with plant discipline or production." Id. at 572, 98 S.Ct. at 2515. More significantly, however, the Court acknowledged that "even when concerted activity comes within the scope of the 'mutual aid or protection' clause, the forms such activity permissibly may take may well depend on the object of the activity," and proceeded to quote from Professor Getman's article. Id. at 568 n.18, 98 S.Ct. at 2513 n.18. Thus, while Eastex bears upon the subject of protected activity and recognizes that protection may vary with the form and object of the activity, Eastex is not this case.

The form the employee activity took in this case makes the situation with which we are confronted totally different from the circumstances before the Court in Eastex. Although here, as in Eastex, the source of employee dissatisfaction lay in matters beyond the employer's control, unlike Eastex, the means used to express the employee grievances in the instant case had a substantially greater negative impact on the innocent employer. Moreover, while in Eastex, the employer could not show how it was prejudiced by the mere distribution of a protected newsletter in nonworking areas during nonworking time, the employer here was forced by the unwarranted actions of its employees to close both its plants, thereby shutting down production.

III.

I would thus hold that on the facts of this case, where the company concededly fulfilled all its responsibilities with respect to its collective bargaining agreement and the health and welfare fund, and the employees' grievance was solely with the Fund, the employees' strike against the company which employed them, did not constitute protected activity within the meaning of section 7 of the Act. This being the case, I would not reach the waiver issue discussed by the majority, with whose reasoning I, in any event, agree.

NLRB v. Sheet Metal Workers Union Local No. 3

662 F.2d 513 (8th Cir.), October 30, 1981—253 NLRB 330

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Heaney and Stephenson, Circuit Judges, and Davies,* Senior District Judge.

Per Curiam. This matter is before the Court pursuant to an application of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order against the Sheet Metal Workers Union Local No. 3. The Board found that the Union violated section 8(b)(7)(C) of the National Labor Relations Act by picketing McCarthy Heating & Air Conditioning Services, Inc., between February 25 and April 18, 1980. The Board determined that the Union picketed for more than thirty days without filing a representation petition and that its objective was to force the company to bargain with it or force the company's employees to choose it as their bargaining representative. The Board's decision and order is reported at 253 N.L.R.B. 53, 105 L.R.R.M. 1606 (1980).

In this case, there is absolutely no evidence that any agent of the Union specifically asked any McCarthy employee to become a representative of the Union or to execute an authorization card. Moreover, there is no evidence that the Union ever asked the employer for recognition as the representative of its employees. Finally, Liebsack, a Union agent who engaged in several conversations with McCarthy's employees, disclaimed any desire on the part of the Union to presently represent the employees.

The record does indicate, however, that Union agent Liebsack talked with the employees about their wages and benefits during the period of picketing and prepared a comparative analysis sheet designed to emphasize the disparities between union and nonunion wages. Additionally, Liebsack admitted that the Union may seek to represent McCarthy's employees in the future even though it has no present desire to do so.

The Board ordered the Union to cease and desist from its unfair labor practices in contravention of section 8(b)(7)(C) of the Act and to post an appropriate notice.

While this case presents a close question, we conclude that there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole from which the Board could reasonably have found that the Union conducted its picketing for a recognitional or organizational object in violation of section 8(b)(7)(C). The Board concedes, however, that the only evidence of the Union's unlawful objective is the comparison between union and nonunion wages and benefits made in Liebsack's conversations with McCarthy's employees and in the written comparative analysis sheet, and Liebsack's admission that the Union may attempt to organize the McCarthy employees in the future.

Area standards picketing, for the sole purpose of encouraging compliance with prevailing area wage and benefit standards, is nonrecognitional activity not proscribed by section 8(b)(7)(C). N.L.R.B. v. International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 265, 604 F.2d 1091, 1097 (8th Cir. 1979). Here, the Board essentially conceded at oral argument that the Union was engaged in lawful area standards activity other than its oral and written comparisons of union and nonunion benefits and Liebsack's statement that it may seek to organize the McCarthy employees in the future.

*The Honorable Ronald N. Davies, United States Senior District Judge, for the District of North Dakota, sitting by designation.

Therefore, we enforce the Board's order directing the Union to cease and desist those activities that violate section 8(b)(7)(C). We emphasize, however, that the Union is free to resume its nonrecognitional picketing of McCarthy as long as the picketing is not accompanied by conversations with employees regarding the benefits of unionization which are made with an unlawful recognitional and organizational objective.

National-Southwire Aluminum Company v. NLRB

662 F.2d 446 (6th Cir.), November 2, 1981—247 NLRB 1315

On petition to review Board Order

Before EDWARDS, Chief Judge, and MERRITT and BROWN, Circuit Judges

447

This case is before the court on a petition to review and set aside or modify an order of the National Labor Relations Board and the cross-application of the Board for enforcement of its order. Reference is made to the decision and order by the Board, reported at 247 N.L.R.B. No. 175, for a recitation of the pertinent facts.

Upon consideration, the court concludes that the contested portions of the Board's order are overbroad. Those portions, as written, might be read as prohibiting management conduct that is not proscribed by the National Labor Relations Act.

The portion requiring petitioner to cease and desist from threatening terminations because of union stickers on plant equipment would have the effect of exempting union stickers from any future company neutral policy against placing any stickers on company property. The Act would not prohibit such a neutral policy, unless it were enforced in a discriminatory manner.

Similarly, the portion which prohibits assigning Martin Howard and Bruce Tongate to any duties other than the normal duties of employees in their classification would improperly prevent petitioner from making such assignments under any circumstances, not merely in retaliation for union activity. Moreover, this portion of the order is unnecessary, since an unchallenged provision of the order clearly requires petitioner to cease and desist from making undesirable assignments to employees because of their union activities. This portion of the Board's order requires petitioner to cease and desist from: "assigning employees to more menial or less desirable job tasks because of their union activities and sympathies."

Accordingly, it is ORDERED that:

(1) That portion of the order which requires petitioner to cease and desist from "Threatening terminations because of union stickers on plant mobile units and equipment," be changed to read, "Threatening terminations because of union stickers on plant mobile units or equipment, except in enforcement of a uniform policy applied to all stickers on such equipment."

(2) That portion of the Notice to Employees which reads, "WE WILL NOT threaten employees with discharge because of union stickers on plant equipment or mules," be changed to read, "WE WILL NOT threaten employees with discharge because of union stickers on plant equipment or mules, except in enforcement of a uniform policy applied to all stickers on such equipment."

(3) That portion of the order which requires petitioner to, "Give assurances to Martin Howard and Bruce Tongate that they will only be required to perform the normal and usual duties of employees in the metal workers classification" be deleted. That portion of the Notice to Employees which reads, "WE WILL give affirmative assurances to MARTIN HOWARD and BRUCE TONGATE that they will only be required to perform the normal and usual duties of employees in their classification, and that no less desirable job tasks such as cleaning the break-room will be assigned to them," be changed to read, "WE WILL NOT assign employees to more menial or less desirable job tasks because of their union activities or sympathies."

IT IS SO ORDERED.

Amsoil, Inc., a Delaware Corporation v. NLRB

525 F. Supp. 839 (D. Minn.), November 5, 1981

On motions for injunctive relief and for dismissal

840

MacLaughlin, District Judge: This matter is before the Court on two motions. The defendants, National Labor Relations Board (Board) and its Regional Director Robert Wilson, have moved pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b) to dismiss the complaint for lack of subject matter jurisdiction and failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. The plaintiff, Amsoil, Inc., has moved for a preliminary injunction enjoining the defendants from proceeding with an unfair labor practice hearing scheduled for November 30, 1981, until after the defendants permit the plaintiff to take depositions in preparation for the hearing. For the reasons stated herein, the defendants' motion to dismiss will be granted.

FACTS

Amsoil is engaged in the manufacture and nonretail sale and distribution of synthetic lubricants and related automotive products. Its employees were not unionized in 1980. On January 21, 1981, the General Drivers, Warehousemen, Helpers and Inside Employees Union, Local No. 346 filed a charge against Amsoil with the Board, alleging that Amsoil had engaged in certain improper conduct. The union charged that Amsoil conducted surveillance of employees attending a union meeting and threatened employees with layoffs and loss of benefits if the employees chose to be represented by a union. The union also alleged that Amsoil improperly laid off a number of employees. The Board filed an unfair labor practice complaint against Amsoil on March 27, 1981. It also noticed a hearing for November 30, 1981. Amsoil filed an answer on April 2, 1981.

By letter dated May 28, 1981, Amsoil applied to the Board Regional Director to depose 17 individuals, including 16 employees or former employees. The application was made pursuant to section 102.30 of the Rules and Regulations, Series 8, of the Board, which provides:

> The regional director * * * shall upon receipt of the application [to take depositions], if in his discretion good cause has been shown, make and serve upon the parties an order which will specify the name of the witness whose deposition is to be taken and the time, the place, and the designation of the officer before whom the witness is to testify * * *.

12 C.F.R. § 102.30(a) (1980). The Regional Director, by an order dated June 2, 1981, determined that Amsoil's reason for taking depositions was to seek pretrial discovery and did not constitute good cause. He denied the application to take depositions.

Amsoil appealed the denial of the Regional Director to the Executive Secretary of the Board. The appeal was denied by the Board on June 29, 1981.

Amsoil filed its complaint in the federal district court on July 28, 1981. The complaint alleges that the Regional Director is under a statutory mandate of section 10(b) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(b), to permit discovery so far as practicable. It alleges that the denial of permission allowing Amsoil to engage in pretrial discovery in an unfair labor practice proceeding constitutes unreasonable, arbitrary and capricious conduct in violation of 29 U.S.C. § 160(b). Amsoil predicates jurisdiction of the federal district court on the Administrative Procedure Act, 5 U.S.C. § 701 et seq., and 28 U.S.C. § 1345. It seeks an order compelling the Board to permit discovery and enjoining the Board from holding a hearing on the unfair labor practice complaint until 30 days after permitting discovery.

DISCUSSION

In general, judicial review of action taken by the Board is limited to the United States courts of appeals. 29 U.S.C. § 160(f); Myers v. Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corp., 303 U.S. 41, 48–49, 58 S.Ct. 459, 462–63, 82 L.Ed. 638 (1938). The United States Supreme Court, however, has carved out an exception to this rule. In Leedom v. Kyne, 358 U.S. 184, 79 S.Ct. 180, 3 L.Ed.2d 210 (1958), the Supreme Court held that federal district courts have jurisdiction to enjoin actions of the Board in certain limited circumstances. In Leedom v. Kyne, the Board had established a bargaining unit consisting of both professional and nonprofessional employees without permitting the professional employees to vote on the matter as expressly required by section 9(b)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Supreme Court held:

> This suit is not one to "review," in the sense of that term as used in the Act, a decision of the Board made within its jurisdiction. Rather it is one to strike down an order of the Board made in excess of its delegated powers and contrary to a specific prohibition in the act. Section 9(b)(1) is clear and mandatory * * *. Plainly, this was an attempted exercise of power that had been specifically withheld. It deprived the professional employees of a "right" assured to them by Congress. Surely, in these circumstances, a Federal District Court has jurisdiction of an original suit to prevent deprivation of a right so given.

358 U.S. at 188–89, 79 S.Ct. at 183–84. A factor heavily relied upon by the Supreme Court was the unavailability of any adequate remedy for the professional employees if the federal district courts had no jurisdiction. Congress had granted the professional employees a right not to have to bargain with nonprofessional employees unless they consented to do so. The professional employees could not obtain review in a court of appeals of the Board's action. The Court held that where Congress grants a right "it must be held that [Congress] intended that right to be enforced * * *." 358 U.S. at 191, 79 S.Ct. at 185. In summary, Leedom v. Kyne established the proposition that district courts have jurisdiction apart from the review provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, to strike down orders of the Board which contravene an express statutory mandate.

The jurisdictional issue here is whether this case falls within the Leedom v. Kyne exception. The plaintiff contends that there is a clear statutory mandate requiring the Board to permit depositions in unfair labor practice hearings. Section 10(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(b), provides for the filing of unfair labor practice proceedings by the Board. It also provides:

> Any such proceeding shall, so far as practicable, be conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the district courts of the United States under the rules of civil procedure for the district courts of the United States, adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States pursuant to section 2072 of Title 28.

This provision has been interpreted in different ways in the courts of appeals. In N.L.R.B. v. Safway Steel Scaffolds Co., 383 F.2d 273 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 955, 88 S.Ct. 1052, 19 L.Ed.2d 1150 (1967), the Fifth Circuit, on review of a final order of the N.L.R.B., held that the Board's trial examiner erred in ruling that he had no discretion to permit depositions. The Fifth Circuit interpreted section 10(b) of the Act and Board Rule 102.30 as a grant of authority to trial examiners to permit the taking of depositions when practical and when good cause is shown. However, the Fifth Circuit declined to reverse the Board's decision in this case because it found "that the denial of the motion for leave to take depositions was a technical error which did not result in prejudice to the respondent's case." 383 F.2d at 277. Accord, N.L.R.B. v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 403 F.2d 994 (5th Cir. 1968); N.L.R.B. v. Rex Disposables, Division of DHJ Industries, Inc., 494 F.2d 588 (5th Cir. 1974).

The Second Circuit, however, has rejected the Fifth Circuit's interpretation of section 10(b) of the Act. In N.L.R.B. v. Interboro Contractors, Inc., 432 F.2d 854 (2d Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 915, 91 S.Ct. 1375, 28 L.Ed.2d 661 (1971), it interpreted section 10(b) as follows:

> Section 10(b) of the Act provides that Board proceedings, where "practicable," shall be conducted in accordance with the "rules of evidence" applicable in the federal district courts. On its face this amendment regulates the introduction of evidence at Board hearings, without imposing on the Board any particular pretrial procedures—such as discovery—which do not by any standard constitute rules of evidence. The legislative history of section 10(b) confirms this. Under the original Act, section 10(b) provided that "[i]n any such proceeding the rules of evidence prevailing in courts of law or equity shall not be controlling." This provision was heavily criticized on the ground that it allowed too much incompetent evidence to get into the record of Board hearings. It was solely to meet that criticism that section 10(b) was amended in 1947 * * *.

432 F.2d at 859. Under this interpretation, section 10(b) relates only to introduction of evidence at the unfair labor act hearing, leaving the Board free to establish the prehearing procedures. The Board has done so in Board Rule 102.30.

The existence of these differing interpretations is probative evidence that the Court lacks subject matter jurisdiction. Leedom v. Kyne authorizes district courts to block Board actions that violate a clear statutory mandate. If courts of appeals cannot agree on the meaning of a statutory provision, then it certainly is not a clear mandate. It should be noted that what is at issue here is whether the Board's denial of depositions violates section 10(b), not its authority to enact Board Rule 102.30, nor its interpretation of that rule. Indeed, even the Fifth Circuit cases do not question the validity of Rule 102.30. In N.L.R.B. v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 403 F.2d 994 (5th Cir. 1968), the court held that the Board's denial of depositions was not error because the respondent failed to present good cause for taking depositions. Good cause is required only by Rule 102.30, not by section 10(b).

When deciding whether jurisdiction exists in this case, the Court must determine for itself whether the relevant portion of section 10(b) establishes a clear statutory mandate that the Board must follow. On this point, the Court notes that the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit has not had an opportunity to interpret this portion of section 10(b). In the absence of guidance from the Eighth Circuit, it is the judgment of this Court that the Second Circuit correctly interpreted section 10(b) in N.L.R.B. v. Interboro Contractors, Inc. The statute requires that unfair labor practice hearings shall be conducted "in accordance with the rules of evidence" that apply in district courts. The language deals only with the conduct of the hearing itself, not prehearing matters. Congress certainly could—and perhaps should—make all the rules of civil procedure applicable to Board unfair labor practice hearings, but under a straightforward reading of section 10(b), it has not done so. The Court believes that the Board should enact rules permitting greater use of discovery techniques. However, the Court concludes that the Board is not required by section 10(b), as it is currently written, to do so.

Moreover, the availability of judicial review of the Board's denial of depositions militates against finding that jurisdiction exists. Both the Second Circuit and the Fifth Circuit addressed the issue now before the Court on review of final orders of the Board. The plaintiff in this case should also be able to obtain review in the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit of the denial of depositions in the event that the Board should rule against the plaintiff.

For the reasons stated herein, it is the conclusion of the Court that this lawsuit must be dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Because of this disposition of the case, it is unnecessary to address the merits of the plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction.

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the defendants' motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction is granted.

LET JUDGMENT BE ENTERED ACCORDINGLY.

Dow Chemical Company, Texas Division v. NLRB

660 F.2d 637 (5th Cir.), November 5, 1981—250 NLRB 748

On petition to review and cross application for enforcement of Board Order

Before MARKEY, Chief Judge, and GEE and POLITZ, Circuit Judges

MARKEY, Chief Judge: Dow Chemical Company, Texas Division (DOW) and certain employee-intervenors petition to review and set aside, and the National Labor Relations Board (board) cross-petitions to enforce, two orders of the board issued July 18, 1980. The orders originated in two cases—one involving Dow and Local Union 716 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, AFL-CIO-CLC (IBEW), the other involving Dow and Local No. 1848 of the International Brotherhood of Painters and Allied Trades, AFL-CIO (IBPAT). The board found Dow guilty in both cases of violating 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5) [8(a)(5)] and 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) [8(a)(1)] of the National Labor Relations Act (Act). The petitions have been consolidated on this appeal. We deny enforcement.

Of the U.S. Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, sitting by designation.

Background

Dow operates a large chemical manufacturing complex in Brazoria County, Texas, with 7200 employees, of which 2700 were represented by unions and 4500 were not. Represented employees were paid hourly and received benefits bargained for by their respective unions; unrepresented employees were salaried and received a standard set of benefits.

A. IBEW

Since 1944, Dow had collectively bargained with IBEW. The most recent collective bargaining agreement covered May 1975—May 1978. On or about March 14, 1978[1] certain members of IBEW filed a decertification petition. The board scheduled an election for April 14.

Between March 14–April 14, Dow conducted voluntary meetings at which management representatives informed IBEW members of the scheduled election, and answered their questions on differences between their existing wages and benefits and those of salaried, unrepresented employees. The managers presented slides illustrating the differences. In some respects salaries and benefits of unrepresented employees were superior to those of IBEW members. The managers repeatedly and specifically emphasized that they could not promise and were not promising that salaried pay and benefits would be available if the voters voted to decertify the Union.

During the election campaign, Dow sent three letters, over the signature of D.A. Rikard, Vice-President of Operations, to the home addresses of IBEW members.

Enclosed in the first letter, dated April 3 and addressed to "Dow Electricians and Families," were reproductions of slides presented at the previous week's meetings. The enclosures compared life insurance, medical coverage, and various types of leave afforded unrepresented and represented employees. The letter stated that the "benefits covered [in the enclosures] * * * are specifically outlined in the policies and booklets issued by the Company to all salaried employees." In closing, Rikard wrote, "As we explained in the meetings, the law prohibits us from promising these salaried benefits to our Dow Electricians if they choose to decertify. This information is being provided for you solely in response to your questions to allow you to review the answers at your convenience."

The second letter, dated April 7, included reproductions of slides presented at the second set of meetings to illustrate pay and retirement policy differences. Rikard noted that although the retirement formula was "exactly the same for both hourly and salary" that "the higher the annual earnings, the higher the monthly retirement benefit." Rikard also commented on the availability of "excellent medical insurance for the families of salaried employees who die while employed at Dow." This letter closed with the same disclaimer paragraph pointing out Dow's legal disability against making any promises.

In the third letter, dated April 11, Rikard said it was "very significant" that employees from other groups who had voted to decertify had not chosen to revert to union status, illustrating that "these employees are being treated fairly and are well satisfied with their compensation and benefits." He concluded that "[a] 'no (X)' vote is a vote for a better way for yourself and your family."

Not surprisingly, there were numerous brief discussions about the election between supervisors and IBEW members during the campaign. Testimony regarding some of those discussions, and about some managers' statements at the meetings, figured prominently in the board's evaluation of Dow's pre-election conduct.

On April 14, the 115 IBEW members voted 63 to 52 against continued representation by the Union. On Monday, April 17, Dow placed the former IBEW members on salary and made available the fringe benefits established for salaried employees. In changing the electricians' classification, Dow was following precedent established in 1969 and 1972, when employees affiliated with the Teamsters' and the Carpenters' unions voted to decertify and were placed on salaried status immediately after the elections.

On April 21, IBEW filed objections to the election, and requested that it be set aside, alleging that Dow had "destroyed the conditions necessary for the conduct of a fair election" by informing the electricians that "decertification of the Union would result in an immediate and substantial wage increase, along with other improved benefits," in violation of § 8(a)(1)[2] of the Act.

[1] Events described in the text occurred in 1978 unless otherwise indicated.

On May 18, some former IBEW members were granted increases of $140 to $150 per month, retroactive to the date of the election.[3] On May 22, the IBEW filed a charge with the board, alleging that Dow had "refused to bargain in good faith," and had "discriminated against its employees in terms and conditions of employment to discourage membership in a labor organization by granting increased wages and improved benefits."

On July 6, the board's Regional Director issued a complaint alleging that Dow had engaged in conduct violative of § 8(a)(1) and § 8(a)(5)[4] of the Act. The complaint and election objections were consolidated for hearing.

Administrative Proceedings re IBEW

The Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) who presided over a hearing on November 6–8 found that each of eight statements of Dow supervisors constituted a "promise of benefit" and thus an unlawful attempt to induce employees to vote against the Union in violation of § 8(a)(1). He considered three other statements or questions coercive inquiries violative of § 8(a)(1).

The ALJ stated, "If I were to view the informational meetings with employees (including the slide presentations on wages and benefits) and [the three letters] which were mailed to employees detailing the same material—in isolation, there would be a strong argument that the Company was correctly detailing the existing facts to employees in order that they could make an informed decision in the election. * * * [However,] [b]ecause of comments made by supervisors * * * in which employees were told, inter alia, that they would receive better wages and fringe benefits, and would fare better as salaried employees, * * * and in light of a systematic campaign of interrogation of employees, I find that the dissemination of benefits via slides and individual mailings to employees to be part and parcel of the Company's effort to woo the employees from the Union and in this context, constitutes a promise of benefits and is violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act."

Regarding the transfer to salaried status immediately after the election, the ALJ stated, "Since such actions were taken both before and after timely objections to the election were made, the Employer made such changes at its peril. As I have found [Dow's] conduct in the period prior to the decertification election is violative of Section 8(a)(1), and * * * also constitutes objectionable conduct to the election, I find that the unilateral granting of the raises and change of employee status, done while the validity of the election was still in doubt, constitutes a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act." [Emphasis added.]

Finding that "a fair election at this time would not be possible," the ALJ recommended that the election be set side and that Dow be ordered to bargain with the Union "for a reasonable period of time." He further recommended that the bargaining order should not be construed to require a recission of the benefits granted subsequent to the election.

The board affirmed the ALJ's rulings, findings and conclusions, and adopted his recommended order. The board added that if Dow had not engaged in pre-election unfair labor practices, it would nonetheless have still violated § 8(a)(5) and § 8(a)(1) by its post-election transfer to salaried status, citing Presbyterian Hospital, 241 NLRB 996 (1979).

B. IBPAT

IBPAT had been the collective bargaining representative for Dow's painters since 1944. The most recent collective bargaining agreement covered May 19, 1975—May 18, 1978. On March 16, members of IBPAT filed a decertification petition. On August 25, the board scheduled an election for September 22.

[2] Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1):

"It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title [§ 7 of the Act]."

[3] Upon transfer to salaried status, each former IBEW member received a $50 increase. That increase and the $140–150 increases resulted from the transfer to salaried status. The transfer being determinative, no need was seen by the board, or is seen by us, for separate discussion of the increases.

[4] Section 8(a)(5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(5):

"It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title.

During the month before the election, Dow conducted voluntary meetings with the painters as it had with the electricians. In response to painter's questions at the meetings, a Dow managerial representative compared the painters' current benefits to those available to salaried employees, using some of the slides presented at the earlier IBEW meetings. Disclaimers of making any promises were repeatedly made, as they had been at the IBEW meetings. On September 13 and 19, Dow's General Manager McClure sent letters to painters, one of which included, "I'm convinced that our people in the Texas Division don't need a union to assure them of good pay and benefits, as well as fair treatment. I hope you share this feeling and will cast a vote for yourself and your family by voting NO on election day."

The 44 eligible painters voted 29 to 15 to decertify. Following its customary practice, Dow transferred the painters to salaries status on the first working day after the election.

On September 28, IBPAT filed objections to the election, alleging that Dow had informed the painters that they would receive improved wages and benefits if they voted against the Union. On November 15, IBPAT filed a charge that Dow had refused to bargain. A complaint issued on December 1, charging that Dow violated § 8(a)(1) and § 8(a)(5) by offering its employees certain benefits prior to the election and by granting a post-election increase and salaried benefits without notice or consultation with the Union. The complaint and election objections were consolidated for hearing.

Administrative Proceedings re IBPAT

The ALJ who conducted hearings on April 26 and 27, 1979, found that Dow had not promised benefits, saying, "[I]t had no need to do so, since the Company's practices were common knowledge. All the Company did was furnish specific details and comparisons so the voters were completely informed of what they would gain in material benefits by abandoning union representation, as surely the Union informed them of what they would gain by continued representation."

The ALJ recommended dismissal of the complaint in its entirety, concluding that because Dow had not interfered with its employees' free choice in the election, its post-election transfer to salaried status did not violate the Act. He recommended that IBPAT be officially decertified.

The board affirmed dismissal of the complaint with respect to Dow's pre-election conduct and decertified the union. It went on, however, to disagree with the ALJ's conclusion of law respecting Dow's post-election conduct, holding that, despite the validity of the election, Dow had violated § 8(a)(5) and § 8(a)(1) by unilaterally transferring the painters to salaried status before the results of the election were validated, again citing Presbyterian Hospital, supra,

Issues [5]

(1) Were pre-election statements and questions of Dow supervisors to IBEW members violative of § 8(a)(1), or were those statements protected speech under § 8(c) [6] of the Act?

(2) Were post-election transfers of former IBEW and IBPAT members to salaried status, before validation of election results, a violation of § 8(a)(5) and § 8(a)(1) of the Act?

OPINION

(1) Dow's Pre-Election Statements.

Under § 8(c) of the Act, an employer has the right to express "any views, argument, or opinion" so long as "such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit." The board, in adopting the ALJ's determinations that eight statements of Dow's supervisors to IBEW members, made at the meetings and in separate conversations, were "promises of benefit," and three were "coercive inquiries," necessarily viewed all eleven pre-election statements as having overstepped the limits of § 8(c).

When the board's findings are reasonable and supported by substantial evidence, a court will affirm them, though the court might well have made contrary findings if sitting de novo. Reviewing courts are not, however, rubber stamps. Theirs is not only the right but the duty of overturning findings unreasonable and not supported by the evidence of record. "[A] reviewing court is not barred from setting aside a Board decision when it cannot conscientiously find that the evidence supporting that decision is substantial, when viewed in the light that the record in its entirety furnishes, including the body of evidence opposed to the Board's view." Universal Camera Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). Applying those standards, we conclude that the board's eleven statement-based findings of separate § 8(a)(1) violations are unsupported by substantial evidence. Nothing of record supports IBEW's charge that Dow's pre-election conduct "destroyed the conditions necessary for the conduct of a fair election."

[5] In view of our disposition, it is unnecessary to discuss a third issue raised in the briefs, that is, whether the board's bargaining orders or rerun elections were the appropriate remedy.

[6] Section 8(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(c):

> "The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this subchapter, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit."

In reaching our conclusion, we deem it unnecessary to resolve any question of credibility or testimonial conflict. Though Dow strenuously argues that the statements allegedly made were not in fact made, we assume here that they were. The board cautions us with remainders of our inability to observe the demeanor of witnesses, and thus to judge credibility, an inability of which we are fully aware. The ALJ's reference to demeanor and credibility related, however, only to his finding that the eleven statements were made. We accept those findings, and review the statements in the light of the law.[7]

(A) Promises of Benefit.

In testing whether substantial evidence supports the board's findings that eight statements were promises, three facts in the record are of great probative force. First, it is undisputed that Dow's managers and supervisors repeatedly and specifically cautioned that they could not promise and were not promising anything if the election resulted in decertification. Second, as recognized by each ALJ in decisions adopted by the board, it was common knowledge at Dow, long before the decertification petitions were filed, that decertifying normally meant "going salaried." Third, no witness testified that he considered any of the eight statements to have constituted a promise. An absence of those three facts would not alone make the statements promises, for none was a promise per se. The presence of those facts, however, undermines the determination that the present statements can properly be interpreted as promises of benefit under the circumstances of record here.

In analyzing election campaign statements of employers for the presence of promises, no need exists for unearthing an express statement that particular benefits will be given in exchange for a vote to decertify. The Act is violated by statements from which promises may reasonably be inferred. Chromalloy Mining and Minerals v. N.L.R.B., 620 F.2d 1120, 1124–25 (5th Cir. 1980). The inference, however, must be one reasonably makeable by the employee or employees to whom the statement is made. It is not sufficient that bits and pieces of statements may be later lifted out of context, that the facts and circumstances in which the statements were made and which were known to the employee or employees may be ignored, and that those bits and pieces may then be viewed in vacuo as either promises or non-promises. See Federal-Mogul Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 566 F.2d 1245, 1254 (5th Cir. 1978), cf. N.L.R.B. v. Kaiser Agricultural Chemicals, 473 F.2d 374, 381 (5th Cir. 1973).

Also central to an analysis of employer statements is the principle that § 8(c) at an irreducible minimum protects the right of an employer to state its views, argument, or opinion, and to make truthful statements of existing facts. The First Amendment would permit no less. N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). As the ALJ in the IBPAT proceeding stated: "Section 8(c) of the Act is completely devoid of meaning unless it permits an employer to clearly portray its practice with respect to its unrepresented employees so they could decide whether they wanted to secure unrepresented status." Indeed, the board has stated: "Section 8(c) grants to an employer the right, in a manner and setting free from coercion, to compare benefits presently in effect in his unorganized operation with those enjoyed by employees in a similar operation which has union representation." Walgreen Co., 203 NLRB 177 at 181 (1973). Walgreen was not mentioned by either ALJ or by the board.

[7] We do not, of course, consider testimony nowhere mentioned or referred to below, as a basis for a violation finding or otherwise, by the ALJ or the board. The board's brief quotes some of that testimony. Nor do we consider Dow's inappropriate allegations of bias on the part of the ALJ. In his decision the ALJ paraphrased the statements at issue. We treat and quote the statements themselves.

The ALJ did not simply ignore the freedom of expression of views assured employers under the First Amendment and § 8(c). He said:

> Granted, there is often a fine line between the exercise of freedom of speech under Section 8(c) and violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act where statements and conduct involve threats or promise of benefit. With certain exceptions (e.g., medical benefits), I have found no explicit promises to raise wages a certain amount. However, numerous supervisors did more than supply information to employees, they systematically contacted electrician employees in the unit and, inter alia, urged them to decertify the Union stating that medical benefits were better, that they would be stupid not to decertify, that they would fare better on benefits as salaried employees, that the Company would pay them more but for the union, that the lowest paid carpenter (salaried-unrepresented) received more than the highest paid electrician, etc.

> I am aware of and have not disregarded Respondent's principal contention that Section 8(c) (and its related First Amendment claim) grants Respondent freedom to express its views, and particularly here, where all Respondent had to do was point out existing wages and benefit scales for salaried employees. In this case, the anamoly [sic] exists that wages and benefits for salaried employees were in fact better in some respects than wages and benefits being paid hourly represented electricians. In essence it can be argued that by telling the facts the Respondent was automatically engaging in a promise of benefits. I have attempted to reconcile the right of employees to be informed and the right of the employer to express his views under Section 8(c) with existing law that prohibits an employer from making threats or promises of benefits in violation of Section 8(a)(1) or constituting objectionable conduct prior to an election. I have concluded that on the basis of the record as a whole, Respondent did more than inform the employees of benefits currently enjoyed by salaried employees. It systematically interrogated employees as to their views on the decertification election and made the judgment that their wages and benefits would be better and attempted to "sell" that judgment to employees and thereby induce them to reject their existing union representation. It can be argued, of course, that if the Respondent is entitled to inform the employees of existing wage and benefit scales for salaried employees, why is it not entitled to use such factual material in campaigning to reject the Union? I have found that employees and supervisors alike were aware that decertification meant that employees would become salaries. In light of this, the Respondent went too far when it made the judgment that decertification meant better and increased wages and benefits and told the employees that. By so doing, the Respondent advanced into a forbidden area of promising employees benefits if they voted to reject the Union. [Emphasis in the original.][8]

As appears infra, the foregoing falters for lack of support in the record.

The board says in its brief that "an employer is entitled to present facts concerning the benefits or experience of its non-union employees," but that an employer "is not free to inform employees outright or by suggestion, that it will give them more if they vote to decertify the union." [Emphasis the board's.]

646

Nowhere in the statements at issue, or in the circumstance in which they were made, can there be found a suggestion that IBEW members would get "more" than then-salaried employees were getting if they voted to decertify. There was no promise that they would get even the same, though, as the ALJ recognized, it was common knowledge that "going salaried" normally followed decertification. The board's brief undercuts the notion that promises were made. In arguing for the appropriateness of a bargaining order, the board recognizes that though the electricians knew that salaried status had followed past decertifications "they had no way of knowing just how much greater their own weekly earnings would be * * * if they voted to decertify the IBEW," and "the extent of the Company's post-election changes was unknown to the employer prior to the election."

---

[8] The reference to Dow's having made a "judgment" is difficult to understand. If, as the ALJ recognized, everyone knew decertification meant "employees would become salaried," and if "wages and benefits for salaried employees were in fact better in some respects," it would seem that a judgment contrary to that attributed to Dow would be impossible. As appears in the text, what Dow actually told its employees did not constitute threats or promises.

There is no allegation that any statement of fact by Dow's supervisors was untruthful. Three statements were truthful answers to employee questions. One was a clarification of an employee's misstatement at a meeting. Three were statements of opinion. One was an expression of the speaker's desire. For a full month, the forthcoming election was necessarily a topic of many conversations. If the eight statements here involved must under the present circumstances be considered "promises" violative of the Act, virtually nothing would be left to employers in an election campaign but a sterile silence.

Moreover, nothing of record indicates that the employee-craftsmen here involved, electrician-members of IBEW, were so illiterate or unsophisticated as to have been misled or influenced to vote against their will by subtle nuances in the challenged statements, by drawing the inferences drawn by the ALJ, or otherwise. It would neither surprise nor coerce an IBEW member, for example, to hear that a Dow supervisor believed in or desired decertification of the Union. We do not deal here with the recognized imbalance of power between an employer and an individual employee in a bargaining context. We deal with an election, where the effective silencing of one source of information would be a clear disservice to employees faced with the need of making an informed choice.

Lengthy court opinions are anathema, yet explication of the evidentiary void surrounding the statement-based findings requires discussion of all eleven statements.

(a) Statements of Superintendent Goff.

Union steward Long testified that an unidentified electrician at a pre-election group meeting, "asked why we couldn't get them [salaried] benefits before," and that "Mr. Goff, I think, replied that the company had to deal with a third party. And if they didn't have to deal with this third party, they wouldn't have to process grievances, have arbitration and negotiation. They wouldn't need Labor Relations; they'd have more money to spend on the Dow employees." Interpreting Goff's response as "a clear indication that without the Union, employees would get more money," the board viewed it as a promise of benefit.

A truthful statement, in answer to a question on why money was not being spent on employees, that more money would be available to spend on employees if it were not being spent on labor relations, is not the same as a promise that that money would be spent on higher wages and benefits for employees. Economics, to say nothing of common sense, dictate that without the costs of running a Labor Relations department, and of negotiating and administering collective bargaining agreements, Dow would have more money to spend elsewhere. Whether that money should be spent on labor relations was not involved in the statement. That choice was yet to be made by the employees at the election. The statement that more money would be available is thus one of existing fact. In view of Dow's repeated disclaimers concerning promises, the truthful statement that Dow would "have more money to spend on the Dow employees" must be viewed as incorporating Dow's unquestioned unilateral right to choose, after decertification, whether to spend it on the employees or elsewhere. That the question dealt with salaried benefits known to be higher, that decertification had historically meant "going salaried," and that the question itself required reference to the union, are further circumstances undermining the board's interpretation of the statement as a promise. Accordingly, we find Goff's response protected under § 8(c).

Long further testified that Goff answered a question about "how much money they was [sic] talking about" by stating that "he couldn't tell us anything about the amount of money, but the lowest paid carpenter made more than the highest paid electrician." The board says this "direct comparison between the wages of the nonrepresented carpenters and the represented electricians indicated to employees the benefits of nonrepresentation," and thus constituted a promise of benefit.

The board did not elucidate the basis for its apparent belief that employers may not in an election campaign truthfully indicate to employees the benefits of nonrepresentation. Nor did it explain the basis for its conversion of that indication into a promise. Nor did it explicate the obvious conflict with its statement in Walgreen Co., supra. Nor did it say why it thought employees involved as the electorate in an election campaign should not be told "the benefits of nonrepresentation," along with, as the board would presumably approve, the benefits of representation.

Unchallenged testimony established the truth of the response that "the lowest paid carpenter made more than the highest paid electrician." Hence Goff's statement in response to an employee's question was no more than a truthful comparison of benefits available to represented and unrepresented employees, a comparison recognized as legitimate campaign conduct protected under § 8(c). See Central Hardware Co. v. N.L.R.B., 439 F.2d 1321, 1329 (8th Cir. 1971), vacated on other grounds, 407 U.S. 539, 92 S.Ct. 2238, 33 L.Ed.2d 122 (1972); J. S. Dillon & Sons Stores Co. v. N.L.R.B., 338 F.2d 395, 400 (10th Cir. 1964); N.L.R.B. v. Laars Engineers, Inc., 332 F.2d 664, 667 (9th Cir.), cert., denied, 379 U.S. 930, 85 S.Ct. 325, 13 L.Ed.2d 342 (1964); and Walgreen Co., supra.

Moreover, Goff explained without contradiction that he told the employees that salaries were confidential, that he could not answer questions about salary directly, and that it was only the need to correct the implication that unrepresented carpenters were treated less favorably than electricians, and to set the record straight, that caused him to make the comparison. Goff's statement in context was not a promise to grant increases if employees voted to decertify.

Union steward Tomlin testified that Goff stated "that because we were represented by the Union, that Dow couldn't pay us sometime [sic] what they'd like to. And I asked him why. And Lee Wilkins answered and said it was because of the laws that they couldn't pay it." Electrician Salinas testified that Goff had "said something about that he would like to pay us more than what we were worth, but he couldn't pay it because we belonged to the I.B.E.W. And I think Mr. Tomlin asked him why. And then before Mr. Charlie Goff could answer, Lee Wilkins jumped up and told him that it was the law. * * *" The board viewed Goff's statements as promises.

Lee Wilkins, Manager of Labor Relations, testified, without contradiction, that Tomlin, the questioner, had first paid pay scales in the collective bargaining agreement were merely a minimum, not prohibiting Dow from paying more than the agreed rates. Consistent with the testimony of Tomlin and Salinas, Wilkins said he responded to Tomlin that, as he understood it, "any benefit offered any bargained for personnel with respect to increase of wages or benefits of any kind had to be offered to all. And [Dow] couldn't individually decide what a given electrician was worth."

Dow was foreclosed from paying individual employees without regard to the provisions of Article XXVIII of the labor contract governing wage adjustments within particular job classifications. The statements of Goff and Wilkins concerning an inability to unilaterally vary wages among individuals beyond the agreed scale was thus not a promise but a truthful statement of existing fact protected under § 8(c).

Electrician Allen testified that at a meeting someone had asked, "what was going to happen to Mr. T. A. Hutchins," an apprentice who had failed the journeyman test a few weeks before the election. According to Allen, Goff answered, "[I]f Mr. Hutchins was [sic] salaried that the company would have more leeway as to what to do with it; but under the existing labor contract, that he was washed out." That response to a question, citing a labor contract provision, was given a new connotation when the board found that "Goff was pointing out that management would be more lenient with apprentices if they were unrepresented and thereby violated Section 8(a)(1)."

Article 30, § 7 of the collective bargaining agreement between Dow and IBEW provides that, "an apprentice who fails the [journeyman] exam will be released from the program." Allen admitted that Goff had essentially said that if there were no labor contract in the picture, individual treatment could be given in such cases. Goff did not promise that Hutchins, or any other apprentice who failed a journeyman test, would be retained in the future if the electricians voted to decertify. "Leeway" is not here synonymous with "leniency." In context, therefore, Goff's remark was at most a truthful identification of a possible disadvantage of being governed by a labor contract. It was a truthful response to a question, to which under the circumstances the only alternatives would be either an incomplete answer or a refusal to answer. As such, it constituted an accurate observation of fact within the bounds of legitimate electioneering protected under § 8(c).

(b) Statements of Foreman Williamson.

Electrician Allen testified that one day during the decertification campaign, he and Williamson "were just talking about general things; you know, talking a lot about it was such a pretty day, and I commented I'd sure like to go fishing. And he said, well, if we were to decertify, then I possibly could, you know." Allen also stated, however, that he had realized that half-days off were a salaried benefit. The board says Williamson's comment was "a holding out of a possible benefit."

Allen's testimony describes a conversation about "general things," "a pretty day," and his expressed desire to "go fishing." Williamson's response thus occurred in a casual conversation, the very type of "setting free from coercion" referred to by the board in Walgreen Co., supra at 181. Allen knew that one benefit available to unrepresented employees, but not negotiated for IBEW members, was the right to take half-day vacations. Williamson's remark referring to that known and factual possibility, in response to Allen's expression of a desire to go fishing on a pretty day, was not a promise of benefit but a statement protected under § 8(c).

(c) Statements of Foreman McGee.

Electrician Johnson testified that on the day before or the morning of the election, McGee came to his shop area and said "that he thought the electricians would be better off salaried, and that he figured that a guy would be dumb or stupid not to vote to decertify or to go salaried." Electrician LeBoeuf testified that McGee on the day before the election, told him that "he wished that we would decertify; that it would be to my—for my future and security that we do so." The board found these statements promises violative of § 8(a)(1).

There being no evidence that either Johnson or LeBoeuf viewed McGee's comments about what he "thought" and "figured" and "wished" as either coercive or promissory, those comments can only be considered the type of generalized statements of opinion permissible on both sides in an election campaign. The record is devoid of substantial evidence to support a finding of a § 8(a)(1) violation in McGee's statements of his opinion.

Electrician Rab testified that during the campaign Oswald told him that "he wished we would decertify, because if we did * * * they could do a lot more for us. They could perhaps, take us out for supper, or something to that effect, and reward us for doing a real good job." The ALJ stated that though "taking them 'to supper' seems almost innocuous, it does nevertheless, continue a trend of promising employees 'rewards' if they decertified the Union." The board found Oswald's comment violative of § 8(a)(1).

Testimony of a witness must be reviewed and evaluated in its entirety. Here, for example, the ALJ and the board quoted only partially from Rab's testimony, disregarding that part in which Rab testified that Oswald also said, in the same conversation, that "he wasn't promising anything." There is no inconsistency between the two segments of Oswald's statement described by Rab, and no reason to choose one and exclude the other. Indeed, the ALJ found it unnecessary to consider whether disclaimers of promises were said "tongue in cheek" because "employees and supervisors acknowledged that if the union were decertified, the employees involved would become salaried based on past practice and the fact that the Company had only two classes of employees, hourly represented and salaried unrepresented."

Testimony of a witness must also be evaluated in light of that of other witnesses which is consistent with the testimony under evaluation. Rab's testimony that Oswald denied any promise cannot be simply ignored, particularly in light of its total consistency with Oswald's unchallenged testimony that he had made it "very clear" to employees that he could not make any promises, and that in response to employee questions, he explained his views on how being treated individually could work to the employee's advantage. In the context of the freedom to state the truth and honest opinion in an election campaign, and in light of all consistent testimony, including the admitted disclaimer of any promises, Oswald's remark was not a promise but a protected statement under § 8(c).

(e) Statements of Foreman St. Clair.

Union steward Long testified that St. Clair told him during the campaign that "he believed we would be better off going salaried." Long further testified that St. Clair later called him into his office and told him "we would be better off decertified, and we'd have better benefits and make more money." Electrician Henderson testified that St. Clair told him that "he thought that the electricians would be better off financially and in benefits by going salaried—decertifying." The board considered St. Clair's comments promises.

Apart from the right of an employer in an election campaign to say it "believed" and "thought" employees would be "better off," the corollary of a union's right to say they would not be, the circumstances in which St. Clair's comments were made cannot be disregarded. Those circumstances cast a light quite different from that in which the board viewed those comments. Henderson admitted that he had known St. Clair for twenty-five years and considered him a friend. Their conversation occurred on a non-business related drive together on a Sunday afternoon. Long also knew St. Clair, who was not his supervisor, for a long time and had talked with him in his office several times before, "usually about fishing." St. Clair candidly testified that he told Long "friend to friend" that it was his "honest, personal opinion" that the electricians would be better off if the Union were decertified.

That neither Long nor Henderson testified that they interpreted St. Clair's statements of his thoughts and beliefs as promises of better benefits and wages in exchange for decertification, is consistent with St. Clair's unchallenged denial of ever promising anything to Long or Henderson.

Nothing in the law prohibits an employer's representatives in an election campaign for stating, in a setting free from coercion, their opinion or belief that voters would be better off if they voted to decertify, any more than it prohibits union representatives from stating a contrary opinion. That is what an election campaign is all about. The statements of St. Clair to personal friends in private conversations were noncoercive expressions of personal opinion protected under § 8(c).

(B) Coercive Questions.

The ALJ labeled three occasions, when Dow supervisors asked certain employees about the election, "a systematic campaign of interrogation." The board says the three occasions involved coercive inquiries or unlawful interrogation in violation of § 8(a)(1). Quite apart from whether three instances of inquiry during a month-long campaign for the allegiance of 115 voters may be considered a "systematic" anything, the inquiries themselves cannot on this record be considered coercive. No witness testified that he considered any of the three questions coercive, and nothing in the circumstances of record warranted the ALJ, the board, or would warrant us, in doing so.

In N.L.R.B. v. McGahey, 233 F.2d 406 (5th Cir. 1956), this court described casual and moderate inquiries, even as to union preference, absent evidence indicating that the employee has reason to consider the inquiries a threat of reprisals, as not constituting an unfair labor practice in violation of § 8(a)(1). In McGahey, threats to close the plant and comparable menacing predictions were forecasts of reprisals. No such threats appear in the present record.

In Federal Mogul Corp. v. N.L.R.B., supra, this court supplied extensive guidance and precedent in setting forth what it designated the Bourne Rule. Bourne v. N.L.R.B., 332 F.2d 47 (2d Cir. 1964); see also N.L.R.B. v. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d 803, 804 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 926, 86 S.Ct. 313, 15 L.Ed.2d 339 (1965). Under that rule, all of the circumstances must be considered in light of certain listed factors. This court there described the ALJ's election not to apply the Bourne Rule as improper.

In Paceco v. N.L.R.B., 601 F.2d 180, 182–183 (5th Cir. 1979), this court said: "While it is correct as a general proposition that '[o]nly when the interrogation tends to restrain, coerce, or interfere with employees in the exercise of their rights under the Act is such interrogation proscribed by Section 8(a)(1),' NLRB v. Sunnyland Packing Co., 5 Cir. 1966, 369 F.2d 787, 793 * * * [citations omitted], we find the mere recital of that general standard without more too cryptic to permit us to determine whether there is substantial evidence to support the board's conclusions." In Paceco, this court again detailed the factors[9] to be considered in determining whether a line of questioning has the effect of interfering with employee's rights under § 7 of the Act,[10] vacated the board's order, and remanded for reconsideration in light of those factors.

Here, the board's brief contains ad hoc assertions of counsel touching at most four of the eight factors listed in Paceco. Neither the ALJ nor the board articulated a relationship of Paceco factors to the challenged inquiries. In the interest of judicial economy, and in view of the nature and circumstances of the three inquiries involved, we decline what would be merely a pro forma remand to the board for application of Paceco factors. That action would serve only to further delay for the parties a final resolution of a dispute now more than three years old.

When the inquiries here involved are examined in light of over thirty-four years of Dow—IBEW collective bargaining, on this record hardly a history of hostility on either side, in light of all the evidence, in light of the factors listed in Paceco, and in light of this court's prior holdings, the inquiries are seen to be non-violative of § 8(a)(1).

(a) Question of Superintendant Goff.

Salinas testified that Goff asked "what I thought about the decertification, and I told him that either way it would affect my family." The board found Goff's inquiry "coercive and violative of Section 8(a)(1)."

Goff asked Salinas a single question on what he thought about the election. That question did not concern Salinas' voting intention. Goff pressed no further after Salinas' noncommittal response. Goff is not even alleged to have asked Salinas how he intended to vote or for his attitude toward the Union. There is not the slightest evidence indicating that Salinas had reason to consider the question as forecasting a reprisal. We find nothing in the record to support the finding that Goff's question was coercive or that it constituted a § 8(a)(1) violation.

(b) Question of Foreman Hargrove.

Electrician Hernandez testified that Hargrove asked him and another electrician (Gary) "how we was [sic] voting." Hernandez testified that he remained silent but that Gary answered "yes," meaning, says Hernandez, that Gary would be voting for the Union, and that Hargrove then "started talking about our benefits would be better * * * both as far as insurance goes and * * * we would have a better opportunity going salaried." The board said Hargrove "engaged in unlawful interrogation and promises of benefits, both of which constitute separate violations of Section 8(a)(1)."

Hernandez was the only employee to claim that a supervisor had asked how any employee intended to vote.[11] Yet Hernandez also testified that Hargrove's question was posed "in a joking manner." Again, in analyzing a question to detect the presence of coercion, the context, manner, and circumstances in which the question occurred cannot simply be ignored. That neither Hernandez nor Gary said they felt coerced, and that the question was admittedly put and received in a humorous tone, indicate its noncoercive nature. The record lacks substantial evidence to support a finding that Hargrove's question constituted coercive or unlawful interrogation.

When asked whether Hargrove had ever made any promises to him of increased benefits, Hernandez answered "No." He acquiesced in a characterization of the conversation with Hargrove as essentially a discussion of benefits available under salaried status, that is, a comparison fully within the bounds of § 8(c). No support can be found in the record for the board's finding that Hargrove's statements constituted promises in violation of § 8(a)(1).

[9] History of employer's conduct toward employees; nature of information sought; position of questioner in company's hierarchy; place and method of interrogation; truthfulness; whether employer had a valid purpose for information on union strength; whether that purpose was communicated to employees interrogated; and whether company personnel gave employees any assurances that they would not be subject to reprisals. Paceco v. N.L.R.B., supra at 183.

[10] Section 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157:

"Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engaged in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 158(a)(3) of this title."

[11] Hargrove denied asking about intention, and testified that he only asked "their feelings on the election, and how did they think the election would go." Gary, described by Hernandez as the only one who answered, did not testify. His testimony might have been helpful in resolving the testimonial conflict. As indicated in the text, we do not attempt here to resolve the conflict, nor do we consider allegations of hearsay, but accept the truth of Hernandez' testimony. We do, however, evaluate Hernandez' testimony in its entirety.

Electrician Elliott testified that Walker "wanted to know what my feelings was [sic] about the voting and the election," that he answered that he would not be where he is today but for the Union, and that Walker said "if we went salaried, that it would be beneficial—could be beneficial to me, on account of my age and length of service." The board says that "by interrogating Elliott and indicating it would be beneficial to him if he voted to decertify, [Dow] engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1)."

652

Elliott did not say Walker asked his voting intention, a fact consistent with Walker's uncontradicted testimony that he did not ask Elliott how he intended to vote. Elliott did not testify that he felt coerced and the question is not in haec verba coercive. Insubstantial evidence appears in the record to support a finding, even by inference, that Walker's question was anything other than the type of casual or moderate inquiry described as non-violative of § 8(a)(1) by this court in McGahey, supra.

Elliott did not testify that Walker made any promises, or that he viewed anything Walker said as a promise, a fact consistent with Walker's uncontradicted testimony that he had told employees "[o]n many, many occasions" that he could not make any promises. To state the view that decertification could be beneficial is permissible campaign rhetoric, as is a union representative's statement that decertification would not be beneficial.

The board said Walker's statement was a promise, but merely labeling a statement a promise does not make it so. A finding that a statement not in haec verba a promise must nonetheless be so interpreted requires some evidence in the record to support that interpretation. Nothing of record supports an inference that Walker's statement that going salaried "could be beneficial" was a promise. In the present record, no evidentiary basis exists for the board's finding that Walker's statement was a promise violative of § 8(a)(1).

(C) Comparisons Made in Meetings and Letters.

Each of the board's eleven findings based on pre-election statements to IBEW members being without support in the record, there remains in the pre-election picture only the comparisons made at the group meetings and in the three Rikard letters to IBEW members. The ALJ, as above indicated, viewed that evidence as presenting "a strong argument that the Company was correctly detailing the existing facts to employees in order that they could make an informed decision in the election." The ALJ in the IBPAT proceeding found that comparisons substantially identical to those made to IBEW members "did not interfere with employee free choice in the election," and the board adopted that finding in that proceeding. The substantially identical exhortations to vote "No" in the Rikard and McClure letters were apparently considered, as they are here, as permissible electioneering rhetoric.

The record establishes that the comparisons made here are precisely the type described by the board in Walgreen Co., supra, as within the right granted an employer in § 8(c). The ALJ and the board effectively found the comparisons themselves in the IBEW proceeding free from coercion. Looking to the entire course of Dow's conduct, as it should, and noting the pre-election statements discussed above, the board found the comparisions at meetings and letters tainted as part of a campaign to "woo" the IBEW members from their union. The difficulty in that approach is that every election campaign is a wooing process, engaged in by the employer and union. If Dow, in all its challenged pre-election conduct, sought to woo its employees from the Union, that intent is of no moment in itself, an employer's "wooing," absent threats or promises, being specifically sanctioned by § 8(c) of the Act. N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., supra; N.L.R.B. v. Sidran, 181 F.2d 671, 674–75 (5th Cir. 1950); N.L.R.B. v. Laars Engineers, Inc., 332 F.2d 664, 665–67 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 930, 85 S.Ct. 325, 13 L.Ed.2d 342 (1964); N.L.R.B. v. Enid Co-op Creamery Assoc., 169 F.2d 986 (10th Cir. 1948). Here, as above indicated, the view that eleven statements constituted "promises" and "unlawful interrogation" sufficient to have tainted the comparisons made at meetings and in letters is without support in the record.[12]

The board adopted one ALJ's finding that comparisions to IBEW members constituted violations. It also adopted another ALJ's finding that virtually identical comparisons to IBPAT members did not. The board distinguishes the former on the basis of statements found to be violations, a distinction that disappears, as above indicated, when those statements are viewed in light of the evidence and the law.

It has been recognized that a course or pattern of anti-union activity, or anti-union animus or hostility, may create an atmosphere in which otherwise seemingly innocuous statements may impede employees' free choice. N.L.R.B. v. Kaiser Agricultural Chemicals, supra, at 381. There is here, however, no finding and no evidence whatever of any such course or pattern, and no basis in law for distinguishing the comparisons made to IBEW members from those made to IBPAT members.

The board's findings that Dow violated § 8(a)(1) in its pre-election conduct in the IBEW election being without support in the record, enforcement of that portion of the board's order based on those findings must be denied, and its order setting aside the election must be vacated.

(2) Post-Election Conduct of Dow.

In the IBEW and IBPAT proceedings, the board found Dow's unilateral post-election transfer of employees to salaried status an unfair labor practice in two respects: first, as a § 8(a)(5) violation of its duty to bargain, and, second, as a § 8(a)(1) violation of its duty to refrain from interfering with the employees' § 7 rights in a possible rerun election. The board relied on its holding in Presbyterian Hospital, supra, that when a union loses a decertification election an employer may not withhold dues under a preexisting bargaining agreement provision for dues checkoff, decline to transfer them to the union, and save them until the board resolves the union's election objections. The board there expressed the view that a union that has lost a decertification election remains the employees' bargaining representative until all union objections are resolved and the final election results have been validated by the board, and that a refusal to bargain during that interim period thus violates § 8(a)(5). The board's treatment of Dow's post-election conduct creates a case of first impression in this court.

The board's application of Presbyterian Hospital as a basis for holding Dow's post-election changes a violation of a duty to bargain under § 8(a)(5) conflicts with the rule applied in both proceedings by the ALJs here. Each held that Dow was free to place the employees on salaried status and grant raises, but that it did so at its peril while the union's election objections were pending. Sustaining the objections in the IBEW proceedings, that ALJ found Dow's post-election conduct a violation of § 8(a)(5) and § 8(a)(1). Rejecting the objections in the IBPAT proceeding, the other ALJ found Dow's same post-election conduct not a violation and dismissed the § 8(a)(5) and § 8(a)(1) allegations.

Before us, the parties describe the rule applied by the ALJs as having its origin in Mike O'Connor Chevrolet-Buick-GMC Co., 209 NLRB 701 (1974), enforcement denied on other grounds, 512 F.2d 684 (8th Cir. 1975), and refer to that rule as "the Mike O'Connor rule." The rule, however, has a long pedigree reflected in decisions rendered by this court before and after Mike O'Connor.[13]

---

[12] The board's brief makes much of Manager Kessler's testimony in the IBPAT proceeding as proof that the elections were conducted differently. The partially quoted testimony, however, related only to the events at meetings. Further, the board lacks candor in mischaracterizing Kessler's testimony. When asked whether at any meeting he told the painters that if they voted to decertify "they would be transferred to salary status and receive the salaried schedule benefits," Kessler answered: "Absolutely not. With my prior experience in the electrician's campaign, I know what is and is not proper under the rules covered by the National Labor Relations Board, and we absolutely went out of our way to make sure we did not make any promises." The board's brief disingenuously recasts that testimony: "Kessler further testified that as a result of the Company's 'prior experience in the electricians' campaign' it had learned what was and was not 'proper under the rules covered by the National Labor Relations Act, and * * * absolutely went out of [its] way to make sure * * * [not to] make any promises." Neither the ALJs nor the board made any reference to Kessler's testimony, perhaps because Kessler did not say "as a result of the Company's" prior experience, or that "it had learned" what "was and was not" proper.

Div.,* 571 F.2d 279, 282 (5th Cir. 1978); General Electric Co., Battery Prod., Capacitor Dep't, 400 F.2d 713, 717–18 (5th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 904, 89 S.Ct. 1012, 22 L.Ed.2d 216 (1969); and N.L.R.B. v. N.L.R.B., 235 F.2d 37, 42–43 (5th Cir. 1956), cert. denied, 352 U.S. 916, 77 S.Ct. 214, 1 L.Ed.2d 122 (1956); and N.L.R.B. v. Houston Chronicle Publishing Co., 300 F.2d 273 (5th Cir. 1962).

Under what we will also call the Mike O'Connor rule, an employer may make unilateral changes following a union victory in an initial representation election and before the employer's election objections are resolved, but does so at its peril. If the employer's objections are sustained, no duty to bargain with the union existed and a failure to bargain charge under § 8(a)(5) will be dismissed. See N.L.R.B. v. Houston Chronicle Publishing Company, 300 F.2d 273 (5th Cir. 1962). If the employer's objections are rejected, its duty to bargain relates back to the date of the election, and the employer's unilateral actions while objections were pending are automatic violations of § 8(a)(5). See Anchortank, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 618 F.2d 1153 (5th Cir. 1980).

Though Mike O'Connor involved an initial representation election won by the union, and the present case involves a decertification election lost by the union, we see no basis in law or justice for distinguishing between types of election or for distinguishing on a basis of which side won or lost. Moreover, we view the Act as requiring that its labor peace goals, as well as protection of workers' freedom to choose, be achieved by an even-handed application of the same rules of the game to all elections and to both sides.

As above indicated, the board rejected the ALJs' effective application of the Mike O'Connor rule, by holding that Dow's obligation to bargain continues after a union has lost a decertification election and until election objections are reviewed by the board, regardless of whether the election is ultimately held lawful. The impracticality of that approach in the present context is illustrated by the board's order to bargain in the IBPAT proceeding. The board decertified IBPAT and, on the same day, ordered Dow to cease and desist from "[u]nilaterally changing the terms and conditions of employment of unit employees * * * prior to the final resolution concerning any question concerning the continuing representation of [IBPAT] * * * or any incumbent union." General Counsel's admission at oral argument that the board provided a highly technical remedy does not go far enough. The "remedy" was constructed of smoke.

There was no instant of time afforded by the board's order in which Dow would be able to bargain with a union that was not board-decertified. Ironically, the board noted that "Nothing herein is to be construed, however, as requiring [Dow] to rescind any of the wage increases or other benefits, the granting of which we have found to be unlawful." The order to bargain may at best be described as a general admonition, possibly applicable sometime in an unknowable future.

Beyond its impracticality, a broad application of Presbyterian Hospital to decertification elections lost by a union would deprive former union members of the right to express their choice in the election from the date of the election to the date on which the board completed its review of the election, and would do so whether the election was fair or unfair. In the present case, Presbyterian Hospital would have so deprived IBPAT members from September 22, 1978 until July 18, 1980—that is, for almost twenty-two months. Under Mike O'Connor, the choice expressed by union members is immediately honored. If the election is found to have been fair, that choice remains undisturbed. Only if the election is found to have been unfair is that choice overturned.

In Presbyterian Hospital, the board articulated policy and practical considerations it viewed as undergirding the concept that the result of a decertification election must be in limbo until the board resolved objections: "The well-established rule concerning election results is that they are not effective until certification [i. e. validation by the board] * * *. If the status of the parties were to change immediately upon the tally of ballots, the possibility of sustained objections and rerun elections might lead to a number of changes in the collective bargaining relationship before a representative is finally certified * * *. The general rule * * * lends certainty and stability to the process since the parties may safely maintain the status quo until the representation question is conclusively resolved by the Board." Presbyterian Hospital, supra at 998, quoting Trico Products Corp., 238 NLRB 1306 at 1307 (1978).

Though the foregoing articulation has the sound of superficial plausibility, it collapses when confronted with the Mike O'Connor rule. The latter rule, which the board chose not to mention in its Decision and Order, is not only more fair and practical, but meets the desiderata articulated by the board in Presbyterian Hospital. Mike O'Connor's requirement that an employer whose election objections are overruled must bargain retroactively about all post-election changes, thus restoring the duty-to-bargain status quo as of the date of the election, is fully applicable to the present circumstances. It is clear that a long-established union should not be destroyed immediately upon its loss of a decertification election, but Mike O'Connor causes no such result. The union continues to exist and, if its election objections are sustained, the employer must bargain retroactively with it. Further, the employees may elect at an appropriate time to return to the union. If, on the other hand, a union's objections are rejected and it has thus lost a fair election, no reason appears for requiring an employer to bargain with it, or for holding employees bound to it, throughout the pendency of its objections.

Moreover, the board is inaccurate in stating that the view broadly expressed in Presbyterian Hospital is "well-established," insofar as its application to an employer's general duty to bargain with a union that has lost a decertification election is concerned.[14] Before us, the board cites three cases: Andor Company, Inc., 119 NLRB 925 (1957); N.L.R.B. v. Albert Van Luit & Co., 597 F.2d 681 (9th Cir. 1979); and Trico Products Corp., supra. Andor did not involve an election, but dealt only with an employee petition for a deauthorization election to rescind a union security clause. The board said that if the employees voted to deauthorize it would be effective on board validation. Luit involved only the question of whether employee revocations of dues checkoff authorizations were valid during pendency of union objections to a deauthorization election. In Andor and Luit, the union necessarily continued as the recognized representative of the employees, the involved deauthorization elections relating only to continuance of specific provisions in bargaining agreements. In Trico, the election was between competing unions, the incumbent union lost, and the sole charge related to the employer's withholding and transfer of dues to the incumbent union. None of the cases cited by the board involved a charge of failure to bargain under § 8(a)(5) based on an employer's change to salaried status of employees who had voted to decertify their union.

Enforcement of union dues checkoff and security clauses basically concern the relationship of employees to their union, with the employer only peripherally involved. The Presbyterian Hospital view may serve the purpose of maintaining financial integrity of a union which has merely lost a security clause deauthorization election, as in Andor and Luit. It may serve a similar purpose with respect to payment of dues checkoff money to a union that has lost an election to another union, as in Trico. We make no evaluation of the merits of Presbyterian Hospital as it may apply to the facts in those cases. It is sufficient here to indicate that it was in appropriately applied to the duty to bargain on change to salaried status amid the distinct facts in the present case.[15]

Before us, the board argues that if the Mike O'Connor rule were to apply to the outcome of a decertification election lost by a union, a victorious employer could profit by its own unfair labor practices—that is, an employer might thereby unfairly regain for a time its freedom to make unilateral changes if the union's election objections were ultimately sustained. In so arguing, the board disregards not only the employee's right to prompt recognition of their choice, but the effect of Mike O'Connor's requirement that an employer's freedom to make changes be rendered conditional while election objections are pending. Similarly, the board disregards the "heads I win, tails you lose" aspect of its insistence that the no-duty-to-bargain status quo must be changed immediately when a union wins a representation election, as required by Mike O'Connor, and that the duty-to-bargain status quo must not be changed when a union loses a decertification election. Nor does the board appear to recognize that a victorious union could profit by its own unfair labor practices when, as it should be, Mike O'Connor is applied to the outcome of a decertification election won by the union—that is, that a union might have unfairly impinged for a time upon an employer's autonomy to make unilateral changes (and on employees' freedom of choice) if the employer's election objections are ultimately sustained. Rules should not be designed on an assumption that either employers or unions are or are not likely to employ them unfairly. Nor, as above indicated, should the rule applied be dependent on which side wins. The board enjoys a "wide discretion over representation matters," Brooks v. N.L.R.B., 348 U.S. 96, 103, 75 S.Ct. 176, 181, 99 L.Ed. 125 (1954), yet that discretion cannot reasonably encompass application of one rule governing creation of an obligation to bargain and application of a different rule governing dissolution of an obligation to bargain.

[14] Presbyterian Hospital was decided by the board during the year after the events involved herein. In Sec v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 203, 67 S.Ct. 1575, 1580, 91 L.Ed. 1995 (1947) the court stated, "Every case of first impression has a retroactive effect, whether the new principle is announced by a court or by an administrative agency. But such retroactivity must be balanced against the mischief of producing a result which is contrary to a statutory design or to legal and equitable principles. If that mischief is greater than the ill effect of the retroactive application of a new standard, it is not the type of retroactivity which is condemned by law." Because Presbyterian Hospital is clearly out of line with the statutory design expressed in § 7 and § 159(a), its retroactive application by the board to the instant cases was the type of retroactivity condemned by law.

[15] No issue respecting dues checkoff or union security clauses is presented in the present appeals. We need not hold in this case, therefore, that the Mike O'Connor rule, enabling unilateral employer changes at peril and providing for retroactive bargaining, would accommodate the balance of interests raised by those issues.

In its insistence that an employer's duty to bargain arises, and a new relationship is established, as soon as a union wins an election, but not the converse, the board confuses employees' freedom of choice with a policy favoring unions. Indeed, the board's brief describes Mike O'Connor as an "exception" adopted "to protect a union's status as the majority representative," and describes the issue here as "the continued status of the union," emphasizing the value in preserving stability in "established relationships." The recognized goals of a union-favoring policy have long been recognized. The board, and we, however, must be governed by the law. Section 7 of the Act provides that "[e]mployees shall [not only] have the right to self-organization, to form, join or assist labor organizations" but "shall also have the right to refrain from any and all such activities." Presbyterian Hospital, when employed to enforce continued bargaining with a union that has lost a fair decertification election, as the board did here in the IBPAT proceeding, results in a form of compulsory unionism in disregard of the employees' untainted and uninfluenced vote to become non-union, and a consequent denial of the employees' statutory right of free choice under § 7 of the Act.

Employment of Presbyterian Hospital to enforce a duty to bargain under the present circumstances is further inconsistent with the long-standing rule that an employer is under no obligation to bargain with a union if it has reasonable and good faith grounds for doubting the union's continued majority status.[16] See N.L.R.B. v. Gissel Packing Co., supra 395 U.S. at 597 n. 11, 89 S.Ct. at 1931 n. 11; N.L.R.B. v. Leatherwood Drilling Co., 513 F.2d 270 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1016, 96 S.Ct. 449, 46 L.Ed.2d 387 (1975); and N.L.R.B. v. A. W. Thompson, Inc., 449 F.2d 1333 (5th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 1065, 92 S.Ct. 1497, 31 L.Ed.2d 795 (1972). An employer having such a reasonable and good faith basis to doubt the union's continued majority status is not simply permitted but may be required by the Act to refrain from further bargaining with the union. See ILGWU v. N.L.R.B., 366 U.S. 731, 81 S.Ct. 1603, 6 L.Ed.2d 762 (1961). A contrary view would nullify the employees' freedom of choice recognized in § 7 of the Act.

Section 8(a)(5) provides that a violation occurs only when an employer refuses to bargain with "the representative of his employees." That obligation is expressly "subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title." Section 159(a),[17] in turn, provides that employee representatives must be selected "by the majority of the employees." Here, the board insists that an employer must bargain with a union that has lost an election (with IBEW even if the board had not found the election unfair; [16] The board contends that though Dow raised the issue of its good faith doubt in its brief to the board, it did not press it sufficiently to put the board on notice, and that Dow may not argue the matter before us. In answers to the complaints, Dow stated that since the filing date of the decertification petitions it "has had a good faith doubt of the Union's continued status as a representative of an uncoerced majority of the employees." There was, of course, no reason or basis for pressing before the board the matter of doubt as it related to Dow's post-election activities. Both ALJs considered those activities permissible, the ALJ in the IBEW proceeding finding that those activities constituted only a retroactive violation in view of what he considered pre-election violations. It was the board's election to inject its own view of Dow's post-election activities, finding them per se violations, that raises the issue of whether Dow had a good faith doubt justifying a refusal to bargain after the unions lost the elections.

[17] Section 159(a), 29 U.S.C. § 159(a)

> "Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment: Provided, That any individual employee or a group of employees shall have the right at any time to present grievances to their employer and to have such grievances adjusted, without the intervention of the bargaining representative, as long as the adjustment is not inconsistent with the terms of a collective-bargaining contract or agreement then in effect: Provided further, That the bargaining representative has been given opportunity to be present at such adjustment."

with IBPAT even though the board did find the election fair and decertified the union). It is difficult to perceive, however, of a more firm and logical basis for a reasonable and good faith doubt of a union's majority status than the fact of its having lost a fair decertification election.

For all of the foregoing reasons, we reverse the board's findings of § 8(a)(5) post-election violations in both cases.

Respecting the finding of a § 8(a)(1) violation, this court long ago refused to extend to the post-election period the pre-election prohibition of that section against the employer's granting benefits. N.L.R.B. v. Ambox, Incorporated, 357 F.2d 138, 141 (5th Cir. 1966); General Electric Co. v. N.L.R.B., 400 F.2d 713, 717 (5th Cir. 1968), cert. denied, 394 U.S. 904, 89 S.Ct. 1012, 22 L.Ed.2d 216 (1969). Accordingly, we reverse the findings of § 8(a)(1) violations based on post-election transfers to salaried status in both cases.

CONCLUSION

We deny enforcement of the board's orders in both cases, vacate the order setting aside the election in the IBEW proceeding, and remand the latter proceeding to the board for further action consistent with this opinion.

658

On petition to set aside Board Order

Before Ainsworth, Ingraham and Tate, Circuit Judges

627

Per Curiam: The employer ("Red Ball") petitions to set aside a remedial back pay and reinstatement order entered by the National Labor Relations Board against it, and the Board cross-petitions for enforcement of the order.

Red Ball had discharged its employee, Linda Surley, at the close of a work day, allegedly because she had been dilatory in commencing work at her desk at 8:00 A.M. that morning. On a complaint to such effect by the Board's regional director, the Administrative Law Judge (the ALJ) had held, after hearing, that the discharge was based on Surley's protected concerted activities in protesting and objecting to certain employment practices by Red Ball that were unfavorable to its clerical employees. On analysis of the record evidence, the ALJ concluded that Red Ball "seized upon" the failure of Surley (an employee of 9½ years tenure) "to commence work promptly at 8 A.M. as a pretext to make its true motivation, i.e., to rid itself of an employee who had demonstrated a growing propensity to engage in protected concerted activities."

The Board affirmed the rulings, findings, and conclusions of the ALJ. Red Ball Motor Freight, Inc. and Linda Surley, 253 NLRB No. 111 (1980). It agreed that the activities in which Surley had been engaged were protected by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157, as "concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection" with respect to the terms and conditions of employees. It upheld the unfair labor practice under Section 8(a)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), as found by the ALJ, in that Red Ball had interfered with or coerced the employee in her exercise of her protected concerted activities conduct. In doing so, however, the Board analyzed the issue in the light of its own recent decision in Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150 (1980). By that test, when the General Counsel had made a prima facie showing that Surley's participation in concerted activities protected under Section 7 of the Act was the motivating factor in Red Ball's decision to discharge her, the burden shifted to the company to establish that the discharge would have taken place in the absence of the protected conduct; Red Ball having failed to rebut the prima facie showing, the Board concluded that Red Ball had failed to show that, absent Surley's protected activities, her discharge would nevertheless have occurred.

Red Ball challenges the Board's Wright Line shift of the burden of proof, in mixed-cause discharges (i.e., at least partially based on protected conduct and also allegedly based on good cause), as improperly requiring an employer to prove its innocence and as in derogation of the right of management to discharge employees for cause, see, e.g., Section 10(c) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Another panel of this court, however, recently indicated no disapproval of the Board's use of the Wright Line test in determining whether, after a prima facie case of discharge for protected activities has been established, the "good" cause assigned was indeed the real reason rather than pretext for the discharge. N.L.R.B. v. Charles H. McCauley Associates, 657 F.2d 685 (5th Cir. 1981). Moreover, substantial evidence in the present record as a whole, as the Board's decision states, "amply supports the Administrative Law Judge's findings that Surley's growing propensity to engage in protected concerted activities caught the attention of Respondent's management, which was then motivated to engage in special surveillance of her work performance and to seize upon her first alleged transgression as a pretext to terminate her."

Accordingly, the petition for review of the order of the Board will be DENIED. The Board's cross-petition for enforcement of its order will be GRANTED.

ORDER ENFORCED.

Lippincott Industries, Inc. v. NLRB

661 F.2d 112 (9th Cir.), November 9, 1981—251 NLRB 262

On petition to review Board Order

Before WRIGHT and ANDERSON, Circuit Judges, and THOMPSON,* District Judge

113

J. BLAINE ANDERSON, Circuit Judge: Lippincott Industries, Inc. (Lippincott) petitions for review of a decision of the National Labor Relations Board (Board), 251 NLRB No. 34 (1980). The Board cross-applies for enforcement of its order.

The Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) concluded that Lippincott violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), by unlawfully interrogating three employees during the union organizational campaign. The ALJ further held that Lippincott violated Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (3), by discharging one of those employees three hours before the representation election because of her known pro-union sentiment, and because her discharge would have a chilling effect on the other employees who would be voting in the election. The Board affirmed the ALJ's findings and conclusions. We enforce the Board's order.

EMPLOYEE INTERROGATIONS

Interrogation of employees is an unfair labor practice when, under all the circumstances, the interrogation reasonably tends to restrain or interfere with the employees in the exercise of their protected rights. Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1080 (9th Cir. 1977). The Board's determination on this issue must be upheld if supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); NLRB v. International Medication Systems, Ltd., 640 F.2d 1110, 1112 (9th Cir. 1981).

The evidence of record sufficiently supports the Board's ruling that employee Peterson was subjected to interrogation(s) having a reasonable tendency to restrain or interfere with the exercise of protected rights, and Lippincott does not seriously contend otherwise. Rather, Lippincott challenges the ALJ's crediting of Peterson's testimony over the testimony of two of its supervisors. We may not reject the ALJ's credibility determinations unless a clear preponderance of the evidence shows they are incorrect. NLRB v. Carilli, 648 F.2d 1206, 1211 (9th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Inland Empire Meat Co., 611 F.2d 1235, 1238 (9th Cir. 1980). The record in this case does not.

The unlawful interrogation of Peterson justifies the Board's order to cease and desist from such conduct. Accordingly, it is unnecessary for us to address the interrogations of former employees Carter and Hartman.

EMPLOYEE DISCHARGE

The Board concluded, in agreement with the ALJ, that Peterson was discharged because of her known pro-union sentiment and because her discharge would have a chilling effect on the other employees who would be voting in the representation election a few hours later. The Board found that the legitimate business reasons advanced by Lippincott were contrived to provide an excuse for the discharge.

---

*The Honorable Bruce R. Thompson, Senior United States District Judge for the District of Nevada, sitting by designation.

The remedial order respecting this violation must be enforced if the Board correctly applied the law and if its findings of fact are supported by substantial evidence on the record viewed as a whole. NLRB v. Nevis Industries, Inc., 647 F.2d 905, 908 (9th Cir. 1981). Lippincott challenges the order on both counts.

We have carefully studied the parties' contentions regarding the applicable legal standard for determining whether a discharge is violative of the Act. The Board has characterized this as a "pretext" case. Lippincott describes it as a "mixed motive" case. We think that in terms of the proper legal standard to be applied, the difference between these two types of cases is of little importance.

Undoubtedly, the language in some of the cases has suggested a distinction. Compare, e.g., Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1083 (9th Cir. 1977) ("* * * the existence of a justifiable ground for discharge will not prevent such discharge from being an unfair labor practice if partially motivated by the employee's protected activity; a business reason cannot be used as a pretext for a discriminatory firing.") with Western Exterminator Co. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1114, 1118 (9th Cir. 1977) ("* * * where a discharge is motivated by both a legitimate business consideration and protected union activity, 'the test is whether the business reason or the protected union activity is the moving cause behind the discharge.' "). The perceived distinction, however, is more semantical than substantive. In either instance, the employer has asserted justifiable, legitimate business reasons for the discharge. The difference is 115 that in a pretext case the employer's reasons are discredited or otherwise rejected, leaving only the impermissible reason, while in a mixed motive case the relative causative force of the employer's reasons is compared against the impermissible reason to determine whether the latter is the moving cause behind the discharge. Therefore, the primary distinction between the two cases rests upon the differing weight that is attributed to the employer's explanation when examining the motivations behind a discharge. Of course, this determination is made after the evidence is presented.

The artificial distinction existing between these two classes of cases was eroded in Ad Art, Inc. v. NLRB, 645 F.2d 669, 678 (9th Cir. 1980), where this court stated that, "[w]hen a discharge is conceivably motivated both by legitimate business considerations and protected union activity, the test is whether the business reason or the protected union activity is the moving cause behind the discharge." (emphasis added). Many of our more recent decisions have stated the test without reference to the employer's asserted legitimate reasons. See, e.g., NLRB v. Anchorage Times Publishing Co., 637 F.2d 1359, 1366–67 (9th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Adams Delivery Service, Inc., 623 F.2d 96, 99 (9th Cir. 1980); Stephenson v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 1210, 1213 (9th Cir. 1980). Thus, the test is properly focused on the employer's impermissible motivation to determine whether anti-union animus was the moving cause, or but for cause, behind the decision to discharge an employee. The test so structured gives full recognition to the well accepted maxim that "[a]n employer may discharge an employee for good cause, bad cause, or no cause at all, without violating § 8(a)(3), as long as his motivation is not antiunion discrimination and the discharge does not punish activities protected by the Act." L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1341 (9th Cir. 1980).

We note in passing that the Board's decision in Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB No. 150, 105 LRRM 1169 (1980), while changing the procedural requirements, nonetheless applies a test designed to identify whether protected union activity was the moving cause behind the discharge. The rule announced in Wright Line has recently been accepted by this court. NLRB v. Nevis Industries, Inc., 647 F.2d 905, 909 (9th Cir. 1981). The Wright Line decision was rendered after the Board's decision in the instant case and will not be applied here. We mention it only to illustrate the consistent development of this area of law.

We must now determine whether the Board properly applied the law as described above. Lippincott directs us to the ALJ's decision wherein he sets forth the guiding rule as follows: "* * * a discharge motivated in part by an employee's exercise of section 7 rights is a violation even though another valid cause may also be present." (emphasis added). We agree with Lippincott that this statement of the test is incorrect. Stephenson v. NLRB, 614 F.2d 1210, 1213 (9th Cir. 1980). However, it is the Board's, not the ALJ's, application of the law that we review.

Nevertheless, Lippincott contends that the Board applied the "in part" test described by the ALJ. It relies on footnote 4 of the Board's decision wherein it is stated that member Penello found it unnecessary to rely on the "in part" test referred to by the ALJ. Lippincott argues that by logical implication, the other two members did rely on the improper test. We disagree. The Board did not explicitly state a test, and whatever contrary inference can be drawn from footnote 4 is dispelled by the unequivocal express language in the body of the decision. The Board concluded that Peterson was discharged because of her involvement with the union and because of the chilling effect that discharge would have on other employees. Lippincott's explanation was found "implausible" and its reasons "contrived." These expressions comport with the proper standard discussed above. We are convinced that the Board properly applied the law.

The only remaining question is whether the Board's findings are supported by substantial evidence on the record viewed as a whole. The Board may rely on circumstantial as well as direct evidence in determining an employer's motivation, NLRB v. Inland Empire Meat Co., 611 F.2d 1235, 1238 (9th Cir. 1979), and we must be mindful that the determination of motive is particularly within the purview of the NLRB. Pay'n Save Corp. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 697, 702 (9th Cir. 1981).

We have reviewed the entire record and find that a very close question is presented. Perhaps we would have reached a different conclusion had the evidence been presented to us de novo, but we are without power to substitute our view for the Board's choice between conflicting views. Ad Art, Inc. v. NLRB, 645 F.2d 669, 679 (9th Cir. 1980). The Board's inferences and findings are reasonable and supported by substantial evidence.

Lippincott's petition for review is denied. We enforce the Board's order.

NLRB v. Forest City Enterprises, Inc.

663 F.2d 34 (6th Cir.), November 10, 1981—248 NLRB 17

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Keith and Merritt, Circuit Judges, and Aldrich, District Judge*

35

In this case the NLRB seeks enforcement of its cease and desist order against respondent Forest City Enterprises' (the "Company") refusal to bargain with the certified union in violation of § 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Company justifies its refusal to bargain on the grounds (1) that the Board's certification of a single store bargaining unit was inappropriate, and (2) that the representation election was invalid because certain actions of the NLRB agent conducting the election destroyed the integrity and neutrality of the Board's procedures. We find that the Board did not abuse its discretion in certifying a single store as a bargaining unit, and that the NLRB misconduct alleged by the company was not so substantial as to have affected the outcome of the representation election. We therefore affirm the order of the NLRB.

In August, 1978 the union filed a representation petition seeking to represent the Company's employees at one of the Company's two retail stores in Akron, Ohio. The Company unsuccessfully contested the designation of the single store (the "Rolling Acres" store) as an appropriate bargaining unit claiming that the bargaining unit must include employees from both the Company's Akron area stores.

The union won a representation election (36 to 22) on December 1, 1978; however, the Company filed objections to the election claiming that the Board agent who conducted the election was unfairly prejudiced in favor of the union. The Regional Director conducted an investigation but refused the Company's request for a hearing and overruled the Company's objections finding that they did not raise substantial and material issues of fact or law. The union was certified as the exclusive collective bargaining representative. The Company's request for review of the Regional Director's decision was denied by the Board on April 5, 1979.

*The Honorable Ann Aldrich, Judge, United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

Unfair labor practice proceedings were initiated by the newly certified union after the Company refused to bargain with it. The Board granted summary judgment against the Company, finding a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1), and ordered the Company to bargain with the union. 248 N.L.R.B. No. 5 (March 3, 1980). The Board now petitions this Court for enforcement of its order.

I.

The Company first argues that it should not be required to bargain with the union because the designation of a single store bargaining unit in this case was inappropriate. To justify its refusal, the Company must establish that the Board abused its discretion in designating the bargaining unit, Meijer, Inc. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 737, 743 (6th Cir. 1977); and where the Board designates a single store bargaining unit, the Company has the additional burden of rebutting a presumption in favor of the designation, Haag Drug Co., 169 NLRB 899, 876 (1968). The Company has failed to overcome its burdens in this case.

Although Forest City Enterprises operates a multistate retail store chain with two stores in the Akron market area, the manager of the Rolling Acres store has significant control over the day to day operations and his decisions are rarely challenged by the central management. Moreover, there is little employee interchange between stores, and the attempts to organize a union and to initiate bargaining have occurred solely at the single store level. These factors support the view that the individual unit is able to deal with day to day issues of the bargaining relationship, Meijer, Inc. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d at 740. In light of the absence of broader union activity within the Company, the selection of a single store bargaining unit advances the policy of assuring employees the "fullest freedom" in exercising their rights under the NLRA. 29 U.S.C. § 159(b) (1976); Meijer, Inc., 564 F.2d at 742–43; Michigan Hospital Service Corp. v. NLRB, 472 F.2d 293, 296 (6th Cir. 1972).

There is thus ample basis for a finding that the designation of the single store bargaining unit was appropriate here.

II.

Disposition of the claim that the alleged irregularities in the representation election constitute a sufficient justification for the Company's refusal to bargain turns on the determination whether the objections raised, viewed in the light most favorable to the Company, merited a full hearing before the NLRB, or whether the objections were so insubstantial as to have neither impaired the neutrality of the election nor significantly affected the outcome.

The Company made 10 specific charges of election irregularities, which taken together amount to a claim that the Board agent was biased in favor of the union and that her bias was apparent to many employees destroying the "laboratory conditions" under which elections should be conducted.

We agree with the Board's determination that a sufficient number of employees was not affected to have changed the outcome of the election. See NLRB v. Bostik Division, USM Corp., 517 F.2d 971, 975 (6th Cir. 1975). We also find that the irregularities were not so extreme as to destroy confidence in the Board's election process. Cf. Provincial House, Inc. v. NLRB, 568 F.2d 8 (6th Cir. 1977) (Board agent fraternizing with union members).

Because we find that the objections, when interpreted in a manner most favorable to the Company's case fail to present any "substantial and material issues of fact," we agree that the Company was not entitled to a hearing in this case. The Regional Director conducted an ex parte investigation of the objections and found them insufficient to overturn the election. The Company then filed exceptions to the Regional Director's report which the Board found did not raise substantial issues warranting review. This Court has previously upheld such a procedure on similarly narrow grounds. Reichart Furniture Co. v. NLRB, 649 F.2d 397 (6th Cir. 1981).

Nonetheless, we must again emphasize that where a hearing is not granted and the determination whether objections to elections are substantial depends entirely on an ex parte report prepared by the Regional Director, that report must be included in the record submitted to the Board and the Court of Appeals. This Court has repeatedly suggested that due process demands and that the NLRB regulations apparently require such a record where substantial questions regarding the fairness of union elections are raised. See Reichart Furniture Co. v. NLRB, 649 F.2d 397, 398–99 (Merritt, J., concurring); NLRB v. North Electric Co., Plant No. 10, 644 F.2d 580 (6th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Curtis Noll Corp., 634 F.2d 1027 (6th Cir. 1980); Prestolite Wire Division v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 302 (6th Cir. 1979).

We find that the NLRB has not erred in issuing the order requiring the Company to bargain with the certified union. The order is hereby enforced.

NLRB v. St. Louis Christian Home

663 F.2d 60 (8th Cir.), November 11, 1981; rehearing and rehearing en banc denied December 10, 1981—251 NLRB 1477

On petition to enforce Board Order

61

Bright, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) petitions this court under section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), for enforcement of an order directing St. Louis Christian Home (the Home) to bargain collectively with the Nursing and Convalescent Division, Local 50, Service Employees International Union, AFL–CIO, CLC (the Union), as bargaining agent for the Home's childcare workers, a maintenance employee, and a storeroom clerk. This case presents the question of whether the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490, 99 S.Ct. 1313, 59 L.Ed.2d 533 (1979), exempting lay teachers in church-operated schools from NLRB jurisdiction, covers lay employees in church-operated institutions other than schools. We conclude that the employees of the respondent Home do not fall within the Catholic Bishop exemption. Accordingly, we grant enforcement of the NLRB's order.

I. Background.

The St. Louis Christian Home is an emergency residential treatment center for battered, abused, and neglected children between the ages of five and seventeen. It is organized as a nonprofit Missouri corporation and is an agency of the National Benevolent Association, the social service arm of the Christian Church Disciples of Christ (Christian Church). The Home was originally established in 1905 as an orphanage exclusively serving members of the Christian Church, but later changed its orientation. From the early 1960's through the early 1970's, the Home treated emotionally disturbed children from throughout Missouri, and in the early 1970's, the Home embarked on its current enterprise of treating battered, abused, and neglected children from the St. Louis area.[1]

The Home has facilities to accommodate thirty-two children and has completed construction of a cottage that will increase its capacity to forty-eight children. The Missouri Division of Family Services refers children to the Home, which accepts them as space becomes available. Children stay for an average of six weeks, during which time they remain wards of the state while a state social worker attempts to find permanent placement for them. The Home assists the state in placing the children, and provides the children with extensive therapy through social workers. Most of the children attend public school while staying at the Home, but those few (no more than six) unable to do so because of physical or mental problems attend classes in the Home.

Federal, state, and local governments provide the largest source of funds for the Home. Its funding pattern breaks down as follows:

Government: 55%
Christian Church: 19%
Investment income: 13%
Gifts: 6%
Bequests: 5%
Gifts in kind: 2%

The Missouri Division of Family Services does not license church-affiliated care institutions such as the Home, but such a care institution must fulfill the same requirements necessary for licensing of comparable nonreligious institutions in order to receive state funds for its services to abused children. For example, the Home must supply the state with copies of its constitution and bylaws, budget intake procedures, and personnel policies, as well as a list of its employees, their salaries, and records of their physical examinations. To comply with another state requirement, the Home must provide each child an opportunity for religious expression according to the religious preference of the child's family. The Home must obtain parental consent before a child attends a religious service of any church, including the Christian Church, if the practice of the church varies from the religious preference of the child or the child's family.

[1] The Home also operates a limited adoption service, placing about six babies a year with Christian Church families. None of the employees in the bargaining unit engage in this activity, however.

62

The Union petitioned for certification as bargaining agent for the Home's childcare workers, maintenance man, and storeroom clerk on December 4, 1979. All of the employees in the bargaining unit are lay workers. State regulations prescribe minimum qualifications for childcare workers: they must be over 21 years of age, have graduated from high school, pass yearly physical examinations, and be able to prepare meals and administer prescribed medication. Religious affiliation is not a factor in selection of these employees, and the record does not show how many, if any, belong to the Christian Church.[2]

Following a representation hearing on January 7, 1980, the Regional Director of the NLRB certified the unit as appropriate for collective bargaining on January 18, 1980. The Union won the election held February 15, 1980, and on February 26, 1980, the Regional Director certified the Union as bargaining representative for the designated employees. The Home refused to bargain, contesting the NLRB's asserted jurisdiction as a violation of the first amendment and the standards set out in NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra. The Union filed an unfair labor practices charge, and on August 27, 1980, the NLRB found the Home in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (5) (1976), and ordered the Home to bargain with the Union. The case has come before this court on an application for enforcement and cross-petition for review of the NLRB order.

II. Discussion.

A. Interstate Commerce.

The Home initially contends that it is not an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of sections 2(6) and (7) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 152(6), (7) (1976),[3] and as a result, its activities are outside the ambit of the NLRB's jurisdiction as defined in 29 U.S.C. § 160(a).[4] Congress intended to grant the NLRB, under the commerce clause, the broadest possible jurisdiction permitted by the Constitution. See NLRB v. Reliance Fuel Oil Corp., 371 U.S. 224, 226, 83 S.Ct. 312, 313, 9 L.Ed.2d 279 (1963); NLRB v. Alexander, 595 F.2d 454, 456 n.3 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 899, 100 S.Ct. 209, 62 L.Ed.2d 135 (1979); NLRB v. Erlich's 814, Inc., 577 F.2d 68, 70–71 (8th Cir. 1978). The NLRB sets discretionary jurisdictional standards expressed as a minimum level of gross annual revenues, and Congress explicitly approved this policy in the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959, 29 U.S.C. § 164(c)(1) (1976). The NLRB has set the jurisdictional standard for "day care centers, institutions involving specialized care and custody of children" at $250,000 in gross annual revenues. See The Rhode Island Catholic Orphan Asylum, a/k/a St. Aloysius Home, 224 NLRB 1344, 1345 n.6 (1976); Salt and Pepper Nursery School and Kindergarten No. 2, 222 NLRB 1295 (1976); cf. NLRB v. Kent County Association for Retarded Citizens, 590 F.2d 19 (1st Cir. 1978) (approving extensions of St. Aloysius Home standard to other nonprofit charitable institutions). Accordingly, because the Home's gross revenues in 1979 approximated $600,000, the

[3] The relevant portions of section 152 follow:

(6) The term "commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, or communication among the several States, or between the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States and any State or other Territory, or between any foreign country and any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or between points in the same State but through any other State or any Territory or the District of Columbia or any foreign country.

(7) The term "affecting commerce" means in commerce, or burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce, or having led or tending to lead to a labor dispute burdening or obstructing commerce or the free flow of commerce. [29 U.S.C. §§ 152(6), (7) (1976).]

[4] Subsection (a) provides in part:

(a) The Board is empowered, as hereinafter provided, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in section 158 of this title) affecting commerce. [29 U.S.C. § 160(a) (1976).]

NLRB exercised jurisdiction over the Home. Thus, the Home falls within the above jurisdictional standard.

The Home contends that because its children all come from Missouri and it purchases supplies solely from Missouri suppliers, it does not affect interstate commerce regardless of the size of its annual income. In addition to applying the $250,000 jurisdictional standard, the Board based its assertion of jurisdiction on findings that in 1979 the Home paid in excess of $16,000 for telephone and electricity to companies engaged in interstate commerce. This amount of interstate purchases supports NLRB jurisdiction over the Home. In other cases involving lesser sums, courts have approved the Board's exercise of jurisdiction, in light of the broad grant of power to the NLRB. See, e. g., NLRB v. Maxwell, 637 F.2d 698 (9th Cir. 1981) ($6,000 sufficient); Von Solbrig Hospital, Inc. v. NLRB, 465 F.2d 173 (7th Cir. 1972) ($4,925 sufficient); NLRB v. Inglewood Park Cemetery Association, 355 F.2d 448 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 384 U.S. 951, 86 S.Ct. 1572, 16 L.Ed.2d 548 (1966) ($3,000 sufficient); NLRB v. Aurora City Lines, Inc., 299 F.2d 229 (7th Cir. 1962) ($2,000 sufficient). Accordingly, we hold the Board properly exercised jurisdiction in these proceedings.

The Home also contends that the Board's jurisdiction does not extend to non-profit institutions which do not affect commerce. The argument relies on the dissent of NLRB Member Penello in Lighthouse for the Blind of Houston, 248 NLRB 1366 (1980), which the Fifth Circuit adopted in denying enforcement of the NLRB bargaining order in NLRB v. Lighthouse for the Blind of Houston, 653 F.2d 206 (5th Cir. 1981). In that case, the court found the relationship between employer and employee to be rehabilitative rather than commercial in nature, and thus not suitable for collective bargaining. In contrast, the Home has a commercial, not rehabilitative, relationship with its employees in the bargaining unit. The record here supports the Board's determination that the operations of the Home (a nonprofit corporation) affect commerce. See generally NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra, 440 U.S. at 511–18, 99 S.Ct. at 1324–27 (Brennan, J., dissenting) (discussing legislative history); NLRB v. Kent County Association for Retarded Citizens, supra, 590 F.2d at 20–23.

B. First Amendment.

The Home argues that the NLRB's assertion of jurisdiction over it will lead to violation of both the establishment and free exercise clauses of the first amendment. Under the framework of analysis formulated by the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra, this court must initially consider "whether the Board's exercise of its jurisdiction here would give rise to serious constitutional questions." 440 U.S. at 501, 99 S.Ct. at 1319. The Catholic Bishop Court determined that the exercise of NLRB jurisdiction over the relationship between the church and its teachers in church-operated schools raised serious first amendment questions, and refused to rule on the constitutionality of the questioned NLRB jurisdiction without a showing of the "affirmative intention of the Congress clearly expressed" to confer such jurisdiction. Because this case does not raise the serious constitutional questions discussed in Catholic Bishop, this court need not inquire whether Congress clearly expressed its intention to confer jurisdiction.

According to the Home, the constitutional problems arose in Catholic Bishop because the Catholic Church operated the schools in question. This interpretation of Catholic Bishop underlies the Home's contention that NLRB jurisdiction does not extend to any institution established by a church for religious reasons because a situation might arise where the NLRB would need to inquire into the legitimacy of those reasons.

Church operation, although important, constituted but one of many features which, considered together, presented potential first amendment problems in Catholic Bishop. Not only did the Catholic Church operate the schools, it actively propagated religious faith in the classrooms. The teachers in the bargaining unit, even though members of the laity, participated in that religious mission. The Supreme Court quoted extensively from Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602, 91 S.Ct. 2105, 29 L.Ed.2d 745 (1971), to illustrate that its concern stemmed from the religious nature of the schools' relationships with their teachers.

"Religious authority necessarily pervades the school system." * * *

> We cannot ignore the danger that a teacher under religious control and discipline poses to the separation of the religious from the purely secular aspects of pre-college education.

* * * * *

"[P]arochial schools involve substantial religious activity and purpose.

> "The substantial religious character of these church-related schools gives rise to entangling church-state relationships of the kind the Religion Clauses sought to avoid." (Footnote omitted.)

* * * * *

"[T]he raison d'etre of parochial schools is the propagation of religious faith." [NLRB v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, supra, 440 U.S. at 501, 503, 99 S.Ct. at 1319, 1320 (quoting Lemon v. Kurtzman, supra, 403 U.S. at 617, 616, 628, 91 S.Ct. at 2113, 2118).]

The Court emphasized the possible religious function of a teacher employed by a school engaged in a pervasively religious enterprise.[5]

The religious character of the enterprise in Catholic Bishop existed at all three levels: the church, the church-operated institution, and the institution's employees. The Supreme Court concluded that the involvement of the NLRB in mediating between two of those levels would pose a significant danger of impermissible entanglement between church and state.

By contrast, the Home, though sponsored by the Christian Church, does not devote itself to the propagation of religion. The Christian Church may perceive its religious mission to include caring for unfortunate children, but the actual business of the Home and of its employees does not involve a religious enterprise comparable to a church-operated school. The Home operates in the same way as a secular childcare institution.

The evidence produced at the representation proceeding clearly demonstrates that the Home differs from a Catholic school and resembles a nonreligious institution. The Home receives funds primarily from government sources. It operates on a non-sectarian basis, hiring employees without regard to religion and taking in children solely from state agency referrals. The children remain wards of the state, and unlike the schools in Catholic Bishop where Catholic religious training was mandatory, the state requires the Home to obtain parental consent before resident children attend Christian Church services.

Because both the Home and its employees perform essentially secular functions, the involvement of the NLRB in mediating collective bargaining between the two does not raise the serious constitutional questions discussed in Catholic Bishop,[6] although some issue implicating the religion clauses could conceivably arise during collective bargaining. The Home suggests, for example, that in bargaining over wages, the Home might have to disclose the source and destination of contributions to the Christian Church, or that if the Christian Church decides to relocate or close the Home, the NLRB could question its decision. However, "[t]he possibility of impairment [of sectarian objectives] must be more substantial than one based on dark speculation and forboding fancy." St. Elizabeth Community Hospital v. NLRB, 626 F.2d 123, 129 (9th Cir. 1980) (Sneed, J., dissenting) (remand for further factfinding in light of Catholic Bishop). The Home has not demonstrated that such impairment will likely occur. The Home's activities relate only tangentially to the religious mission of the Christian Church, and inquiry into the operation of the Home should not intrude on any activity substantially religious in character. The Home operates in the same way as a secular childcare institution and voluntarily accepts state regulation which treats it in the same way. Thus, under the circumstnaces of this case, the NLRB properly treated the Home in the same manner as a secular institution.

[5] The Second Circuit reached the same conclusion about the Catholic Bishop opinion in NLRB v. Bishop Ford Central Catholic High School, 623 F.2d 818, 822 (2d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 1698, 68 L.Ed.2d 196 (1981) (holding Catholic Bishop applicable to Catholic school controlled by law trustees):

> The entire focus of Catholic Bishop was upon the obligation of lay faculty to imbue and indoctrinate the student body with the tenets of a religious faith. * * * It is the commitment of the faculty to religious values * * * and the obligation to propagate those values which provides the risk of entanglement.

[6] The Home works directly with the State of Missouri in accepting state referrals and in finding placements for the children, and it depends heavily on state funding. If the Home were not secular in nature, this collaboration could lead to constitutional problems under Lemon v. Kurtzman, supra, but because the Home is not permeated by religion, it can work closely with the state without violating the establishment clause.

III. Conclusion.

The NLRB's assertion of jurisdiction over the Home does not raise the serious constitutional questions contemplated in Catholic Bishop. We affirm the NLRB's finding that the Home is subject to the Act because its operations affect interstate commerce. Accordingly, we enforce in full the NLRB's order requiring the Home to bargain collectively with the Union.

Bill Johnson's Restaurants, Inc. v. NLRB

660 F.2d 1335 (9th Cir.), November 12, 1981; certiorari granted October 18, 1982—249 NLRB 155

On petition to review Board Order

Before GOODWIN and CANBY, Circuit Judges, and BYRNE,* District Judge

1338

CANBY, Circuit Judge: On April 30, 1980, the National Labor Relations Board affirmed a ruling by an administrative law judge that appellant Bill Johnson's Restaurants had committed unfair labor practices by discharging four waitresses, interrogating other employees, and by filing and prosecuting a state court lawsuit against picketers who were protesting unfair labor practices. The Board ordered the restaurant to reinstate the four waitresses, to give them back pay, and to withdraw the lawsuit from state court. The restaurant seeks review of the Board's order under section 10(f) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §160(f). The Board cross-petitions for enforcement. We enforce the order of the Board.

FACTS

The following facts were found by the administrative law judge and affirmed by the Board. In February 1972, Ruth Helton began working at Bill Johnson's Big Apple East, one of four restaurants owned and operated by Bill Johnson's Restaurants, Inc., in the Phoenix, Arizona, metropolitan area. The corporation is owned by the Johnson family. By summer 1978, Helton was one of the two most senior waitresses at the restaurant; since 1977 she had received an hourly bonus, and she served on the breakfast shift, which because of the hours and tips was the most desirable shift at the restaurant.

On July 25, 1978, Vice President Johnny Johnson called a meeting of employees to announce a new policy of strict enforcement of company rules. Among other things, Johnson told the waitresses that they must call in on days off, and that they could not chew gum while working or use the business phone for personal calls. Johnson ended by stating that any waitress who broke company rules would be fired. The next day, a waitress on the breakfast shift who had not attended the meeting asked her supervisor, Suzie Gay, what had happened. Gay answered, "Nothing pertaining to the breakfast girls." The breakfast waitresses, as the most senior employees, had traditionally been excepted from some company rules. For example, they were not required to call in on days off, and they had been allowed to use the business phone for personal calls.

In the days after the speech, the waitresses discussed it extensively. Several waitresses agreed with Helton's suggestion that they needed a union to represent them. Discussions of unionization were held in the waitresses' lounge, at a nearby hotel, at a party where Supervisor Gay was present for at least part of the discussion, and in the restaurant during a coffee break while Gay was nearby.

On August 8, Helton worked her regular shift and went home. That afternoon, Gay called her and told her that she was fired. Helton asked why, and Gay answered that Johnny Johnson had not liked a question she had asked at the July 25 meeting. (Helton had asked only whether waitresses could sell customers a single pancake or had to sell orders of two.) Gay said also that Johnson did not like Helton's attitude.

Helton asked for a written explanation, but Gay said that the restaurant was not required to give her one. On August 9, Helton filed a charge with the NLRB.

The day after Helton's discharge, Dirkson, a hostess, told Gay that all the waitresses thought Helton had been treated unfairly. Gay said that she didn't like firing Helton, but that "Ruth had been antagonizing the girls on the floor" and that she couldn't "run a shift with that type of friction." She then asked whether Dirkson knew "if Ruth had any contact with any of the girls." A few days later, after learning that Helton had filed a charge with the NLRB, Gay asked Dirkson if any other waitresses had been talking about the union.

*Honorable William M. Byrne, United States District Judge for the Central District of California, sitting by designation.

On September 18, waitresses Nichols, Scott, and Michaud walked out of the restaurant without explanation. On the way out, they turned their checkpads in to the cashier. The cashier reported their leaving to Manager Lois Williams. That afternoon, the waitresses returned to fill out their tip reports. Williams told them that they could pick up their checks the next day. When Manager Sherry Sturgeon asked the waitresses why they had walked out, they responded that they thought Helton was fired unjustly, and complained about the treatment they had received since the July 25 meeting. Sturgeon told the waitresses that they could forget what Johnny Johnson had said at the meeting because she was back in charge after her vacation. During the conversation, Scott stated that she was tired of waitressing. Nichols complained that her daily commute was too long. At no time did the waitresses say that they had quit their jobs, but Sturgeon told them to pick up their checks the following day.

On September 20, the Board issued a complaint against the restaurant, and the three waitresses joined Helton and a few others to picket the restaurant. Their picket signs said that the restaurant had been accused of unfair labor practices and asked the public to boycott the restaurant. The picketers walked along the sidewalk in front of the restaurant. Although they crossed two driveways which led to the restaurant parking lot, they did not block public access to the lots. At no time were there more than seven adults and two children picketing. That day, Sturgeon confronted the picketers and took down their names. She said, "You might think you're funny, but I intend to have the last laugh. I will get even with you for what you're doing." She told Helton that "I'll get even with you if it's the last thing I do." That afternoon, Gene Johnson telephoned waitress Cheryl Nichols and asked to talk with her husband. Johnson asked Carl Nichols why they had been picketing the restaurant. Carl said that they were protesting Helton's discharge. Then Johnson said that she would hate to see the Nichols lose their new home, and also that she would hate to see them "get hurt by all this."

On September 21 and 22, the picketing continued. On September 22, the picketers distributed a leaflet to the public. The leaflet stated:

> THE [NLRB] HAS ISSUED A COMPLAINT AGAINST THE BIG APPLE RESTAURANT * * * FOR UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES.
> The complaint was issued as a result of charges filed by [Ruth] Helton, a former employee who was fired August 8 after suggesting to other waitresses they should organize a union. Mrs. Helton had been an employee of the Big Apple seven and one half years.
> Several other waitresses have quit their jobs to join Mrs. Helton in picketing the restaurant to inform the public of the dispute between the employees and the restaurant's management. Among the waitresses' complaints are the following:
> - Eight hour shifts with no specified breaks.
> - No pay for overtime when waitresses were required to remain at their posts until their last customer's check had been paid.
> - Waitresses threatened with dismissal if they lost any time due to illness over the Christmas holiday season.
> 1340
>
> - Inconsistent management practices.
> - Unwarranted sexual advances.
> - A filthy restroom for women employees, with no soap, paper towels or toilet tissue provided.
> EMPLOYEES OF BILL JOHNSON'S BIG APPLE FOR JUSTICE ON THE JOB.

On September 25, the restaurant filed a civil complaint in state court. The complaint alleged that the picketers had engaged in mass picketing, blocked public access to the restaurant, and created a threat to public safety. The complaint also alleged that the picketers had distributed a leaflet containing "false and outrageous statements, including misrepresentations of proceedings pending before the NLRB." The complaint sought actual damages, $500,000 in punitive damages, and an order enjoining the picketers from trespassing, mass picketing, violence, interfering with the restaurant's business operations, and publishing false and misleading statements about the restaurant and its management. That same day, the court issued a temporary restraining order granting most of the relief requested, and setting an October 5 hearing to consider the request for a preliminary injunction.

On September 26, the picketing continued, and Helton hired an attorney to represent her. On October 2, the restaurant's attorney deposed Helton, asking numerous questions about the nature and extent of Helton's union activities, the identities of other employees involved in union activities, and the extent of management's knowledge of these activities. On November 16, the state court denied the restaurant's request for a preliminary injunction. The suit for a permanent injunction and damages is still pending.

HELTON'S DISCHARGE

The Board found that the restaurant had violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (a)(3), by discharging Helton for engaging in union activity. The Board ordered reinstatement and back pay. Under section 8(a)(3), the test is whether the union activity was the moving cause behind the employee's discharge. L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d 1337, 1341–42 (9th Cir. 1980). The determination of motive is particularly within the Board's area of expertise. Pay'n Save Corp. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 697, 702 (9th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Fort Vancouver Plywood Co., 604 F.2d 596, 600 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 915, 100 S.Ct. 1275, 63 L.Ed.2d 599 (1980). An employer may not use a business reason as a pretext for a discharge which is motivated by anti-union animus. L'Eggs Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 619 F.2d at 1341. The Board need not credit an employer's self-serving statement that an employee was discharged for cause. NLRB v. Fort Vancouver Plywood Co., 604 F.2d at 600. If the Board's findings and inferences are reasonable and supported by substantial evidence, they must be affirmed. Pay'n Save Corp. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d at 702; NLRB v. Silver Spur Casino, 623 F.2d 571, 585 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, — U.S. —, 101 S.Ct. 1973, 68 L.Ed.2d 294 (1981).

In this case, the restaurant argues that it fired Helton for rules violations. The Board found that this reason was a pretext, and concluded that Helton was fired for engaging in union activity. This finding is supported by substantial evidence. Helton was a senior waitress, one of two waitresses who received a bonus. She had not previously been reprimanded for rules violations. Gay specifically told another breakfast waitress after the July 25 meeting that the rules did not apply to the breakfast shift, and none of the breakfast waitresses was required to call in on days off until Helton was fired. Other waitresses who broke the rules were reprimanded, not fired. The timing of Helton's discharge, the restaurant's leniency in enforcing rules violations of other waitresses, and the absence of reprimands on Helton's record all support the conclusion that she was fired for union activity. See NLRB v. Warren L. Rose Castings, Inc., 587 F.2d 1005, 1008 (9th Cir. 1978).

The restaurant argues, however, that the evidence does not show that the restaurant management knew about Helton's union activities, and that without such knowledge, there can be no section 8(a)(3) violation. We conclude that there is substantial evidence to support the finding that the restaurant management knew about Helton's union activities. An employer's knowledge of union activity may be inferred from circumstantial evidence. Famet, Inc. v. NLRB, 490 F.2d 293, 295–96 (9th Cir. 1973). Because of the small number of employees who worked in the restaurant (40 waitresses total) and the close-knit, family management team, it is reasonable to infer that the management knew of Helton's efforts to organize a union. Id. After the July 25 meeting, the waitresses often discussed unionization in the restaurant. Their efforts at secrecy were minimal. At the August 3 party, Helton and another waitress discussed unionization in the presence of supervisor Gay. Later, after Helton was fired, Gay told Dirkson that Helton had been fired for creating friction among the waitresses, and asked whether Helton had contacted any other waitresses. The Board's conclusion that Helton was fired for union activity was a reasonable one, and supported by substantial evidence. We enforce the order of the Board on this issue.

DISCHARGE OF THE STRIKERS

The Board found that the restaurant had violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) by discharging three waitresses who struck in support of Helton. The restaurant argues that the waitresses did not strike, but quit their jobs. The Board found otherwise, and we conclude that its finding is supported by substantial evidence. The waitresses told manager Sturgeon that they had walked out of the restaurant because they objected to Helton's discharge and to management's treatment of the waitresses after the July 25 meeting. Sturgeon then told them to pick up their checks the next day. It was reasonable for the Board to conclude from this conversation that the waitresses were fired for protesting working conditions. The failure of employees to present more specific demands to management at the time of their walkout does not prevent it from being a strike, within the scope of Section 7, 29 U.S.C. § 157. NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 14–15, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 1102–03, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962); Electromec Design & Development Co. v. NLRB, 409 F.2d 631, 634 (9th Cir. 1969). It is true that during the conversation with Sturgeon, Scott said that she was tired of waitressing, and Nichols complained that her daily commute was too far. It is also true that the leaflets distributed by the picketers stated that the waitresses had quit their jobs in support of Helton. While different inferences may be drawn from the facts, however, the inferences drawn by the Board were reasonable and supported by substantial evidence. Once it was determined that the waitresses were fired for striking in support of Helton, they were entitled to reinstatement and back pay. NLRB v. International Van Lines, 409 U.S. 48, 50–51, 93 S.Ct. 74, 76, 34 L.Ed.2d 201 (1972). We therefore enforce the order of the Board on this issue.

THREATS AND INTERROGATION

The Board found that the restaurant had violated section 8(a)(1) by threatening and interrogating employees. An employer's interrogation of an employee violates section 8(a)(1) if, under all the circumstances, the interrogation reasonably tends to restrain or interfere with the employee in the exercise of his or her protected § 7 rights. Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 725 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 2317, 68 L.Ed.2d 841 (1981); Penasquitos Village, Inc. v. NLRB, 565 F.2d 1074, 1080 (9th Cir. 1977). The test is whether the interrogation tends to be coercive, not whether the employee was in fact coerced. Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d at 725; NLRB v. Anchorage Times Publishing Co., 637 F.2d 1359, 1364 (9th Cir. 1981). The Board found four instances of threats or interrogation which violated section 8(a)(1). These findings are supported by substantial evidence.

On the first day of picketing, manager Sturgeon threatened to get even with the picketers. That afternoon, president Gene Johnson told a picketer that she would hate to see him get hurt by all this. Both conversations involved threats which violated section 8(a)(1). On two occasions, supervisor Gay questioned Dirkson about union activities. On August 10, Gay told Dirkson that she had to fire Helton because Helton had been antagonizing the waitresses. Gay then asked whether any other waitresses had been contacted by Helton. A few days later, Gay again asked Dirkson whether any other waitresses had been talking about the union. Taken together, these two conversations clearly implied that a waitress involved in unionization would be fired. Therefore, these interrogations violated section 8(a)(1).

THE STATE COURT SUIT

The Board found that the restaurant had violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(4) by filing and prosecuting the state court civil suit against the picketers. It is clear that "the mere filing of a lawsuit can restrain the exercise of [section 7] rights." United Stanford Employees, Local 680 v. NLRB, 601 F.2d 980, 983 (9th Cir. 1979). Before condemning a lawsuit as an unfair labor practice, however, the Board must be careful to make an accommodation between the rights of all persons to seek resolution of their legal claims in court and the rights of employees under the NLRA. Clyde Taylor, 127 N.L.R.B. 103, 109 (1960). The Board has adopted the rule that it is not an unfair labor practice for an employer to file and prosecute a civil lawsuit against an employee, so long as the suit is filed in good faith and not in furtherance of an unlawful objective. See United Credit Bureau of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 643 F.2d 1017, 1023 (4th Cir. 1981); Power Systems, Inc. v. NLRB, 601 F.2d 936, 939 (7th Cir. 1979). Thus an employer who brings a good faith action against employees for mass picketing, and produces evidence making his claim a colorable one, is not guilty of an unfair labor practice simply because he ultimately loses the lawsuit on the merits. Cf. Associated General Contractors v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 556, 560–62 (8th Cir. 1980).

In this case, the restaurant's civil lawsuit had a lawful objective on its face; i.e., the complaint sought relief for alleged wrongs that the state court could remedy. The Board found, however, that the restaurant lacked a reasonable basis in fact for the lawsuit, and concluded that the lawsuit was filed in bad faith to retaliate against the picketers. The Board found violations of both section 8(a)(1) and section 8(a)(4). Other courts have stated that the employer's anti-union motive is a key element of such violations. See Associated General Contractors v. NLRB, 637 F.2d at 561; United Credit Bureau of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 643 F.2d at 1024.[1] We conclude that there is substantial evidence in the record to support the Board's findings that the restaurant's lawsuit lacked a reasonable basis in fact, and that it was filed to penalize Helton for filing charges with the Board and to penalize the picketers for engaging in protected activity.

The restaurant produced no evidence to support its suit to enjoin the picketing. The allegations of mass picketing, trespass, and the resultant blocking of restaurant entrances and danger to the public were totally unsubstantiated. The state court did issue a temporary restraining order to limit the number of picketers and the manner of picketing. At no time, however, did the picketers number more than seven adults and two children who demonstrated peacefully on the sidewalk outside the restaurant. The mass picketing alleged in the complaint never materialized, and the preliminary injunction was later denied.

The restaurant also lacked a reasonable basis in fact for its libel suit. To prove libel in the context of a labor dispute, an employer must prove that the employees made false, defamatory statements, and that the statements were made with "actual malice," as defined in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254, 279–80, 84 S.Ct. 710, 725–26, 11 L.Ed.2d 686 (1964). See Linn v. Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53, 65, 86 S.Ct. 657, 664, 15 L.Ed.2d 582 (1966). The statements contained in the leaflets were somewhat ambiguous; it was not made clear whether all the picketers' listed complaints (which the administrative law judge found to be factually true) had been made the subject of charges by the NLRB. The restaurant may therefore have believed that the leaflets falsely characterized the NLRB proceedings. But the very ambiguity of the leaflets in that regard tends to negate actual malice. In fact, the restaurant produced no evidence to show that the picketers made the statements with reckless disregard for the truth or falsity of the statements. Instead, the restaurant argues that its lawsuit had a reasonable basis because the complaint on its face was subject to state court jurisdiction. More than a carefully drawn complaint is required to avoid a finding that a lawsuit lacks a reasonable basis. See United Credit Bureau of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 643 F.2d at 1024–25.

The lack of a reasonable basis in fact for the lawsuit is some evidence that it was filed for an improper purpose. The Board's finding of an improper motive is supported by more than this reasonable inference, however. On the first day of picketing, manager Sturgeon confronted the picketers, and wrote down their names. She told them that she would "get even with you for what you're doing." She told Helton that she would "get even with you if it's the last thing I do." That afternoon, president Gene Johnson told a picketer that she would hate to see him "get hurt by all this." Five days later, the restaurant filed the lawsuit in state court. The restaurant almost immediately deposed Helton, and questioned her in depth about the identities of other pro-union employees. The deposition was conducted without the assurances against reprisal usually expected to accompany employer interrogation of employees.[2]

[1] We question whether motive should necessarily play a part in determining whether an employer violates section 8(a)(1) by filing a lawsuit, without a reasonable basis in fact, against an employee. On its face, section 8(a)(1) does not require a showing of motive: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in [section 7.]" In contrast, section 8(a)(4) requires a showing that the employer's conduct was provoked by the employee's filing of charges with the Board. Motive is therefore a necessary element of a section 8(a)(4) violation. Because we uphold the Board's finding of improper motive, we need not reach the question whether section 8(a)(1) may be violated in the absence of such motivation. See Ad Art, Inc. v. NLRB, 645 F.2d 669, 678 n.10 (9th Cir. 1981).

[2] The Board found that the restaurant violated section 8(a)(1) by conducting this deposition. The deposition almost certainly had a chilling effect on Helton and the other picketers. It also tended to interfere with the Board's administration of federal labor policy by allowing the restaurant to circumvent the restrictive discovery rules which apply to unfair labor practice hearings. See NLRB v. Maxwell, 637 F.2d 698, 702–03 (9th

These circumstances, in the context of other unfair labor practices which the Board found, clearly permit a finding that the lawsuit was prompted by an improper motive. The immediate effect of this lawsuit upon Helton was to penalize her for filing an unfair labor practice charge with the Board. That motive and effect clearly produce a violation of section 8(a)(4). In addition, the lawsuit carried an implicit message to the other picketers: namely, that any persons who file charges against the restaurant or picket the restaurant will find themselves in court.[3] The violation of section 8(a)(1) is also clear. We conclude that substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that the lawsuit filed by the restaurant against Helton and the other picketers violated 1344 sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(4). See United Credit Bureau of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 643 F.2d at 1025.

Since the Board properly found that the filing of the state court action was an unfair labor practice, it follows that the Board can order the employer to cease and desist from that practice. The federal antiinjunction statute, 28 U.S.C. § 2283, does not prevent the Board from curbing state court action that interferes with the Board's exercise of its own jurisdiction. Capital Service, Inc. v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 501, 504–06, 74 S.Ct. 699, 701–03, 98 L.Ed. 887 (1954); see also NLRB v. Nash-Finch Co., 404 U.S. 138, 144–48, 92 S. Ct. 373, 377–79, 30 L.Ed.2d 328 (1971). Indeed, the Board's power to enforce the provisions of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(4) would be largely crippled if it could not order the withdrawal of a retaliatory lawsuit.

It is true that the regulatory scheme established by the National Labor Relations Act does not of itself preempt state court jurisdiction over actions for libel arising in a labor context. Linn v. Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53, 86 S.Ct. 657, 15 L.Ed.2d 582 (1966). The Supreme Court has recognized the potential of such state suits for interference with federally protected rights, however, and has consequently ruled that all state libel actions are preempted unless they are based upon defamatory statements published with knowledge of their falsity or with reckless disregard of truth or falsity. Id. at 65. This carefully drawn boundary between legitimate state and federal interests would be hopelessly obscured if a libel action was automatically sustainable so long as the plaintiff carefully drafted its complaint to allege malice. The proper test of the legitimacy of the state action is whether the plaintiff has evidence to support its allegations of malice. See United Credit Bureau of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 643 F.2d at 2024–25.

The state court, of course, is competent to determine whether an employer who brings a libel suit has evidence to support his allegations. The same determination, however, is one which the Board must make to decide whether filing the libel suit was an unfair labor practice. Since the Board has actually decided the issue, and the subject is central to the enforcement of federal labor policy, the Board's decision would appear to preempt further action by the state court. Sears, Roebuck & Co. v. Carpenters, 436 U.S. 180, 209–10, 98 S.Ct. 1745, 1763–64, 56 L.Ed.2d 209 (1978) (Blackmun, J., concurring); see San Diego Building Trades Council v. Garmon, 359 U.S. 236, 244–245, 79 S.Ct. 773, 779, 3 L.Ed.2d 775 (1959). Whether or not the state court's jurisdiction is technically preempted, however, the Board has the power to enjoin a state court lawsuit when the impropriety of that lawsuit is properly addressed and adjudicated by the Board.

We recognize that this case involves a delicate balance between federal and state interests as well as between individual rights of organization and litigation. The Board has demonstrated its sensitivity to these issues by its sparing enforcement of limitations on the right to bring suit in state court. See United Credit Bureau of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 643 F.2d at 1022–23. In the present case the employer did not offer factual substantiation of its allegations of malice, and substantial evidence supported the Board's finding that the action was brought for retaliation and intimidation of employees in their organizational rights. In these circumstances, pursuit of the state action threatened the proper enforcement of the federal act and the Board was justified in putting a stop to it.

Cir. 1981). Because we agree that filing and conducting the libel suit was an unfair labor practice, however, we do not consider whether the deposition alone violated section 8(a)(1).

[3] The chilling effect of a state lawsuit upon activity protected by the Act is multiplied when the state action, as here, seeks large damages. Employees whose picketing is the subject of a state suit for injunction may default and simply comply with the terms of the state injunction. They can hardly afford to fail to defend a claim for $500,000 damages. See Linn v. Plant Guard Workers, 383 U.S. 53, 64, 86 S.Ct. 657, 663, 15 L.Ed.2d 582 (1966).

The Order of the Board is enforced in its entirety.

On petition to review Board Order

479

SEITZ, Chief Judge: Metropolitan Edison Company (the Company) petitions for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) finding that the Company violated section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by disciplining two officers of intervenor Local Union 563 (the Local) more severely than rank-and-file members for participating in an illegal work stoppage. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order. This court has jurisdiction under section 10(e) and (f) of the Act, as amended. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) & (f) (1976).

I.

The Company, a public utility that provides electrical power to customers in Southeastern Pennsylvania, started construction of a two-unit nuclear generating station at Three Mile Island (TMI) in 1968. The construction was still underway in 1977. At that time, over half of the Company's employees were represented by five local unions of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (the Union) under a collective bargaining agreement that took effect on May 1, 1976. Article XI of the agreement provided:

480

> The Brotherhood and its members agree that * * * there shall be no strikes or walkouts by the Brotherhood or its members, and the Company agrees that there shall be no lockouts of the Brotherhood or its members, it being the desire of both parties to provide uninterrupted and continuous service to the public.

Under prior collective bargaining agreements containing the same provision, members of the Union had violated the no-strike provision four times. On each occasion the Company disciplined the Union officers more severely than its members. The Company justified the disparity in discipline on the ground that union officers, unlike the members, have an affirmative duty to try to end an illegal strike. Twice the Union grieved to arbitration the issue of whether the Company could impose the extra discipline, and twice the Union lost.

The events that gave rise to this dispute occurred on August 30, 1977. Members of the Operating Engineers' Union picketed the north entrance to TMI. Members of the Local, including its president Lang and vice-president Light, refused to cross that picket line. The administrative law judge succinctly described the events on that morning:

> Both [Lang and Light] spent the morning of August 30, 1977, seeking to secure removal of the picket line so that their members, who had earlier indicated an unwillingness to cross any picket line, would go to work. Thus, Lang had come to [TMI] early on the morning of August 30, pursuant to a phone call from [the Company's personnel administrator], in which [he] advised [Lang] that there was a picket line which the [Local's] members were refusing to cross and requested him to see what could be done. In the course of their conversations that morning, [the administrator] reiterated to Lang a position taken by the Company a number of times previously that the union officers had a particular obligation to cross the picket line so that other employees would follow. When Lang arrived at the gate he spoke to the Operating Engineers' picket captain, learned the reason for the picket line, and was told that the line would not be removed unless removal was ordered by his business agent. Lang called the business agent. Subsequently, Lang went to the union hall, * * * and directed Gene Light to go the Operating Engineers to see whether he could negotiate with them to get them off the bridge. When he returned to the picket line, Lang was again told [by two Company officers] that he had a particular obligation as a union official to cross the picket line. Lang told [one of them] that it was the consensus of the members that they were not going to cross until the picket line came down and he told [the > other] that he felt it was better if he stayed out because then he could at least negotiate with the pickets. Gene Light had substantially similar conversations with both [officers].

> In the course of discussing what it would take to have the picket line removed, the Operating Engineers' steward told Lang that they would remove the picket line if the contractors ceased using the north bridge.

After Lang related this conversation to the Company's coordinator of services, the Company set up a reserved gate for the contractors' employees at the south bridge, the picket line came down, and the Local's members went to work.

Of the 135 rank-and-file members who refused to cross the picket line, 121 received five-day suspensions, and fourteen who had participated in previous illegal stoppages received ten-day suspensions. Lang and Light each received a twenty-five-day suspension. The Company stated in the written records of its disciplinary action that the harsher discipline for each was justified because in addition to violating the no-strike clause, each had > [failed] as an elected official of [the Local] to demonstrate to the Company, in an objective manner, [his] affirmative duty as an elected officer to:

> (a) Make every effort to uphold the sanctity of the Agreement and its established grievance procedures.
> 481
> (b) Make every bona fide effort to prevent the unlawful work stoppage.
> (c) Make every effort, including returning to work [himself], to end the unlawful work stoppage.

The Local filed an unfair labor practice charge, and the General Counsel issued a complaint against the Company. The administrative law judge found that the Company's actions violated section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, and the Board adopted his rulings, findings, and conclusions, although modifying the terms of his cease and desist order. Metropolitan Edison Co., 252 N.L.R.B. 1030 (1980).

II.

An employer may impose greater discipline on union officials if the collective bargaining agreement enumerates specific affirmative steps a union official is to take in the event of an illegal work stoppage and the official has failed to perform those actions. In Gould Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir. 1979), cert. denied sub nom. Moran v. Gould Corp., 449 U.S. 890, 101 S.Ct. 247, 66 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980), this court held that an employer did not commit an unfair labor practice when it singled out from among fifty participants in an illegal work stoppage a union steward for discharge. The collective bargaining agreement contained a no-strike clause, and also required union officials to take affirmative steps to end illegal work stoppages:

> In the event of an illegal [work stoppage], the Local and International Union and its officers shall immediately take positive and evident steps to have those involved cease such activity. These steps shall involve the following: Within not more than twenty-four (24) hours after the occurrence of any such unauthorized action, the Union, its officers and representatives shall publicly disavow same by posting a notice on the bulletin boards throughout the plant. The Union, its officers and representatives shall immediately order its members to return to work, notwithstanding the existence of any wildcat picket line. The Union, its officers and representatives shall refuse to aid or assist in any way such unauthorized action. The Union, its officers and representatives, will in good faith, use every reasonable effort to terminate such unauthorized action.

612 F.2d at 730 n.3. The court held that the employer's discharge of the steward did not discriminate against the exercise of protected section 7 concerted activities because the company disciplined the steward not because of his status as a union officer but because of his failure to fulfill the responsibilities imposed on him by the collective bargaining agreement. The court further held that the discharge of the steward for violation of that contractual duty was not inherently destructive of employee rights and thus an unfair labor practice under the doctrine of NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 34, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 1798, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967), because (1) there is no right to strike illegally or to violate contractually imposed duties, and (2) anyone dissuaded from seeking union office by such a rule should be dissuaded if he or she intended to engage in illegal strikes or to violate contractual obligations. Id. at 730–33.

If the collective bargaining agreement requires in general terms that union officials take affirmative steps to end an illegal work stoppage, a union official does not breach that duty simply because he does not take the exact affirmative steps the employer ordered him to take. Only if his actions in complying with that duty are not in good faith does he become subject to greater discipline. In C. H. Heist Corp. v. NLRB, 657 F.2d 178 (7th Cir. 1981), an employer discharged only one out of twenty-five employees who participated in an illegal work stoppage—the shop steward. There was a no-strike provision in the collective bargaining agreement. The court held that the only basis for finding a greater obligation on the steward than on the other employees was a provision that, "The steward's duties shall consist of seeing that all terms and conditions of the Agreement are being complied with * * *." Id. at 181. The steward, both before and during the 482 work stoppage, attempted to dissuade the employees from striking, but would not cross the picket line as the employer wanted him to do. The court held that the employer had committed an unfair labor practice in more harshly disciplining the steward, because "[i]n the absence of a clear contractual provision requiring [the steward] to cross the picket line, his efforts were sufficient, if not the most effective possible, to satisfy his obligation to see that the no strike clause was complied with." Id. at 183.

If the collective bargaining agreement does not specify that union officials have some responsibility to try to end an illegal work stoppage, then the company may not impose any greater discipline on union officials than on other participants in the strike. In Hammermill Paper Co. v. NLRB, 658 F.2d 155 (3d Cir. 1981), an employer had punished a union steward who took part in an illegal work stoppage more severely than other participants. The collective bargaining agreement contained a general no-strike clause. However, the Hammermill agreement contained no provision that placed any greater responsibilities on union officials than on the rank-and-file members, and the arbitrator in a grievance proceeding on the same matter had held that the contract placed no increased responsibilities on union officials. In those circumstances, the two members of the panel who reached the issue held that the company had committed an unfair labor practice in singling out the steward for harsher punishment. Id. at 163 (opinion of Rosenn, J.); id. at 166–67 (opinion of Higginbotham, J.).[1]

The rules developed from the Gould, Heist, and Hammermill cases are consonant with sound labor policy. The rules recognize the principle that although statutory rights may be waived, courts will generally not find a waiver unless it is clear and unmistakable. See Texaco, Inc. v. NLRB, 462 F.2d 812, 815 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1008, 93 S.Ct. 442, 34 L.Ed.2d 302 (1972). The rules recognize that, since the holding of union office is the essence of protected union activities, see General Motors Corp., 218 N.L.R.B. 472, 477 (1975), enforced mem., 535 F.2d 1246 (3d Cir. 1976), discriminatory punishment solely on the basis of holding union office is a section 8(a)(3) unfair labor practice.[2] Hammermill, 658 F.2d at 163; id. at 166–67. Although it is true that we need not hesitate to adopt a rule that allows union officials to be punished discriminatorily if such a ruling would deter prospective union officials from seeking union office because they intend after assuming office to participate in illegal work stoppages and to repudiate voluntarily assumed contractual obligations, see Gould, 612 F.2d at 733, this case illustrates the limits of that rationale. Allowing the discriminatory punishment that the Company imposed on Lang and Light might deter others from seeking union office because of the fear that, if an illegal strike were to occur, they would be put into an untenable position: either obey the company and lose their authority,[3] or follow their own judgment and risk harsher punishment. It is because of this dilemma that we will not interpret a collective bargaining agreement to impose additional responsibilities on union officials absent clear language showing that the union agreed to it. Compare Heist, 657 F.2d at 182–83 (similar analysis where agreement did not specify the responsibilities it imposed on union official).

[1] To the extent that Indiana & Michigan Electric Co. v. NLRB, 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979) is inconsistent with Gould, Heist, and Hammermill, we decline to follow it. See Hammermill, 658 F.2d at 163–65 (opinion of Rosenn, J.) (distinguishing Indiana); id. at 167 (opinion of Higginbotham, J.) (rejecting Indiana). We also note that the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit appears to have limited the scope of the Indiana & Michigan decision. See Heist, 657 F.2d at 182–83.

[2] If union officials take a leadership role in support of an illegal work stoppage, then they may be more severely disciplined for that reason. See J. P. Wetherby Construction Co., 182 N.L.R.B. 690 (1970).

[3] This possibility was demonstrated on August 4, 1977. That morning, members of the Local had refused to cross the picket line established by the Pipefitters' Union at the north entrance to TMI. After this incident the Company advised Lang and Light that they had a legal obligation to cross the picket line and to urge their membership to do the same. At a meeting after work on August 4, Lang told the members of their obligations, but the membership shouted down his urgings that they cross picket lines.

483

Because the agreement here, like that in Hammermill, did not expressly impose a duty on the Union officials to attempt to halt an illegal work stoppage, the Company committed an unfair labor practice when it disciplined Lang and Light more harshly than the other participants in work stoppage of August 30.

III.

The Company argues that, notwithstanding the absence of any explicit contractual language placing greater responsibilities on the Union officials, two earlier arbitrations had interpreted identical language in previous collective bargaining agreements between the Company and the Union to require Union officials to take affirmative steps to end an illegal work stoppage. Because the relevant language was not changed in any of the renewals since the time of those decisions, the Company argues that we are bound by the arbitral awards construing the collective bargaining agreement to place greater responsibilities on union officials.

There are two arbitration awards on which the Company relies: the Howard arbitration in 1975 and the Seidenberg arbitration in 1973. Both arbitrations arose out of illegal work stoppages in which the Company had disciplined union officials more severely than rank-and-file members. Both times the issue before the arbitrator was whether the company had had just cause for the discipline. In neither hearing did the Union raise the issue whether the collective bargaining agreement placed greater responsibilities on the Union officials. The only discussion of the origin of the greater responsibilities occurred in the Howard arbitration. The arbitrator stated:

> It is well-established that Union officials have an affirmative duty to protect the authority of the Union leadership from illegitimate action on the part of employees, and to uphold the sanctity of the Agreement and its established grievance procedures. Failure to exercise this responsibility subjects them to more serious penalties. * * * Indeed, the mere participation by Union leaders in an illegal work stoppage is sufficient to justify a differential penalty * * *.

The narrow issue before us is whether we are bound by the previous arbitral interpretations. We hold that we are not.[4]

Normally an arbitrator need not follow previous arbitrations construing the same agreement. See New Orleans Steamship Association v. General Longshore Workers, 626 F.2d 455, 468 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. granted sub nom. Jacksonville Bulk Terminals, Inc. v. International Longshoremen's Association, —— U.S. ——, 101 S.Ct. 1737, 68 L.Ed.2d 223 (1981); Riverboat Casino, Inc. v. Local Joint Executive Board, 578 F.2d 250, 251 (9th Cir. 1978) (to require adherence to previous arbitration would reduce flexibility of the arbitral process). It follows that when this court is called upon to construe a collective bargaining agreement, it need not follow a previous arbitral interpretation. To bind this court to a contractual interpretation made in a previous arbitral award would not be consistent with what the parties bargained for: arbitration as a dispute resolution process for specific grievances. See NLRB v. Pincus Brothers, Inc.-Maxwell, 620 F.2d 367, 374 (3d Cir. 1980).

484

An exception to the general rule may be found if the collective bargaining agreement so provides. Riverboat Casino, 578 F.2d at 251. However, that exception is not applicable here, because the agreement between the Company and the Union does not provide that one arbitration is to be bound by an earlier decision, unless the earlier decision was made under the same collective bargaining agreement. Article IX, § 9.2, 4th ("A decision [by an arbitrator] shall be binding * * * for the term of this Agreement."). The two arbitrations upon which the Company relies were made under previous agreements. Additionally, the agreement provides that "all Customs and Practices" between the Company and the Union are to be listed in the agreement. The agreement lists no practice of being bound to arbitrations under previous agreements.

---

[4] The administrative law judge held that he was not bound to the previous interpretations because, if they had been made today, the Board "would likely find those awards repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act," 252 N.L.R.B. at 1035 (emphasis added), under the analysis of Spielberg Manufacturing Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080 (1955). Because we reach the same result on other grounds, we do not decide whether the conclusory Spielberg analysis was correct.

IV.

The Company further argues that its harsher discipline of Lang and Light was justified because Lang and Light were leaders of the strike. See J.P. Wetherby Construction Co., 182 N.L.R.B. 690 (1970). The Board rejected this argument, finding that Lang and Light were not active leaders of the strike. Our review persuades us that the Board's finding is supported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole. See Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 487–88, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464–65, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

V.

The Company's petition for review will be denied, and the Board's order will be enforced.

VAN DUSEN, Senior Circuit Judge, dissenting: I respectfully dissent from the majority opinion because my analysis indicates that it is contrary to Gould, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. Moran v. Gould Corp., 449 U.S. 890, 101 S.Ct. 247, 66 L.Ed.2d 115 (1980),[1] which is this court's most pertinent decision on the facts presented by this record, and hence in violation of Chapter VIII, paragraph C (p. 25), of the Internal Operating Procedures

(IOP) of this court.[2] I would vacate the Board's order and remand the case to the Board for reconsideration and application of the principles of Gould, supra, to the factual situation presented by this record.

In addition to the language quoted from the decision of the ALJ on page 480 of the majority opinion, that decision contains this wording at p. 1034 of 252 N.L.R.B.:

> "Respondent contends that Lang and Light were given the greater discipline not because they held union office but rather:
> > * * * it was awarded because of things they did or did not do; statements they made or did not make; and, the misuse of the union office they held.
> "Respondent points out that, while violations of the no-strike agreement were not frequent at its plants, the August 30 incident was not the first. On prior occasions in 1970, 1972, 1973, and 1974, members of various IBEW locals engaged in work stoppages in violation of the contract. In each of those incidents the participating employees were disciplined and the union officers or stewards involved were given greater discipline for failure to make bona fide efforts to get the employees back to work. Indeed, in the 1973 work stoppage, which occurred at T.M.I., Lang and Light, as union officers, received the greater

[1] Note 3 of the dissenting opinion of Member Penello makes clear that the Board, in promulgating its September 1980 decision, see Metropolitan Edison Company, et al., 252 N.L.R.B. 1030, 1031 (1980), was referring to the December 1979 opinion of this court in Gould, as opposed to the opinion in that case as it was amended in March 1980, since Gould, supra, was cited at 252 N.L.R.B. 1031 and 103 LRRM 2207 as 612 F.2d 728 (3d Cir. 1979), rather than as a 1980 decision. On March 13, 1980, the court added this wording to the Gould opinion in place of the last two sentences on page 12 of the 1979 slip opinion:

"We reaffirm this court's previous statement of the proper precept to be applied where there is a mixed motivation attending employer's action: 'Although there might exist a justifiable cause for discharge of an employee, there is a violation of the Act if the real motive for the discharge is found to be the employer's dislike of union activity or affiliation. * * * Such real motive will be found where union activity by the employee is recognized as a substantial or motivating cause of his discharge.' N.L.R.B. v. Gentithes, 463 F.2d 557, 560 (3d Cir. 1972) (per Chief Judge Seitz). It is also controlling case law of this court that where there is substantial evidence that the employee's discharge was motivated by the employee's protected activity, there is a violation of the Act notwithstanding the concurrent existence of an otherwise valid reason. N.L.R.B. v. Princeton Inn Co., 424 F.2d 264, 265 (3d Cir. 1970). From our review of the entire record we conclude that there is no substantial evidence to support a finding that Moran's discharge was because he had filed charges with the EEOC, OSHA, and the Board. Accordingly the Board's holding of a § 8(a)(4) violation must be vacated."

612 F.2d at 734. The report in 103 LRRM 2207 does not contain this new language, but it contains the previous language from the 1979 slip opinion. See 103 LRRM at 2211 (last two sentences).

More importantly, the majority of the Board cited and relied on Precision Castings Company, 233 N.L.R.B. 35 (1977), a decision which this court implicitly rejected in Gould when it adopted the reasoning of Ind. & Mich. Elec. Co. v. N.L.R.B., 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979), in the passage quoted on pp. 486 & 487 of this dissent. 612 F.2d at 732–33. The Board's brief in this appeal admits that it refused to follow our decision in Gould and instead applied its own case law. Respondent's brief at pp. 32–35.

[2] Paragraph C of Chapter VIII of the IOP reads as follows:

"It is the tradition of this court that reported panel opinions are binding on subsequent panels. Thus, no subsequent panel overrules a published opinion of a previous panel. Court in banc consideration is required to overrule a published opinion of this court."

discipline. In 1972 and 1974, when the Union took to arbitration the question of the greater discipline assigned to the union officers, the Company's discipline was upheld. In both arbitration decisions, the arbitrators held that union officials had an affirmative duty, by virtue of their office, to honor and protect the collective-bargaining agreement, and that failure to exercise that responsibility subjected them to more severe penalties. Respondent also pointed out that both Lang and Light had been told repeatedly, both prior to the August 30 incident and while it was occurring that Respondent expected them to set an example for the other employees by crossing the picket line and that it would discipline them if they failed to do so. Further, Respondent argued, by attempting to secure the removal of the picket line as a means of getting the employees back to work, rather than leading the employees across the picket line or ordering those employees to cross, Lang and Light 'became the active leaders of the strike.' This, Respondent stated, was a factor considered significant in determining the degree of their discipline.

"Respondent also adduced evidence that a work stoppage similar to that of August 30 had taken place on August 4. At that time, various participating employees, not including Lang and Light, were disciplined. Lang and Light were both told, quite emphatically, that the Employer considered it their obligation to cross a picket line and set a proper example for their members. At a union meeting following this work stoppage, Lang told his membership of their legal obligations. The membership vociferously rejected his urgings that they cross such picket lines.

"Finally, Respondent points to an incident involving David Lang which it contends provides separate justification for the greater discipline accorded him. Early on the morning of August 30, after Lang had been summoned to the line by Hahn, an employee drove up, observed the pickets, and asked what he should do. According to Hahn, Hahn said 'come to work,' but Lang told the employee, 'go to the union hall.' According to Lang, when the employee (identified by Lang as Tom Lynch) asked what he should do, Lang told him 'you know what you are supposed to do.' The employee never left his vehicle but drove off in the direction of the union hall. Lang saw Lynch later at the union hall."

The majority has chosen to follow language in two separate opinions of two individual judges on the panel in Hammermill Paper Co. v. N.L.R.B., 658 F.2d 155 (3d Cir. 1981), a case where each of the two members of the panel concurring in the judgment of the court stated his own views separately, rather than the very clear and strong language used by a unanimous panel of this court in Gould, supra, the facts of which are closer to those in this case than are the facts of Hammermill. In Gould, this court used the following language at pp. 732–33:

> "We first consider the law applicable to the § 8(a)(1) and (3) violations and begin by noting our prior holding that 'strikes carried out in violation of a no-strike provision in a collective bargaining agreement are not protected by the Act, and therefore the discharge of employees who engage in such strikes is not an unfair labor practice.' Food Fair Stores, Inc. v. NLRB, 491 F.2d 388, 395 (3d Cir. 1974). Also relevant are Board rulings that an employer need not fire all illegal strikers, but may 'pick and choose' which participants will be discharged as long as the basis for so doing is not union related. Precision Castings, supra; Chrysler Corp., 232 NLRB 466, 474 (1977); McLean Trucking Co., 175 NLRB 440, 450-51 (1969). See also NLRB v. Fansteel Metallurgical Corp., 306 U.S. 240, 59 S.Ct. 490, 83 L.Ed. 627 (1939). And we note, finally, the holding of the Supreme Court in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967), that if the discriminatory discipline complained of is so inherently destructive of employee rights there is no need to establish any specific anti-union motivation in order to sustain a § 8(a)(3) violation.
> "* * * when the Board followed Precision Castings with a similar ruling in Ind. & Mich. Elec. Co., 237 NLRB No. 35 (1978), that ruling was reversed on appeal, Ind. & Mich. Elec. Co. v. N.L.R.B., 599 F.2d 227 (7th Cir. 1979). The Board had ruled that the greater responsibility which accompanies the holding of union office was insufficient reason for imposing more severe discipline on officers than rank-and-file strikers. In reversing, the court reasoned:

> Employees have no right to participate in an illegal strike. Accordingly, if an employee right is threatened here, it must be one relating to union office. The Board has said and we recognize that union office 'embodies the essence of protected concerted activities.' See General Motors Corp., 218 N.L.R.B. 472, 477 (1975), enforced, 535 F.2d 1246 (3d Cir. 1976). Employer action that would impair some right or restrict some legitimate activity of union officials and thereby discourage members from holding office would no doubt have an inherently adverse effect on employee rights. The same is not true, however, of employer action that at most deters union officials from deliberately engaging in clearly unlawful conduct that is both a violation of their duties as employees and union members and a repudiation of their responsibilities as union officials.
> In arguing that status as a union official may not be the sole criterion for differentiating among employees in meting out discipline, the Board somewhat misstates the issue. The more severe punishment was not based merely on the officials' status but upon their breach of the higher responsibility that accompanies that status, a breach that makes their misconduct more serious than that of the rank-and-file. 599 F.2d 230.
> Differentiating between union officers and rank-and-file in meting out discipline for participating in a clearly illegal strike (footnote omitted) did not penalize or deter the exercise of any protected employee right. We believe the employer was entitled to take into > account the union officials' greater responsibility and hence greater fault, and that the resulting different treatment of union officials could not be reasonably considered inherently destructive of important employee rights. 599 F.2d 232.

"We concur in that reasoning and believe that it applies as well to the instant case and supports our conclusion that the Board's finding of a § 8(a)(1) and (3) violation must be vacated. More specifically, we cannot agree with the Board's deduction that since Moran was a steward and was discharged it follows logically that he 'was singled out for discipline solely because he was the steward.' On the contrary, it is clear that he was disciplined because he participated in an illegal strike and failed to perform his contractual obligation to take positive steps to halt that work stoppage. True, this duty devolved upon him because he fell within the class of persons upon whom the collective bargaining agreement imposed that duty, to wit, officers of the union, but the agreement could just as well have imposed this duty on individuals by name regardless of their office, and the result would be the same. In other words, it was a breach of a duty imposed by his office and not his office as such which formed the basis for his discharge. Viewed in this light, Moran's discharge was permissible and did not constitute an unfair labor practice. Indeed, if we were to hold otherwise, the union officer who participated in an illegal work stoppage would be placed in a more advantageous position than the rank-and-file members, and this would be neither fair, logical nor just.

"The General Counsel's argument that since the company lacked the right under the contract to discharge Moran for violating Article XVI § 3 his discharge was unlawful is unpersuasive. It is true that § 3 contains no provision for the discipline of those who violate it, however, § 2 does give the company the right to discharge those who participate in illegal work stoppages. Section 3 of Article XVI was relied upon merely as a basis for singling out Moran from among the strikers subject to discharge. This was lawful.

"* * * As for the contention that as a result of this ruling prospective stewards will be dissuaded from seeking union office, an obvious and short answer is that they should be deterred from seeking office if they intend thereafter to participate in illegal work stoppages or to repudiate contractual obligations which were freely negotiated and voluntarily assumed. The company's action and our ruling deters no other kind of 'union' activity."

(Emphasis in original.)

Also, in Hammermill, supra, Judge Rosenn, writing the OPINION OF THE COURT, pointed out that

> "* * * the result we reach is not at all inconsistent with Gould and Indiana. Nor do we see any need to reconsider our decision in Gould. * * * [W]e caution the Board that insofar as Gould holds that an employer may use discipline as a means of enforcing the individual duties of union officials, we continued to adhere to that precedent."

It is noted that Indiana, cited above, is referred to in that portion of the Gould opinion quoted above.

There is no showing that the company ever approved, condoned, or ratified the personal decision of the two union officials to negotiate with the pickets, thereby prolonging the work stoppage, instead of leading their fellow union members across the picket line to work for this electric utility supplying power to the Harrisburg area of southeastern Pennsylvania.[3]

488

I believe the terms of VIII-C quoted above in note 2 require that this case, at the least, be remanded to the Board, which may decide to have it reconsidered by the ALJ, who heard the witnesses, in light of Gould, as amended, and Hammermill, neither of which decision in its final form was considered by the ALJ (see note 1 above).

Aaron Brothers Company, a Division of Chromalloy American Corp. v. NLRB

661 F.2d 750 (9th Cir.), November 16, 1981—245 NLRB 29

On petition to review Board Order

Before TANG and NORRIS, Circuit Judges and WHELAN*, District Judge

751

TANG, Circuit Judge: Aaron Brothers Company seeks review of a National Labor Relations Board decision and the Board seeks to enforce its order. Two issues are raised: (1) whether Aaron Brothers violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (5) (1976), when it instituted a wage increase without first consulting or bargaining with the union representing the company's employees; and (2) whether Aaron Brothers violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) by refusing to entertain wage proposals beyond the amount granted by the company's unilateral wage increase.

FACTS

Aaron Brothers is engaged in retail art sales. As part of its business, the company operates a warehouse in California. In 1975, the Teamsters Automotive Workers Union, Local No. 495 (the Union), was certified as the bargaining representative for the warehouse employees. To challenge the certification's validity, Aaron Brothers refused to bargain with the union; the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) ordered Aaron Brothers to bargain, and this court enforced the order. See Aaron Brothers Corp., 223 N.L.R.B. 1179 (1976), enf'd, 563 F.2d 409 (9th Cir. 1977).

Aaron Brothers and the Union met to negotiate a contract on March 30, 1978. Negotiations were conducted by the company representative, John Fretwell, and Union representative John Krasnick.[1] Krasnick and Fretwell held four bargaining sessions between the first meeting and June 15, 1978. They discussed various contract items, including wages, during the meetings, but they reached tentative agreement only with respect to a union security clause. At the completion of the June 15 session, the parties scheduled their next session for September 15, 1978. The session was later postponed to November 9, 1978.

---

*Honorable Francis C. Whelan, United States District Judge for the Central District of California, sitting by designation.

[1] On the strength of the ALJ's credibility assessment, we credit Krasnick's version of the facts in the few instances of conflicting testimony. The ALJ stated at page 2[illegible]:

> This discrepancy is resolved in Krasnick's favor because his overall demeanor was more convincing then Fretwell's; his testimony on this point and generally carried greater substantive plausibility than Fretwell's in instances of conflict; and, as is about to be developed, Fretwell testified on one occasion with such palpable falseness as to cast serious doubt on his credibility in any case of conflict.

On September 22, 1978, Aaron Brothers sent a notice to all of its employees, including those in the bargaining unit, that it was instituting a 19 cents an hour wage increase, effective October 5, 1978. Aaron Brothers considered notifying the Union, but decided against such action. The increase went into effect as scheduled.

The Union first learned of the increase at the November 9 bargaining session. Fretwell apologized for not notifying Krasnick earlier. Krasnick stated that the wage increase was an unfair labor practice and Fretwell agreed that it would be so interpreted. Krasnick then suggested that they use the wage increase as a base for further negotiations. Fretwell replied that he had no authority to grant anything further. Krasnick then stated that there was no sense in negotiating further and indicated that he was going to file an unfair labor practice charge. Fretwell agreed with Krasnick's assessment, and the session adjourned.

The Union filed an unfair labor practice charge on November 28, 1978. A hearing was held on April 17, 1979 before an Administrative Law Judge (ALJ). The ALJ found that Aaron Brothers had violated sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) by instituting the October 5 wage increase and refusing on November 9 to negotiate further on wages. The ALJ entered an order requiring, inter alia, Aaron Brothers to refrain from unilaterally implementing wage increases and to cease refusing to negotiate wage changes beyond the increase granted on October 5, 1978. The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) adopted the ALJ decision without modification.

Aaron Brothers now petitions the Court of Appeals for review of the Board decision and the Board cross-applies to enforce the order.

Wage Increase

It is settled that an employer violates sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) & (5) (1976),[2] if he or she institutes a wage change without first consulting and bargaining with the union representing the employees. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 745–47, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 1112–14, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962). Aaron Brothers concedes that it implemented the October 5 wage increase without first alerting or consulting the Union. It argues, however, that the wage increase did not violate sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(5) because the increase was part of a continuing company policy annually to adjust wages and was therefore not a change in working conditions subject to the Katz rule.

The Board and the ALJ did not rule on whether the wage increase was instituted pursuant to a longstanding company policy. The ALJ concluded that even if it was, Aaron Brothers was required to notify the Union of the impending increase, citing the Board's decision in Allis-Chalmers Corp., 237 N.L.R.B. 290, 291 (1978), enf'd on other grounds, 601 F.2d 870, 875 (5th Cir. 1979) (wage increases not automatic), enf'mt stayed pending review, 608 F.2d 1018 (5th Cir. 1979) (sole issue whether union properly certified). The Board affirmed this position without comment.

The Board's position is contrary to this circuit's established rule. Wage changes that merely reflect continuations of past company policy are not considered changes in existing work conditions, and thus fall outside the Katz rule. See Queen Mary Restaurants Corp. v. NLRB, 560 F.2d 403, 408 (9th Cir. 1977); NLRB v. Nello Pistoresi & Son, Inc. (S & D Trucking Co., Inc.), 500 F.2d 399, 400 (9th Cir. 1974). Moreover, no other circuit has accepted the Board's position. See, e.g., NLRB v. Phil-Modes, Inc., 406 F.2d 556, 557 n.3 (5th Cir. 1969) (Board position "simply begs the question of whether there was a change in wages").

[2] Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the NLRA provide:

(a) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title; (5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title.

29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (5) (1976).

The Board suggests on appeal that an enforcement order can be granted on the alternative ground that this wage increase does not fit within the "longstanding practice" exception to Katz. The burden of proving that a wage increase falls within the longstanding practice exception is upon the employer. See NLRB v. Allis-Chalmers Corp., 601 F.2d 870, 875 (5th Cir. 1979), modified, 608 F.2d 1018 (5th Cir. 1979) (sole issue whether union properly certified). While the Board's argument may have merit, it is not clear upon this record whether Aaron Brothers has met its burden.

In determining whether a benefit change fits within the Katz exception, the Supreme Court has counseled lower courts to examine the degree to which an employer has discretion to award a benefit or determine its size. See Katz, 369 U.S. at 746–47, 82 S.Ct. at 1113–14. The greater the discretion, the Court has reasoned, the greater the danger unilateral action will destablize industrial relations by undermining a union's institutional credibility.

In applying this standard, we have focused principally upon how long an employer's practice has been in effect. By itself this standard does not give a clear indication whether here the wage increase was a change in working conditions or whether it was merely a continuation of established company policy. The policy was four years old. This time period falls between the periods we have deemed insufficient to qualify as a longstanding practice and periods we have declared sufficient. Compare Queen Mary Restaurants Corp., 560 F.2d at 408 (wage increase to employees not part of a longstanding practice when wages increased only once under policy) and Nello Pistoresi & Son, Inc., 500 F.2d at 400 (when Christmas bonus paid for only two years and followed no formula, discontinuance of bonus not unilateral change in terms of employment) with NLRB v. Progress Bulletin Publishing Co., 443 F.2d 1369 (9th Cir. 1971) (when Christmas bonus paid regularly for 20 of previous 21 years and amount varied with seniority of employees, discontinuance of bonus was unilateral change in working conditions).

We also have indicated that a court should consider whether the benefit change was fixed by an established formula containing variables beyond the employer's immediate influence. Nello Pistoresi & Son, Inc., 500 F.2d at 401 (holding that Christmas bonus was not established policy partly because employer used no formula to compute bonus; distinguishing earlier case partly on ground that bonus program there was tied to employees' seniority). Three circuits follow this approach and inquire whether benefit changes result from fixed guidelines or formulae based on sales, employee tenure, or other factors beyond an employer's immediate control.[3]

Aaron Brothers urges the adoption of the Second Circuit rule that unilateral wage increases of any amount are permissible under section 8(a)(5) so long as the employer has had a history periodically of increasing employee benefits. See NLRB v. Hendel Manufacturing Co., Inc., 523 F.2d 133, 135 (2d Cir. 1975); NLRB v. Patent Trader, Inc., 415 F.2d 190, 199–200 (2d Cir. 1969), modified in part on other grounds, 426 F.2d 791 (2d Cir. 1970). We reject this approach. So long as an employer has made wage changes on a regular basis, the Second Circuit rule appears to give an employer unfettered discretion to implement a wage change of any amount without first consulting or bargaining with the union representing the employees. This standard allows an employer routinely to circumvent the collective bargaining process, a result the Katz Court sought to avoid by creating a per se rule.[4]

[3] See Allis-Chalmers Corp., 601 F.2d at 875–76 (wage increase did not result from "purely automatic" policy and was not pursuant to "definite guidelines"); NLRB v. John Zink Co., 551 F.2d 799, 801–02 (10th Cir. 1977) (where company action was not "automatic" and involved some degree of managerial discretion, 82 job classification changes and merit increases were unilateral changes in terms of employment); N.L.R.B. v. J. P. Stevens & Co., 538 F.2d 1152, 1163 (5th Cir. 1976) (where employer had no tangible guidelines to determine which employees should receive merit increase, when they should receive it, or the size of the increase, grant of merit increase to 20 of 50 employees in bargaining unit a unilateral change in terms of employment); N.L.R.B. v. Ralph Printing & Lithographing Co., 433 F.2d 1058, 1062–63 (8th Cir. 1970) (consultation with union not required where wage increase granted pursuant to well-established policy raising wages to maintain wage differential between skilled and unskilled workers in response to increases in minimum wage or when character of an employee's job changes, but a company policy does not qualify under exception where wage increase based on a subjective evaluation of an employee's performance), cert. denied, 401 U.S. 925, 91 S.Ct. 883, 27 L.Ed.2d 829 (1971); Phil-Modes, Inc., 406 F.2d at 557 (shifting employee's pay from piecework basis to hourly basis not a unilateral change where the shift had occurred every year the employer had been in operation and where the beginning and end of the period were triggered each year by consumer demand, a factor beyond the employer's control); N.L.R.B. v. Southern Coach & Body Co., 336 F.2d 214, 217–18 (5th Cir. 1964) (wage increase not an unilateral change where increase resulted from longstanding policy granting automatic increases according to job tenure and difficulty of job).

[4] Aaron Brothers also argues that a failure to implement the October 5 wage increase would have been an unfair labor practice, placing it in the

Nothing in this record suggests that Aaron Brothers relies upon pre-established guidelines or formulae in deciding whether to grant a wage increase or in determining its size. Moreover, the marked fluctuation in the size of the raises from year to year, summarized in Table #1, suggests that the wage decision was the product of an ad hoc decisionmaking process rather than a continuation of an established company policy.

Nonetheless, on the record before us we are unable to determine whether the wage increase violated section 8(a)(5). We therefore remand the issue to the Board to determine whether the increase resulted from nondiscretionary standards and guidelines.

III

Refusal to Bargain

The ALJ and the Board found that Aaron Brothers committed a separate violation of section 8(a)(5) by refusing, in bad faith, to bargain about wages after November 9, 1978. This court must accept the Board's finding of bad faith if it is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 477, 71 S.Ct. 456, 459, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). When reviewing a charge of bad faith, a court must examine the entire conduct of both sides during negotiations. NLRB v. Insurance Agents International Union, 361 U.S. 477, 80 S.Ct. 419, 4 L.Ed.2d 454 (1960); NLRB v. American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 72 S.Ct. 824, 96 L.Ed. 1027 (1952).

An employer fails to manifest good faith in bargaining sessions if he does not " 'participate actively in the deliberations so as to indicate a present intention to find a basis for agreement' " and does not make " 'sincere effort * * * to reach a common ground.' " NLRB v. Yutana Barge Lines, Inc., 315 F.2d 524, 530 (9th Cir. 1963) (quoting NLRB v. Montgomery Ward & Co., 133 F.2d 676, 686 (9th Cir. 1943)). Both parties are required "to afford the other [party] a fair opportunity to exchange and discuss proposals and counter-proposals." Id.

The charge of bad faith made here is based principally upon the conduct of Aaron Brothers representative, John Fretwell, at the November 9 negotiating session with Union negotiator John Krasnick. After describing what had transpired at the five previous bargaining sessions, the ALJ found:

> By notice dated September 22, 1978, Respondent notified its employees companywide, including those in the bargaining unit, that they would be receiving an hourly wage increase of 19 cents, effective October 5. The Union first learned of the increase during the November 9 bargaining meeting, when Fretwell gave Krasnick a copy of the employee notice. Fretwell told Krasnick that he had asked that the increase be withheld from the unit employees, and was "embarassed" that it had not; and voiced agreement with Krasnick's accusation that the inclusion of the unit employees in the raise was an unfair labor practice. With that, Krasnick proposed that the new wage levels be used as a base for the continued negotiation of the wage issue. Fretwell declined, explaining that he was without authority to offer anything additional. Krasnick countered that he would have to file an unfair labor practice in that event, and Fretwell said he would not blame Krasnick if he did.

The ALJ concluded from these facts that Aaron Brothers' refusal to continue negotiating on wages resulted from the company's bad faith. Aaron Brothers does not dispute any of the findings made above, but contends that they do not demonstrate bad faith. It argues first that these findings show that the Union was the party responsible for breaking off negotiations. The record does not support this contention. The ALJ found that the union rep-untenable position of committing an unfair labor practice whether or not it implemented the increase. This concern is unfounded. Aaron Brothers could have avoided all risk by notifying and consulting with the Union as to the course it should follow. See N.L.R.B. v. United Aircraft Corp., 490 F.2d 1105, 1111 (2d Cir. 1973); General Motors Acceptance Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 476 F.2d 850, 854 (1st Cir. 1973).

resentative offered to continue wage negotiations using the October 5 wage increase as a base. The more plausible reading of Fretwell's response is that Aaron Brothers was not interested in negotiating the wage issue further.

Aaron Brothers argues alternatively that it was justified in breaking off wage bargaining on November 9 because the parties had reached an impasse on the wage issue. Although it is clear that "the obligation to bargain collectively does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession," American National Insurance Co., 343 U.S. at 404, 72 S.Ct. at 829, the record does not support a conclusion that the prospects for further compromise were nil; the parties had completed only five bargaining sessions prior to the November meeting and neither party had yet presented a "final" wage offer.

Aaron Brothers also argues that it bargained in good faith prior to November 9. The record indicates that the company actively engaged in bargaining during the negotiating sessions held prior to November 9. The record, however, also contains evidence casting doubt on the company's interest in reaching an agreement. Aaron Brothers' two month delay in informing the Union of its decision to implement the October 5 pay increase suggests that the company was prepared to circumvent the collective bargaining process by presenting the Union with a fait accompli. Cf. Alfred M. Lewis, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 587 F.2d 403, 409 (9th Cir. 1978) (bargaining in good faith requires not only notice to Union of pending unilateral change in working conditions, but also the opportunity to bargain.) Moreover, hearing testimony indicates that Aaron Brothers made a conscious decision not to inform the Union of the pending increase on the ground that the employer doubted whether the Union retained majority support. Cf. Clear Pine Mouldings, Inc. v. NLRB, 632 F.2d 721, 730 (9th Cir. 1980) (an employer who believes that a Union has lost majority support may petition the NLRB for decertification but may not in the interim refuse to bargain or otherwise engage in unfair labor practices).[5]

The Board's finding of bad faith in Aaron Brothers' November 9 refusal to bargain about wages is supported by substantial evidence. We therefore affirm that portion of the Board's decision, and enforce the portion of the Board's order pertaining to the refusal to bargain.

ENFORCED in part; REMANDED in part.

[5] Aaron Brothers also argues that events that occurred after November 9 do not support a finding that the company violated the NLRA. The NLRB, however, did not rely on events after November 9 in reaching its findings, nor did it cite the company for additional unfair labor practices that may have occurred after November 9. The ALJ accepted testimony concerning the events that occurred after November 9, but did so only for the purpose of determining whether the Union waived its bargaining rights after November 9.

Construction Erectors, Inc. v. NLRB

661 F.2d 801 (9th Cir.), November 16, 1981—252 NLRB 319

On petition to review Board Order

Before DUNIWAY and SNEED, Circuit Judges, and TASHIMA,* District Judge

802

TASHIMA, District Judge: Construction Erectors, Inc. (the "Company") petitions for review of a decision of the National Labor Relations Board (the "Board"). The Board has cross-petitioned for enforcement of its order. The Administrative Law Judge's ("ALJ") Findings of Fact and Conclusions and the Board's Decision and Order are reported at 252 NLRB No. 85 (1980).[1]

On December 10, 1977, the Company entered into a collective bargaining agreement with Local 625 of the International Association of Bridge, Structural, and Ornamental Ironworkers, AFL-CIO (the "Union"). The Company repudiated the agreement on February 28, 1979, asserting, inter alia, that it no longer employed any Union members. An unfair labor practice charge was filed by the Union on March 13, 1979.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE BOARD

The ALJ found that the Company had committed an unfair labor practice by repudiating its contract with the Union and held that, at the time of the 1977 agreement between the Company and the Union, i. e., on December 10, 1977, the Company's employees were a stable unit and the Union had the support of a majority of that unit. As a result, he concluded that the agreement was governed by § 9(a) of the National Labor Relations Act (the "Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 159(a), rather than § 8(f), 29 U.S.C. § 158(f), that the Union was entitled to be recognized as the exclusive representative of all ironworkers employed by the Company for the remainder of the term of the agreement and that the Company was, therefore, not free to unilaterally terminate the contract and withdraw recognition from the Union. The ALJ recommended that the Board issue a cease and desist order, award backpay to all employees in the bargaining unit who had lost wages since the time the Company repudiated the contract and require the Company to make up any payments it owed to the Union trust fund pursuant to that contract.

[1] The facts are fully detailed in the ALJ's decision. The facts necessary to explain our decision are set forth in Part II of the "Discussion," which follows.

The Board affirmed the ALJ's findings and conclusions, and adopted his recommended order.

ISSUE

Was the Board's finding, that there was a permanent and stable workforce at the time the Company and the Union signed the 1977 agreement, supported by substantial evidence.

DISCUSSION

I. Standard of Review and Applicable Law.

On review of an order of the Board, this Court's inquiry is limited to whether the Board's factual findings are supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole, and whether the Board's application of those findings is rational and consistent with the Act. An order meeting this test is entitled to enforcement. Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 501, 98 S.Ct. 2463, 2473, 57 L.Ed.2d 370 (1978); Precision Striping v. NLRB, 642 F.2d 1144, 1146 (9th Cir. 1981).

Generally, it is an unfair labor practice for an employer and union to sign a collective bargaining agreement recognizing a minority union as an exclusive bargaining representative. International Ladies Garment Workers Union v. NLRB, 366 U.S. 731, 81 S.Ct. 1603, 6 L.Ed.2d 762 (1961). However, § 8(f) of the Act creates an exception to this rule, allowing a construction industry employer to execute a "pre-hire agreement" with a Union that has not yet attained majority status. This exception recognizes the unique nature of the construction industry. Employees in that industry tend to move frequently from job to job, making it impossible for the NLRB to conduct an election at each site. The use of pre-hire agreements also facilitates bidding, by allowing a contractor to compute his labor costs before submitting his bid for a particular job. NLRB v. Local Union No. 103, Int'l Assn. of Bridge, Structural & Ornamental Iron Workers, AFL-CIO, 434 U.S. 335, 348, 98 S.Ct. 651, 659, 54 L.Ed.2d 586 (1978) ("Higdon").

A pre-hire agreement under § 8(f) does not entitle a union to full rights until it can show that it has attained majority support in the relevant bargaining unit. An employer is free to repudiate a § 8(f) agreement and call for a bargaining representative election at any time. Higdon, supra, at 345, 98 S.Ct. at 657. Once a union achieves majority status, however, "the pre-hire agreement attains the status of a collective bargaining agreement executed by the employer with a union representing a majority of the employees in the unit", id. at 350, 98 S.Ct. at 660, and the employer becomes obliged to recognize the union as bargaining representative for the duration of the contract. Pioneer Inn Associates v. NLRB, 578 F.2d 835, 838–39 (9th Cir. 1978).

One method employed by the Board in deciding whether construction industry bargaining agreements are voidable § 8(f) contracts or binding § 9(a) contracts is to determine whether the agreement in question covers a permanent and stable unit of employees. See, e. g., Precision Striping, Inc., 245 NLRB No. 34, 102 LRRM 1264

(1979), enf. denied, 642 F.2d 1144 (9th Cir. 1981); Land Equipment, Inc., 248 NLRB 685 n.2 (1980), enf'd 649 F.2d 867 (9th Cir. 1981) (memorandum); Hageman Underground Construction, 253 NLRB No. 7, 1980–81 CCH NLRB ¶ 17,486 (1980). If the union represents a majority of employees in a stable unit when the contract is executed, the contract is treated as a binding § 9(a) agreement from the date of its execution. If the union does not represent a majority at the time of contract execution, but later achieves a majority in a stable unit, the Board deems the contract to be initially a § 8(f) agreement that is later converted to a § 9(a) agreement. In either situation, once the contract becomes a § 9(a) agreement, it is binding for the term of the agreement under the "contract bar" principle.[2] On the other hand, when a construction industry employer has no stable complement and hires its employees on a project-by-project basis with little employee carryover from site to site,

> "majority status among employees at a given jobsite is not presumed to carry over automatically to future sites and 'the union must demonstrate its majority status at each new jobsite in order to invoke the provisions of Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.' "

Hageman Underground Construction, supra, at n.7, citing Dee Cee Floor Covering, Inc., 232 NLRB 421 (1977), 1977–78 CCH NLRB ¶ 18,658.

II. Application of the Legal Standard to this Case.

As we have stated, the Board found that on December 10, 1977, the Company had established a permanent complement of at least six ironworkers which it maintained until the outbreak of a strike in late November, 1978. However, only six of the Company's 13 employees, on December 10, 1977, the date of the agreement between the Union and the Company, had been working there more than three weeks prior to that date. Two of these six were not Union members and were not primarily employed as ironworkers. Only one of these six was employed by the Company during 1978. Of the entire complement of 13 employed on December 10, 1977, only two were still employed at the end of January, 1978. There also was evidence before the Board that 62 employees were referred from the Union hiring hall during 1978. Therefore, we conclude that there was not substantial evidence to support the Board's finding that there was a permanent and stable work force at the time of the agreement between the Union and the Company.

The facts of this case, thus, clearly distinguish it from the cases relied on by the Board. For example, in Precision Striping, supra, the employer was found to have employed the same five persons from September, 1977 until the contract was repudiated in March, 1978. 245 NLRB No. 34 at n.10. Similarly, in Hageman Underground Construction, supra, three identifiable backhoe operators were transferred by the company from project to project. These three were held to constitute a stable unit because the company operated only four backhoes in all. 253 NLRB No. 7, 1980–81 CCH NLRB at 28,246–47.

The Board made no finding as to whether or not the Company's force of ironworkers had become a permanent and stable unit at any time after January, 1978. The Board now contends that at the time of the strike in November, 1978, there were six workers who constituted the entire ironworker complement and that they had worked for the Company on a relatively continuous basis throughout 1978.[3] The Board, however, did not rely upon this evidence to find that the workforce of ironworkers became permanent and stable during the latter part of 1978. Thus, the facts relied on in the Board's brief cannot be relied upon by us to support the Board's order. As the Court stated in NLRB v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 380 U.S. 438, 444, 85 S.Ct. 1061, 1064, 13 L.Ed.2d 951 (1965):

> "[T]he integrity of the administrative process requires that 'courts may not accept appellate counsel's post hoc rationalizations for agency action * * *' Burlington Truck Lines v. United States, supra, [371 U.S. 156] at 168 [83 S.Ct. 239 at 245, 9 L.Ed.2d 207]; see Securities and Exchange Comm'n v. Chenery Corp., 332 U.S. 194, 196 [67 S.Ct. 1575, 1577, 91 L.Ed. 1995]. For reviewing courts to substitute counsel's rationale or their discretion for that of the Board is incompatible with the orderly function of the process of judicial review."

[2] Under the "contract bar" rule, the Board will ordinarily not entertain a challenge to an incumbent union's majority status during the term of an agreement of three years duration or less. Pioneer Inn Associates, supra, 578 F.2d at 838; General Cable Corp., 139 NLRB 1123, 1124 (1962); Hexton Furniture Co., 111 NLRB 342, 344 (1955).

[3] The Board's brief names these six ironworkers and states that two worked for the Company from January through November, three worked from April through November and one worked from May through November.

Because of his conclusion as to the stability of the Company's workforce on the date the 1977 agreement was executed and his application of the "contract bar" rule, the ALJ did not reach the question of whether the Union had majority support at any other time prior to the repudiation of the agreement. The Company claims that it employed no Union members at the time it repudiated the agreement. If this is true, the Company cannot be found to have committed an unfair labor practice, unless the Board finds that at some time prior to the repudiation of the 1977 agreement, the workforce in the bargaining unit had become permanent and stable and the Union obtained majority support within the unit at that time. Otherwise, the Union must demonstrate its majority at each new jobsite in order to invoke the provisions of § 8(a)(5) of the Act. Dee Cee Floor Covering, supra, 1977–78 CCH NLRB at 31,024.

CONCLUSION

The Company's petition for review is granted and the Board's order is vacated. The Board's cross-petition for enforcement of its order is denied. We remand to the Board for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

VACATED AND REMANDED.

R.W. Harmon & Sons, Inc. v. NLRB

664 F.2d 248 (10th Cir.), November 16, 1981—246 NLRB 454

On petition to review Board Order

249

LOGAN, Circuit Judge: R. W. Harmon & Sons, Inc. (Harmon or petitioner) seeks review of two orders of the National Labor Relations Board (Board) asserting jurisdiction over petitioner's activities. Harmon is a corporation engaged in providing school bus and other charter bus transportation services in nine states. It presently provides school bus services to approximately seventy-three public school districts. The challenged Board orders arose out of petitioner's refusals to bargain with Service Employees Union Local 513 (union), which represents school bus drivers in Wichita, Kansas and O'Fallon, Missouri.[1]

Harmon contests the Board's jurisdictional authority on two grounds. It argues, first, Harmon's activities are essentially local in character and do not affect interstate commerce; and, second, each school board so fully controls employment conditions and restricts Harmon's ability to engage in meaningful collective bargaining with its bus drivers, that Harmon shares the school board's governmental exemption from Board jurisdiction, as provided in section 2(2) of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA), 29 U.S.C. § 152(2). Petitioner also argues that the Board abused its discretion when it abandoned its former test for asserting jurisdiction over school bus operators.

The two cases consolidated here involve Harmon's contracts to provide school bus transportation in the Sedgwick County school district in Wichita, Kansas and the Fort Zumwalt school district in O'Fallon, Missouri. In both contracts the school districts require that drivers possess valid chauffeur's licenses and meet state qualifications for school bus drivers. The school districts have authority to reject applicants for bus driver positions, and the contracts allow the school districts to recommend that Harmon dismiss, discipline, or transfer drivers to other routes. Additionally, the school boards establish the bus routes and route schedules. Harmon hires and trains the drivers, determines their wage rates and benefits, and regularly monitors and supervises their performance.

In 1978 the union filed representation petitions with the Board's Regional Director, seeking certification as the collective bargaining representative of Harmon's bus drivers in both school districts. Following the representation hearings, the Regional Director ordered elections, rejecting Harmon's contentions that its operations were purely local in character or were so controlled by the school districts that the Board could not assert jurisdiction over it. The union won the elections and was then certified as the drivers' exclusive bargaining representative.

*Honorable Earl E. O'Connor of the United States District Court for the District of Kansas, sitting by designation.

[1] To obtain judicial review of a Board decision in either a representation proceeding or an election, an employer must refuse to bargain with the employee representative, which will result in an unfair labor practice charge against the employer. Magnesium Casting Co. v. NLRB, 401 U.S. 137, 139, 91 S.Ct. 599, 600, 27 L.Ed.2d 735 (1971).

When Harmon refused to bargain, the union filed unfair labor practice charges. In its defense Harmon again asserted that the Board lacked jurisdiction. In both cases the Board granted summary judgment against Harmon because it found the company raised no issues it had not or could not have litigated in prior representation proceedings. It also found that by refusing to bargain, Harmon violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) and (5). This appeal followed.

We first consider the jurisdictional issues. Harmon argues that because its business is essentially local in character its labor activities do not affect interstate commerce. Congress vested the Board with the "fullest jurisdictional breadth constitutionally permissible under the Commerce Clause." NLRB v. Reliance Fuel Oil Corp., 371 U.S. 224, 226, 83 S.Ct. 312, 313, 9 L.Ed.2d 279 (1963) (emphasis in original). Cases determining the Board's jurisdiction have focused upon the employer's activities. The Board may regulate any business if it is engaged in interstate commerce; or even if it is essentially local in nature, if its activities affect interstate commerce. E. g., Community Currency Exchange, Inc. v. NLRB, 471 F.2d 39, 41 (7th Cir. 1972); cf. NLRB v. Merrill, 388 F.2d 514, 518 (10th Cir. 1968) (Board may consider all of the employer's business operations). Contrary to Harmon's assertions that its activities are essentially local and do not affect interstate commerce, Harmon admits that it has annual revenues of more than $16,000,000 from extensive operations in nine states, and that for use in its business activities in Kansas and Missouri, it annually purchases thousands of dollars of goods originating outside those states. These factors clearly bring Harmon within the Board's statutory jurisdiction.

Petitioner next argues that the Board should decline to exercise jurisdiction because of the extent to which the school districts, which are exempt under NLRA section 2(2), control the conditions of employment. The Board may exercise its jurisdiction only over statutory employers, employees, and labor organizations. Section 2(2) exempts from the definition of "employer" any "state or political subdivision thereof." 29 U.S.C. §152(2). Courts have interpreted section 2(2) to prohibit the Board from asserting jurisdiction over private employers that perform services for exempt governmental entities if the employer does not "retain sufficient control over the employment relationship to engage in meaningful collective bargaining." Board of Trustees of Memorial Hospital v. NLRB, 624 F.2d 177, 185 (10th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Pope Maintenance Corp., 573 F.2d 898, 902 (5th Cir. 1978).

Whether an employer retains sufficient control over the employment relationship is a question of fact. We must accept the Board's resolution of the question "unless unsupported by substantial evidence on the record considered as a whole, or unless arbitrary or capricious." Id. at 903; accord, NLRB v. St. Louis Comprehensive Neighborhood Health Center, 633 F.2d 1268, 1272 (8th Cir. 1980). The record supports the Board's conclusion that petitioner retains substantial control over most employment conditions. Harmon controls the basic bargaining subjects: wages, seniority, grievance procedures, vacation, insurance, and retirement plans.[2]

Harmon contends that the school districts' authority to reject job applicants and to recommend dismissal of a driver effectively eliminates Harmon's ability to engage in meaningful collective bargaining. We disagree. Courts view the absolute power to hire and fire workers as a relevant but not essential indication of an employer-employee relationship, e. g., NLRB v. E. C. Atkins & Co., 331 U.S. 398, 413, 67 S.Ct. 1265, 1273, 91 L.Ed. 1563 (1947), and have affirmed the Board's jurisdictional authority over an employer that has yielded some control over hiring and discharge to a governmental entity. Zapex Corp. v. NLRB, 621 F.2d 328, 333 (9th Cir. 1980); Herbert Harvey, Inc. v. NLRB, 424 F.2d 770, 778-79 (D.C. Cir. 1969). Even if the school districts vigorously exercise their authority to reject applicants or recommend dismissal of drivers, Harmon still would control and could bargain over most employment conditions. Moreover, the school districts only infrequently have exercised their authority to reject applicants or recommend dismissal. Harmon officials testified that between them the two school districts had rejected only two applicants Harmon had approved and had recommended dismissal on just four occasions, and that in all but one instance Harmon transferred rather than dismissed the drivers.

[2] Although Harmon presently does not provide vacation time, insurance, or retirement plans, it admits it has the authority to grant these benefits.

Harmon also emphasizes that it cannot bargain about bus routes, time schedules, and days of operation because the school districts specify those terms. The jurisdictional test, however, does not require an employer to control all terms and conditions of employment, but only enough control to bargain effectively. Since Harmon controls wages and benefits—the bread and butter issues of collective bargaining—it can engage in meaningful bargaining.

Finally, Harmon argues that the Board abused its discretion when it abandoned its earlier "intimate connection" test. Prior to National Transportation Service, Inc., 240 NLRB 565 (1979), the Board utilized a two-pronged test to determine whether to assert jurisdiction over enterprises performing services for governmental entities. First, the Board would determine whether the private employer retained sufficient control over employment conditions to bargain effectively with a union. Second, even if the employer could bargain effectively, the Board would not exercise its jurisdiction if it found that the private employer served a function that was "intimately connected" with the governmental entity. The Board had considered school bus transportation a function "intimately connected" with the school districts and declined jurisdiction over companies providing school bus transportation. E. g., Roesch Lines, Inc., 224 NLRB 203 (1976). In National Transportation Service, however, the Board abandoned the test's second prong and for the first time asserted jurisdiction over a bus transportation company.

Harmon makes various arguments that the Board abused its discretion in abandoning the "intimate connection" prong of the test, including that it should have followed the rulemaking procedures of the Administrative Procedure Act. See 5 U.S.C. § 553. We need not address Harmon's claims because it did not raise them until the unfair labor practice proceedings. A party cannot raise an issue in an unfair labor practice proceeding or on appeal that could have been, but was not, raised in the representation hearing.[3] St. Anthony Hospital Systems v. NLRB, 655 F.2d 1028, 1030 (10th Cir. 1981); 29 C.F.R. § 102.67(f) (1981).[4] While there is an exception to this rule if the party can demonstrate compelling circumstances, NLRB v. Austin Development Center, Inc., 606 F.2d 785, 788 (7th Cir. 1979), Harmon has not suggested any compelling circumstances, and we decline to address the merits of this issue.

The Board's order is therefore enforced.

[3] Although the Fort Zumwalt representation hearing took place before the Board decided National Transportation Service, the Wichita hearing occurred after that decision. At the Wichita hearing Harmon referred to National Transportation Service, but did not argue that the Board's decision in that case was an abuse of discretion.

[4] 29 C.F.R. § 102.67(f) (1981) provides, in pertinent part:

"Failure to request review shall preclude such parties from relitigating, in any related subsequent unfair labor practice proceeding, any issue which was, or could have been, raised in the representation proceeding."

Prudential Insurance Company of America v. NLRB

661 F.2d 398 (5th Cir.), November 16, 1981—251 NLRB 1591

On petition to review Board Order

Before TUTTLE, RONEY and ANDERSON, Circuit Judges

399

RONEY, Circuit Judge: This petition involves an employee's right to have a union representative present at an investigatory interview that the employee reasonably believes would result in disciplinary action. NLRB v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 95 S.Ct. 959, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975). The Prudential Insurance Company of America petitions this Court to set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board requiring it to cease and desist from violating that Weingarten right. Finding that the Union waived the Weingarten right in its collective bargaining agreement with Prudential, we deny enforcement of the Board's order.

Neal Bowser was a district agent with Prudential. One of his responsibilities was to keep accurate premium payment records in an Agency Record Book (ARB) so the company could determine which policies were active and which had lapsed. Because of discrepancies in some of Bowser's records, his district manager conducted an audit of Bowser's ARB and found a number of policies whose current status could not be determined. A meeting with Bowser, his immediate supervisor, and the manager was set up for 11:15 a. m. on May 11, 1979. Bowser asked a union representative to attend the meeting, and the manager approved the request. Without advance notice, however, the meeting was moved up to 10:00 a. m. and started without the union representative. After five minutes of questioning about his ARB, Bowser asked for and was denied union representation. He continued the meeting under protest. Later, a union grievance committee member was denied permission to join the meeting as Bowser's representative. The manager subsequently recommended that Bowser be discharged.

The Union filed an unfair labor practice charge. The Administrative Law Judge found that although the interview was investigatory in nature, Bowser had no right to union representation because the information sought by Prudential was necessary for the conduct of its business and could only be obtained from Bowser. The Board, however, reversed the ALJ and found an unfair labor practice.

The first question in a case like this is whether Bowser's meeting with his supervisor and manager was an interview covered by Weingarten. For the purpose of this decision, we assume that the Weingarten criteria were met: it was an investigatory interview in which Bowser was questioned about his ARB, records, and policies; he reasonably feared disciplinary action; and he asked for union representation. We assume Bowser had a right to have a union representative present during the interview unless it was waived.

Although Prudential argues that Weingarten should not apply to the insurance industry due to its special nature, no authority is cited for this proposition, the argument relies in part upon some of the arguments disregarded by the Supreme Court in Weingarten, and there is no base upon which this Court could build an exception to Weingarten for the insurance industry.

The question then is whether the bargaining agreement with the Union waives such right. By the express language in the agreement, it would seem to do just that. The agreement provides:

> The Union further agrees that neither the Union nor its members shall interfere with the right of the Employer: * * *
> To interview any Agent with respect to any phase of his work without the grievance committee being present.

Confronted with this language, the Board held that the clause did not effectively waive the Weingarten right because it was originally adopted before such right was recognized and it referred to "grievance committee" rather than "union representative."

Since the Weingarten right to representation at an interview with the employer "plainly effectuates the most fundamental purposes of the Act," Weingarten, 420 U.S. at 261, 95 S.Ct. at 966, an initial question is whether it can be waived by a union contract. The Weingarten decision provides no clear indication whether a contractual waiver of this important right is permissible. 420 U.S. at 275 n.8 (Powell, J., dissenting). The Board has not yet ruled on the question of waiver, but the Board's General Counsel has issued a formal opinion holding that a waiver would be valid. Southern California Edison Co., Case 31–CA–7526, 7 Advise Mem.Rptr. ¶ 17, 102 (Division of Advice, July 12, 1978).

Other congressionally given fundamental rights, such as the right to strike, may be bargained away contractually by the union. See Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270, 76 S.Ct. 349, 100 L.Ed. 309 (1956). See also NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., 345 U.S. 71, 73 S.Ct. 519, 97 L.Ed. 832 (1953). Since the right to representation only inheres upon the employee's request, it is clear that the employee's silence can be an effective waiver of the right. Since the individual can waive his Weingarten right and the Supreme Court has recognized the right of a contractual waiver for other such fundamental rights, it would appear that a contractual waiver of the Weingarten right is possible.

Identifying the Weingarten right as an individual right does not mean that it cannot be contractually waived by the union. A union is allowed a great deal of flexibility in serving its bargaining unit during contract negotiations. It makes concessions and accepts advantages it believes are in the best interest of the employees it represents. See Ford Motor Co. v. Huffman, 345 U.S. 330, 337–38, 73 S.Ct. 681, 686, 97 L.Ed. 1048 (1953). This flexibility includes the right of the union to waive some employee rights, even the employee's individual statutory rights. Textile Workers Union of America v. Lincoln Mills of Alabama, 353 U.S. 448, 455, 77 S.Ct. 912, 917, 1 L.Ed.2d 972 (1957); NLRB v. Mid-States Metal Products, Inc., 403 F.2d 702, 704–05 (5th Cir. 1968). Courts which have invalidated a clear contractual waiver of an employee's individual statutory right have done so only when the waived right affects the employee's right to exercise his basic choice of bargaining representative. See NLRB v. Magnavox Co. of Tennessee, 415 U.S. 322, 94 S.Ct. 1099, 39 L.Ed.2d 358 (1974). Compare NLRB v. Mid-States Metal Products, Inc., 403 F.2d 702 (5th Cir. 1968) with Mason & Hanger-Silas Mason Co. v. NLRB, 405 F.2d 1 (5th Cir. 1968). The union should therefore be able to waive the employee's Weingarten right for other concessions during negotiations.

Such a contractual waiver, however, must be "clear and unmistakable." NLRB v. Item Co., 220 F.2d 956, 958–59 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 836, 76 S.Ct. 73, 100 L.Ed. 746 (1955). The Board argues that the no-union-representation-at-interviews clause of the collective bargaining agreement is not a clear and unmistakable waiver because it was agreed to initially long before Weingarten was decided, because it contains a reference to "the grievance committee" being present rather than a "union representative," and because neither side focused on the Weingarten right in the negotiations. To understand what the parties intended by the contract clause it is necessary to review the history of negotiations affecting this clause.

Following an incident involving alleged harassment of an employee during an investigatory interview, the clause was put in Prudential's agreement with the Union in 1956. Weingarten was decided in 1975. There have been three agreements negotiated since Weingarten, and the record has numerous references to that decision. Prior to 1975, the Union negotiated for representation during all interviews. It has since negotiated for representation during all "abusive" interviews. The Union asserted a right, similar to Weingarten, to union representation at the request of the employee when the employee determined the interview was "abusive." The union representative, like the representative in Weingarten, would not actively participate in the interview. While the Union never stated it was expressly waiving the Weingarten right, the record of the negotiations indicate the Union was aware of Weingarten and that its attempt to have union representation at abusive meeting compassed the Weingarten-type of interview.

Throughout the negotiations, Prudential maintained the stand that union representation in any employee interview was an interference with its business. Although the Union indicated that Prudential's position was contrary to the law, Prudential made clear that it considered the clause a waiver of the Weingarten right. Given Prudential's position and the Union's acquiescence, it is unmistakable that the Union waived the Weingarten right. Indeed, it is not clear what the clause waived if it did not waive the Union's Weingarten right. Cf. Retail Clerks International Association Local No. 455, AFL-CIO v. NLRB, 510 F.2d 802, 805 (D.C.Cir.1975) (contract provision should be interpreted to give it meaning). As for the reference to the "grievance committee" rather than to a "union representative," Prudential's practices recognize the grievance committee as essentially the same as the union representative in each district office.

We hold that the Union agreement waived the Weingarten right which was the basis of the unfair labor charge. We therefore deny enforcement of the Board's order.

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

General Thermo, Inc. v. NLRB

664 F.2d 195 (8th Cir.), November 20, 1981—250 NLRB 1260

On petition to set aside Board Order

Before HEANEY and HENLEY, Circuit Judges, and NICHOL,* Senior District Judge

196

HENLEY, Circuit Judge: General Thermo, Inc. petitions this court to set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board finding that it engaged in unfair labor practices when its assistant plant manager, Ronald Bohn, asked questions about support for a union and indicated his opposition to it, and when Bohn fired an employee, Richard McMahon. The NLRB cross-petitions for enforcement of its order. This court has jurisdiction pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) and (f), the alleged unfair labor practices having taken place in Maquoketa, Iowa, within this circuit.

*The Honorable Fred J. Nichol, Senior District Judge, District of South Dakota, sitting by designation.

The Company makes radiators and industrial heat transfer units, and employs about 125 people. McMahon was employed as a radiator assembler from January 20, 1977 until his discharge on September 26, 1978.

1. Bohn's questions and statements about the Union.

On August 21, 1978 McMahon and two other employees, Melva Polkinghorn and Clayton Shady, discussed various problems at the plant—safety hazards, disparate wages for women, material shortages, and equipment problems. Polkinghorn suggested that they needed a union, and McMahon and Shady agreed with her. Polkinghorn stated that she knew of some people to contact about forming a union.

Shortly thereafter McMahon made efforts to contact them. He sent his wife to Dubuque, Iowa to discuss union organizing with a UAW representative. McMahon then arranged for an organizational meeting to take place at his house on September 20. The meeting was rescheduled for October 5 (several days after McMahon's discharge) because of a conflict in the UAW representative's schedule. At this meeting only seven or eight authorization cards were collected, and no further meetings have been held.

By the time of the Company picnic on September 9, management was aware that some employee support for a union existed. At the picnic Ronald Bohn, who had only begun working at the Company at the beginning of September, introduced himself to employees and conversed with them. He was asked about his past employment, and he responded that he had worked at Young Radiator (a competitor of General Thermo). In the course of the conversation he mentioned a nine and one-half month strike which had occurred at Young Radiator, and stated that both the company and the employees lost during the strike.

One of the groups Bohn approached included Victor DuBois and Clarence Polkinghorn. After introducing himself, Bohn asked whether they had any complaints about the Company. DuBois replied that some newer employees earned more money than long time employees. Bohn promised to look into it, and then inquired what the people in the group thought of the union. He also indicated that he knew that McMahon and Shady were involved, and had heard that a woman was involved but did not know who she was. Clarence Polkinghorn knew that the woman was his former wife, Melva, and went to get her.

Melva shortly joined the group. Bohn expressed the opinion that employees did not need a union, and that problems could be worked out. He referred to the strike at Young, where, he asserted, the union did not back up employees. According to Melva Polkinghorn and DuBois, Bohn also said that big shots in a union could be fired.

Later in the afternoon McMahon joined a group which included Bohn, Charles Gilmore, the Polkinghorns, and an employee named Huey. When Huey complained that employees with less seniority than his were earning more than he and that certain work conditions were not right, Bohn responded that he was there to straighten things out. McMahon, who had been drinking, interjected that the only way to straighten things out was to get a union. Bohn asked if he was the one who was starting a union, and McMahon admitted that he was. The talk became loud and heated, with McMahon and Bohn swearing. According to McMahon, Charles Gilmore (a lead man)[1] declared that McMahon and Shady were nothing but troublemakers, and McMahon had only two weeks left.

A few months after the picnic, Bohn gave Melva Polkinghorn a raise, and told her to quit badmouthing the Company. The raise was not part of a plant-wide increase.

The ALJ found that questions at the picnic amounted to unlawful interrogation, and gave the employees the impression that their union activities were under surveillance. He further found that the "threat" to Melva Polkinghorn, to quit bad-mouthing the Company, could only refer to her union activities. Such an admonition, he concluded, interfered with Polkinghorn's protected rights under the Act. The Board adopted both findings of unlawful conduct, and ordered the Company to post an appropriate notice.

[1] The ALJ found that Charles Gilmore was not a supervisor, and thus his conduct could not be attributed to the Company. Charles Gilmore's status is not an issue on appeal.

Five circumstances deserve consideration in unlawful interrogation cases:

> a history of employer hostility and discrimination, the nature of the information sought (e. g., was the interrogator seeking information from which he could take action against individual employees), the identity of the questioner (i. e., what was his position in the company), the place and method of interrogation, and the truthfulness of the reply (e. g., did the interrogation inspire fear leading to evasive answers).

NLRB v. Ritchie Mfg. Co., 354 F.2d 90, 99 (8th Cir. 1965).

Applying these factors to the instant case, we think that no violation of the Act occurred at the picnic. The questioning about the union was isolated and casual, and took place in a recreational atmosphere. No one gave evasive answers, and this indicates lack of fear among the employees. Finally, other than the discharge of McMahon (discussed infra), there was no evidence of Company action against individual employees.

We find the evidence insufficient to support the conclusion that the Act was violated when Bohn told Polkinghorn to quit "bad-mouthing" the Company. This comment occurred three months after the only organizational meeting. Unlike the Board, we are not willing to assume that the comment referred to union activity.

2. The discharge of McMahon.

The Company maintains that McMahon was a problem employee, and the record supports this contention. At various times he failed to maintain a satisfactory level of production, and his attendance intermittently was poor. His foreman, Tom Gilmore, often had difficulty getting him to wear safety glasses, and when he persuaded McMahon to put them on there was no assurance that they would stay on. In mid-May, 1978 Gilmore discussed McMahon's work problems with the plant manager, Miller, but at that time Gilmore did not recommend discharge. In July Gilmore recommended discharge, but Miller disagreed, stating that they should make every effort to salvage McMahon as an employee.[2]

On the morning of September 26, 1978 an employee named Bickford heard McMahon say that he was going to kick the shit out of Rick Starr (another employee). Bickford repeated what he had heard to Charles Gilmore, who reported the matter to Bohn.

Bohn warned Starr to stay away from McMahon, and then called McMahon to his office. He also had Tom Gilmore come. According to Bohn and Gilmore, they wanted to ask about the reported threat to Starr, and they had not made any decision to discharge or even discipline McMahon. However, in light of the fact that Gilmore may have been building a case against McMahon, the possibility of adverse action unquestionably existed.

According to Bohn and Gilmore, the first thing Bohn said was that he had heard that McMahon threatened Starr. McMahon vehemently denied this charge, and used considerable profanity. According to Gilmore, Bohn cursed back at him. McMahon asked to face his accusers, and Bohn refused. Finally, Bohn fired McMahon.

In contrast, McMahon testified that the first thing Bohn said to him in the interview was that he (Bohn) had said at the picnic that he would get rid of all troublemakers, and that four or five people would quit if he did not fire McMahon (thus indicating that Bohn had already made the decision to fire McMahon). Bohn then referred to the reported threat to Starr. McMahon then appealed to Gilmore and also asked that plant manager Miller be brought in to corroborate McMahon's assertion that he did not talk about people behind their backs, and that he was the sort of person who would confront someone face-to-face if he had something to say. McMahon denied cursing, but the ALJ discredited him on this point.

The ALJ found that the Company had ample ground to discharge McMahon, and that, therefore, the discharge did not violate the Act, even if McMahon's discharge was motivated in part by his union activities. He found that McMahon's poor work habits, low production, and refusal to wear safety glasses were legitimate reasons for the discharge. He found that it was unnecessary to decide whether Bohn had decided to fire McMahon before the interview.

[2] McMahon, who is illiterate, has a wife and four children to support.

The Board reversed the ALJ on the issue of the legality of the discharge. It found that the complaints of McMahon's poor work habits, low production, and refusal to wear safety glasses were too remote in time[3] to be the real reasons for his discharge. It further found that McMahon's loud and profane behavior at the meeting could not be a justification for the discharge, because this behavior was typical of him and cursing was common at the plant.

The existence of a good reason for discharge does not negate a violation of the Act if the discharge is actually for union activity, NLRB v. Superior Sales, Inc., 366 F.2d 229, 233 (8th Cir. 1966). On the present state of the record, we are unable to determine what the actual reason for McMahon's discharge was. We think the Board erred in part in overturning the finding of the ALJ that poor performance and refusal to wear safety glasses were not part of the reason for McMahon's discharge. Complaints on these matters and Gilmore's recommendation of termination to plant manager Miller both occurred before McMahon was involved in organizing efforts. However, these faults of McMahon do not of themselves explain why the discharge occurred when it actually did and, indeed, the faults may not have been the precipitating cause of the discharge.

The timing of the discharge was suspicious, coming only a short time after the Company learned of McMahon's union activity. However, McMahon's profanity at the meeting, coupled with his previous shortcomings, could well explain the timing of his discharge. According to Bohn and Gilmore's version of the meeting, McMahon's behavior was very insubordinate and insulting.[4] We cannot agree with the Board that because the Company tolerated foul language from McMahon and others before that his profanity at the meeting was a pretext for discharge. Cursing at one's peers in a work situation differs from arguing profanely with one's supervisor in a meeting called to investigate reports of a threat.

The ALJ and the Board did not specifically determine whether Bohn made the decision to fire McMahon before the meeting or during the meeting. Rather, the Board noted that Bohn chose to confront McMahon only with the single issue of alleged threats and discharged him at the point when Bohn decided McMahon's loud and abusive protestations had become excessive. It then noted that other reasons mentioned in the post-discharge memorandum were not communicated to McMahon at the time of discharge, and from these facts drew the inference that the reasons were constructed as an afterthought to conceal an unlawful motive for the discharge.

This reasoning, however, in a way begs the question. It assumes without finding an answer to the question what happened at the meeting. If McMahon became so loud, profane and abusive at the meeting that discussion with him was impossible, then failure to mention all of the reasons for discharge would hardly support the inference that the reasons were pretextual and the discharge unlawful.

Resolution of the basic question requires in large measure a credibility determination: whether, as McMahon testified, Bohn's first words at the meeting indicated an intention to fire McMahon, or whether, as Bohn and Gilmore testified, no decision on disciplinary action had been made at the time the meeting started. Credibility questions initially are for the ALJ, not this court, and in present circumstances we cannot say that the Board's decision is supported by substantial evidence or by adequate reasoning. Accordingly, the Board is at liberty to conduct further proceedings looking toward a determination of what actually happened at the meeting of September 26, 1978 and the inferences to be drawn from the facts.

Enforcement is denied. The portion of the Board's decision relating to McMahon's discharge is remanded for such further proceedings as may be appropriate.

COFFIN, Chief Judge: Pioneer Finishing Corporation seeks review of an order issued by the National Labor Relations Board requiring it to reinstate three employees in the same or similar jobs from which they had been discharged, and the Board seeks enforcement of its order. After reviewing questions of law, and after finding that there is substantial evidence on the record to support the Board's conclusion that the discharge of two employees violated § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act and the discharge of one violated §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3), we hold that the Board's order should be enforced.

Pioneer Finishing operates a factory in Fall River, Massachusetts, in which approximately 140 employees dye and finish textile products. The employees, unionized for a number of years, had negotiated a new collective bargaining agreement late in 1977. Although the wage provisions went into effect immediately, other provisions were deferred until the Company prepared a final copy of the agreement for signing.

Among the topics of negotiation was the question whether formation of a health and safety committee should be required by the agreement. Believing that the negotiators had agreed upon formation of such a committee, Union Shop Chairman Kenneth Pacheco was distressed to find that the final draft prepared by the Company in the spring of 1978 omitted reference to the committee. The Company took the position that the committee was to be implemented on a trial basis but not included in the contract. It is not clear whether, at that point, the contract had been signed or whether further negotiation was possible. Believing the issue still to be negotiable, Pacheco got the Union to schedule a meeting of employees to discuss the omission of the clause from the contract. He helped prepare a leaflet discussing working conditions at the plant and the status of the health and safety clause, and recommending that employees act by taking note of safety issues and by attending the Union meeting. He signed the leaflet as Shop Chairman and distributed the leaflet on the Company premises during his off-hours on May 2.

The leaflet stated in part that:

> "Pioneer Finishing is a dangerous place to work * * *. In 1977 alone, there were 28 serious accidents resulting in 2,248 hours of lost time and wages! Which of us will be victims of these crippling accidents in 1978? How many of us risk accidents daily because of holes in the floor, falling lights, defective trucks and machinery, etc.? Only an effective Health & Safety Committee can ensure a safer future for us all * * *.
> "The company wants the Health & Safety clause stricken from the contract * * *. The reason the company wants this is clear. After all, an effective Health & Safety Committee forcing the company to fix the hazards affecting you and I is bound to cost them money * * *."

On May 5, three days after Pacheco distributed the leaflet, he was suspended by Thomas Melucci, President of the Company. In a letter to the Union explaining the reasons for the discharge, Melucci assumed that the contract was in effect. He wrote that Pacheco had violated the contract because he did not have permission to distribute the leaflet and should instead have posted it on the bulletin board provided under the contract for official notices.[1] Melucci also stated that the leaflet disrupted the "harmonious relationship" between the Company and the Union guaranteed by the agreement because it contained false and inflammatory statements. Specifically the Company claimed that not all 28 accidents were either "serious" or "crippling", that there were no grounds for stating that the Company was not respecting the agreement reached during negotiation and that it was reneging because it did not wish to spend the money that would be required. Approximately a week later, Pacheco was discharged. [Matter not pertinent to printed opinion deleted.]

[1] The two relevant clauses in the collective bargaining agreement state that:

"Bulletin Boards: The Employer agrees to provide space on its bulletin board for the posting of official notices relating to Union meetings and other Union affairs."

"Access to Premises: A representative or representatives of the Union shall have access to the plants of the Employer for the purpose of adjusting grievances, negotiating the settlement of disputes, investigating working conditions and generally for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions and aims of this agreement. He shall make an appointment in advance of such visits. In any event, the representative of the Union shall on arrival at the plant clear through the regular channels of the Employer for receiving visitors and may be accompanied by a representative of the Employer on any visit into the plant."

The issue of Pacheco's discharge was submitted to a single arbitrator by agreement of Pacheco, the Union, and the Company. After a hearing, the arbitrator concluded that the Company was justified in discharging Pacheco. In reaching this conclusion, he found that Pacheco had entered the Company's premises and circulated the leaflets without permission in violation of the contract, that Pacheco's activity was not protected by virtue of his status as Shop Chairman, that the content of the leaflet grossly exaggerated safety conditions at the plant, and that it violated the contract by destroying the "harmonious relationship" between the Union and the Company. Pacheco protested this decision by filing a charge against the Company, claiming that his discharge violated §§8(a)(1) and 8(a)(3) of the Act. The administrative law judge (ALJ), after determining that he did not need to defer to the arbitrator's decision, found that the Company was not justified in discharging Pacheco because his activities were protected by the Act. The Board upheld that conclusion. [Matter not pertinent to printed opinion deleted.]

Deference to the Arbitrator

Although the Board is not required by statute to defer to the decision reached by an arbitrator, it has established a policy of deference to encourage the voluntary settlement of labor disputes. Spielberg Manufacturing Company, 112 N.L.R.B. 1080, 1082 (1955). Recognizing, however, that it also has the statutory responsibility to remedy unfair labor practices, it has defined criteria to determine when deference is appropriate: the arbitration proceedings must appear to have been fair and regular, all parties must have agreed to be bound, and the decision cannot be clearly repugnant to the purposes and policies of the Act. Id. In addition, the arbitrator must have considered the unfair labor practice issue. Suburban Motor Freight, Inc., 247 N.L.R.B. No. 2 (Jan. 8, 1980); Raytheon Company, 140 N.L.R.B. 883, 884 (1963), enf. denied on other grounds, 326 F.2d 471 (1st Cir. 1964).

In choosing not to defer, the ALJ wrote that

> "The [arbitrator's] decision does refer to the concept of 'protected activity', but the arbitrator defines that term in a sense totally at odds with the statute, and his statement of the issue presented indicates that he felt confined solely to the contractual questions: "The issue before me was not whether certain employees thought unsafe conditions existed, but whether Pacheco exceeded the Contract in doing what he did' [emphasis in original] * * * . The arbitrator nowhere conveys an awareness of the statutory principles implicated by [the issue of Pacheco's right to engage in concerted activity], and his decision, in my view, abridges those principles."

Although not expressly so stating, the ALJ was in effect concluding that deference was not appropriate because the arbitrator had not considered the statutory issues and because the result was not consistent with the Act.

In reviewing the correctness of this conclusion, we look to whether the ALJ abused his discretion in deciding that the factors calling for deference were not present. Liquor Salesmen's Union Local 2 v. NLRB, 664 F.2d 318 at 326 & n.3 (2d Cir. 1981); Ad Art, Inc. v. NLRB, 645 F.2d 669, 674 (9th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Pincus Bros., Inc.,—Maxwell, 620 F.2d 367, 372 (3d Cir. 1980). We find that there was no abuse of discretion primarily because the arbitrator did not adequately address the statutory issue.

The arbitrator's opinion clearly evidences that he was solely concerned with whether Pacheco had violated the contract by distributing the leaflets. Although he initially stated that the question was whether Pacheco was engaged in "protected activity", to determine if the activity was protected, he looked to whether the activity violated the contract. He found as violations Pacheco's unauthorized entry into the premises and the distribution of untruths that attempted to destroy the "harmonious relationship" protected by the contract.

There are occasions when consideration of the contractual issues may determine the statutory issues, and therefore allows the Board to find that the arbitrator necessarily and clearly, though not explicitly, considered the statutory issue. This occurs when the statutory and contractual issues are congruent because they rest upon the same factual determinations. See, e.g., Liquor Salesmen's Union Local 2 v. NLRB, supra, at 325; Ad Art, Inc.

v. NLRB, supra, 645 F.2d at 677; Bloom v. NLRB, 603 F.2d 1015, 1021 (D.C.Cir. 1979); Bay Shipbuilding Corp., 251 N.L.R.B. No. 114 (Aug. 27, 1980).

In the case at bar, the finding that the contract was violated, even if taken as correct, does not of necessity determine that Pacheco had no protection under the statute. To so determine, the arbitrator would have had to consider the separate, statutory issues: whether the content of the leaflet was protected under the statute and whether the contract waived statutory rights to enter and to distribute the leaflet. These issues require individualized analysis and hence prevent deference where, as here, there is no indication that this analysis has been performed.

It is not enough that the parties raised the statutory issues before the arbitrator and that one might decide that he considered those issues by virtue of the fact that he chose instead to rest his decision on contractual grounds. Where the arbitrator has no duty to consider the statutory issues, it would undermine the purpose of the Act to require the Board to defer merely on the speculation that he must have considered an employee's rights under the statute. See Stephenson v. NLRB, 550 F.2d 535, 540 (9th Cir. 1977). Moreover, it is quite clear that the arbitrator's decision did not reflect, directly or indirectly, consideration of any factors germane to the statutory issue. Although deference may advance the policies of the statute by encouraging voluntary settlement, in this instance the Board did not abuse its discretion by deciding not to defer to the arbitrator's award.

Because we find that one of the deferral criteria was not met, we do not need also to review the ALJ's conclusion that the result was contrary to the purpose and policies of the Act. Compare NLRB v. Max Factor and Co., 640 F.2d 197, 203 n.6 (9th Cir. 1980). Such a judgment, however, is implicit in our discussion below on the question whether substantial evidence supports the Board's finding that Pacheco's activities were protected under the Act.

Pacheco's Discharge

Having correctly decided that deference was not appropriate, the Board concluded that Pacheco's activities were protected under the statute and therefore could not be used as reason for his suspension and subsequent discharge. In so finding, the Board had to determine that the substance of the leaflet warranted protection under the Act, and that Pacheco had a protected right to be on the premises and to distribute leaflets. We review these findings to the extent of considering whether the Board applied the law properly and whether substantial evidence on the record as a whole supports its findings.

Examining first whether the message conveyed by Pacheco's activities was protected, we find ample evidence to support the Board. The leaflet dealt directly with an important condition of employment, the health and safety measures to be taken to protect employees. This is a topic of discussion falling clearly within the core of concerns protected by the Act. The action urged by the leaflet—inclusion of a health and safety clause in the contract—does not affect the status of this protection. Although the Company reasons that this call to reopen negotiations after a contract had been signed violated the contract and the Act by disrupting harmonious relations, substantial evidence exists to support the Board's finding that there was reason to question whether the contract had been signed by all parties at the time of Pacheco's activities. As a result, there may have been no contract to violate, and the courses of action suggested in the leaflet would not have eroded the respect for a finalized collective bargaining agreement required by the Act.

Lastly, the particular wording of the leaflet does not remove Pacheco's activities from the sphere of protection afforded by the statute. Although the language in the leaflet may have been inflammatory, the Act protects expression that may not be totally accurate. Inaccurate or misleading statements lose their protection only if they are "deliberately or maliciously false". El Mundo Broadcasting Corp., 108 N.L.R.B. 1270, 1278–79 (1954). The Supreme Court has recognized that "rhetorical hyperbole" is common in labor disputes and must be protected, Dominion Branch No. 496, National Ass'n of Letter Carriers v. Austin, 418 U.S. 264, 286, 94 S.Ct. 2770, 2782, 41 L.Ed.2d 745 (1974), and that the "vigorous exercise of [section 7 rights] must not be stifled by the threat of liability for the overenthusiastic use of rhetoric". Id. at 277, 94 S.Ct. at 2778.

While the portrayal of the 28 injuries as serious or crippling was not accurate, we agree with the Board's assessment that the leaflet's characterization of the injuries was "rhetorical hyperbole" not to be construed as fact by fellow employees. There is no evidence that any misstatements of fact were made maliciously or without some foundation in fact. See El Mundo Broadcasting Corp., supra, 108 N.L.R.B. at 1280. We also agree with the Board that the assertion that the company wished to save money is an argument typical to labor disputes, to be interpreted in such a light. Lastly, the Board had reason to conclude that Pacheco was not intentionally maligning the Company when he wrote that he did not think that it would live up to the agreement to include the health and safety clause in the contract. Pacheco genuinely believed that the Company had agreed to the clause during negotiations and that its failure to include the clause was the result of bad faith, not the Company's good faith understanding that the clause was not to be included.

There remains the question whether the manner in which Pacheco distributed the leaflets removed him from the protection of the Act. He entered the premises during his off-hours and distributed the leaflets to the employees while they were working.

The Board is correct first in concluding that the contract, if in effect, did not waive the statutory right of employees to distribute Union materials. It limited the right of access of Union officials to the premises to the performance of specific duties, which did not include the distribution of literature. It also established the bulletin board as the place in which official notices should be posted. These specific restrictions cannot be interpreted, however, as a waiver of the right of employees to circulate leaflets that deal with the conditions of their employment. See Ford Motor Co., 221 N.L.R.B. 663, 665 (1975) (contractual waiver of employees' rights to distribute union literature would be invalid).

Pacheco was in the unusual situation of being both an employee and, as Union Shop Chairman, a Union official. Although we have in the past recognized that a contract may validly restrict the rights that a union official would otherwise enjoy as an employee, NLRB v. Wilson Freight Co., 604 F.2d 712, 726–27 (1st Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 962, 100 S.Ct. 1650, 64 L.Ed.2d 238 (1980), Pacheco's activities here have not been specifically proscribed by the contract. When a union official is also an employee, it cannot be assumed that he had waived rights he would have as an employee unless he has done so explicitly or unless his activities are destructive to the collective bargaining process to which he is specifically committed as a union official. Compare id.

The fact that Pacheco was off-duty at the time that he entered the premises does not render his activity unprotected. Whether off-duty access is protected under the Act depends upon the balance between the employees' § 7 rights and the employer's private property rights. GTE Lenkurt, 204 N.L.R.B. 921 (1973). Although the Act cannot require access when a company has asserted its property rights by issuing a no-access rule, the balance shifts when the company has not taken a strong stand. In this instance, the Company has no rule preventing access but instead has in fact allowed non-working employees to enter the premises to distribute materials to working employees. Under these circumstances, we uphold the Board's finding that Pacheco's off-duty status did not remove his activity from the protection of the Act.

Finally, the fact that the leaflets were distributed to employees who were working does not justify Pacheco's discharge. Where distribution during working time is not specifically prohibited, distribution is protected as long as it does not interfere with production. Daylin, Inc., 198 N.L.R.B. 281 (1972), enf'd, 496 F.2d 484 (6th Cir. 1974). There is no evidence that production was substantially impaired in this instance. We conclude, therefore, that the Board applied the law properly and that there is substantial evidence on the record to support the Board's conclusion that Pacheco was discharged for the performance of protected activities in violation of the Act.

664 F.2d 1074 (7th Cir.), November 25, 1981—253 NLRB 1054

On petition to review Board Order

Before SWYGERT, Senior Circuit Judge, and SPRECHER and BAUER, Circuit Judges

SWYGERT, Senior Circuit Judge: Justak Brothers and Company, Inc. (hereinafter "the Company") has petitioned this court for review of an order of the National Labor Relations Board (hereinafter "the Board") pursuant to section 10(f) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. §§ 151 et seq. (hereinafter "the Act"), 29 U.S.C. § 160(f). The Board has cross-applied for enforcement of its order pursuant to section 10(e) of the Act. Laborers Local Union 41, Laborers International Union of North America (hereinafter "the Union") intervened in this proceeding.

The Company supplies casual labor and vacuum truck waste removal services to industrial plants. Its work force consists of office employees, mechanics and mechanics' helpers, truck drivers, and laborers. In June 1979 the Union began an organizing campaign among the Company's laborers and truck drivers. On July 2 the Union filed a petition with the Board seeking an election at the Company. On July 12 the Company received the Union's request for bargaining. On July 23 the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Company.

On September 28 the Board issued a complaint alleging that the Company (1) violated section 8(a)(1) by threatening and interrogating employees, promising and granting benefits to employees, and creating an impression of surveillance; (2) violated sections 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging three employees; and (3) violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1) by refusing to bargain with the Union. After a hearing in December the Administrative Law Judge issued a decision on June 30, 1980 that sustained the allegations. On January 7, 1981 the Board affirmed the Administrative Law Judge's findings and conclusions. It adopted the recommended order that included the issuance of a Gissel-type bargaining order. The Company then filed this petition for review.

We review three issues. First, whether there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the Board's finding that the Company violated section 8(a)(1) of the Act by restraining the coercing employees in the exercise of their section 7 rights. Second, whether there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the Board's finding that the Company violated sections 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging three employees because of their union activities. Third, whether the Board abused its discretion in finding a bargaining order necessary to remedy the Company's violations of sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act of refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union.

I. The Independent Section 8(a)(1) Violations

The Company does not challenge the independent section 8(a)(1) violations. The provisions of the Board's order relating to these violations, therefore, are enforced. A discussion of these unfair labor practices is necessary, however, because their scope and nature are important factors in determining whether the Board properly issued a bargaining order. (See section III infra.)

In June 1979 the Union began an organizing campaign among the Company's laborers and truck drivers. On June 26 the Union held an organizational meeting where many of the Company's employees presented signed authorization cards to the Union representatives.

The Company's section 8(a)(1) violations began the next day. All of the Company's management, from owner Gary Justak to lower level supervisors,[1] committed these unfair labor practices. The violations fall into six categories: (1) threatening employees with discharge or layoff; (2) threatening employees with investigations and deportations by Immigration and Naturalization Service authorities; (3) creating the impression of surveillance of union activities; (4) interrogating employees about union activities; (5) promising better wages and medical coverage to thwart union organization; and (6) actually granting wage increases to thwart union organization.

II. Sections 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(1) Violations

A. Applicable Law

Section 8(a)(3) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to discriminate against an employee "in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *." An employer violates section 8(a)(3) when it discharges an employee because of his union activities.

[1] For a discussion of the supervisory status of the Company's "leadmen," see section III, infra.

The critical issue in a section 8(a)(3) claim is whether the employer's actions were motivated by anti-union considerations. NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596, 601 (7th Cir. 1978); Jay's Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 573 F.2d 438, 443 (7th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 859, 99 S.Ct. 176, 58 L.Ed.2d 167 (1978). Because motive is rarely open to direct proof, it is "to be determined by the Board from consideration of all the evidence and in making its determination the Board is free to rely on circumstantial, as well as direct evidence." NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d at 601.

This court recently approved the Board's refinement of the analysis used to determine the causal relationship between the employee's protected activities and the employer's action. Peavey Co. v. NLRB, 648 F.2d 460 (7th Cir. 1981). Under this analysis:

> The General Counsel must first make a prima facie showing that the employee's protected conduct was a motivating factor in the employer's decision to discharge the employee. Once this is established, the burden shifts to the employer to demonstrate that he would have discharged the employee even in the absence of the protected conduct.

Peavey Co. v. NLRB, 648 F.2d at 461 (7th Cir. 1981). See Statler Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 644 F.2d 902, 905 (1st Cir. 1981). If a causal relationship between the discharge and the protected activity is shown then the employer is liable unless he sustains his burden of proof. Furthermore, an employer's explanation need not be accepted if there is a reasonable basis for believing it "furnished the excuse rather than the reason for [an employer's] retaliatory action." NLRB v. Thor Power Tool Co., 351 F.2d 584, 587 (7th Cir. 1965).

As noted, Company officials made numerous unlawful threats of discharge, layoff, plant shutdown, and deportation as soon as they became aware of the Union's organizational campaign. (See section I supra.) This court has held repeatedly that the employer's conduct and anti-union animus are significant factors in determining motive. NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596, 601–02; NLRB v. Tom Wood Pontiac, Inc., 447 F.2d 383, 386 (7th Cir. 1971); NLRB v. Bedford Nugent Corp., 379 F.2d 528, 529 (7th Cir. 1967).

Finally, this court "may not displace the Board's choice between two fairly conflicting views [of the evidence], even though the court would justifiably have made a different choice had the matter been before it de novo." Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 488, 71 S.Ct. 456, 464, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). See W. W. Grainger, Inc. v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 1118, 1120–21 (7th Cir. 1978). We will not pass on the credibility of witnesses, reweigh the evidence, or reject reasonable Board inferences simply because other inferences might also be reasonably drawn. NLRB v. Walton Mfg. Co., 369 U.S. 404, 405, 82 S.Ct. 853, 854, 7 L.Ed.2d 829 (1962).

B. Illegal Discharges

On the morning of June 28, three truck drivers—Thomas Waugaman, David Clousing, and Eric Myers—signed union authorization cards. Waugaman and Clousing also solicited cards from other drivers.

1. Waugaman's discharge

The Company threatened to discharge Thomas Waugaman. Justak (the owner) told him, "You may get a union in here but you will not be here." Kritch told Clousing that Waugaman "was on his way out." On June 29, the day before Waugaman's alleged misconduct that was the ostensible basis for his discharge, Kritch told Waugaman that he would try to "get him" for work related infractions.

On June 30, the Company asserts that Waugaman failed to respond when paged. The credited testimony shows, however, that: (1) Waugaman was called in and worked most of Saturday; (2) he was told he could leave by the job site supervisor; (3) the supervisor said that he would telephone the Company and have Waugaman paged if he was needed further; and (4) Waugaman was not paged that day to return to the job site.

The Company relies on discredited testimony without showing exceptional circumstances that warrant overturning the Administrative Law Judge's credibility resolutions. See NLRB v. Pitts- burgh S. S. Co., 337 U.S. 656, 659–60, 69 S.Ct. 1283, 1285–86, 93 L.Ed. 1602 (1949); Electri-Flex Co. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 1327, 1331–32 (7th Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 911, 99 S.Ct. 280, 58 L.Ed.2d 256. For example, the Company claims that Waugaman lied to the job site supervisor on June 30 by telling him that his shift had ended. The Company however, never called the supervisor as a witness to rebut Waugaman's uncontradicted testimony that the supervisor told Waugaman he could leave. Cf. International Union, UAW v. NLRB, 459 F.2d 1329, 1336–39 (D.C.Cir. 1972).

The Board's finding that Waugaman was discharged for anti-union reasons had substantial support in the record.

2. Clousing's discharge

Clousing too was threatened. He was warned of a plant shutdown, told he was being fired for soliciting cards, and rehired on the condition he destroy the cards that he had in his possession.

On June 28, the day Clousing was observed soliciting authorization cards, the Company inserted a warning in his personnel file for taking an overly-long lunch break. The credited testimony, however, shows that Clousing did not take a one-hour lunch break, was never told of the purported infraction and was never shown the warning. On July 2 the Company issued another warning to Clousing for arriving late for work. The credited evidence shows, however, that Clousing actually arrived at work early that day when he drove Myers to work. Moreover, as with the June 28 warning, Clousing was never told of the infraction or shown the warning.

Three weeks later the Company discharged Clousing. The Company asserts that Clousing quit voluntarily. The credited evidence shows, however, that Clousing was actually discharged because of his pro-Union activities.

We repeat that a reviewing court generally will not overturn the Administrative Law Judge's credibility resolutions. NLRB v. Walton Mfg. Co., 369 U.S. 404, 405, 82 S.Ct. 853, 854, 7 L.Ed.2d 829 (1962). The Administrative Law Judge based credibility findings on the demeanor of the witnesses and on the inconsistencies in the testimony of Kritch and Justak. Kritch gave three different versions of Clousing's discharge, while Justak gave yet another. Clousing, on the other hand, testified consistently about the events surrounding his discharge. Furthermore, as noted, the two warnings in Clousing's file are suspicious. We see no basis for overturning the Administrative Law Judge's credibility resolutions or the inferences drawn therefrom.

The Company asserts further that it would have justifiably discharged Clousing because he falsely told the Company that he missed work on July 24 because he had to take a sick child to the doctor. This contention lacks merit. The Company has contended all along that Clousing was not discharged. It was only after the Company's evidence was discredited that it argued that it would have discharged Clousing for lying. The evidence shows overwhelmingly that the Company suspected that Clousing was at the union hall on the day in question and that this suspicion was the actual reason for his discharge. In these circumstances Clousing's misconduct is no defense for the Company.

3. Myers' discharge

The Company discharged a third truck driver, Eric Myers, who had signed an authorization card on June 28.

The Company asserts that it discharged Myers for failing to answer a second beeper while enroute to the Company and for taking too long to report to the yard after the first page. The credited evidence shows, however, that Myers was not paged a second time. Moreover, Myers told Justak when he responded to the first page that it would take him a while to come in, and Justak replied, "That's OK * * * . Make it as soon as you can." Once again, we are presented with no basis for overturning the Administrative Law Judge's credibility resolutions.

Moreover, even if Myers' testimony is not believed, there is no credible evidence showing that his conduct was treated uniformly by the Company as a dischargeable offense. The record does not support the Company's contention that it had a consistently-applied policy of automatic termination for beeper violations. Moreover, witnesses did not testify that truck drivers were told to answer a page within a specific time or that they were told to stay within a specific distance from the Company.

The Board's order relating to all section 8(a)(3) violations is enforced.

III. Sections 8(a)(5) and (1) Violations

A. The Appropriate Unit

The Company contends that the Board erred in including certain employees in the unit and in excluding others. Congress has delegated the primary responsibility for determining the appropriateness of a collective bargaining unit to the Board. NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596, 603 (7th Cir. 1978); State Farm Mutual Automobile Ins. Co. v. NLRB, 411 F.2d 356, 358 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 832, 90 S.Ct. 87, 24 L.Ed.2d 83 (1969). Its determination will not be overturned unless it is arbitrary and unreasonable. South Prairie Construction Co. v. Local No. 627, Int'l Union, 425 U.S. 800, 805, 96 S.Ct. 1842, 1844, 48 L.Ed.2d 382 (1976); NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d at 603.

1. The J. B. Sanitation Employees

The Board found that there was no "community of interest" requiring the inclusion of the J. B. employees in the unit. The Board noted that the J. B. employees had separate supervisors, performed different tasks, and drove different trucks than the Company's drivers. Moreover, there were no transfer or exchange of duties, no common supervisors, and no similarity in pay structure. These findings justify the Board's exclusion of the J. B. employees from the bargaining unit. NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d at 603 nn. 13 and 14.

2. Part-time Employees

The Board excluded Ruth Hicks, James Lampa, Timothy King, and Joseph

1080

Nowak from the unit because of the irregular nature of their part-time employment. Part-time employees may be included in a bargaining unit with full-time employees if the part-time employees work regularly. NLRB v. Economy Food Center, Inc., 333 F.2d 468, 471 (7th Cir. 1964). The Board found, however, that these four individuals were employed only on a sporadic and intermittent basis. The exclusion of these employees from the bargaining unit is justified.

3. Francisco Arredondo, Silverio Gonzalez, Jesus Sanchez, and Sergio Herrada

The Company challenges the inclusion of these four employees in the unit because their personnel files reveal that they left the Company to return to Mexico. As the Board noted, however, all these employees were working for the Company on the July 12 demand date, had been working for at least four months previously, and continued to work for at least a month afterwards. There was no evidence showing that these employees were hired to work only until a definite termination date. The Board's inclusion of Arredondo, Gonzalez, Sanchez, and Herrada in the bargaining unit is justified.

4. Supervisory status

One of the Board's special functions is to determine whether a person is an "employee" or a "supervisor" within the meaning of the Act. This court has noted that the Board is entitled to a "large measure of informed discretion" in carrying out this task. Dynamic Machine Co. v. NLRB, 552 F.2d 1195, 1201 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 827, 98 S.Ct. 103, 54 L.Ed.2d 85 (1977).

The Board excluded Parks, Vrabel, Godines, and Simko from the bargaining unit because they were supervisors. Their employment contracts designated the four as foremen; they wore hats distinguishing them from laborers; and their pay scale was more than twice that of the laborers. Their job functions were supervisory—they assigned work, directed employees to their jobs, checked employees' performances, sent employees home, and transferred employees between jobs. These findings justify the Board's designation of these men as supervisors. NLRB v. Adam & Eve Cosmetics, Inc., 567 F.2d 723, 727–29 (7th Cir. 1977); Dynamic Machine Co. v. NLRB, 552 F.2d at 1200–01.

The Board included Enrique Miranda and Pedro Moreno in the bargaining unit because they were not supervisors. The two men were paid less than the leadmen, were designated laborers in their employment records, and did a laborer's work. These findings justify the inclusion of Miranda and Moreno in the bargaining unit.

The Board's determinations on the scope of the bargaining unit are upheld.

B. The Union's Majority

Seventy-nine employees were in the bargaining unit on July 12 when the Company received the Union's request for bargaining. The Union had received authorization cards from 42 of these employees. The Company challenges the validity of several of the cards.

The Company challenges Thomas Waugaman's card because of the alleged misinformation given him by Union representatives as to the purpose of the cards. Where the terms on the card are unambiguous, however, it must be counted unless a union adherent deliberately and clearly cancels its meaning. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575 at 606, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1936, 23 L.Ed.2d 547; Red Oaks Nursing Home, Inc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503, 507 (7th Cir. 1980). The terms of the card here are clear, and there is no evidence of a deliberate cancellation.

The Company challenges Ancelmo Acosta's card because there is no evidence that anyone explained its meaning to him. The record shows he signed the card and turned it in at the June 26 organizational meeting. At this meeting the Union had employees interpreting in Spanish the remarks of the Union representatives. This challenge, therefore, lacks merit.

The Company also challenges Carillo's, Gonzalez's, and Samarron's cards because of their alleged inability to understand English. There was no evidence in the record, however, indicating that these employees spoke only Spanish.

The Company challenges the cards of Altamirano, Moreno, and Martinez because the Company payroll records show that they began work on June 26 at 8:00 A.M., worked 11½ hours, and so could not have attended the organizational meeting. Substantial evidence in the record, however, showed that the Union meeting lasted as long as three hours (beginning at 5 or 5:30 p.m.) and that the card signing occurred at the end of the meeting. These cards were properly counted. NLRB v. Philamon Labs, Inc., 298 F.2d 176, 180 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 370 U.S. 919, 82 S.Ct. 1555, 8 L.Ed.2d 498 (1962).

Finally, the Company challenges the card of Felix Campos because his pretrial affidavit was admitted to authenticate his card. Campos's affidavit states that he attended the June 26 meeting and he authorized another employee to sign his name to his authorization card. The Company challenges the admissibility of this affidavit under Rule 804 of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

The Administrative Law Judge gave reasons justifying the affidavit's admission. Campos was unavailable because he could not be found. His affidavit had probative value because it explained the difference between the signatures on the authorization card and his W-4 form. The affidavit was given under oath—a person who willfully lies is subject to criminal penalties. The affidavit, therefore, had "equivalent guarantees of trustworthiness." See Copperweld Steel Co. v. Demag-Mannesmann-Bohler, 578 F.2d 953, 963-64 (3d Cir. 1978); United States v. Lyon, 567 F.2d 777, 784 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 918, 98 S.Ct. 1476, 55 L.Ed.2d 510 (1977). Finally, there was adequate notice because as soon as the General Counsel learned that Campos was unavailable, he informed the Company that he would introduce the affidavit. United States v. Bailey, 581 F.2d 341, 348 (3d Cir. 1978).

C. Bargaining order

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Supreme Court upheld the Board's authority to issue bargaining orders on the basis of authorization cards whenever the employer has committed unfair labor practices that had "the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election process." 395 U.S. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. The determination of the appropriateness of a bargaining order is, like all remedies, entrusted to the sound discretion of the Board.

This court has required the Board to give reasons that justify its use of the bargaining order remedy. Peerless of America, Inc. v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108, 1118 (7th Cir. 1973). The purpose of this requirement is to permit the court to perform its task of judicial review. Id. at 1119; Red Oaks Nursing Home, Inc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503, 509 (7th Cir. 1980). The requirement, therefore, must be understood in light of this purpose.[2] It is meant neither to burden the Board nor to curtail the issuance of bargaining orders. Hedstrom v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 305, 309 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 1699, 68 L.Ed.2d 196 (1981). Elaborate explanations are not essential; indeed, scientific accuracy in estimating the impact of unfair labor practices is impossible. Rather, we only require that the Board delineate the factors that it considers in its estimation, and describe how these factors have been weighed. See 484 F.2d at 1118, n.16. In this case the Board identified and discussed the unfair labor practices it relied upon, noted their tendency to undermine the Union's majority—especially in regards to their lingering effects—and evaluated the adequacy of traditional remedies. Nothing more is necessary.

[2] For example, even if the Board fails to justify its issuance of a bargaining order, as long as the record is clear this court may review it and affirm or deny the issuance of the order. Walgreen Co. v. NLRB, 509 F.2d 1014, 1018 (7th Cir. 1975); C&W Super Markets, Inc. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 618, 625-26 (7th Cir. 1978).

Once the Board has spelled out the basis for its issuance of a bargaining order, this court's review is limited to whether the Board abused its discretion. The Board noted that from the very start of the Union's organizing campaign, the Company engaged in a systematic campaign of unfair labor practices designed to destroy the Union's support. (See sections I and II, supra.) These unfair labor practices were committed by almost all the Company's supervisors, including its highest corporate official. Moreover, the Company has made no effort to neutralize the effect of its threats of layoff, discharge, shutdown, and deportation. Common sense recognizes the dramatic and long term effects of such threats. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. at 587–89, 615, 619–20, 89 S.Ct. at 1926–27, 1940, 1942–43; NLRB v. Jamaica Towing Co., Inc., 632 F.2d 208, 212–13 (2d Cir. 1980); Bandag v. NLRB, 583 F.2d 765, 772 (5th Cir. 1978).

The Board considered and rejected traditional remedies. The probable impact of unfair labor practices is increased when a small bargaining unit is involved. NLRB v. Bighorn Beverage, 614 F.2d 1238, 1243 (9th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Eagle Material Handling, Inc., 558 F.2d 160, 168 (3d Cir. 1977). The Company's violations are not minor. It engaged in surveillance of Union activities, discharged pro-Union employees, threatened layoffs and immigration investigation, and both promised and granted benefits to thwart unionization. Threats were not only made but executed. ("Actions speak louder than words," as the administrative law judge noted.) Under such circumstances, and after a careful review of the record, we fully agree with the Board that a bargaining order is an appropriate remedy.

The Company maintains that its employee turnover shows the inappropriateness of the bargaining order. It is well settled, however, that the Board may issue a bargaining order even if the Union represents only a minority when the order is entered. Gissel, 395 U.S. at 610, 89 S.Ct. at 1938. If we were to accept the Company's contention, an employer could engage in a scheme of unfair labor practices and yet escape a bargaining order by delaying and waiting for employee turnover. NLRB v. L. B. Foster Co., 418 F.2d 1, 5 (9th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 990, 90 S.Ct. 1124, 25 L.Ed.2d 398 (1970); Chromalloy Mining and Minerals v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 1120, 1132–33 (5th Cir. 1980). We cannot allow this perversion of the Act's purpose. It is important to recall, as the Supreme Court has noted, that the issuance of a bargaining order in the Gissel-type circumstances promotes employee free choice because the Union must have obtained a majority of cards to obtain the bargaining order. Gissel, 395 U.S. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940. To allow employee turnover to defeat the issuance of a bargaining order, therefore, would undermine employee free choice. Employee turnover should not be a controlling factor.

IV

The order of the National Labor Relations Board is enforced.

NLRB v. Atlantic International Corporation and its wholly owned subsidiaries, Atlantic Manufacturing Corporation and Atalantic Marketing Corporation

664 F.2d 1231 (4th Cir.), November 30, 1981—246 NLRB 291

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before WIDENER, HALL and SPROUSE, Circuit Judges

1231

WIDENER, Circuit Judge: The National Labor Relations Board (the Board) seeks enforcement of a remedial order entered by it against Atlantic International Corporation and its wholly owned subsidiaries, Atlantic Manufacturing Corporation and Atlantic Marketing Corporation (the Company). The Company objects to this order on the grounds that the Board lacks the authority to impose a make-whole remedy, and, in the alternative, that the remedy is inappropriate in this case. We enforce the order as a proper exercise of the Board's discretionary remedial authority.

1232

On July 30, 1976, the Board conducted a representation election in a unit of 455 of the Company's employees. Following certain challenges and objections by the Company, the Board certified the Carpenters' District Council of Baltimore and Vicinity and its Affiliates, Cabinet Makers' Local No. 974, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO (the Union), as the bargaining representative for that unit.

Subsequent to certification, the Union filed an unfair labor practice complaint alleging the Company's refusal to bargain. The Board found that the Company had violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq., § 158(a)(1, 5), and entered a bargaining order which was enforced by this court on December 26, 1979. 236 N.L.R.B. 903, enf'd sub nom. NLRB v. Atlantic International Corporation, et al., 612 F.2d 1308 (4th Cir. 1979) (unpublished).

During the pendency of that action in the latter half of 1977, the Company experienced serious financial problems. In addition to a restriction of its cash flow, the Company was notified that the premium for the health insurance coverage that it provided its employees would rise by approximately 48%. At that time, the Company unilaterally changed certain terms and conditions of employment. It required employees to contribute to the maintenance of the health insurance plan which previously had been provided free of charge. Furthermore, the Company lowered its pay scale for a period of approximately two weeks, conditioned reemployment of laid-off workers upon acceptance of that pay scale, and suspended its practice of giving its employees hams and turkeys for Thanksgiving and Christmas. A ruling concerning hams and turkeys is not at issue here. The Union filed unfair labor practice complaints as to these changes, again claiming that the Company had refused to bargain in violation of sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

The Board affirmed the administrative law judge's finding that the Company violated these sections by "unilaterally discontinuing full payment of employee health insurance premiums, . . . temporarily reducing wages, and conditioning reemployment of laid-off employees upon acceptance of the reduced wage rate." Contrary to the administrative law judge's decision, however, the Board ordered restitution of losses suffered by qualified employees as a result of the discontinuance of the fully paid health plan.

The finding of the Board that the Company violated sections 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act is not the subject of review by the Company.

In arriving at a remedy, the administrative law judge applied his interpretation of the N.L.R.B. case of Wonder State Mfg. Co., 147 N.L.R.B. 179 (1964), enforcement denied on other grounds, 344 F.2d 210 (8th Cir. 1965). He construed Wonder State as requiring that he determine what the result of bargaining would have been had the parties bargained in good faith and that he enforce the hypothetical result accordingly. The administrative law judge applied this principle to the Company's discontinuance of its contributions to the health plan and concluded as a fact that negotiations would not have altered the Company's decision. In contrast, applying the same principle, the administrative law judge found that, had the Company bargained in good faith as required, it would not have reduced wages.

The Board, in its opinion and order, found that the administrative law judge had misapplied Wonder State to the health insurance premiums. It found that the premiums were an ongoing, fixed benefit, administered on a regular basis and, as a term or condition of employment, not subject to unilateral change. The Board thus attempted to divorce itself from the administrative law judge's findings with respect to health insurance premiums, whatever the validity of its reason.

In adopting the administrative law judge's rulings, findings and conclusions with respect to the unilateral wage reduction, the Board erroneously adopted his construction of Wonder State. If the Board's discussion of the insurance premiums can be read as holding that the administrative law judge should have treated the health benefits as equivalent to wages and therefore should have applied the same test, it is also in error. The notion that the Board may require a party to comply with what it speculates the outcome of negotiations would have been had good-faith bargaining taken place clearly contravenes the holding of H. K. Porter Co., Inc. v. NLRB, 397 U.S. 99, 90 S.Ct. 821, 25 L.Ed.2d 126 (1970). Porter forbids the Board from requiring a company and a union to bargain to a foreordained result. The principle applied here by the administrative law judge and the Board goes even a step beyond Porter in requiring the parties to act as though they had bargained to a conclusion when no such bargaining in fact had taken place.

The administrative law judge, however, also found a unilateral reduction in wages and health benefits without bargaining during the time the Company should have been bargaining with the Union was an unfair labor practice, and this finding was adopted by the Board.

When we strike out, as we do, from the findings of the administrative law judge and the Board all reference to what the parties would have arrived at had they bargained, we still find a unilateral reduction in wages and health benefits during the time when the Company should have been bargaining. This is not dependent upon the other subsidiary finding of what conclusion the parties would have arrived at had they bargained.

A unilateral reduction in wages and benefits during the time the Company should have been bargaining is within the proscription in this circuit of Overnight Transportation Company v. NLRB, 372 F.2d 765 (1967). Restitution of losses with reference to pre-existing wages and benefits is a restoration of the status quo ante, Overnight, p. 770, and we thus think the Board's order should be enforced, although we have stricken out one of the subsidiary findings. Communist Party v. Control Board, 367 U.S. 1, 81 S.Ct. 1357, 6 L.Ed.2d 625 (1961), especially pp. 66–67, 81 S.Ct. pp. 1394–95.

We also think the order of the Board is within its broad discretion even considering the financial condition of the Company.

ENFORCEMENT GRANTED.

K. K. HALL, Circuit Judge, concurring: Although I concur in the majority's result, I think the opinion incorrectly criticizes the Board's decision. Contrary to the impression given by the majority, the Board did not adopt the ALJ's application of Wonder State v. NLRB, 147 N.L.R.B. 179 (1969). Therefore, I would affirm the decision of the Board, without extraneous reference to the Wonder State problem.

In Wonder State, the Board upheld an employer's decision to unilaterally eliminate Christmas bonuses. In that case, management's decision in September to withhold bonuses turned out to have been justified because, by Christmas time, the business outlook was dismal. Nevertheless, the essence of the Board's decision was merely a recognition that management should have discretion whether or not to give Christmas bonuses.

The ALJ's opinion in this case does contain some faulty legal analysis. He mistakenly interpreted Wonder State as requiring him to decide whether bargaining would have made any difference in the employer's decisions to decrease benefits and reduce wages. Pursuing this analysis, the ALJ found that Atlantic's business was so bad that it could not afford to pay the additional insurance premiums regardless of whether negotiations had been held. Accordingly, the ALJ ruled that Atlantic did not have to reimburse its employees for their contribution to the insurance program. However, the ALJ concluded that business was not bad enough to justify the reduction in wages, and added that "if the Respondent had engaged in good faith bargaining on these matters, it would not have taken these benefits away from the employees." Therefore, he required the employer to reimburse the employees for lost wages.

On review, the Board reversed the ALJ's decision on the issue of insurance premiums, but affirmed the decision on wages. In reviewing the insurance issue, the Board specifically rejected Wonder State as authority, noting that Christmas bonuses are variable depending on economic conditions, while insurance premiums are an ongoing, fixed benefit. However, in reviewing the wages issue, the Board did not analyze the ALJ's opinion, but rather summarily affirmed the award.

The majority reads the Board's summary affirmance on the wages issue as an adoption sub silentio of the ALJ's analysis of Wonder State. It puzzles me how the majority can reach this conclusion when the Board had explicitly stated that Wonder State would not apply to the analogous issue of insurance premiums. Certainly wages—like insurance premiums—fall within the "fixed benefit" category. More likely, the Board recognized that the ALJ had reached the right result on the wages issue (albeit for the wrong reason) and saw no reason to repeat its earlier rejection of the ALJ's interpretation of Wonder State. Reading the Board's opinion as a whole, it is clear that the Board considered insurance premiums and wages to be fixed benefits which do not fall within the ambit of Wonder State.

It seems that the majority would have no complaint with the Board's decision if the Board had emphasized that it disagreed with the ALJ's analysis of Wonder State on the wages issue as well as on the insurance issue. However, since the Board never adopted Wonder State at all, I see no reason why it should be required to chastise the ALJ for his incorrect interpretation of the case. Therefore, I would enforce the Board's decision without any caveats.

Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc. v. NLRB

664 F.2d 1095 (8th Cir.), November 30, 1981—254 NLRB 826

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before BRIGHT and ROSS, Circuit Judges, and LARSON, District Judge*

1096

PER CURIAM: The National Labor Relations Board (Board) has applied to this court for enforcement of its order holding that Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc. (Wards) violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). Wards discharged Michael Poupard and Richard Lafferty (employees) after they admitted that they had stolen goods from Wards. The Board found that Wards violated section 8(a)(1) by requiring the employees to attend investigative interviews without the presence of their union steward after they had requested his presence and when the employees reasonably believed that disciplinary action could result from such an interview. Although the issue is close we find that there is substantial evidence in the record as a whole of section 8(a)(1) violations but disagree with the "make whole" relief ordered by the Board.

During the course of a security investigation, Wards discovered that Poupard and Lafferty had been stealing merchandise from their respective departments. When the security investigator contacted the employees for an interview regarding these thefts, each employee requested union representation. Upon such request, the employees were informed that the security interviews would not be conducted if a union representative was called and the entire matter would be turned over to management and the police. The employees each signed an interview consent form, proceeded with the interview, and then signed a statement admitting they had stolen merchandise from Wards. Both employees offered to make restitution. Wards terminated the employees after reviewing the results of the security investigation. The evidence is clear that the firings were a direct result of the admitted thefts and not the result of the employees' insistence on the presence of a union steward.

The ALJ determined that Wards had violated section 8(a)(1) by failing to permit the requested union assistance at the investigative interviews and recommended that the Board order reinstatement and back pay for Lafferty. He also recommended a cease and desist order along with the posting of the usual notice. The Board agreed with the ALJ but added the requirements that Wards expunge any record of the discharge from Lafferty's personnel file and ordered back pay for Poupard.[1]

We find substantial evidence in the record as a whole to support the Board's determination that both employees requested and were denied union representation at investigative interviews which the employees reasonably believed would result in disciplinary action. See NLRB v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 420 U.S. 251, 95 S.Ct. 959, 43 L.Ed.2d 171 (1975).

---

*The Honorable Earl R. Larson, Senior United States District Judge for the District of Minnesota, sitting by designation.

[1] Poupard admitted to the ALJ that he had stolen from this employer. Lafferty recanted his confession and the ALJ refused to let Wards prove that Lafferty made partial restitution. In addition the counsel for the General Counsel acknowledged that there was no allegation that the discharge was not for just cause.

However, the determination that the proper remedy should be back pay and reinstatement is clearly prohibited by the language of the National Labor Relations Act. NLRB v. Potter Electric Signal Co., 600 F.2d 120 (8th Cir. 1979) is dispositive of the remedy issue. In Potter, we held that where it is clear that employees were discharged for good cause and not for requesting union assistance at an investigatory interview, section 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c), precludes an order of back pay and reinstatement under such circumstances.

In this case, like Potter, the employees effected their own discharge by stealing and the section 8(a)(1) violation was simply incidental to the investigation which preceded the firing. Thus, the Board lacks the power to order reinstatement or back pay for employees discharged for theft of company property, because to do so would violate section 10(c) as interpreted in Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 85 S.Ct. 398, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964); NLRB v. Potter Electric Signal Co., supra, 600 F.2d at 124.

Enforcement is granted as to the finding of the Board that there were section 8(a)(1) violations. Enforcement is denied as to the determinations concerning back pay and reinstatement. The notice shall be modified by striking the last paragraph thereof.

Pioneer Natural Gas Company v. NLRB

662 F.2d 408 (5th Cir.), November 30, 1981—253 NLRB 17

On petition to review Board Order

Before THORNBERRY, REAVLEY and POLITZ, Circuit Judges

410

REAVLEY, Circuit Judge: An administrative law judge determined that the Pioneer Natural Gas Company had violated § 8(a)(1) and § 8(a)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3) by interrogating and discriminating against certain employees. The National Labor Relations Board summarily affirmed the ALJ's "rulings, findings, and conclusions" and adopted his order with a slight modification.[1] Pioneer petitions for review, and the Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order. We grant Pioneer's petition and deny enforcement.

I. Background

In March 1978, a union began a campaign to organize Pioneer's employees at Pioneer's several places of business. The campaign ended on October 13, 1978. There is no evidence in the record that Pioneer actively opposed this or any other union. The union simply failed to gain sufficient support from the employees. As the ALJ found, Pioneer demonstrated "little or no" anti-union animus.

The violations found in this case all occurred in one department on one floor in one of Pioneer's many facilities. This "gas measurement" department had 17 non-supervisory employees; all but one were female. Five women worked under the supervision of James Blatzheim, the chief clerk of gas measurement; the others worked under the supervision of James Goldston, the computer supervisor. Both Blatzheim and Goldston reported to supervisor Bob Brotherton; Brotherton reported to Guy Bufkin, the Assistant Director of the Department; and Bufkin reported to Bob Spikes, the Director. With a single exception, all of the events involved three of the five employees who worked for Blatzheim—Ninnevah Kay Younger, Biolanda Benitez, and Deborah Gallegos (the "reprimandees").

The ALJ found, and the record makes clear, that, prior to June 1978, there was constant bickering between the three reprimandees and some of the women who worked for Goldston. On June 6, the three were called individually into Blatzheim's office and were reprimanded for criticizing, badgering, deliberately antagonizing, and threatening violence against Goldston's employees, and for making deliberate mistakes on the job and bragging that supervisors couldn't tell them what to do. That all of these charges had some basis in fact is established by the three reprimandees' own testimony at the hearing.[2] The ALJ found, however,

[2] Benitez admitted that the three of them criticized the work of Goldston's employees "several times a month." Both Benitez and Younger ad-that the reprimands were issued because two of the three had attended a union meeting on May 25, and because all three had thereafter distributed union cards and advocated the union.

The ALJ also found that two statements Blatzheim made to Younger on June 6, and two questions Goldston asked Benitez and another employee in late May and early June, were instances of "restraint and coercion" prohibited by § 8(a)(1).

Finally, the ALJ found that the discharge of Gallegos in June 1979, over eight months after the union campaign had ended, was in retaliation for her attempt to engage in "concerted activity" protected by § 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157.

As we have said, all of the ALJ's determinations were affirmed by the Board.

II. Review of the Merits

We are, of course, bound by the Board's findings of fact if they are supported by substantial evidence in the record "considered as a whole." 29 U.S.C. § 160(e); see Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951). If the Board applies an erroneous legal rule in concluding that the facts establish a violation of the Act, however, we are not bound by the Board's conclusion that the Act has been violated. See Allied Chem. & Alkali Workers v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 182, 92 S.Ct. 383, 399, 30 L.Ed.2d 341 (1971) ("the legal standard to be applied is ultimately for the courts to decide and enforce"). Instead, we apply the Board's factual findings to the correct legal standard. If the Board has not made a necessary finding, we may nevertheless sustain its conclusion if the record clearly supports the omitted finding. If the record is unclear, we may remand to the agency for further proceedings. If the record clearly provides no support for the necessary finding, however, we may deny enforcement without resort to remand. See Delco-Remy Div., Gen. Motors Corp. v. NLRB, 596 F.2d 1295, 1309–10 (5th Cir. 1979).

With these principles in mind, we review the Board's determinations on each of the alleged violations.

A. The Reprimands

The ALJ concluded that the decision to reprimand Younger, Benitez and Gallegos was discrimination that violated § 8(a)(3) and § 8(a)(1) of the Act.[3] In order to prove that Pioneer discriminated against its employees, "the Board must show that the particular supervisory responsible for the [action] knew about [the employees'] union activities," Delchamps, Inc. v. NLRB, 585 F.2d 91, 94 (5th Cir. 1978), and that the employees' union activities were a "motivating factor" in the employer's action, Delco-Remy, 596 F.2d at 1305; NLRB v. Whitfield Pickle Co., 374 F.2d 576, 582 (5th Cir. 1967) (anti-union animus must be a "but for" cause). In establishing the knowledge element, the Board may not simply "impute" the knowledge of a lower-level supervisor to the decision-making supervisor, Delchamps, 585 F.2d at 94; the Board may, however, "rel[y] on circumstantial evidence to infer that the knowledge of one supervisor has been communicated" to the other, id. at 95 (citing Texas Aluminum Co. v. NLRB, 435 F.2d 917, 919 (5th Cir. 1970)).

The ALJ found that Blatzheim learned on May 24 that Younger planned to attend a union meeting on May 25, and that he learned on May 26 that Younger was distributing union cards.[4] The ALJ also found that Goldston learned on May 25 that Benitez planned to attend the meeting. In addition, the ALJ noted that Blatzheim and Goldston mitted to criticizing Goldston and his predecessor. Younger admitted that, during the four or five months previous to May 18, 1978, Blatzheim had told her on "several occasions" that Goldston's employees were complaining about the three of them.

Benitez admitted to an incident in which she caused a confrontation by talking behind another employee's back, and another in which she caused a disturbance by verbally abusing Velma Hall, one of Goldston's employees. Both Younger and Benitez admitted to calling the supervisors "asses."

Younger also acknowledged an incident, occurring shortly before the time when Pioneer claims it decided to give the reprimands, in which Gallegos threatened to hit one of Goldston's employees with a bottle. Benitez admitted that, in another incident occurring around the same time, she "could have" stated that she would not do work assigned to her.

[3] Section 8(a) of the NLRA provides in pertinent part:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title;

* * * * *

(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *

29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (3).

[4] Blatzheim admitted that he knew Younger had attended the meeting—she had volunteered the information on May 24—but he denied knowing that she was distributing union cards.

worked in the vicinity of the three reprimandees.[5] From these facts, the ALJ found "that Respondent, through its supervisors Blatzheim and Goldston, was aware of [the three employees' union] activities during late May, 1978."

The undisputed evidence shows, and the ALJ found, that neither Blatzheim nor Goldston made the decision to reprimand the three employees. That decision was made by Assistant Director Bufkin and Director Spikes. Neither the ALJ nor the Board found that Bufkin or Spikes was aware of the reprimandees' union activities, or that Blatzheim or Goldston communicated his knowledge to Bufkin or Spikes.[6] Thus, it is clear that the ALJ performed the "mechanical imputation" of knowledge rejected in Delchamps, 585 F.2d at 95.

The Board argues that, despite its failure to follow Delchamps, the circumstances surrounding the reprimand support the inference that Spikes and Bufkin knew of the reprimandees' union activities. We think that there is no support in the record for this inference.

The reprimandees' own testimony establishes that the reprimandees themselves were not aware of the union campaign before May 18, 1978. Pioneer claimed at the hearing that the decision to reprimand was made in April. Pioneer's supervisors testified that the continuing complaints from Goldston's employees about the reprimandees were brought to Bufkin's attention sometime in April. Bufkin testified that he and Spikes decided to reprimand the three, and had Goldston's employees reduce their complaints to writing. Even if the ALJ disbelieved this testimony, the General Counsel was presented with two such written complaints at trial, and stipulated on the record that the written complaints were indeed given to management by two of Goldston's employees on May 7 and May 8.[7] The General Counsel also stipulated on the record that Goldston submitted a written statement concerning his employees' complaints on May 19, and that Blatzheim submitted his own written statement on May 22. All of this activity concerning the complaints occurred before Blatzheim or Goldston learned of the reprimandees' union activities, most of it before the reprimandees themselves even knew there was a union. There is no evidence in the record that, after they found out that Younger and Benitez had attended the union meeting, Blatzheim or Goldston participated in any way in the decision to issue the reprimands on June 6[8] or communicated their knowledge to Bufkin and Spikes during that period.

The Board argues that other circumstantial evidence, relied on by the ALJ in finding that the reprimand was motivated by the union activities, supports the inference that Bufkin and Spikes knew that the reprimandees were union supporters. The ALJ relied most heavily on two statements that, he found, Blatzheim made to Younger on June 6. Younger testified that, after Blatzheim had read to her the reprimand written by Spikes, he told her, "Maybe [the reprimand] has something to do with your union activities." Younger claimed that Blatzheim made a similar statement to her and her husband later that day in the company parking lot. Blatzheim denied making either statement, but the ALJ discredited his testimony.

Although we think that the ALJ's reasons for rejecting Blatzheim's testimony are unpersuasive,[9] we

[5] There was no evidence that anyone knew of Gallegos' union activities. Moreover, Gallegos did not attend the union meeting of May 25. Younger and Benitez testified, however, that Gallegos helped them distribute union cards.

[6] Nor was there any direct evidence that either Bufkin or Spikes was aware of the reprimandees' union activities. The only evidence on this issue was Bufkin's testimony denying knowledge. The ALJ failed to mention this testimony in his written decision.

[7] The documents themselves were not introduced into evidence and thus are not in the record.

[8] Younger did testify that Blatzheim told her that he went to Bufkin on June 2 "to talk him out of the allegations." Blatzheim denied this, testifying that he did not even know until June 5 that a decision to reprimand had been made. The ALJ noted Younger's testimony in his review of the evidence, but made no factual finding on this issue Even if Blatzheim did go to talk Bufkin out of the reprimand, however, this does not tend to prove that he communicated his knowledge of the reprimandees' union activities; on the contrary, it shows that he was making an effort to protect his employees from discipline.

[9] We have held that the reviewing court is "not compelled to respect" credibility choices "based on an inadequate reason, or no reason at all." NLRB v. Moore Business Forms, Inc., 574 F.2d 835, 843 (5th Cir. 1978) The ALJ discredited Blatzheim's denials because he found Blatzheim's testimony "inconsistent and conflicting" when Blatzheim attempted to quantify the number of times he had had problems with the reprimandees. We question this basis for rejecting Blatzheim's testimony for two reasons. First, the purported "inconsistencies" in Blatzheim's testimony do not exist. The ALJ said that Blatzheim first testified that he had orally reprimanded Younger "about 12 times," and later testified that he had orally reprimanded her "6 or 7 times." Actually, what Blatzheim said the second time was that he had reprimanded Younger "6 or 7 times" on his own initiative; a few questions later, he made it clear that he had reprimanded her "several" other times because of complaints from other su-accept his credibility determination. Even so, we do not see how the two statements tend to prove that Bufkin or Spikes knew of Younger's union activities. First, under Younger's own description of the statements, Blatzheim did not purport to know the reason for the reprimands, much less know whether Bufkin or Spikes knew of Younger's union activities; he merely suggested a possible explanation for Younger's reprimand. Second, according to the ALJ's findings, Blatzheim was the only individual who knew of Younger's union activities. He was the only one who could have communicated information about Younger's union activities to Bufkin and Spikes. Since, under Younger's version of the facts, Blatzheim was acting as her confidant in revealing Pioneer's possible motives, we think it unlikely that he would also be informing the company of her union activities. The ALJ drew no such inference, and we refuse to draw it on review.

Nor do we think that any of the other circumstances relied on by the ALJ in finding causation provide substantial evidence for the inference that Bufkin or Spikes was aware of the reprimandees' union activities.[10] Since the Board has not proved this element of its case, its conclusion that the reprimands violated § 8(a)(3) and § 8(a)(1) cannot be upheld.

B. The Section 8(a)(1) Violations

The Board concluded that, in three separate instances, Pioneer had engaged in activity that tended "to interfere with, restrain [and] coerce employees" in violation of § 8(a)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). One instance concerned Blatzheim's statements to Younger; the other two concerned questions Goldston asked Benitez and another employee.

Blatzheim's Statements

To establish a § 8(a)(1) violation, the Board need not show actual restraint or coercion; it need only draw from the credited evidence the reasonable conclusion that the employer's conduct would tend to restrain or coerce employees from engaging in protected activities. See NLRB v. Henriksen, Inc., 481 F.2d 1156, 1161–62 (5th Cir. 1973); NLRB v. Varo, Inc., 425 F.2d 293, 298 (5th Cir. 1970). In reviewing the reasonableness of the Board's conclusion, the court "must recognize the Board's competence in the first instance to judge the impact of utterances made in the context of the employer-em-

415

pervisors about her dealings with employees under their supervision. The other inconsistency found by the ALJ was Blatzheim's first statement that Goldston complained about Blatzheim's employees "about a dozen" times, followed by a later statement that Goldston complained about Gallegos "about a dozen" times. Rather than inconsistent, this testimony was entirely consistent with Pioneer's supervisors' claims that the complaints were almost always made about the three reprimandees as a group. This testimony was also consistent with Blatzheim's statement that he never received a complaint concerning the other two of his five employees.

Second, and more importantly, we think that the ALJ's focus on a purported inconsistency in the use of round numbers stands in striking contrast with his disregard for the serious inconsistencies in Younger's story concerning this very issue and other substantial issues. On June 9, 1978, Younger circulated a letter among the supervisors denying the charges in the reprimand. At the same time or shortly thereafter, she circulated a second letter claiming that she was being discriminated against because of her union activities. In neither letter did she mention what one would think would be the crucial evidence supporting her complaint, Blatzheim's June 6 statements. On another of her claims—a frivolous charge that she had been "interrogated" by Pioneer's attorney in a phone conversation she had initiated—she changed her story several times, first swearing in an affidavit that she had "forgotten" that the man was Pioneer's attorney, then "clarifying" her story in a second affidavit swearing that she did not know at any time prior to the phone call that the man was Pioneer's attorney, and finally admitting at the hearing that she did know that the man was Pioneer's attorney when she called him. The attorney testified and further contradicted Younger's testimony in many important respects. Younger also denied ever making derogatory statements about Goldston's employees; this testimony was contradicted by co-reprimandee Benitez. Finally, Younger changed her testimony on other matters when confronted with the truth.

Despite the conflicts in her sworn statements, the ALJ found Younger's testimony "candid and consistent."

[10] The ALJ noted Blatzheim's admissions that the charges were "vague" and "individually" did not warrant more than an "oral" reprimand. The ALJ fails to note that management could easily have decided that "collectively" the charges were worthy of a reprimand, and that the evidence in the record, while not specific on dates and events, establishes that the three reprimandees had collectively committed the transgressions generically described in the reprimand. See note 2 supra.

The ALJ also found the "timing" of the reprimands suspect, pointing out that the reprimands were not issued until over a month after the date Pioneer claimed it had made the decision to reprimand. The record demonstrates, however, that Pioneer was taking time to make sure that the reprimands were accurate: for example, by obtaining written statements from the complaining employees on May 8 and 9, and by obtaining statements from Goldston and Blatzheim on May 19 and 22. The fortuity that the reprimandees joined a union on May 24 does not protect them from discipline imposed in good faith on the basis of complaints made before that time. We think the "timing" factor is little more than a makeweight.

Finally, the ALJ noted that Pioneer had not reprimanded Vera Isham, another "troublemaker" in the department. The reason for this "disparity" was obvious: Isham was one of the very employees who had decided to take their complaints about the reprimandees up the company's chain of command; no similar complaint had been pressed by the reprimandees (or anyone else) against Isham.

ployee relationship." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 620, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1943, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

The ALJ concluded that Blatzheim's two statements on June 6 "would clearly tend to restrain and coerce employes [sic] from engaging in union activities." We do not think that this conclusion could reasonably be drawn from the credited evidence.

Blatzheim's first statement, as recounted by Younger, was made in Blatzheim's office after he had read the reprimand written by Spikes. Younger told Blatzheim that she didn't understand the charges. Blatzheim replied, "I don't understand them either, Kay. Maybe it has something to do with your union activities." If this incident were taken in isolation, perhaps the Board could reasonably have concluded that Blatzheim saw the reprimands as an opportunity to discourage Younger from further participation in the union campaign. The statement, however, must be taken in the context in which Younger claims it was made. Later that same day, Younger claimed that Blatzheim spoke to her and her husband in the parking lot. Blatzheim told Mr. Younger, "I don't know what's going on. I don't understand it. It's got to be something with Kay with her union activities. I think, Bob, I would get a lawyer and I'd see if I could get something done on that" (emphasis added). This second statement, rather than one that "would clearly tend to restrain and coerce," was a statement encouraging Younger to assert her rights. Indeed, the very picture that Younger attempted to paint with her testimony, which the ALJ credited, was that Blatzheim was on her side concerning the union issue: Younger testified that when she first mentioned the union to Blatzheim on May 24, Blatzheim replied that the union would be "a good thing for you"; that Blatzheim later told her that he had tried to talk Bufkin out of the reprimands on June 2; and that Blatzheim repeatedly told her on June 6 that he did not think that her reprimand was justified.[11] In fact, Younger believed that Blatzheim was such an ally and friend of the union cause that she asked him to testify for the union in this case.

We think it was unreasonable for the Board to conclude that two statements, which Younger herself considered to be sympathetic statements of support for her and her union activities, tended to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights. We think it even more unreasonable to find that the statements constituted unfair labor practices on the part of Pioneer, which demonstrated no anti-union animus, engaged in no active campaign of opposition to the union, and in fact encouraged its employees to listen to what the union had to say.

The Interrogations

Reprimandee Benitez testified that, on May 25, 1978, Goldston asked her if she was going to the union meeting that night, and pointed out that unionization "had its good points and its bad, you know, and I had to take it into consideration that Pioneer had good benefits." Another employee, Maria Escoto, testified that on June 1, 1978 Goldston asked her, after a conversation in his office on other subjects, whether she had signed a union card. When she did not respond, he said that "they would know who filled one out and who didn't."

In contrast to his conclusion concerning Blatzheim's statements, the ALJ did not expressly find that Goldston's two questions had a tendency to coerce. Rather, he merely described the two incidents and concluded, in effect, that they were per se violations of § 8(a)(1). This was error. "It is well established in this Circuit that interrogation of employees is not illegal per se * * * . "To fall within the ambit of § 8(a)(1), either the words themselves or the context in which they are used must suggest an element of coercion or interference.' " Delco-Remy, 596 F.2d at 1309 (quoting NLRB v. J. Weingarten, Inc., 339 F.2d 498, 500 (5th Cir. 1964)). In Delco-Remy, we made it clear that the Board must consider a number of criteria in determining whether the questioning "suggest[s] an element of coercion or interference":

> "(1) the history of the employer's attitude towards its employees; (2) the type of information sought or related; (3) the company rank of the questioner; (4) the place and manner of the conversation; (5) the truthfulness of the employee's responses; (6) whether the employer had a valid purpose in obtaining the information; (7) if so, whether this purpose was communicated to the employee, and (8) whether the employer assures employees that no reprisals will be taken if they support the union."

[11] Blatzheim denied making any of these statements.

596 F.2d at 1309 (quoting NLRB v. Aero Corp., 581 F.2d 511, 514 (5th Cir. 1978)). This list is not definitive, and the Board may find that other factors suggest an element of coercion, even when the listed factors "cut in favor of the employer." NLRB v. Camco, Inc., 340 F.2d 803, 804 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 382 U.S. 926, 86 S.Ct. 313, 15 L.Ed.2d 339 (1965). We made it clear in Delco-Remy, however, that the Board may not ignore these factors and find a § 8(a)(1) violation "in a conclusory fashion." 596 F.2d at 1309. As in Delco-Remy, that is exactly what the Board did here; and, as in Delco-Remy, we find that the record does not support the Board's conclusion. See id. at 1310–11.

Goldston's question to Benitez is the kind of casual question that this court has never held to be a § 8(a)(1) violation. See Delco-Remy, 596 F.2d at 1310; Mueller Brass Co. v. NLRB, 544 F.2d 815, 820–21 (5th Cir. 1977) (involving more intrusive questioning against a clear history of strenuous anti-union activity); NLRB v. O. A. Fuller Super Markets, Inc., 374 F.2d 197, 203 (5th Cir. 1967). Certainly there is nothing inherently coercive about the lowest-level supervisor asking an employee, with whom, as the record clearly demonstrates, he engaged in friendly conversation on a daily basis, whether she was going to attend a union meeting, and observing that unionization has "its good points and its bad." "[I]nterrogation which is not in itself threatening * * * must meet fairly severe standards, normally including the showing of a background of employer discrimination and a demonstration that the circumstances of the interrogation would reasonably induce fear of reprisal." O. A. Fuller Super Markets, 374 F.2d at 203. Pioneer has no history of anti-union discrimination. The three-sentence conversation took place when Benitez wandered into another employee's office, where Goldston was already engaged in conversation with the other employee. Benitez had no hesitation in telling Goldston that she planned to attend the meeting. Finally, Goldston's "good points and bad points" remark negated any implication that Pioneer intended to take reprisals against those who attended the meeting.

Similar considerations apply to the Goldston-Escoto conversation. The Board points out that this conversation took place in Goldston's office, that Escoto declined to answer Goldston's question and that Goldston's remark—"they would know who filled [a card] out and who didn't"—could have been taken as a veiled threat of reprisal. Escoto, however, did not testify that she took the remark that way.[12] Goldston testified that he meant the remark as a joke, and Escoto did not contradict this testimony. Moreover, the conversation took place just two days after Bufkin had made a speech telling the employees to attend union meetings if they wanted to. On a record as barren as this one of any active opposition to the union, any systematic interrogation of employees, or any other circumstances suggesting an element of coercion, we cannot uphold the conclusion that this single incident is a violation of § 8(a)(1). Cf. Delco-Remy, 596 F.2d at 1306–11 (three interrogations, each more lengthy and intrusive than one at issue here, held not a § 8(a)(1) violation despite background of company opposition to union).

C. The Discharge of Gallegos

On Friday, June 22, 1979, eight months after the union campaign had ended, Velma Hall, a black employee, went to Goldston to complain about a problem. On Monday, June 25, Goldston had Hall put her problem in writing. Hall wrote in her own hand that, every single day from June 19 through June 22, Deborah Gallegos had repeatedly informed her that Helen Wilborn, another coworker, had said "that she didn't like to error check with me and that she just don't like niggers." Hall's written statement related that she had "error checked" with Helen several times that week and had had no problems with Helen. After each session, however, Gallegos would come to her and repeat the racial insults that Helen had allegedly made. On Wednesday, Hall wrote, "all [Gallegos] did was tell me what Hellen [sic] said." On Thursday, "she just kept on telling me things like this * * * ." Finally, on Friday morning, Hall reported, "I think that Deborah wanted me to have words with Hellen about what she had told me. But I just looked over it. That morning after I had finished [sic] error checking with Hellen, no problems at all, * * * Deborah * * * called me into [an office]. I went to see what she wanted not thinking it would something else Hellen said * * * . I told her that I was so tired of her telling me every day something about what Hellen had said and to just [have] Hellen tell me. I told her I was going to tell James [Goldston] about it because if I didn't know how to error check that he would see to it that I learn how, and she went on telling me that Hellen said this and Hellen said that so I just went right to James' office and told him about it" (emphasis added).

[12] Escoto simply recounted the incident. She did not testify that she felt intimidated or even upset by Goldston's remarks.

The day after Hall wrote this account, Bufkin called Gallegos into his office and asked if she had made these statements. Gallegos admitted that she had, but said that Wilborn had actually made the statements to her. Bufkin fired Gallegos on the spot, reminding her that this was the kind of conduct for which she had been reprimanded. That evening, Hall became so afraid that Gallegos would take reprisals against her that she had to have two police officers escort her home.

The ALJ concluded that Gallegos' behavior was "concerted activity" under § 7 of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157,[13] and that Gallegos was discharged for engaging in such activity in violation of §§ 8(a)(3) and 8(a)(1). The ALJ credited Gallegos' testimony[14] that she encouraged Hall to go to Goldston with "the Wilborn matter" because she "felt" that "that was the best way to go about it instead of us taking care of it ourselves. That way [Goldston] would know what was said and who said it and that way we can clear it up." The ALJ concluded that Gallegos' behavior was concerted activity because it related to "a matter of common concern"—an atmosphere of racial tension.[15]

It is unbelievable that Gallegos was at all concerned about the work atmosphere. When asked on cross-examination why she did not go herself to complain to a supervisor, Gallegos replied that Wilborn's alleged racial remarks—including remarks insulting Gallegos' own race and her husband's race—"didn't bother me that much." It was only after a week of harassing Hall, and after suggesting that Hall confront Wilborn, that Gallegos suggested that Hall go to a supervisor.[16]

Even if we accept the Board's finding that the work atmosphere was Gallegos' concern, however, we doubt that Gallegos engaged in any "concerted activity" protected by § 7. In the leading case of Mushroom Transportation v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 683 (3d Cir. 1964), the court held that advising another employee of his rights is not "concerted activity." In order for conversations between two employees to constitute "concerted activity," there must be "some element of collective activity or contemplation thereof." NLRB v. Buddies Supermarkets, Inc., 481 F.2d 714, 717 (5th Cir. 1973) (citing Mushroom Transportation). There is no evidence in the record that Gallegos ever proposed collective activity to Hall; the only evidence is that she told Hall to go to a supervisor. While Gallegos may have "felt" that this was the best way for "us" to handle it, there is no evidence that she ever expressed her "feeling" to anyone else or suggested that going to Goldston would be a collective effort.

Thus, the only ground on which we could hold that Gallegos engaged in concerted activity is that she "contemplated" group action. Even if we could hold that such personal "contemplation" is sufficient, however, we cannot uphold the Board's conclusion that Pioneer violated § 8(a)(3) and § 8(a)(1) by discharging Gallegos because there is no evidence that Gallegos' discharge was motivated by participation in the protected activities she "contemplated." Bufkin and Brotherton made the decision to discharge Gallegos. There is no evidence that either Bufkin or Brotherton knew that Gallegos had told Hall to go to a supervisor. All Bufkin and Brotherton had before them was Hall's written statement. This statement does not indicate that Gallegos ever suggested that Hall go to management to complain; the only suggestion recounted in the statement is that Hall directly confront Wilborn. Furthermore, there is no evidence that, when Bufkin called Gallegos in to ask her whether she had indeed made the statements that Hall attributed to her, Gallegos ever told Bufkin or Brotherton that she suggested that Hall go to management; she merely insisted that what she had said about Wilborn was true. Thus, there is no evidence to support the ALJ's conclusion that "Gallegos was discharged because she insisted that Hall go to her supervisor and 'clear it up.'" Since Bufkin and Brotherton did not know that Gallegos told Hall to go to her supervisor, they could not have fired her for that reason. Therefore, her participation in concerted activity could not have been a motivation for her discharge.

[13] Section 7 provides in pertinent part:

> Employees shall have the right * * * to engage in * * * concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities * * * 29 U.S.C. § 157.

[14] Gallegos' testimony was often incomplete or at odds with Hall's story. Gallegos testified that Wilborn made the racial insults on June 22, when Hall left work early, and that she told Hall about them on June 25, whereupon Hall went directly to Goldston. According to Hall's written statement, Gallegos had been reporting these remarks since June 19, and Hall went to Goldston on June 22 after five days of reports and after Gallegos' suggestion that Hall confront Wilborn. Gallegos also claimed that Hall "knew how Helen was on racial problems" and had heard derogatory comments from Wilborn in the past. Hall, however, testified that when she went to Goldston she did not believe that Wilborn had made the statements.

[15] The ALJ relied on Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 N.L.R.B. 999 (1975), as explained by the Board in Diagnostic Center Hosp. Corp., 228 N.L.R.B. 1215 (1977). In those cases, the Board established the rule that actions taken by an individual employee are "concerted activity" if they relate to "a matter of common concern." We do not regard the Alleluia Cushion doctrine to be consistent with our decision in NLRB v. Buddies Supermarkets, Inc., 481 F.2d 714 (5th Cir. 1973). See NLRB v. Datapoint Corp., 642 F.2d 123, 128–29 (5th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Dawson Cabinet Co., 566 F.2d 1079, 1083 (8th Cir. 1977) (concluding that Alleluia Cushion is inconsistent with Buddies Supermarkets and rejecting Alleluia Cushion); NLRB v. Bighorn Beverage, 614 F.2d 1238, 1242 (9th Cir. 1980) (also rejecting Alleluia Cushion). The Board, however, does not attempt to defend the Alleluia Cushion doctrine in this case; instead, it argues only that Gallegos engaged in concerted activity under our case law.

[16] Moreover, Hall testified that the reason Gallegos gave her for going to Goldston was that Wilborn "never did anything. She [was] always coming out smelling like a rose."

ENFORCEMENT DENIED.

Vesuvius Crucible Company v. NLRB

668 F.2d 162 (3d Cir.), November 30, 1981—252 NLRB 1279

On petition to review Board Order

Before SEITZ, Chief Judge, and ADAMS and GARTH, Circuit Judges

163

ADAMS, Circuit Judge: In this appeal, Vesuvius Crucible Company petitions for review of a final order of the National Labor Relations Board and the Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order. The Board determined that the employer violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act when it refused to pay accrued vacation benefits to its striking employees. Because we conclude that there is insufficient evidence in the record to support the Board's decision, we grant the petition for review and decline to enforce the order.

I.

Vesuvius Crucible Company is a steel manufacturer with a facility located in Swissvale, Pennsylvania. For many years, Local 3730 of the United Steelworkers Union has represented the company's production and maintenance employees. The two parties have executed a number of collective bargaining agreements; the agreement at issue in this case extended from November 2, 1973 to October 31, 1976.

During September and October of 1976, the union and the company began negotiations for a new collective bargaining contract. When no agreement was reached prior to the October 31, 1976 expiration date, the union commenced a strike, which lasted until July 11, 1979.

On June 28, 1977, the union requested that the company pay accrued vacation benefits, based on work done for the ten months before the strike, to all eligible employees. The request, made pursuant to Section VII of the 1973–1976 agreement,[1] coincided with the customary date of the company's annual plant shutdown. At that time all eligible employees normally would have received at least a portion of their vacation pay, in accordance with the company's requirement that vacations be scheduled during the shutdown.

The company refused to grant the union's request. In a letter dated June 28, 1977, the company's counsel wrote to Caleb Scott, the union staff representative:

> We have carefully reviewed Section VII of the 1973–76 Labor Agreement and have concluded that no vacation pay is yet due to any Vesuvius Bargaining Unit employee.
> Section VII, B–1 reads as follows:
> "1. An eligible employee who has attained the years of continuous service indicated in the > following table in any calendar year, on the anniversary of his employment with the Company, during the term of this Agreement shall receive a vacation corresponding to such years of continuous service as shown in the following table: * * *"

> As we interpret this Section there was vacation due for the three years which constituted the "term of this agreement." Unless and until a new agreement is reached specifying terms and conditions for vacation during its term, I do not believe that any payment is required.

Joint Appendix at 225.

On September 13, 1977, the union filed a charge with the NLRB, alleging that the refusal by Vesuvius to pay the vacation benefits in question violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3) (1976).[2] After the NLRB issued a complaint, Vesuvius moved for deferral to arbitration. It argued that the determination of the validity of the union's claim for vacation benefits involved the interpretation of the expired 1973–1976 collective bargaining agreement, and that the parties were bound by Section X of that agreement to arbitrate disputes concerning "the interpretation or application of, or compliance with, the provisions of this Agreement." The company's motion was denied.

After a hearing, the presiding administrative law judge found that vacation benefits had not accrued and that therefore Vesuvius had violated neither sections 8(a)(1) nor (3). In a footnote, the administrative law judge noted that a "similar conclusion follows from the conclusion that the vacation pay obligation, even if it could be said to have accrued, was impossible of calculation in the absence of a new agreement." Joint Appendix at 331–32.

The Board disagreed. Finding that the employees' right to 1977 vacation benefits had accrued on the basis of work performed in the first ten months of 1976, the Board concluded that the company had violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. It ordered Vesuvius to "cease and desist" from the unfair labor practices found; to grant accrued vacation pay, plus interest, in accordance with the 1973–1976 agreement, to those striking employees who had worked in 1976; to make its payroll records available to the Board for determination of amounts due; and to post appropriate notices.

After the Board denied the company's motion to reconsider its decision, Vesuvius filed a petition for review in this Court. Shortly thereafter, the Board filed a cross-petition for enforcement of its order.

II.

In its brief filed with this Court, Vesuvius challenged both the merits of the NLRB decision and the failure of the Board to defer to arbitration. At oral argument, however, the parties informed the Court that vacation benefits for the time period in question eventually were awarded under the new 1979 contract. This effectively moots the deferral issue, as no arbitrable dispute now remains. We nonetheless are left with the question whether the refusal of the company to pay the benefits when they were first requested, in June of 1977, itself constituted an unfair labor practice under the Act.

Our analysis begins with the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 388 U.S. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967). There, the employer refused to pay vacation benefits to strikers—while continuing to pay such benefits to non-strikers—because it asserted "that all contractual obligations had been terminated by the strike and, therefore, none of the company's employees had a right to vacation pay." Id. at 29, 87 S.Ct. at 1795. The Court declared that this was "discrimination in its simplest form." Id. at 32, 87 S.Ct. at 1796. It then outlined the following principles:

> First, if it can reasonably be concluded that the employer's discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" of important employee rights, no proof of an antiunion motivation is needed and the Board can find an unfair labor practice even if the employer introduces evidence that the conduct was motivated by business considerations. Second, if the adverse effect of the discriminatory conduct on employee rights is "comparatively slight," an antiunion motivation must

[2] Sections 8(a)(1) and (3) provide that:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 [29 U.S.C. § 157];

* * * * *

(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *.

> be proved to sustain the charge if the employer has come forward with evidence of legitimate and substantial business justifications for the conduct. Thus, in either situation, once it has been proved that the employer engaged in discriminatory conduct which could have adversely affected employee rights to some extent, the burden is upon the employer to establish that he was motivated by legitimate objectives since proof of motivation is most accessible to him.

Id. at 34, 87 S.Ct. at 1798 (emphasis in original).

In Great Dane, the Supreme Court concluded that it was unnecessary to decide whether the discriminatory conduct was "inherently destructive" or "comparatively slight" because the company had come forward with no evidence of legitimate motives for its discriminatory conduct. The Supreme Court thus held that the employer's refusal to pay the benefits violated sections 8(a)(1) and (3).

This Court has had two occasions on which to apply the Great Dane doctrine to situations similar to the one at hand. In NLRB v. Frick Co., 397 F.2d 956 (3d Cir. 1968), the company's vacation plan provided that "[n]o vacation or vacation pay will be allowed or paid to any person who is not on the payroll of the Company on Wednesday preceding the week in which vacation pay is distributed." 397 F.2d at 959. After the employees went on strike, Frick removed them from the payroll and then informed them that, unless they returned to the job for the three days preceding the day in which the vacation pay was to be distributed, their vacation pay would be forfeited. Frick argued that, in conditioning vacation benefits on the employees' presence at work, it was merely applying the same longstanding rule to the strikers that it would have applied to any other employee who was absent for an unauthorized or unexplained reason. We rejected Frick's contentions. Noting that Frick could have authorized the strikers' absences, but chose not to, Judge Biggs stated:

> In the circumstances at bar it is undenied that Frick refused to pay vacation benefits to the strikers who were absent from work because of the strike when such benefits were paid to other employees.
> 166
> This action is discriminatory on its face and the burden is on the company to demonstrate the nondiscriminatory and business reasons for such conduct.

Id. at 961.

Frick presented no evidence showing how the "unauthorized or unexplained" absence rule had been applied in the past, except for the statement of one management official "that it would apply to any employee." In addition, there was evidence that in demanding that its employees work for three days, rather than one, in order to be eligible for their vacation benefits, Frick was not strictly applying the company's vacation rule. For these reasons we concluded that Frick had not met its burden of justifying its conduct. Id. at 962 & n.13. Thus, under Great Dane, Frick was in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (3); no showing of anti-union motivation was required. Id. at 963.

More recently, in E. L. Wiegand Division v. NLRB, 650 F.2d 463 (3d Cir. 1981), we faced once again the question whether an employer that withholds benefits from strikers has committed an unfair labor practice. There, however, our decision turned not on the validity of the employer's proffered business justifications but rather on the Board's finding of anti-union motivation. In Wiegand, the employer threatened that it would terminate disability payments to twenty-three employees then on sick leave if the union went on strike. When a strike was called, the employer carried out its threat, halting disability benefits to all the affected employees despite the fact that at least some of the disabled workers were not participating in the strike. The Board found, first, that the disability payments were accrued benefits rather than current wages, and second, "that these benefits were cut off by Weigand with the intention of coercing and restraining protected union activity with respect to the strike through the imposition of a sanction against certain employees if other employees engaged in strike activity." 650 F.2d at 467. We concluded that substantial evidence supported both of the Board's determinations.

III.

The present case comes to us in a procedural posture more closely analogous to Frick than to Wiegand. Here, there has been no finding of anti-union motivation. After determining that the employees' benefits had accrued, the Board simply concluded that "[i]n refusing to grant their benefits in 1977 because the employees struck rather than worked that year, Respondent unlawfully penalized the strikers for exercising their protected right to strike." Joint Appendix at 358. Vesuvius construes this decision as a determination that the denial of benefits was "inherently destructive" of employee rights. Brief for Petitioner at 22. The Board clarified its position in its brief to this Court, explaining that it had "concluded that the Company had failed to show any 'legitimate and substantial' business justification for its conduct" and that "it was unnecessary for the Board to decide whether the denial of benefits had an 'inherently destructive' or 'comparatively slight' effect on employee rights." [3] Brief for the NLRB at 14–15 n.11.

We are, of course, mindful of the fact that "[i]t is the primary responsibility of the Board and not of the courts 'to strike the proper balance between the asserted business justifications and the invasion of employee rights in light of the Act and its policy.'" NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375, 378, 88 S.Ct. 543, 546, 19 L.Ed.2d 614 (1967) (quoting Great Dane, 388 U.S. at 33–34, 87 S.Ct. at 1797–98). Nonetheless, we cannot agree with the Board's conclusion that Vesuvius failed to meet its burden of proving a legitimate motive for its conduct.

The company asserts that it refused to pay vacation benefits to its employees because of its "legitimate and good faith interpretation of the expired contract." Brief for Petitioner at 26 n.18. The NLRB found not that Vesuvius lacked bona fides but rather that its interpretation of the contract was incorrect. Specifically, the Board rejected the company's contention that the vacation benefits had not accrued because, under company policy, an employee had to perform some work in the year he or she was to take a vacation in order to receive the vacation benefits.[4] Additionally, the Board dismissed Vesuvius' assertion that the benefits were dependent on the contract and were expressly limited to the term of the contract. The company argued that, in the absence of a new agreement specifying the terms and conditions for vacation during its term—and in light of past practice—there was no basis on which to compute the amount of vacation pay owed. The Board responded: "the amount-of-vacation formula and the vacation pay formula were inseparably intertwined; once the employees' 1976 service had met the test for regular vacation entitlement, the terms of the 1973–1976 contract determined with equal finality how many weeks of vacation each employee would receive in 1977, and with how much vacation pay." Brief for the NLRB at 17.

We need not decide on this appeal whether Vesuvius, or the Board, correctly interpreted the collective bargaining agreement at issue here. Indeed, we believe that in formulating its own interpretation of the contract, the Board overstepped its authority and seriously misperceived its role. The legitimacy of the company's conduct for purposes of the analysis prescribed by Great Dane depends not on the truth of its assertions regarding its contractual obligations but rather on the reasonableness and bona fides with which it held its beliefs. The mere fact that the NLRB construed the contract differently from the way Vesuvius did should not, without more, mean that Vesuvius ipso facto committed an unfair labor practice.

The First Circuit's decision in NLRB v. Borden, Inc., Borden Chemical Division, 600 F.2d 313 (1st Cir. 1979), is persuasive in this regard. In Borden, the employer withheld accrued vacation pay because of the employees' strike activity until after the contractual vacation period had expired. The Board rejected the employer's assertion that it was acting pursuant to a contractual obligation, i.e., "employees shall not be paid vacation pay in lieu of vacation," and concluded that the denial of vacation benefits was inherently destructive of the employees' rights. The First Circuit remanded the case, declaring:

> Borden did come forward with evidence of a business justification for its conduct, namely, the terms of the collective bargaining agreement and past practice.
> The Board found this reason invalid because its interpretation of the contract differed from that of Borden's. This, however, is not a question of contract interpretation. The Board had a duty to determine whether Borden was motivated by its reliance on the collective bargaining agreement or by anti-union animus when it withheld the accrued vacation benefits. We caution the Board that it is nei- > ther our function nor the Board's to second-guess business decisions. "The Act was not intended to guarantee that business decisions be sound, only that they not be the product of antiunion motivation" (emphasis in original). Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 595, 603 (1st Cir. 1979), quoting from Stone & Webster Engineering Corp. v. NLRB, 536 F.2d 461, 467 (1st Cir. 1976). See NLRB v. Eastern Smelting & Refining Corp., 598 F.2d 666 at 670, 673 (1st Cir. 1979).

[3] For purposes of this opinion, we adopt the Board's characterization of its own decision. We note, however, that regardless of how the decision is characterized, the result in this case remains the same.

[4] See note 6 infra.

600 F.2d at 321 (emphasis added).

Here, as in Borden, the employer came forward with evidence of a business justification for its conduct: it did not believe that any vacation benefits were due and payable under the expired contract on June 28, 1977. To resolve the dispute, Vesuvius offered to submit the matter to arbitration, but the Board effectively closed that avenue when it declined to defer to arbitration.

168

The employer was then faced with a dilemma—it could either accede to the union's request for the vacation benefits, or it could refuse and run the risk that its refusal would be grounds for an unfair labor practice charge.

We find this result untenable. There is no suggestion that Vesuvius' interpretation of its contractual obligations was unreasonable or made in bad faith; indeed, the administrative law judge who heard the case agreed with the company's interpretation and concluded that the employees were not entitled to vacation pay on June 28, 1977. The company pointed to the language in the collective bargaining agreement stating that "[t]o be eligible for a vacation in any calendar year during the term of this Agreement, the employee must have one year or more of continuous service." § VII(A). Admittedly, this provision is ambiguous, but it is at least arguable that the phrase "during the term of this Agreement" refers not to vacation eligibility but to the vacation itself. Even more convincing is the company's argument that "in 1974, as in 1971, when new contracts were agreed upon, the vacation rights of the employees were not determined under the predecessor expired agreements for 1970–73 and 1967–70, but under the new agreement then in effect which provided for different terms and conditions." Brief for Petitioner at 30. The Board dismissed this argument by noting: "That the parties agreed to compute 1974 vacations under the terms of the later contract does not rebut the fact that [the] employees earned vacation benefits in the year they performed the work." Joint Appendix at 357 n.17.

While we venture no opinion on the merit of the employer's contentions, we conclude that Vesuvius' construction of the contract, based both on the language of the vacation provision and on past practice, is reasonable and at least arguably correct. Accordingly, we hold that, in the absence of proof of anti-union motivation or a finding that the company's conduct was inherently destructive of employee rights, a non-discriminatory refusal to pay benefits to all employees based on a good faith interpretation of the labor contract is insufficient to make out a violation of the National Labor Relations Act.[5]

Frick does not counsel otherwise. In that case, the employer conditioned the payment of vacation benefits on the employees' willingness to quit the strike and return to work; this directly violated the rule that "[s]trikers must be treated uniformly with nonstrikers with respect to whatever benefits accrue to the latter from the existence of the employment relationship." 397 F.2d at 962 (quoting Great Dane Trailers, 150 N.L.R.B. 438, 439 (1964), rev'd sub nom. NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, Inc., 363 F.2d 130 (5th Cir. 1966), rev'd, 388 U.S. 26, 87 S.Ct. 1792, 18 L.Ed.2d 1027 (1967)). Here, in contrast, the employer argued that no benefits had accrued to any employee—striking or non-striking—under the expired contract.

Nor are we persuaded that cases such as NLRB v. Duncan Foundry and Machine Works, Inc., 435 F.2d 612 (7th Cir. 1970), and NLRB v. Knuth Brothers, Inc., 584 F.2d 813 (7th Cir. 1978), compel a different result. In Duncan Foundry, the employer argued that, under the contract, only those employees who had been working on May 1, 1967 were entitled to vacation pay. Similarly, the employer in Knuth Brothers pointed to a provision in its collective bargaining agreement requiring that "an employee must be on the 'active payroll' on March 1 to be entitled to any vacation benefits for the previous 12 months," and argued that no vacation benefits were due to striking employees not present at work

[5] The mere fact that the employer has treated all of its employees alike will not, of course, legitimize otherwise illegal conduct under sections 8(a)(1) and (3). It is well settled that an employer may not defend inherently destructive or improperly motivated conduct on the ground that it did not discriminate against one group of employees. See Kansas City Power & Light Co. v. NLRB, 641 F.2d 553, 556–57 (8th Cir. 1981); Allied Industrial Workers, Local 289 v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 868, 877 (D.C.Cir. 1973); NLRB v. Jemco, Inc., 465 F.2d 1148, 1152 (6th Cir. 1972), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1109, 93 S.Ct. 911, 34 L.Ed.2d 690 (1973).

on March 1. In both cases, "the effect of the alleged active work rule [was] to deny strikers vacation benefits while granting such benefits to non-strikers and strikers who returned before the end of the strike." Duncan Foundry, 435 F.2d at 618. Thus, the work rule—cited by the employer as a business justification for its conduct—was itself discriminatory in effect, and could not be applied by the employer absent a legitimate and substantial business justification for its use. In the case at hand, in contrast, there was no suggestion that the contractual provisions relied upon by the employer worked to entice the strikers back to work or to favor those employees who chose not to strike. Here, Vesuvius' asserted justification for its conduct—its good faith belief that no vacation benefits were due to any employee under the expired contract—was not itself discriminatory in effect.[6] We conclude, therefore, that Vesuvius met its burden, under Great Dane, of showing a legitimate and substantial business justification for its conduct.

IV.

Our inquiry is not ended by concluding that Vesuvius has met its burden of establishing a legitimate and substantial business justification for its conduct. We now must address the question, unanswered by the Board in this case, whether the company's conduct was "inherently destructive" of the employees' rights or whether the adverse consequences were "comparatively slight."[7] If the conduct properly can be characterized as "inherently destructive," no proof of anti-union motivation is required; the Board can find an unfair labor practice despite the employer's proof of legitimate business justifications. If, however, the effects of the conduct are less severe, anti-union animus must be shown to sustain the unfair labor practice charge.

A.

The Supreme Court has stated that conduct is inherently destructive if it "carries with it 'unavoidable consequences which the employer not only foresaw but which he must have intended' and thus bears 'its own indicia of intent.'" Great Dane, supra, 388 U.S. at 33, 87 S.Ct. at 1797 (quoting NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 228, 231, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1145, 1147, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963)). Generally, those courts that have addressed the question have described "inherently destructive" conduct as that "with far reaching effects which would hinder future bargaining, or conduct which discriminates solely upon the basis of participation in strikes or union activity." Portland Willamette Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 1331, 1334 (9th Cir. 1976). Put another way, "inherently destructive" conduct is "that which creates visible and continuing obstacles to the future exercise of employee rights." Inter-Collegiate Press, Graphic Arts Division v. NLRB, 486 F.2d 837, 845 (8th Cir. 1973) (citing Note, Lockouts—Employers' Lockout with Tem- porary Replacements Is an Unfair Labor Practice, 85 Harv.L.Rev. 680, 686 (1972)), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 938, 94 S.Ct. 1939, 40 L.Ed.2d 288 (1974).

There is no evidence in the record to support a conclusion that Vesuvius' refusal to pay vacation benefits in June 1977 was "inherently destructive," as that phrase has been defined. This is not a case in which the employer offered to non-strikers a benefit, such as super-seniority, that necessarily and permanently worked to the detriment of the strikers. See NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp., 373 U.S. 221, 230–31, 83 S.Ct. 1139, 1146–47, 10 L.Ed.2d 308 (1963). Nor are we faced with the situation in which workers were permanently discharged because of their participation in collective action. See Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945); cf. Radio Officers' Union v. NLRB, 347 U.S. 17, 74 S.Ct. 323, 98 L.Ed. 455 (1954). Here, payment of the vacation benefits was made contingent not on the strikers' return to work but rather on the resolution of a dispute regarding the contractual obligation of the employer to pay the very benefits in question. In no way can it be said that this conduct bears its own indicia of improper intent. See NLRB v. Borden, Inc., supra at 321. Consequently, actual proof of anti-union motivation would be necessary to sustain the Board's determination that Vesuvius committed an unfair labor practice in this case.

[6] The Board's decision that Vesuvius had committed an unfair labor practice rested in large measure on its finding that Vesuvius had "refused to grant vacation benefits to the strikers because, as a result of their strike, they were absent from work in 1977." Joint Appendix at 353. Indeed, Vesuvius does argue vigorously that "it is an established practice under the agreement that in order for an employee to be eligible for or entitled to vacation in a calendar year he must perform some work in that calendar year." Brief for Petitioner at 32. Had it been shown that any employee who abandoned the strike and worked for at least one day in 1977 received vacation benefits, while those who remained on the picket line forfeited their benefits, we might be constrained, under Frick, to hold that Vesuvius had not presented a legitimate business justification for its conduct. There was, however, no evidence to this effect. In fact, the record suggests that—notwithstanding its ex post facto legal arguments—Vesuvius' primary contention when it refused to grant the vacation benefits was that, whether or not the employees worked in 1977, under section VII(B)(1) of the contract, vacation pay was due only for the three years that constituted the term of the collective bargaining agreement. Joint Appendix at 225.

[7] Because we conclude that there is insufficient evidence on the record to support either a determination that the company's conduct was "inherently destructive" or a finding of anti-union motivation, we find it unnecessary to remand the case to the Board in this instance.

B.

Under the law of this Circuit, it is unnecessary for the Board to prove that the employer's conduct was motivated solely by anti-union animus. NLRB v. Garry Manufacturing Co., 630 F.2d 934, 945 (3d Cir. 1980); Gould Inc. v. NLRB, 612 F.2d 728, 734 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 890, 101 S.Ct. 247, 66 L.Ed.2d 15 (1980); Edgewood Nursing Center, Inc. v. NLRB, 581 F.2d 363, 368 (3d Cir. 1978). Nonetheless, a finding of anti-union motivation cannot be sustained unless there exists some specific evidence demonstrating that the employer intended, at least in part, to interfere with the employees' rights by withholding benefits.

A careful review of the record in this case reveals no evidence of anti-union motivation on the part of Vesuvius. There is no suggestion, for example, that Vesuvius conditioned the payment of benefits on a requirement that its striking employees return to work; indeed, the evidence suggests that one employee who abandoned the strike and returned to work did not receive vacation benefits in 1977. Joint Appendix at 199. Cf. NLRB v. Frick Co., supra (employer notified employees that if they failed to return to work, they would forfeit their vacation benefits); NLRB v. Duncan Foundry & Machine Works, Inc., supra (employer granted vacation benefits to non-strikers and strikers who abandoned the strike); Allied Industrial Workers, Local 289 v. NLRB, 476 F.2d 868 (D.C.Cir. 1973) (employer conditioned payment of accrued vacation benefits upon cessation of strike). Additionally, it is uncontroverted that in January, 1977, the company paid vacation pay to those employees who had scheduled vacations in November or December of 1976 but were on strike as of those dates. No attempt was made to deprive these employees of their accrued benefits merely because they were on strike. Nor does the record indicate that Vesuvius threatened to withhold the benefits prior to the strike in order to gain concessions from the union. See Wiegand, supra, at 470 n.3. Finally, Vesuvius expressed willingness to submit the question of 1977 vacation pay to an arbitrator. No evidence suggests that, had the dispute been arbitrated, and had the arbitrator found in favor of the employees, Vesuvius nonetheless would have refused to pay the benefits to those employees who remained on strike.

In short, we conclude that there is insufficient evidence on this record to support a conclusion that Vesuvius was motivated by anything other than its good faith belief that no right to vacation pay had accrued to its employees as of June 1977, and that entitlement to and amount of the 1977 benefits would be determined under the new collective bargaining agreement if and when that agreement was signed. Accordingly, we find it unnecessary to remand the case to the Board for a determination whether Vesuvius' conduct was improperly motivated.

Thus, the Board's petition for enforcement will be denied, and the company's petition for review will be granted.

APPENDIX

SECTION VII. VACATIONS

A. Eligibility—To be eligible for a vacation in any calendar year during the term of this Agreement, the employee must have one year or more of continuous service.

B. Length of Vacation and Extra Vacation Pay

1. An eligible employee who has attained the years of continuous service indicated in the following table in any calendar year, on the anniversary of his employment with the Company, during the term of this Agreement shall receive a vacation corresponding to such years of continuous service as shown in the following table:

Years of Service	Vacation
1 but less than 3	1 week
3 but less than 10	2 weeks
10 but less than 15	3 weeks
15 but less than 25	4 weeks
25 or more	5 weeks

2. A one week's vacation shall consist of seven consecutive days, a two weeks' vacation of fourteen consecutive days, and a three weeks' vacation of twenty-one consecutive days, etc., provided however that in the event the orderly operations of the business require, such vacations shall be subject to the provisions of the following Subsection C.

C. Scheduling of Vacation—Promptly after January 1 of each calendar year each eligible employee shall be requested to specify the vacation period he desires. Vacations will, so far as possible, be granted at times most desired by employees (longer service employees being given preference as to choice), but the final right to allot vacation period, and the right to change such allotments, is exclusively reserved to the Company in order to insure the orderly operation of the business.

1. Vacation season shall be from January 1 to December 31.

2. Vacation dates must necessarily conform to business requirements and shall be taken as scheduled by Management.

3. Vacation schedules may be changed by the Company if operating conditions make such change necessary.

4. A temporary shutdown in any department may be designated for vacations upon reasonable notice by the Management.

5. Excepting conditions listed above, whenever a Company scheduled vacation shutdown is planned, unless he is otherwise notified, such employee will take his earned vacation at shutdown time. Those employees who are due more than two weeks' vacation are required to take only two weeks of their earned vacation at shutdown time, providing the remaining vacation is taken as provided for above. All vacations must be taken by December 31 in any year. There shall be no pyramiding or carryover into subsequent years of vacation earned but not taken by an employee.

D. Vacation Pay—An employee granted a vacation will receive, for each vacation week, two percent (2%) of his earnings from January 1 to December 31 of the year previous. In the case of first year's employment, he will receive two percent (2%) of the first twelve (12) months' earnings. Vacation pay shall be shown separately on the employees' earnings.

Earnings are defined as all money received within the prescribed period except that money received for holiday pay, jury duty pay, cost-of-living adjustment, and death in family pay shall be excluded from the total earnings for computing vacation pay.

When an employee has been off from work for reasons of his ill health (but for no other reason) for more than one-half of the number of available working days between January 1 of any year and the subsequent December 31, such employee's vacation benefits shall be calculated as follows: (a) an employee having no earnings between January 1 of any year and the subsequent December 31 shall be entitled to a minimum of one week or one-half of his accumulated vacation benefits based on his basic hourly wage rate, and (b) in determining the amount of vacation pay, the two percent (2%) of his average hourly earnings between January 1 and the subsequent December 31 will be used. In such event, if this calculation (b) is less than the minimum defined above in (a), the employee shall receive the greater of the two calculations.

In the event employment is terminated between January 1 and July for the following reason:

Quit, provided two weeks' prior notice of such intent is given the Payroll Office in writing, the employee shall receive for each eligible week two percent (2%) times his earnings for the last four (4) consecutive closed quarters of work.

E. Vacation Allowance in Lieu of Vacation—While it is recognized that the purpose of the vacation provided by this Section is to grant the employees vacation with pay as annual periods of rest and recreation, the Company may require an employee to work during his vacation, in which event he shall be paid his vacation pay in addition to his regular pay.

Bay-Wood Industries, Inc. v. NLRB

666 F.2d 1011 (6th Cir.), December 1, 1981–249 NLRB 403

On petition to review Board Order

Before KEITH and MARTIN, Circuit Judges, and ALDRICH,* District Judge.

PER CURIAM: Petitioner, Bay-Wood Industries, seeks review of a National Labor Relations Board decision finding that it violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) when it discharged William Cederberg, a seasonal employee.

Cederberg was hired in August, 1978 as a laborer to work in its Bay City, Michigan wood fabricating plant. Assigned to the machine shop, Cederberg worked without complaint until mid-September when he complained of the dust and splinters spewing from the circular table saw he was operating. He requested and was given a mask and respirator to wear.

Several days later, on September 20, 1978, Cederberg was assigned to cut wood blocks on an overhead radial saw. After a set-up man demonstrated the saw, Cederberg took over and began to cut blocks as instructed. However, approximately forty-five minutes later, Cederberg complained to the foreman that the saw was unsafe. He stated that certain blocks cut poorly, causing his fingers to be jerked dangerously close to the blade. The foreman returned with Cederberg to the saw where he demonstrated again its proper operation. He left Cederberg with the admonition that if he, Cederberg, operated the machine in this manner and took his time, he would not need a safety guard. Furthermore, the foreman explained that the guard had been removed because it interfered with the saw's operation.

Cederberg again took up operation of the machine only to stop again a short time later because of his continuing fear for his fingers. Returning to the foreman's office, he stated he would not run the saw unless a guard was installed. There is some dispute as to the foreman's response but essentially Cederberg was told to go home. Cederberg returned the next day and briefly took up the issue with the plant supervisor. However, little was said and Cederberg left believing he had been discharged. The only further action Cederberg took was to register a complaint a short time afterwards with the local OSHA office.

The parties on review dispute whether the evidence indicates Cederberg was fired or quit. We need not resolve that question however, for assuming that Cederberg was fired, his dismissal did not violate the Act because it was not discriminatory of protected employee activities.

Section 7 of the Act grants employees the right to engage in "concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection" without fear of recrimination by their employers. 29 U.S.C. § 157. The purpose of this provision is to protect union activity in both its nascent and mature forms. The question then is whether the complaints and actions of Cederberg constitute "concerted activities" protected under section 7.

The uncontroverted evidence shows that Cederberg acted alone on his own behalf. He did not file a grievance concerning this matter as provided for in the collective bargaining agreement between his union and petitioner, nor did he notify the union steward of the problem. Furthermore he testified that when he complained, he was not attempting to enforce the safety provisions of the Union's contract, a document with which he was totally unfamiliar. Instead he stated that he was seeking solely to resolve a problem which he believed concerned him alone. He enlisted no other employees in this dispute nor did he attempt to represent any interests other than his own.

Faced with this absence of facts showing concerted activity, the administrative law judge employed in his decision a judicial fiction known as the "Interboro Doctrine." This principle arose in Interboro Contractors, Inc., 157 NLRB 1295 (1966), enforced, 388 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1967). There the NLRB held that complaints by an individual employee seeking to enforce provisions of a collective bargaining agreement amounted to concerted activity under section 7 despite the absence of interest by his fellow employees in the complaint. The theory behind this principle is that the complaint of one individual necessarily implicates the interests of all employees when it is grounded in the agreement of which they are all a part. However, this court in Aro, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 713 (1979), specifically considered and rejected the Interboro Doctrine's expansive construction of section 7. The test adopted there for determining what activities are "concerted" follows:

*Honorable Ann Aldrich, United States District Judge for the Northern District of Ohio, sitting by designation.

> For an individual claim or complaint to amount to concerted action under the Act it must not have been made solely on behalf of an individual employee, but it must be made on behalf of other employees or at least be made with the object of inducing or preparing for group action and have some arguable basis in the collective bargaining agreement.

Id. at 718.

There is no evidence in the record that shows Cederberg's complaint meets this test.

Consequently, the Board's cross-petition for enforcement of its order is denied.

NLRB v. Service Machine & Shipbuilding Corp.

662 F.2d 1125 (5th Cir.), December 3, 1981—253 NLRB 628

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before CLARK, Chief Judge, RUBIN and SAM D. JOHNSON, Circuit Judges

1125

PER CURIAM: The National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) has applied for enforcement of its order directing Service Machine & Shipbuilding Corp. (Service Machine) to reinstate and pay lost wages to four of its former employees whom the Company had discharged for refusing to operate electrical equipment in the rain. The NLRB's findings are supported by substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole, and its legal conclusions are correct. The Board's order is, therefore, enforced.

Service Machine is in the business of marine construction and ship repair. Nathaniel Buggage, Frank Dorsey, McCullem Williams, and Thomas Coleman were employed by the Company as welders. On September 19, 1979, Service Machine shut down the majority of its yard and boat landing operations because a light drizzle of rain was falling. Shortly before it shut down operations, however, it had loaded an eighty-six foot tall platform [1] onto a barge tied up to one of its boat landings in the bayou. The rains came before Service Machine could secure the platform to the barge. Fearing that the worsening weather conditions would rock the barge and cause the platform to slip off, Service Machine sought volunteers to work overtime to weld the platform into place. Eight welders, including the four complainants, and several fitters agreed to stay.

While the fitters performed some preliminary work on the cross braces which were used to fasten the platform to the barge, Buggage, Dorsey, Williams, and Coleman sought shelter from the rain in a shack near the boat landing. Before the fitters finished, welding foreman Milton Duval ordered these men out to the barge. Carrying their equipment and unprotected by rain gear, the men ran out to the barge and sought shelter under the platform's lower deck. This deck, however, stood fifty-six feet above the floor of the barge and provided little protection from the elements.

After the fitters finished, Dorsey and Williams used their welding equipment to tack one of the braces into place. The welding equipment was powered by 440 volts of electricity and both Dorsey and Williams testified that they received small shocks while tacking the brace. As they finished tacking, the rains became heavier. Dorsey, Williams, Buggage, and Coleman then told Duval that they would not weld in the rain. When Duval ordered them to continue, they protested, saying that they had their families to consider and would not be paid if they became ill.[2] Duval told them to go home if they were not going to work.

[1] The platform is actually a tower built of four large pipe pillars, braced by crossbeams, which support a lower deck about 56 feet above the floor of the barge and an upper deck yet another 30 feet above that. Equipment and smaller structures sit on the platform's decks.

[2] Our review of the record reveals that Dorsey, Coleman, and Williams all testified that they, at this time, expressed a fear of electrocution to Foreman Duval. The Administrative Law Judge (the ALJ), however, apparently overlooked Coleman's and Williams' corroboration of Dorsey's testimony to this effect, and chose not to credit Dorsey's testimony on this point "in view of neither Coleman nor Williams recalling such comments." The Board adopted this section of the ALJ's opinion without modification or dissent. This apparent error is, however, irrelevant in light of our agreement with the Board's conclusion that the danger of electrical shock was known to Duval.

It was raining harder still when the men were confronted by Supervisor Rudy Thibodeaux, who told them that they were fired if they did not return to work. Following this conversation, the men left the yard.[3] They returned to the yard the next day and spoke with Thibodeaux, who told them that they had been discharged when they left work the night before and directed them to collect their equipment and check out.

The ALJ found that these employees were discharged when they collectively exercised their right to refuse to expose themselves to the danger, of which all persons involved were aware, of a major electrical shock, and concluded that their discharge under these conditions violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). A three-member panel of the Board unanimously affirmed the ALJ's findings and conclusions on this point,[4] and adopted his order of reinstatement and back pay.

The facts in this case are in all significant respects identical to those of Brown & Root v. NLRB, 634 F.2d 816 (5th Cir. 1981), in which this Court held the employees' refusal to operate electrical equipment in the rain to be a concerted activity protected by section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 157, and a discharge precipitated by this refusal to be a violation of section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). The distinctions offered by Service Machine, that its employees, unlike those of Brown & Root, volunteered to work in emergency conditions, and that its employees failed to articulate expressly their fear of electrical shock prior to their walkout, are distinctions without a difference.

The Company's argument that its employees lost their right to protest the dangers and discomforts inherent in emergency conditions by volunteering to work under such conditions is premised on a version of the facts at odds with that found by the Board. These employees did not, as the Company would have it, volunteer to weld in wet weather. At the time when they agreed to stay, the rain was only a drizzle, and their clothes were dry. N.L.R.B. v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 82 S.Ct. 1099, 8 L.Ed.2d 298 (1962) firmly established that an employee's waiver of his section 7 rights is not lightly to be implied from an earlier accession to less-than-optimal conditions. The employees of Washington Aluminum Company regularly worked in a Baltimore, Maryland machine shop which was not insulated, which frequently had to be opened to the weather, and which was heated primarily by an oil furnace located in an adjacent building. Even though the conditions which normally obtained in the shop during the winter were quite cold, the Supreme Court found a protected exercise of section 7 rights in the employees' walkout when the furnace broke down. The situation which confronted Buggage, Williams, Dorsey, and Coleman in its significant respects is strikingly similar to that which precipitated the employee walkout in Washington Aluminum. Their agreement to work in conditions which, while perhaps unpleasant, were not hazardous, did not preclude their refusal to continue to work when conditions worsened to present a danger of major electrical shock.

Nor is it relevant that the Board found that these men failed to state explicitly their fear of electrical shock before walking off the job. As stated by the Supreme Court in Washington Aluminum,

> We cannot agree that employees necessarily lose their right to engage in concerted activities under § 7 merely because they do not present a specific demand upon their employer to remedy a condition they find objectionable. The language of § 7 is broad enough to protect concerted activities whether they take place before, after, or at the same time such a demand is made.

Id., 82 S.Ct. at 1102.

[3] The record indicates that the remaining welders completed the job after Duval and Thibodeaux shielded the work area with plastic sheeting and gave the other welders dry gloves. The ALJ found that neither Duval nor Thibodeaux offered, in their exchanges with the complainants, to put up the plastic sheeting.

[4] The ALJ found as well an alternative ground for his order of reinstatement and back pay in his conclusion that, whether or not the welders were concerned for their safety, their simultaneous refusal to work in the rain constituted concerted activity and was therefore protected under the Act. On review of his order, one member of the Board dissented from this construction of "protected concerted activity." On appeal, Service Machine urges us to refute this conclusion, characterizing it as a per se rule protecting all refusals to work regardless of the conditions under which the refusal occurs. Because we find that the Board's order is amply supported by the ALJ's conclusion that the employees acted out of their fear of a hazard which was apparent to all persons involved, we express no opinion on this issue.

The objections offered by Service Machine are found to be without merit. The order of the Board is enforced.

ENFORCED.

Building Material and Dump Truck Drivers, Teamsters Local Union No. 36, etc. v. NLRB

California Dump Truck Owners Association v. NLRB

Larry Shepard v. NLRB

669 F.2d 759 (D.C. Cir.), December 4, 1981—249 NLRB 386

On petitions to review Board Order

Before McGOWAN and ROBB, Circuit Judges, and JAMESON*, United States Senior District Judge for the District of Montana

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge ROBB

ROBB, Circuit Judge: These cases are here on petitions to review the order of the National Labor Relations Board in Building Material & Dump Truck Drivers, Teamsters Local Union No. 36, etc., 249 N.L.R.B. No. 38 (1980). The Board ordered the Building Material and Dump Truck Drivers, Teamsters Local Union No. 36 and the Associated General Contractors, San Diego Chapter, Inc., the San Diego Building Contractors Association, the Engineering and General Contractors Association, and their employer members (the Contractors) to cease enforcing certain provisions of a Master Labor Agreement entered into by the Union and the Contractors in 1977. The Board found that the 1977 Master Labor Agreement required signatory employers to cease dealing with non-union dump truck operators who are independent contractors, thus violating section 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act. 29 U.S.C. § 158(e) (1976).[1]

The Union has petitioned for review of the Board's order, arguing that the Board erred in finding that the truck operators in question are independent contractors. The Associated General Contractors have intervened in support of the Board's order. The California Dump Truck Owners Association, an association of independent dump truck owner-operators, and Larry Shepard, an individual dump truck owner-operator, were charging parties before the Board. They have also petitioned for review, arguing that the remedy awarded by the Board is inadequate. We affirm the Board's order in all respects.

The dispute arises out of the building and construction industry in San Diego County, California. The practice in that industry is that building contractors hire dump truck operators on a day-to-day basis to haul materials to and from construction sites. The contractors generally obtain the services of dump truck operators through brokers, who refer hauling jobs to individual operators, handle billing for services rendered, and generally coordinate arrangements between the contractors and the truck operators. The brokers receive a commission based on the amount billed. Larry Shepard, one of the petitioners, is a dump truck owner-operator who generally accepts referrals from the Terra Trucking Company, one of the brokers in the San Diego area. Petitioner California Dump Truck Owners Association is composed of owner-operators who operate through brokers.

Since at least 1965 the Union and the Contractors have negotiated master labor agreements to govern hauling work performed in the San Diego area. There has been a dispute during that same period between the Union and the non-union truck operators over the availability of hauling jobs for non-union truck operators. The Union sought terms in each new agreement to prohibit dealings with non-union operators. The 1977 Master Labor Agreement contained such terms. Section 4 of the Agreement required signatory contractors to transport "all materials * * * to or from or on the site of the work by workmen furnished by the appropriate craft UNION * * *." Under section 42(B)(1) of the Agreement only union truck operators were cleared by the Union for work with the Contractors. The Agreement also provided that signatory contractors could procure the services of truck operators only through a "person, firm, or corporation * * * signatory to an agreement with the Union". Section 42(B)(2). Other provisions of the Agreement required the Contractors to treat owner-operators as employees, section 42(B)(4), and penalized contractors who failed to comply with the Agreement. Section 42(B)(9)(12) & (13). In short, under the 1977 Agreement the Union enlisted the aid of the Contractors to insure that only signatory brokers received subcontracts and only union truck operators performed hauling services for building contractors in the San Diego area. The Board found that the Union and the Contractors enforced the Agreement against brokers and non-union dump truck operators.

*Sitting by designation pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 294(d).

[1] Section 8(e) provides that:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for any labor organization and any employer to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling, using, selling, transporting or otherwise dealing in any of the products of any other employer, or to cease doing business with any other person, and any contract or agreement entered into heretofore or hereafter containing such an agreement shall be to such extent unenforcible and void: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall apply to an agreement between a labor organization and an employer in the construction industry relating to the contracting or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction, alteration, painting, or repair of a building, structure, or other work: Provided further, That for the purposes of this subsection and subsection (b)(4)(B) of this section the terms "any employer", "any person engaged in commerce or an industry affecting commerce", and "any person" when used in relation to the terms "any other producer, processor, or manufacturer", "any other employer", or "any other person" shall not include persons in the relation of a jobber, manufacturer, contractor, or subcontractor working on the goods or premises of the jobber or manufacturer or performing parts of an integrated process of production in the apparel and clothing industry: Provided further, That nothing in this subchapter shall prohibit the enforcement of any agreement which is within the foregoing exception.

In November 1977 the Kissinger Trucking Company, a broker, entered into a contract with the Penhaul Company to supply hauling services for a demolition project. Shortly after the project began, Kissinger's manager was informed that Kissinger would be replaced because it was referring non-union truck operators. Penhaul had signed the 1977 Agreement and could not, under the terms of that agreement, contract with a broker that referred non-union 763 truck operators. Kissinger Trucking lost the contract with Penhaul and subsequently signed the 1977 Agreement.

The Agreement was also enforced against Terra Trucking, Larry Shepard's usual broker. Terra Trucking has been a party to master labor agreements since 1974, and so was required by the 1977 Agreement to refer only union truck operators to building contractors. In August 1978 Terra Trucking's president, Fred ReCupido, received a letter from the Union stating that under the Agreement he must not deal with seven non-union truck operators, including Shepard. ReCupido informed the seven truck operators that they must join the Union or make other arrangements for brokerage of their services. Shepard joined the Union under protest. Some of the seven non-union truck operators did not join the Union but continued to accept referrals from Terra Trucking.

In December 1977 the Dump Truck Owners filed a charge with the Board alleging that the Agreement violated section 8(e) of the Act. The charge alleged that the Union and the Contractors had agreed to cease, and had actually ceased, doing business with the non-union dump truck operators. In October 1978 Larry Shepard filed a similar charge against the Union, alleging that the Union had violated sections 8(b)(4)[2] and 8(e) of the Act by pressuring Terra Trucking not to broker his services because he did not belong to the Union notwithstanding that he is an independent contractor. At the request of the Regional Director, Shepard filed a new charge containing only the 8(e) allegation.

In January 1979 the Regional Director consolidated the two charges and issued a complaint alleging only a violation of section 8(e) by the Union and the Contractors. After a full trial the Administrative Law Judge found that the truck operators are independent contractors and not employees under the Act. Thus, the Union and the Contractors violated section 8(e) by agreeing not to do business with the non-union truck operators and their brokers. The ALJ recommended that the Board order the Union and the Contractors to cease and desist from enforcing the unlawful provisions of the Agreement. The ALJ further recommended that the Union and the Contractors be ordered to make whole those truck operators who were compelled to join the Union and pay dues, initiation fees, assessments, and contribute to Union trust funds.

29 U.S.C. § 158(b) (1976).

On exceptions and briefs the Board affirmed the ALJ's findings and conclusions, as relevant here, but deleted the make-whole remedy recommended by the ALJ. The Board ordered the Union and the Contractors to cease enforcing the unlawful portions of the Agreement and to post notices. The Union, Mr. Shepard, and the Dump Truck Owners petition for review and the Board petitions for enforcement of its order.

The first question presented by the petitions for review is whether the Board correctly found that the Union and the Contractors violated section 8(e) of the Act by agreeing not to deal, and ceasing to deal, with certain brokers and non-union truck operators. Section 8(e) prohibits "any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby such employer ceases or refrains or agrees to cease or refrain from handling, using, selling, transporting or otherwise dealing in any of the products of any other employer". 29 U.S.C. § 158(e) (1976).[3] This section of the Act has been interpreted by the Supreme Court to prohibit agreements calculated to satisfy "secondary" union objectives, i.e., those objectives which are not "addressed to the labor relations of the contracting employer vis-a-vis his own employees". National Woodwork Manufacturers Association v. NLRB, 386 U.S. 612, 644–45, 87 S.Ct. 1250, 1268–69, 18 L.Ed.2d 357 (1967). Agreements which limit the employer, here the Contractors, to subcontracting with businesses that recognize the union or have a union contract violate section 8(e). Truck Drivers, Local 413 v. NLRB, 118 U.S.App.D.C. 149, 158, 334 F.2d 539, 548 (1964). Thus, a provision in an agreement which is designed to compel independent contractors to become union members as a condition of doing business with a party to the agreement is unlawful because it restricts the employer in his dealings with other businesses. Local 814, International Brotherhood of Teamsters v. NLRB, 167 U.S.App.D.C. 387, 389–90, 512 F.2d 564, 566–67 (1975), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 818, 98 S.Ct. 56, 54 L.Ed.2d 73 (1977). It is not disputed that the Union and the Contractors may not lawfully enforce the provisions of the 1977 Agreement which restrict dealings with truck operators who are independent contractors. However, the Union contends that the Board erred in finding that the truck operators are independent contractors. The truck operators, says the Union, are employees of the brokers. We agree with the Board.

Section 2(3) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) (1976), defines "employee" as excluding "any individual having the status of an independent contractor". The Act does not define "independent contractor", but Congress intended the Board and the courts to "apply general agency principles in distinguishing between employees and independent contractors under the Act." NLRB v. United Insurance Co., 390 U.S. 254, 256, 88 S.Ct. 988, 989, 19 L.Ed.2d 1083 (1968) (footnote omitted). In applying agency principles the Board and the courts look at all aspects of an individual's relationship with the putative employer. Local 777, Democratic Union Organizing Committee, Seafarer's International Union v. NLRB, 195 U.S.App.D.C. 280, 290–91, 603 F.2d 862, 872–73 (1978). Although no one part of the relationship is determinative, the degree of supervision over the means and manner of performing the task assigned is most important in determining whether a relationship is that of employee or independent contractor. Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 271, 279 (9th Cir. 1977); see Joint Council of Teamsters No. 42 v. NLRB, 146 U.S.App.D.C. 275, 279, 450 F.2d 1322, 1326 (1971). Under the familiar principles of agency law > an employer-employee relationship exists when the employer reserves not only the right to control the result to be achieved, but also the means to be used in attaining the result. On the other hand, where the employer has reserved only the right to control the ends to be achieved, an independent contractor relationship exists.

NLRB,* 202 U.S.App.D.C. 261, 264, 628 F.2d 261, 264 (1980). It is the Board which determines independent contractor or employee status in the first instance and we must affirm the Board's determination if it is supported by the record as a whole. 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976); Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 487-88, 71 S.Ct. 456, 463-64, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

Given these legal principles, our task is limited to determining whether the Board's finding that the truck operators are independent contractors is consistent with the statute and the record. The Board found that the truck operators are not supervised in any manner by the brokers, who simply refer hauling jobs to them. While on the job only the building contractor's personnel tell the truck operators where to deliver a load, and this is done by hand signals. The Board found that the truck operators may accept referrals from more than one broker and are free to negotiate a job rate that is higher than a minimum rate set by a state commission. The truck operators own their trucks, and arrange licensing, insurance, repairs and maintenance. They are responsible for operating expenses, may subcontract job referrals, are personally liable for spillage, pay Social Security taxes as self-employed persons, and often receive payment based on tonnage or mileage as opposed to hourly wages. As the Board concluded, it is fair to describe these truck operators as independent businessmen, free to decide when, whether, and how to work. This being so the Union may not lawfully compel them to become members in order to carry on their business.

The Union challenges the Board's conclusion by pointing to certain facts which are said to indicate a close working relationship between Terra Trucking, a broker, and some of the truck operators that accept referrals from Terra. Specifically, the Union notes that Terra Trucking (1) rents trailers to some truck operators, (2) requires five days notice before a truck operator may cease renting a trailer, (3) insures its rented trailers under a policy that includes a two-hundred-fifty dollar deductible clause, (4) makes fuel available for purchase by the operators, (5) performs all billing and collection services for the truck operators, (6) pays the truck operators each month whether or not the bills are collected and (7) the truck operators are told when and where to report to begin work.

We think these facts and others relied on by the Union do not compel a finding that the truck operators are employees under the Act. None of the facts relied on by the Union establishes that the truck operators have given brokers the right to control their work. Taken together, the facts indicate that some of the truck operators have a close working relationship with a broker. This suggests that the truck operators have contracted away some aspects of entrepreneurial freedom and that certain risks have been shifted to the brokers; but the record taken as a whole does not compel a conclusion that the truck operators have surrendered control over their operations to the brokers. On the contrary, the record fully supports the Board's conclusion that the truck operators are independent contractors. Because the truck operators are independent contractors, the Union and the Contractors may not enter into an agreement which prohibits dealings with them unless they become union members. The 1977 Agreement was thus invalid and the Board's order against its enforcement is proper.

We turn to the attack on the Board's remedy by Shepard and the dump truck operators. As we have said, the ALJ recommended that the Union and the Contractors be ordered to reimburse the dues, contributions and fees paid by those truck operators who joined the Union. The Board declined to adopt this recommendation. In a footnote to its decision, 248 N.L.R.B. No. 38 at 3 n.2, the Board said "we find that the reimbursement of owner-operators ordered by the Administrative Law Judge would not effectuate the remedial policies of the Act. See Local 60, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL-CIO, et al. [Mechanical Handling Systems, Inc.] v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 651, 81 S.Ct. 875, 6 L.Ed.2d 1 (1961)." The Board found "a reimbursement order, typically used to 'make whole' employees for violations of the Act, to be generally overbroad and inappropriate in the context of 8(e) violations." [Emphasis in original] Id.

The Board entered a cease and desist order against the Union, combined with notice posting.

Shepard and the dump truck owners complain that the Board failed to give an adequate explanation of its deletion of the make-whole order and that the cease and desist order is insufficient as a matter of law. We think, however, that the Board's explanation is adequate, and that given our limited authority to disturb the Board's exercise of discretion in such matters we may not interfere.

Section 10(c) of the Act provides that, upon finding that an unfair labor practice has been committed, the Board "shall issue * * * an order requiring * * * such affirmative action * * * as will effectuate the policies of this Act." 29 U.S.C. § 160(c). See also NLRB v. Seven-Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 346, 73 S.Ct. 287, 288, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953). The Board's remedial power "is a broad discretionary one, subject to limited judicial review". Fibreboard Paper Products Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964). In fashioning its remedies, "the Board draws on a fund of knowledge and expertise all its own, and its choice of remedy must therefore be given special respect by reviewing courts." NLRB v. Gissell Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1939 n.32, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). As this court has observed in reviewing a petitioner's contention that a Board remedy did not go far enough:

> Just what remedies are necessary to insure that a decision and order of the Board is effective is a matter largely for the Board's discretion. To successfully attack the Board's remedy one must show that the remedies prescribed by the Board are clearly inadequate in the light of the findings of the Board.

I.U.E., Local 806 v. NLRB, 140 U.S.App. D.C. 199, 204, 434 F.2d 473, 478 (1970). Indeed, the Supreme Court has held that a Board remedial order may not be disturbed "unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act." Virginia Electric & Power Co. v. NLRB, 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943).

Section 8(e) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice "for any labor organization and any employer to enter into any contract or agreement, express or implied, whereby" an employer agrees not to handle products of, or agrees to cease doing business with, any other person. Such contracts or agreements, with certain exceptions not germane here, are unlawful per se; evidence of coercion is not necessary to prove a violation of the Section. In the absence of coercion and because union members receive benefits as well as assume burdens, the Board properly finds it inappropriate to order reimbursement of sums paid pursuant to agreements that violate section 8(e); obviously, reimbursement to union members who were not coerced into joining would result in an unjust windfall to them. It was for this reason that the Supreme Court, in the case cited by the Board, Local 60, United Bhd. of Carpenters and Joiners v. NLRB, 365 U.S. 651, 81 S.Ct. 875, 6 L.Ed.2d 1 (1961), held that the Board was not authorized to require the union to refund dues and fees when there was no evidence that any of the employees had been coerced.

Section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) of the Act provides that it is unlawful for a union to engage in certain conduct if the object thereof is to force or require any employer or self-employed person to join any labor organization or to enter into any agreement prohibited by section 8(e). The Board has properly ordered make-whole remedies where employers or self-employed persons have been subjected to violations of this section. See Local 814, Teamsters (Santini Bros.), 208 N.L.R.B. 184, 201 (1974), enfc'd, 178 U.S.App.D.C. 223, 546 F.2d 989 (1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 818, 98 S.Ct. 56, 54 L.Ed.2d 73 (1977); Sheet Metal Workers, Local 223, 196 N.L.R.B. 55, 57 (1972), remanded, 162 U.S. App.D.C. 145, 498 F.2d 687 (1974), modified, 214 N.L.R.B. 786 (1974). In the case before us, however, no violation of section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) was alleged. The Supreme Court has held that a make-whole order "in those circumstances become punitive and beyond the power of the Board." Carpenters Local 60, supra, 365 U.S. at 655, 81 S.Ct. at 877. The petitioners suggest that the Board should have made a sua sponte finding of section 8(b)(4)(ii)(A) violations; but since no such violation was charged a sua sponte finding would have been improper.

We think the Board's explanation of its order, although terse, is a sufficient shorthand indication of its reasoning. Finally, we cannot say that the cease and desist order entered by the Board is insufficient to deter further wrongdoing. Both the unions and the contractors' associations will be subject to contempt proceedings for any future violations. We will not disturb the Board's judgment that the order is sufficient to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The petitions for review are denied and the Board's order will be enforced in full.

So ordered.

NLRB v. Sanford Home for Adults, and Local 6, International Federation of Health Professionals, International Longshoremen's Association, AFL—CIO

669 F.2d 35 (2d Cir.), December 7, 1981—253 NLRB 1132

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before FEINBERG, Chief Judge, OAKES, Circuit Judge, and CONNER, District Judge

36

PER CURIAM: Petitioner National Labor Relations Board seeks enforcement of an order finding that respondent Sanford Home for Adults (the Home) violated sections 8(a)(1), (2), and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1)(3), and that respondent Local 6 (the Union) violated sections 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act. 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(b)(1)(A), (2). The Board found, in essence, that the Home had coerced its employees into joining the Union to prevent them from becoming members of a rival organization, Local 144, the charging party. It also concluded, inter alia, that the Home and the Union had inappropriately entered into a collective bargaining agreement when a majority of the Home's employees had not signed valid membership cards and that the Union had improperly attempted to enforce the agreement's union security clause by demanding that two employees be discharged. The order required respondents to desist from further violations of the Act and to reinstate and make whole employees who were victims of their unlawful practices. The Home was also ordered to withdraw recognition from the Union as the collective bargaining representative of its service and maintenance employees.

Respondents argue that the Board improperly excluded two individuals from the bargaining unit in determining that the Union did not command majority support. One employee, Beverly Salmon, completed a tax form and union membership card, but she did not commence work nor was she ever paid. The other employee, Raymond Murcia, began his term of employment only four days before and completed it one day after the Union's recognition demand date. Although he was ostensibly hired as a kitchen helper, Murcia helped out in the kitchen only on the first day of his employment. The bulk of his time was spent organizing activities for the Union. Under the circumstances, the Board did not err in concluding that Salmon and Murcia did not qualify as employees in determining whether the Union had garnered majority support.

Respondents also claim that the Board erred in finding that Raul Alcides Echeverri's membership card was invalid because he was coerced into signing. At the hearing, the evidence showed that Harry Mayer, the Home's managing partner and administrator, and his wife, the assistant administrator, had been present at various times when Murcia solicited Echeverri to become a union member. Mr. Mayer also told Echeverri that everyone had joined and that anyone else who had not signed would be "thrown out." Mr. Mayer filled out the card for Echeverri, who then signed it. This showing amply supported the conclusion that Echeverri had been coerced into signing. Because exclusion of the cards signed by Salmon, Murcia, and Echeverri resulted in less than majority support for the Union, it is unnecessary to consider the Board's broader finding that all votes cast for the Union were tainted by coercion.

Respondents also contend that the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) should have been disqualified because he engaged in ex parte communication with the Board's general counsel. This contention must also be rejected. First, respondents did not comply with section 102.37 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, 29 C.F.R. § 102.37 (1981), which requires the parties to file a timely affidavit alleging the grounds for disqualification before an administrative law judge files his decision. In fact, when the ALJ informed the parties of the ex parte communication, respondents stated that they were satisfied with his explanation. They did not raise their objection until well after the ALJ's decision. Second, the ex parte communication here was entirely proper. Section 102.130 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, 29 C.F.R. § 102.130 (1981), permits an administrative law judge to engage in ex parte communication regarding settlement of a case. The conversation challenged here involved only information relevant to possible settlement and did not inappropriately deal with the merits of the case.

Finally, respondents argue that their right to due process was denied because the Board had predetermined the outcome of the case when it decided to seek an injunction under section 10(j) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(j). This claim is untenable. If it were accepted, the Board would preclude itself from fulfilling its obligation to review and decide whether unfair labor practices have occurred under section 10(c), 29 U.S.C. § 160(c), by meeting its obligation to seek an injunction under section 10(j). Such a result would be completely out of keeping with congressional intent to delegate these duties to the Board. In seeking an injunction under section 10(j), moreover, the Board does not decide the ultimate merits of a labor dispute, but need show only that "there is reasonable cause to believe that unfair labor practices have been committed." See Seeler v. Trading Port, Inc., 517 F.2d 33, 36 (2d Cir. 1975).

The Board's petition for enforcement is granted.

NLRB v. Wilhow Corporation d/b/a Town and Country Supermarkets

666 F.2d 1294 (10th Cir.), December 7, 1981—244 NLRB 303

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before HOLLOWAY and DOYLE, Circuit Judges, and KUNZIG, Court of Claims Judge

1297

WILLIAM E. DOYLE, Circuit Judge: The question in this NLRB enforcement proceeding is whether there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole of a violation by the respondent Wilhow Corporation of § 158(a)(1)—interference with organizing rights—, § 158(a)(3)—discharge of employees—and § 158(a)(5) of the Act—refusal to bargain.

Prior Proceedings

The problem in this proceeding is that Wilhow Corporation, which operates a chain of grocery stores owned by Shirley Williams and John Howard and known as Town & Country Supermarkets, allegedly engaged in unfair labor practices at one of their stores, in Columbus, Kansas, with respect to which complaints were filed before the Board.

The Board issued a complaint against the respondent on June 30, 1977. In it a claim was made that Wilhow had violated 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1), (3) and (5) in committing unfair labor practices during an organizing campaign by the Retail Store Employees Union, Local 322 of Southwest Missouri, an affiliate of the United Food and Commercial Workers International Union, AFL-CIO. Following a hearing before an Administrative Law Judge, Wilhow was found to have violated § 158(a)(1), (3) and (5). The judge ordered that the respondent cease and desist from further violations, reinstate employees wrongfully fired and make them whole for lost pay and bargain with Local Union 322.

The Labor Board adopted the findings, conclusions and recommended order of the Administrative Law Judge.

All of the proceedings mentioned above started to take form in April 1977 when Stanley Robinson, assistant manager at the Columbus, Kansas store, contacted a union representative of Local 322 and requested a meeting between store employees and the union to discuss union representation. Such a meeting was held on May 5th between eight employees of Town & Country Supermarkets and the Union representative. These eight employees signed authorization cards requesting that the Retail Clerks International Association, AFL-CIO, represent them "for the purposes of collective bargaining, respecting rates of pay, wages, hours of employment or other conditions of employment in accordance with applicable law." Four additional store employees signed authorization cards on the sixth and seventh of May. On May 6 the Union sent a demand to Wilhow demanding recognition and bargaining. A claim was made that the Union represented a majority of employees in the grocery department of the Columbus store. Copies of the authorization cards were included with the letter. The Company received the Union's letter on May 7th and replied by a letter dated May 9th in which it refused to recognize the Union without a secret ballot. Wilhow did not believe that a majority of their grocery employees freely signed the authorization cards. On May 9 the Union filed an election petition with the Regional Director of the NLRB. On May 11 the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Regional Director.

Evidence here is quite extensive. The hearing commenced September 29, 1977 and continued to December 1, 1977 before the Administrative Law Judge.

Testimony on Wilhow's Alleged Interference with the Employees' Right to Organize

The finding by the judge was that Roger Box, manager of the Columbus store, had questioned Mitchell Reese, an employee who had signed an authorization card. The questioning occurred during the week of May 9th having to do with his union activity but without using the term union in the conversation. More questioning about the attempted unionizing occurred through Paula Box, Roger's wife and the bookkeeper at the store. In February of 1977 Mrs. Box told Reese that John Howard, one of the owners, would close the store if the Union was successful and advised him to be wary of speaking about unionizing while at work. Later, on May 7th, Mrs. Box arranged a meeting with the mother of employee Alan McClure, who had signed an authorization card. She asked Mrs. McClure if she knew of the Union's recent activity. Paula Box advised Mrs. McClure that if the Union was successful some employees would lose their jobs because Wilhow would be forced to pay higher wages. This conversation was relayed by Mrs. McClure to her son. The following day Mrs. Box made similar statements to employee Debra Jackson, who had signed an authorization card. She told her that since she was the last one hired she would be the first to go. On May 10th Paula Box made a veiled threat to Alan McClure, who was a part-time employee. She said that, if unionized, the company would dispense with most part-time help in favor of permanent employees.

The owners of the store participated in soliciting complaints from employees subsequent to the Union's demand for recognition. The Administrative Law Judge found that on May 14th Shirley Williams, one of the owners, asked McClure if he knew there had been talk of unionizing. He told McClure that he would be around the store if employees wanted to discuss anything with him, including any problems they might have. On May 26th John Howard asked Stanley Robinson "how we got into this mess * * * and what can we do to get out of it." A further conversation occurred on May 31st between Howard, Williams and Robinson. Robinson volunteered information about the employees' unhappiness with Paula Box's power over them. Following this conversation, Mrs. Box's desk was enclosed from the main part of the store and a diagram of responsibilities was drawn up.

On May 7th Williams promised an enticement to some of his employees. He told them that there had been trouble in the store, an obvious reference to the Union's bargaining demand, and that he owned an auto race track that they could get into free by arranging a Sunday off through Roger Box.

The Evidence Having to do With the Discharge or Firing of Employees.

On May 7th Roger Box told Karlinger, the produce manager, that John Howard had fired him. Karlinger attended the Union meeting on May 5th, signed an authorization card, and on May 6th at the store asked a fellow employee if she knew about or was interested in the Union's efforts. At that time no warning was given to Karlinger that he was going to be terminated. The only reason given to him for his firing was that the gross profits of his department was five percent below the Company's average. At the hearing, however, John Howard testified that there were legitimate reasons for firing Karlinger unconnected with his Union activities: ordering problems, uncleanliness of his department, and displays in poor condition. The ALJ discounted Howard's testimony as vague and unresponsive. He found that it stretched credulity to believe that Karlinger's termination merely coincided with the receipt of the Union's bargaining demand (and was not connected with it).

Employee Jim Mogle was released from duty on May 7th. He had participated, as had Karlinger, in the Union activities. Roger Box kept notes for the prior six months on Mogle's shortcomings. He, however, received no advance warning that he would be fired. The Company claimed that he was fired for his poor job performance. Howard testified to this and claimed that Mogle had a poor attitude, that he had failed to follow directions and failed at his housekeeping tasks. The ALJ found Howard's testimony unbelievable and vague and lacking in substance. It was disregarded.

The Testimony Having to do With Refusal to Bargain

The Administrative Law Judge determined that the grocery employees who demanded collective bargaining through the Union's letter of May 6th comprised an appropriate bargaining unit. The Administrative Law Judge included seventeen employees in the unit. As of May 7th, when 1299 Wilhow received the Union's letter, twelve employees had signed authorization cards. Accordingly, a card-bargaining majority existed. However the Company questioned the manner in which the Union representative waived Union initiation fees for those signing cards. The judge found that there was no evidence that the Union told employees that only those who signed up before the election would receive the waiver. See, NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973) where the Court held that a bargaining order should not be enforced if the Union entices employees to sign authorization cards by telling them that only those who sign up before an election will have their initiation fee waived.

Wilhow complained that a letter dated September 2, 1977 sent to the Union, the Board and the Company by six of the twelve employees who had signed cards was probative. This letter stated that those employees no longer wanted an election, did not believe Wilhow had violated the National Labor Relations Act and did not wish to testify. The Administrative Law Judge disregarded this letter for it was written after the unfair labor practice had occurred. In determining that a bargaining order was appropriate, the Administrative Law Judge gave weight to the unlawful firings. These violations, together with the § 158(a)(1) violations, were considered to undermine the majority of the bargaining unit and impede the Board's election process. The judge ruled that the § 158(a)(1) violations were coercive enough to persist and because a majority of the bargaining unit had signed authorization cards, a bargaining order was consistent with NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

Review of Violations Found by the Board

We are called upon to review the record as a whole for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is substantial evidence supporting respondent's violations of § 158(a)(1), (3) and (5). Our scope of review pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) is a limited one. We do not, of course, retry the proceedings before the Administrative Law Judge or those before the Board. We do not weigh the credibility of one witness against another and we do not search for contradictory inferences.[1] We are not authorized to make contrary alternative inferences from the record evidence where there is substantial evidence to support the Board's determination. Montgomery Ward, supra. We do not have a broad discretion to overturn the NLRB on factual issues. Indeed our authority is narrower than the Board's in its consideration of the findings of the Administrative Law Judge.[2] The fact that this court differs with the Board does not justify setting aside the findings of the Board where the facts lend themselves to conflicting inferences. This is true even though the court would have reached a different conclusion had the matter been before it at the trial level.[3]

As to the § 8(a)(1) violations, the Administrative Law Judge heard a good deal of testimony on the statements made by Roger Box, Paula Box, John Howard and Shirley Williams, to employees participating in the organizing effort. His conclusions based on the credibility of employees Reese,

McClure, Jackson and Robinson were supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole. Credibility determinations are particularly within the province of the hearing examiner and the Board, and these are generally entitled to affirmance on review.[4]

It is noted that the Administrative Law Judge's tendency was to find the testimony of the unionizing employees more believable and forthright than that of Williams and Howard. Wilhow has attacked the Board's decision claiming the Administrative Law Judge acted arbitrarily in refusing to give credence to the Company's testimony. "Merely because the Administrative Law Judge believed the employee's story does not furnish reasons to overturn his credibility determinations." [5] In order for the court to accept the findings of the Administrative Law Judge it is sufficient for this court that the judge advanced plausible reasons for his credibility findings.[6]

We are of the opinion that the Administrative Law Judge was fully justified in determining that the interrogations by the Boxes and the co-owners Williams and Howard were coercive, threatening and restrained unionizing activity.[7] It is primarily the Board's function to decide if interrogation violates the Act and where there is substantial evidentiary support this court will not disturb the ruling.[8] It is within the Board's competence to judge the impact of the statements made on behalf of the Company within the employer-employee relationship.[9]

It is the contention of the respondent that no violations can arise out of the interrogations by Paula Box for the reason that she is not a supervisor under § 2(11) of the Act but rather just another employee. The judge did not reach the question of Mrs. Box's supervisory status. He held that she was sufficiently allied with the Company's Columbus store management to make her its representative.[10] The Administrative Law Judge considered the small number of employees at this store, the fact that Paula Box was married to the store manager and her visibility and role in store operations in entering the determination. There is no necessity for formal supervisory status in order to have employer responsibility. The court will look to whether the employee had justifiable cause to believe that the individual was acting on behalf of management when he performed the acts complained of.[11] In this setting the court must pierce the doctrines of respondeat superior to determine whether there is present employer domination or influence.[12] In Champa Linen there was a question of whether the sons of the general manager were properly considered by the Board and this court to be agents of management in committing violations of § 8(a)(1). It is our determination that Mrs. Box's affinity with management was sufficient to attribute her actions to the respondent.

Turning now to the firings of Karlinger and Mogle, the respondent's complaint is that, contrary to the finding of the Administrative Law Judge, those employees were supervisors within the meaning of § 2(11) and are not protected under the Act.[13] The Board's decision on supervisory status is conclusive if supported by substantial evidence.[14] The decision here being factual, especially within the competence of the hearing examiner and the Board, it is entitled to even greater than usual weight.[15] The record shows that Karlinger worked alone as produce manager and had no authority over others. The same is true of Mogle as a stocker. He did not have the indicia of supervisory status. He could request that other employees help him when they were free, but he did not have authority over them beyond those occasions when they wished to be cooperative. Accordingly, the Board's view that neither of these men comes within the statutory definition of supervisor must be upheld.[16]

Wilhow also challenges the § 8(a)(3) violation on another ground. The claim is that Howard and Williams lacked any knowledge of Karlinger and Mogle's Union activities at the time of their termination. The contention is that they were fired for reasons other than Union activity, reasons having to do with their performance.

In the first instance the General Counsel has the burden of proving a violation of § 8(a)(3). This must be established by acceptable substantial evidence on the whole record that the discharge comes from the forbidden motive of interference in the employee's statutory rights.[17] Thus, if the employer comes forward with evidence of a motive for the firing devoid of Union animus, it is incumbent on the General Counsel to demonstrate explicitly that an improper motive contributed to the discharge.[18] To accomplish this burden it is necessary to have proof of an employer's knowledge of his employee's Union activity.[19] John Howard points out that the Company failed to receive the Union's letter requesting Town & Country Supermarkets to bargain until after the firing of Karlinger and Mogle on May 7th. However, the record as a whole contains sufficient circumstantial evidence that Howard knew of the Union activity of these employees on the 5th and 6th of May and along with any business-related complaints he had, their Union activities brought about their termination. It is unnecessary here for the Board to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Howard was completely aware of the discharged employees' involvement, where, as here, the record in its entirety allows a fair inference of discriminatory motivation.[20] Circumstantial evidence of the employer's knowledge and motive is sufficient to prove a § 8(a)(3) violation. NLRB v. Link-Belt Co., 311 U.S. 584, 602, 61 S.Ct. 358, 367, 85 L.Ed. 368 (1941). The testimony of Howard and that of Roger Box concerning the shortcomings of Karlinger and Mogle would be sufficient to support the Board had it failed to find a § 8(a)(3) infraction. However, we cannot substitute our judgment for that of the Board if there is a reasonable basis in the record as a whole for its determination. The inference of unlawful discrimination in the firing of employees involved in Union activity is sustainable on the record before the court.[21]

We conclude the employer's rationale for its action has included a pretext to mask anti-union motivation. Beyond the Union activity of Karlinger and Mogle, we are unable to ignore the fact that they were fired the day after the Union's collective bargaining request was sent and two days after the Union organizing meeting. Neither employee had ever been warned that they would be fired at any time prior to May 7th. Certainly the timing of events is an important factor in determining the validity of an inference that there has been a discriminatory firing.

Where, as in this case, the employer has committed unfair labor practices with respect to a majority of employees signing Union authorization cards, we have recognized the propriety of a bargaining order.[22]

A fundamental decision of the Supreme Court on the propriety of a bargaining order is NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). The Court in Gissel emphasized the wide discretion the Board has in fashioning its remedies and concomitantly the special respect reviewing courts must give the Board's choice of remedies. 395 U.S. at 612, n. 32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939, n. 32. "[T]he Board, through its expertise, must estimate the effects on the election process of unfair labor practices of varying intensity." Id. This court's function in reviewing the Board's orders is to uphold them "unless it can be shown that the order is a patent attempt to achieve ends other than those which can fairly be said to effectuate the policies of the Act." Virginia Electric Power Co. v. NLRB, 319 U.S. 533, 540, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1218, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943). In the Tenth Circuit we have indicated clearly that the Board has great latitude in determining whether an employer's unfair labor practice vitiates a fair election process, and thus, requires a bargaining order based on a majority of Union authorization cards.[23]

As to the § 8(a)(5) violation, Wilhow claims that it was justified in refusing to bargain; that it did not violate § 8(a)(5), and that a bargaining order is inappropriate because it in good faith doubted that a majority of its employees in the grocery department had signed authorization cards. Also challenged by Wilhow before the Regional Director, the hearing examiner and this court is the make-up of the bargaining unit. Our holding is that the Administrative Law Judge's inclusion of seventeen employees in the bargaining unit is within the informed discretion of the judge and the Board. We see no reason to disturb this finding.[24] Wilhow's alleged good faith is a subjective consideration which is no longer relevant in determining the propriety of a bargaining order. The Board had said in Joy Silk Mills, Inc., 85 NLRB 1263 (1949), enforced, 185 F.2d 732 (D.C. Cir. 1950), that an employer's good faith doubt of majority status was a defense to a demand to bargain. The Board gave up this position by the time of Gissel. "[U]nder the Board's current practice, an employer's good faith doubt is largely irrelevant, and the key to the issuance of a bargaining order is the commission of serious unfair labor practices that interfere with the election process and tend to preclude the holding of a fair election." 395 U.S. at 594, 89 S.Ct. at 1930. The courts have upheld the Board's current position. Linden Lumber Division v. NLRB, 419 U.S. 301, 95 S.Ct. 429, 42 L.Ed.2d 465 (1974); NLRB v. American Cable Systems, 414 F.2d 661, 667 (5th Cir. 1969).

Wilhow, again in this connection, reasserts its claim that Stanley Robinson was a supervisor under § 2(11) and that his participation in soliciting signatures for the authorization cards taints their usefulness. True, both the courts and the Board agree that if a supervisor is a moving force in obtaining authorization cards, they are invalid.[25] In this case, though, the Administrative Law Judge and the Board determined that Robinson was not a supervisor. There are numerous findings as to his duties with Town & Country Supermarkets. The judge held that Robinson's position was actually that of a grocery clerk. He had tasks of some responsibility assigned to him, but he was not authorized to use independent judgment in dealing with other employees or his job performance. The cases cited in regard to Karlinger's and Mogle's status, supra, uphold the Board's determination of Robinson's position. See, NLRB v. Robin American Corp., 654 F.2d 1022 (5th Cir. 1981).

The Company complains that the authorization cards were signed only to get an election and are, therefore, invalid. In Gissel the Supreme Court recognized the Board's decision in Cumberland Shoe Corp., 144 N.L.R.B. 1268 (1963), that if a card states that the signer authorizes the Union to represent an employee in collective bargaining and not to seek an election, the card will be counted. It is only if the employee was told the card was to be used solely to seek an election that it will be invalid. "There is nothing inconsistent in handing an employee a card that the signer authorizes the Union to represent him and then telling him that the card will probably be used first to get an election." 395 U.S. at 606–07, 89 S.Ct. at 1936–1937. The cards used by Local 322 in this case were unambiguous single-purpose cards for collective bargaining. The record does not reflect that there was any misrepresentation by the Union representative or by Stanley Robinson to any of the twelve signatories. No one was told the cards would be used solely to gain an election. Therefore, we find that there is no fault to be found with the cards evidencing the wish of a majority of the bargaining unit.[26]

[25] NLRB v. Hawthorne Aviation, 406 F.2d 428, 430 (10th Cir. 1969).

The Company also attacks the validity of the cards on the ground that the Union representative told the employees that the Union would waive the initiation fee if they signed authorization cards before the election. In the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Savair Mfg. Co., 414 U.S. 270, 94 S.Ct. 495, 38 L.Ed.2d 495 (1973), the Court stated that a bargaining order would not be enforced if the Union lured employees by telling them that only those who signed cards before an election would have their initiation fees waived. The record on this matter supports the conclusion that Union representative Conyers never told these employees that only if they signed before an election would the initiation fee be waived.

What is the Effect of Post Violation Occurrences on the Bargaining Order?

Six of the twelve employees who signed authorization cards sent a letter on September 2, 1977 to respondent, the Union and the Regional Director in which they retracted their desire to have the Union represent them in collective bargaining. The Board considered this letter to be of no significance in contemplating the bargaining order remedy. Respondent maintains that a bargaining order under these facts would be contrary to the § 7 rights of the current employees. The Board found that this employee retrenchment was a product of Wilhow's unlawful conduct and is not entitled to credence. This circuit has had this question before it in the past and concurs with the Board's views. NLRB v. Wylie Manufacturing Co., 417 F.2d 192, 195 (10th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 397 U.S. 913, 90 S.Ct. 915, 25 L.Ed.2d 94 (1970).

Wilhow finds fault with the bargaining order on another ground, to-wit: the order serves no purpose and injures the § 7 rights of the current employees when out of the twelve employees signing cards only one is presently employed.

The issue of employee turnover in determining whether to enforce a bargaining order is a question of timing—whether this court will look to the nature of the work force after a majority of employees in the bargaining unit have given the Union their support. The Board's position has been that employee turnover does not warrant withholding a bargaining order; the validity of such an order depends on evaluating the situation as of the time of the unfair labor practices.[27] The court in Gissel indicated that a bargaining order remains an appropriate remedy even when the Union has not been able to maintain its majority status. 395 U.S. at 610, 89 S.Ct. at 1938. See NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 748, n. 16, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 1114, n.16, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962); Franks Brothers Co. v. NLRB, 321 U.S. 702, 64 S.Ct. 817, 88 L.Ed. 1020 (1944).[28] An unlawful termination of an employee under § 8(a)(3) may raise a question in determining whether a fair election can be held. In NLRB v. Jamaica Towing Co., 632 F.2d 208, 214 (2nd Cir. 1980), the court stated that "employee turnover and lapse of time may * * * become major factors in close cases." Unlike the case that is cited, the § 8(a)(3) violations that Wilhow is guilty of do not make for the type of close case contemplated by the Second Circuit.

Is a Bargaining Order Proper on the Facts in this Case?

It is unquestioned that respondent refused to bargain with Local 322 when it received the Union's letter of May 6th. We have upheld the Administrative Law Judge's determination that as of May 7th a majority of grocery department employees supported the Union's effort. Accordingly, Wilhow's actions in refusing to bargain violated § 8(a)(5).

Several courts, however, have struck the balance between the deterrent effect of a bargaining order and the wishes of the current employees on the side of those employees. Peoples Gas System, Inc. v. NLRB, 629 F.2d 35 (D.C.Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Peninsula Association for Retarded Children and Adults, 627 F.2d 202 (9th Cir. 1980). Both of these cases are distinguishable on their facts from the case before us. It is significant that in neither of these decisions was there a § 8(a)(3) violation as is present here.

We have upheld violations of § 8(a)(1)(3) and (5) in this matter and consider the appropriateness of a bargaining order on respondent. The Supreme Court's view in Gissel was that there must be a showing that at one point the Union had a majority and the Board must determine > the extensiveness of employer's unfair practices in terms of their past effect on election conditions and the likelihood of their recurrence in the future. If the Board finds that the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election by the use of traditional remedies, though present, is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order, then such an order should issue.

395 U.S. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940.

In reviewing the present record it is noted that the Administrative Law Judge considered the possibility of erasing the effects of the violative actions and of ensuring a fair election in making his remedial order. This is not a case like NLRB v. Miller Trucking Service, 445 F.2d 927 (10th Cir. 1971), where the Board made no specific findings on the "extensiveness of the employer's unfair practices in terms of their past effect on election conditions and the likelihood of their recurrence in the future."

However the behavior of the respondents here comes within the second category described in Gissel where there are less extraordinary and less persuasive practices than are sometimes found but still warrant a bargaining order under the Board's discretion. The unfair practices here might seem a close question to some but we cannot substitute our judgment for that of the Board. We recognize that a small plant is involved here and this helps tip the balance. Ann Lee Sportswear, Inc. v. NLRB, 543 F.2d 739, 743–44 (10th Cir. 1976). Certainly the individuals involved in this case were adamant in their attitude toward bargaining and they showed no indication to comply with the law. This to us is additional reason for upholding the order that was issued.

The Second Circuit in Jamaica Towing spoke of bargaining orders based on "hallmark violations," that is to say those practices which are highly coercive and which will support a bargaining order. The loss of employment due to union activity is such a hallmark violation, which has a residual effect on employees and taints the possibility of a free election. 632 F.2d at 212–13; see also, Coating Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 648 F.2d 108 (2nd Cir. 1981). The firing of Karlinger and Mogle lends support to the potentially lingering effects of the respondent's behavior and the difficulty of having a fair election.

There are two other brief points which have been raised by Wilhow. It is contended that the hearing examiner's failure to sequester Karlinger and Mogle during the hearing constituted reversible error. The answer to this is that the Administrative Law Judge has authority to sequester witnesses. The fact that he did not is not necessarily reversible error, where apart from the testimony of the unsequestered witnesses the hearing examiner is on solid ground in his credibility findings.[29]

Wilhow has also complained that the Administrative Law Judge was prejudiced and biased against Wilhow in his handling of the case. The Board found no evidence of this and neither do we. This claim is prompted by the fact that the Judge found the employees to be more credible witnesses. This claim will not support overturning these findings.[30]

The order of the National Labor Relations Board should be and the same will be enforced.

On petition to review Board Order

Before HEANEY and MCMILLIAN, Circuit Judges, and BENSON,* Chief Judge

---

*The Honorable Paul Benson, Chief Judge, United States District Court for the District of North Dakota, sitting by designation.

304

HEANEY, Circuit Judge: This matter is before the Court on the petition of the Rockingham Machine-Lunex Company to review and set aside a decision and order of the National Labor Relations Board. The Board has cross-applied for enforcement of its order. It found that Rockingham had violated Sections 8(a)(1), (3) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. The Board's decision and order is reported at 255 N.L.R.B. 15 (1981).

Rockingham contends that the Board's decision denies the company due process. Initially, Rockingham argues that the administrative law judge (ALJ) used evidence for purposes other than those for which it was admitted. It asserts that the ALJ relied on a transcript of negotiation sessions in finding that the company had refused to bargain in good faith despite his earlier ruling that the evidence would not be used for that purpose. The Board agreed in part with this assertion. It stated:

> At the hearing, the Administrative Law Judge ruled that the unauthenticated transcripts of the post-strike negotiation meetings were hearsay evidence but admissible for the limited purpose of showing the "essence" of what occurred at those negotiations. In his Decision, however, the Administrative Law Judge relied on the transcripts to establish the truth of the matters asserted in the transcripts. Notwithstanding his misplaced reliance on the transcripts, the record shows that the facts concerning those meetings were established by Respondent's authenticated notes concerning the meetings.

We agree with the Board's assessment and add that there is other evidence in the record that is more than sufficient to support the Board's findings, particularly the testimony of the company's chief negotiator, James Hodges.

Rockingham also points out that the ALJ ruled that evidence of an employee discharge by the company occurring outside the Section 10(b) statute of limitations period would be admitted solely for "background" purposes. Rockingham argues that despite this ruling, the ALJ subsequently relied on that "background" evidence to find that the company committed unfair labor practices. We agree that the ALJ's reliance was improper. Nevertheless, we are again convinced that the other evidence in the record is sufficient to support the Board's findings.

Rockingham next contends that the ALJ and Board failed to mention or apply the adverse inference rule in violation of the company's due process rights. The rule provides that when a party has relevant evidence within its control which it fails to produce, that failure gives rise to an inference that the evidence is unfavorable to the party. International Union, United Auto Workers v. N.L.R.B., 459 F.2d 1329, 1336 (D.C.Cir.1972).

Rockingham argues that the General Counsel's failure to call as a witness union spokesperson Peter Kuchirka, who attended every negotiation session and filed the refusal to bargain in good faith charge, creates an inference that his testimony, presumably on the refusal to bargain issue, would be unfavorable to the union.

The adverse inference rule is an important one that should be applied by the Board whenever it is appropriate. E. g., Golden State Bottling Co. v. N.L.R.B., 414 U.S. 168, 174, 94 S.Ct. 414, 420, 38 L.Ed.2d 388 (1973); International Union, United Auto Workers v. N.L.R.B., supra, 459 F.2d at 1347. Rockingham, however, would expand the adverse inference rule to require that the failure to call Kuchirka obligates the Board to resolve all issues with respect to which he may have testified against the union. We do not believe that the rule reaches that far. The rule permits an adverse inference to be drawn; it does not create a conclusive presumption against the party failing to call the witness. See McCormick, Evidence, § 272, at 656–662 (2d ed. 1972). If we accepted Rockingham's interpretation of the rule, the Board would have to call every witness on every conceivable issue relevant to establishing an unfair labor practice. This obviously is unnecessary.

Here, the Board called as its principal witness Hodges, who testified at length as to precisely what took place at the bargaining sessions. He testified in substance that Rockingham rescinded or modified over a dozen provisions to which the parties previously had agreed, offered only minimal concessions to the union, and had a predetermined intention not to reach agreement on dues checkoff—a mandatory subject of bargaining. On this record, even if we draw an inference unfavorable to the union from Kuchirka's failure to testify and draw every favorable inference to the company that can be drawn from Hodges' testimony, Hodges' testimony, together with the undisputed evidence, is sufficient to justify the Board's finding that the company violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to bargain in good faith.

Finally, Rockingham argues that apart from its due process challenges, the Board's decision must be set aside as to each of the unfair labor practices found because it is not otherwise supported by substantial evidence. We disagree. We have carefully reviewed the record and briefs, and find that there is substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the Board's order as to each unfair labor practice.

Rockingham's petition to set aside the order is denied, and the Board's cross-application for enforcement is granted.

Classic Industries, Inc. v. NLRB

667 F.2d 205 (1st Cir.), December 10, 1981—254 NLRB 1149

On petition to review Board Order

Before CAMPBELL and BOWNES, Circuit Judges, and BONSAL,* Senior District Judge

205

LEVIN H. CAMPBELL, Circuit Judge: Classic Industries, Inc., ("Classic") petitions for review of the decision of the National Labor Relations Board finding it in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and 8(a)(2) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (2),[1] and ordering it to withdraw recognition from and disestablish an illegally dominated union, the Shop Committee. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order.

In its decision, the Board mainly affirmed the findings, rulings and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ), and adopted his recommended order. In the following statement of facts, we follow the findings of the ALJ unless otherwise noted. Contrary to Classic's contentions, we believe the ALJ's findings are supported by substantial evidence in the record, and we therefore accept them as, in such event, we must. 29 U.S.C. § 160(f).

Classic Industries, Inc., is a Pennsylvania corporation with its principal offices in Latrobe, Pennsylvania.[2] The company makes and sells custom plastic moldings and employs some 50–60 employees in production and maintenance work. Most of the relevant events took place in the Latrobe plant, which was non-unionized during the spring and summer of 1978.

In late March or early April of 1978, the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers ("the Union") began organizing activities at the Latrobe plant.[3] At an employee meeting held at about this time or soon thereafter, the vice-president and co-founder of Classic, Joe Policastro, reportedly said that he had "heard rumors about a union being started" and that he was opposed to such a development, preferring, he said, to work with the employees directly rather than with "outsiders."[4]

On April 11 or 12, foreman John Huston, whom the ALJ found, with record support, to be acting in this regard as an agent of the Company, distributed ballots during work hours to the employees working under him. These ballots listed the names of everyone on the shift. Huston instructed the employees to check the names of two co-workers and explained that the two receiving the most votes would be representatives on a new employee committee. Other employees in the plant received similar ballots. This process was repeated the next day after it was discovered that some of the ballots were missing names. The record is uncontradicted that Policastro instructed his secretary to draw up, type and copy both the original and the corrected ballots and that he initiated their actual distribution.[5]

[1] Section 8(a)(1) of the Act provides:

[2] Classic has alleged and the Board admits in its brief that Classic "does business" within this circuit. Jurisdiction in this court is therefore proper. 29 U.S.C. § 160(f).

[3] There is evidence that employee Laura Stewart contacted the Union and that the first organizing meeting took place at her house. At that meeting she and a number of other employees signed Union authorization cards. This was around the beginning of April. The Union was meeting with employees in April and May, but did not communicate with management until the end of May.

[4] Mr. Policastro denied having said this then. He testified that the first time he knew the Union was organizing his plant was on May 30, 1978, when he received a letter from the Union claiming majority status and demanding recognition. The ALJ did not credit Policastro's testimony in this regard, crediting instead the conflicting testimony of an employee. We have read the entire record and considered the Company's various arguments against acceptance of the ALJ's credibility determination. We conclude that the ALJ's choice is supported and not unreasonable; it must therefore stand. NLRB v. Pearl Bookbinding Co., 517 F.2d 1108, 1112 (1st Cir. 1975).

One or two days after the election, foreman Huston asked employee Laura Stewart to leave her machine during her regular working time and go upstairs to the Company's conference room to help count the ballots. There she joined another employee, Policastro's secretary and Policastro himself and proceeded to tally the vote. Policastro did not actually count ballots, but he stated that he was in the conference room for about half an hour while the 50–60 ballots were counted. The election resulted in employees Stewart, Giesey, Keefe, Nicholson, Poole, Pratt, and Rudy being made the members of what came to be known as the Shop Committee. Four other employees were designated as alternates.

The Shop Committee met on six occasions between the election and June 9. It never met on its own initiative, but rather each meeting was apparently called by Policastro. Vice-president Policastro was present at every meeting, and he opened, closed and guided the discussion at most, if not all of them. He continued to meet and discuss various employee grievances with the Shop Committee even after he had received formal notice from the Union that they claimed to represent a majority of his employees. At the penultimate meeting on June 8, he urged the Shop Committee to intervene in the upcoming representation election and passed out typed ballots, produced prior to the meeting by the Company, which listed the names of all 11 Shop Committee members and alternates. He also offered the use of the Company lawyer if the Shop Committee decided to intervene.

Not surprisingly,[6] the Shop Committee balked at this suggestion and requested a day to poll their constituents. The next day they returned and voted 7–4 against intervening in the Union election. There is testimony that Policastro looked "really rejected" when the Shop Committee informed him of the result and that Policastro sought to speak with the four dissenting members of the Committee immediately after the vote, though in his testimony he denied this.

This vote marked the end of the Shop Committee as it was originally constituted. With Policastro's assistance and encouragement, however, the Shop Committee was resurrected around a nucleus of Rosemary Poole, a pro-intervention member of the original Shop Committee, and Kathy Amond, one of Poole's co-workers in the inspection department. When Poole asked Policastro what could be done to counter the Union, Policastro encouraged Poole to find out how the Shop Committee could get on the NLRB ballot,[7] allowed her to make long distance calls at Company expense to get this information, and prodded her to follow up on her first inquiries. These efforts eventually resulted in the Shop Committee's being included on the ballot for the July 20 representational election.

During the period between the dissolution of the original Shop Committee and the election on July 20, several events took place which the Board found to be violations of section 8(a)(1) and which tainted the election. These incidents also support the Board's finding that the Shop Committee was illegally dominated.

First, Policastro campaigned actively for the Shop Committee and against the Union. The ALJ found, with record support, that Policastro stated that the Company "would go bankrupt" if the Union were elected, that layoffs might result, and that another closely related company had suffered a shutdown due to high union wages. He also stated, falsely it could be found, that the Union would charge a $100 initiation fee for each employee if it won the election. At the same time, he said that the Shop Committee could use the Company lawyer if it won, reiterated his preference for working with the employees directly rather than with "outsiders," and granted Rosemary Poole permission to speak to the workers in the plant on behalf of the Shop Committee during her working time.

[5] Policastro testifies that he performed these services at the behest of several employees. Classic failed to produce a single employee witness who would corroborate this important point, however. We think the ALJ was justified in drawing a negative inference, as he expressly did, from this absence of corroboration, and could reasonably conclude, on all the evidence, that Policastro acted on his own initiative. Liberty Mutual Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 592 F.2d 595, 601–02 (1st Cir. 1979).

[6] At least one of the Shop Committee members—notably Laura Stewart—was a Union activist. The results of the vote on the intervention question also suggests that a majority of the Shop Committee favored the Union at this time.

[7] The evidence showed that Poole was active in resurrecting the Shop Committee as well as Policastro. The record as a whole supports the conclusion, however, that the two worked very closely together in all phases of the job and that Policastro initiated actions and ideas on behalf of the Shop Committee when Poole did not. He also supported every action she took.

During this period, Policastro discriminated in favor of the Shop Committee in matters regarding employee discipline and grievances. On July 5, Policastro issued a warning slip to Laura Stewart for defective work and misconduct. Both Poole and Amond (the only active members of the Shop Committee) were present at the meeting where this occurred; they were shown material from Stewart's personnel file; and they were permitted to act in a mediating role both before and during this incident. There was testimony that Policastro even introduced Poole and Amond as being involved in the Stewart matter on behalf of the Shop Committee.

The election which followed all these events was close. The initial tally disclosed 24 employees for the Shop Committee and 24 for the Union. Four ballots were contested. After investigation, the final vote came to 28–24 in favor of the Shop Committee. Shortly after the election, Policastro suggested to Poole that she tell the employees the Shop Committee was active. With Policastro's permission and encouragement, she posted a notice to that effect on the Company bulletin board.

On January 19, 1979, the regional director of the Board notified Classic that he was withholding certification of the Shop Committee pending a final determination of an alleged section 8(a)(2) complaint filed by the Union. Notwithstanding, Policastro proceeded to negotiate and sign a rather comprehensive collective bargaining agreement with the Shop Committee which recognized the Shop Committee as the "sole bargaining agency" for all production and maintenance workers at the plant. This agreement took effect on April 16, 1979—only two weeks before the hearing on the section 8(a)(2) charge in this case took place. At no time during the period at issue here, however—either before or after the July 20 election, and continuing through the hearing in this case—did the Shop Committee have a constitution, bylaws, rules, elected officers, a dues system, or any formal structure whatever. Indeed, as of May 3, 1979, the Shop Committee had never received funds from any source.

We think the ALJ and Board were entitled to infer from the foregoing that the Shop Committee was illegally dominated. True, when the resurrected Shop Committee came to negotiate the collective bargaining agreement, it appears to have stood up to the Company and won some concessions. But this enhanced activity took place in the shadow of a serious unfair labor practice proceeding, when it was in the Company's interest to make it appear that the Shop Committee was genuinely independent. In these circumstances we do not believe the Board had to treat the semblance of arm's length bargaining as truly indicative that the Shop Committee was free from employer influence.

We therefore have little hesitation in holding that this record supports the Board's conclusion that the Shop Committee was an illegally dominated labor organization. The record fairly supports the conclusion that Policastro initiated the Shop Committee as an in-house labor organization, the purpose of which was to head off a union-organizing drive. He opened, closed and generally directed the Shop Committee meetings. He thereafter encouraged its growth and success by affording it material support and by discriminating in its favor during the election contest with the rival Union. He negotiated with the Shop Committee after the election while on notice that certification was in doubt. Finally, throughout the entire period at issue here, the allegedly independent Shop Committee had none of the indicia of independence (such as bylaws, rules for electing members, dues, a constitution, or independent sources of income) which mark truly autonomous organizations. The caselaw indicates that such a factual pattern denotes more than mere support; it warrants a finding of actual domination. NLRB v. Clapper's Manufacturing, Inc., 458 F.2d 414, 418 (3d Cir. 1972); NLRB v. Reed Rolled Thread Die Co., 432 F.2d 70 (1st Cir. 1970); NLRB v. Dennison Manufacturing Co., 419 F.2d 1080 (1st Cir. 1969).

Our decision in NLRB v. Northeastern University, 601 F.2d 1208 (1st Cir. 1979), to which Classic repeatedly refers, does not require a different result. In Northeastern University we reversed a Board finding of domination on the grounds that there was no evidence the employer had "actually" dominated a well-established university labor group which the ALJ had found to be an "effective" labor organization. Here there was substantial evidence of actual domination, and no finding, or evidence that would require a finding, of effectiveness. It is true that, in a given case, elements of domination such as assistance in election procedures, limited use of Company resources, and even the fact that the employer encourages establishment of the organization in the first instance, "does not a domination case make," id., at 1214. But when, as here, all these factors and more are found in a single case, the Board may properly find domination. NLRB v. Vernitron Electrical Components, Inc., 548 F.2d 24, 26 (1st Cir. 1977).

We have considered all of Classic's other factual and legal arguments and find them to be without merit.

The order of the Board will be enforced. The petition for review is denied.

Consolidated Freightways v. NLRB

669 F.2d 700 (D.C. Cir.), December 11, 1981—253 NLRB 988

On petition to review Board Order

Before Bazelon, Senior Circuit Judge, and Wilkey and Wald, Circuit Judges

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge Wald

791

Wald, Circuit Judge: Petitioner, Consolidated Freightways ("Consolidated"), seeks review of a decision of the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB" or "Board"), 253 N.L.R.B. No. 137 (1981), ordering it to reinstate a former employee, Charles Hennessey, with full backpay. Because we find that the Board failed to address petitioner's argument that Hennessey's refusal of a prior reinstatement offer tolled petitioner's backpay liability, we remand for further proceedings.

I. Factual Background

Consolidated discharged Hennessey on March 22, 1979, after Hennessey refused to drive a tractor with faulty lights. Hennessey filed a grievance challenging his discharge. His case was brought before the Joint State Committee ("Committee"), an arbitration committee composed of three members of the union and three representatives of the trucking industry.[1] On May 1, 1979, the Committee ordered that Hennessey be reinstated with full seniority and health and welfare benefits, but with a final warning letter and no backpay. Consolidated proceeded to put Hennessey back on "the board" for work. Joint Appendix ("J.A.") 15. Hennessey, however, did not return to work, explaining to a supervisor that he would not return without backpay, Record ("R.") 61.[2]

792

On July 11, 1979, Hennessey filed a charge with the NLRB asserting that he had been discharged for protected concerted activities in violation of section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). The Administrative Law Judge (ALJ) refused to defer to the Committee's award,[3] noting that the award "required

---

[1] The parties to this action stipulated that the "entire grievance and arbitration procedure was fair and regular in all respects." Joint Appendix (J.A.) 15.

[2] This explanation came several days after Hennessey was told that he had his job back. According to the ALJ's findings, the union steward spoke to Hennessey immediately after the arbitrator rendered its decision, explaining that he could probably resume work that same night. J.A. 15; see Record ("R.") at 187. Hennessey's testimony, however, indicates that he was somewhat confused about when he could return to work. Although he received two phone calls to return to work between May 1, 1979, the date of the arbitrator's award, and May 4, 1979, Hennessey testified that he expected to receive "something in writing stating [that he] had been reinstated." R. 61. When the Operations Manager, Charles Schmalz, phoned Hennessey on May 4 to ask him if he was planning to return to work, this confusion was cleared up. But when asked whether he would resume work, Hennessey stated that he would not, explaining that "under the conditions that I didn't get the money that I deserved * * * I didn't see that I could come back to work." R. 61. Hennessey testified that he then agreed to send in a letter of resignation, but never did so. R. 61. Consolidated subsequently sent Hennessey a letter acknowledging his resignation, to which Hennessey did not respond. R. 262.

[3] The Board's policy of deference to arbitration awards was announced in Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 N.L.R.B. 1080 (1955). Under Spielberg, deference to arbitration awards is justified if three criteria are satisfied: (1) fair and regular arbitral proceedings; (2) the parties agree to be bound by the arbitral award; and (3) the award is not clearly repugnant to the National Labor Relations Act. We have added a fourth requirement: that the statutory issue be congruent with the contractual issue, so that a resolution of one is a resolution of both. See Banyard v. N.L.R.B., 505 F.2d 342, 348 (D.C.Cir.1974).

Hennessey to be reinstated but in effect to be under the gun of a warning letter." J.A. 15. Although the ALJ made no specific findings regarding the effect of a warning letter, his conclusion appears to be based on the terms of the labor agreement between Consolidated and Local Union No. 710 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America. That agreement provides that no employee may be discharged or suspended before receiving at least one warning notice regarding the particular complaint against him. See Exhibit 6C-5 at 79-80. The ALJ concluded that a reinstatement offer conditioned on receipt of such a letter failed to remedy the alleged unfair labor practice and that, consequently, the Board need not defer to the arbitrator's award.[4]

On the substantive merits of Hennessey's charge, the ALJ found that Hennessey's refusal to drive the tractor was based on a reasonable belief that to do otherwise would be unsafe under legislatively approved safety standards. Despite the fact that Hennessey was acting alone, the ALJ concluded that absent any evidence that other employees disavowed Hennessey's actions, Hennessey's conduct constituted protected concerted activity,[5] J.A. 13, and his discharge was therefore a violation of § 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). J.A. 16. As a remedy, the ALJ ordered that Hennessey be reinstated with full backpay up to the date of a valid offer of reinstatement. J.A. 13. Consolidated appealed to the Board, arguing that its offer of reinstatement following the arbitrator's award tolled its backpay liability and discharged its obligation to offer Hennessey reinstatement. The Board sustained the ALJ's order.[6]

II. Analysis

Consolidated does not challenge the Board's finding that it violated § 8(a)(1) by discharging Hennessey, Brief for Petitioner 25; nor does it challenge the Board's refusal to defer to the arbitrator's award. Id. Instead, Consolidated argues that by offering Hennessey reinstatement in accordance with the terms of the arbitrator's decision it discharged its legal obligation and stopped the accumulation of backpay liability. In addition, Consolidated argues that since Hennessey refused reinstatement for an admittedly invalid reason (the denial of backpay), Hennessey is entitled to neither a second offer of reinstatement nor backpay which might otherwise have accrued after that refusal. In response, the Board argues that Consolidated's offer of reinstatement was invalid because it was conditioned on accepting a final warning letter. Such a letter, it contends, would have subjected Hennessey to continued discrimination for exercising protected rights. Since this offer was invalid, the Board further argues that there is no need to inquire into Hennessey's reasons for refusing to accept it. Finally, the Board contends that the question whether Hennessey refused reinstatement for invalid reasons was not raised before the Board and therefore cannot be raised on appeal.

A. The Issues Before the Board

As an initial matter, we must consider whether Consolidated's argument that Hennessey improperly refused reinstatement is barred by section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). Section 10(e) provides that:

> No objection that has not been urged before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances.

29 U.S.C. § 160(e). This section furthers "the salutary policy * * * of affording the Board opportunity to consider on the merits questions to be urged

[4] The ALJ suggested that his decision not to defer to the arbitrator's award was based, in part, on its failure to include backpay. J.A. 15. On appeal, the Board agreed that the warning letter placed an invalid condition on reinstatement, but reaffirmed its previous holding that an offer of reinstatement is valid even if it fails to include backpay. J.A. 21. Since we find that the Board should have considered Hennessey's reasons for rejecting Consolidated's offer, we do not reach the question whether the offer was in fact conditional.

[5] Consolidated suggests that our recent decision in Kohls v. N.L.R.B., 629 F.2d 173 (D.C.Cir.1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 931, 101 S.Ct. 1390, 67 L.Ed.2d 363 (1981), draws into question the ALJ's determination that Hennessey was engaged in protected concerted activity. Since Consolidated did not take exception to this determination in its appeal to the Board, this question is not before us. See 29 U.S.C. § 160(e).

on review of its order." Marshall Field & Co. v. N.L.R.B., 318 U.S. 253, 256, 63 S.Ct. 585, 586, 87 L.Ed. 744 (1943). Cases interpreting section 10(e) look to whether a party's exceptions are sufficiently specific to apprise the Board that an issue might be pursued on appeal. Thus, a generalized objection to " 'each and every recommendation' " of an ALJ lacks the particularity needed to preserve objections to the Board's decisions. Id. at 255, 63 S.Ct. at 586; see also N.L.R.B. v. Seven Up Bottling Co., 344 U.S. 344, 350, 73 S.Ct. 287, 290, 97 L.Ed. 377 (1953) (objection to trial examiner's recommendation as unsupported by evidence and contrary to law does not provide adequate notice). Similarly, a party who has limited his objections before the Board to one issue will not be allowed to raise a different issue on appeal. See Dallas General Drivers v. N.L.R.B., 389 F.2d 553, 555 (D.C.Cir.1968) (union could not attack standard by which trial examiner determined whether to order reinstatement when objections before the Board were limited to issue of whether employees had been discharged discriminatorily). But when the issues implicated by an imprecisely drafted objection are made evident by the context in which it is raised, section 10(e) does not shield the Board's resolution of those issues from review. See May Department Stores Co. v. N.L.R.B., 326 U.S. 376, 386 n.5, 66 S.Ct. 203, 209, 90 L.Ed. 145 (1945) (vague exception to paragraph including cease and desist order as "not supported or justified by the record" sufficient to preserve issue of the proper scope of that order); N.L.R.B. v. Blake Construction Co., 663 F.2d 272 (D.C.Cir. 1981) (objections regarding scope of complaint, substantiality of proof and ALJ's conduct of proceeding adequate to preserve due process objections); Florence Printing Co. v. N.L.R.B., 376 F.2d 216, 222 (4th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 840, 88 S.Ct. 68, 19 L.Ed.2d 104 (1967) (objection to sufficiency of proof preserved objection to placement of the burden of proof). In each case, the critical inquiry is whether the objections made before the Board were adequate to put the Board on notice that the issue might be pursued on appeal.[7]

In this case, we find that Consolidated's objections before the Board were sufficient to permit it to argue on appeal that Hennessey's improper grounds for refusing reinstatement relieved Consolidated of any obligation to make a subsequent reinstatement offer and, correlatively, tolled Consolidated's backpay liability. In its exceptions to the ALJ's recommendations, Consolidated specifically objected to his failure to find "[t]hat the Charging Party refused the May 1, 1979 offer of reinstatement because it did not include an offer of backpay. * * *" Respondent's Exceptions to the Decision and Recommended Order of Administrative Law Judge Dated July 30, 1980 (emphasis added). In addition, Consolidated discussed Hennessey's grounds for refusing the reinstatement offer in its brief to the Board. It argued that "the fact that the warning letter did not enter into Hennessey's mind when he rejected [Consolidated's] unconditional offer of reinstatement" was "of great significance," and that it was "anomalous" for the ALJ to "void an otherwise valid offer of reinstatement because of what he perceived as a 'condition' to reinstatement when that alleged 'condition' (the letter) never entered the mind of the Charging Party when he rejected the offer." See Respondent's Brief in Support of its Exceptions to the Decision and Recommended Order of the Administrative Law Judge dated July 30, 1980 16–17.

The Board argues that this discussion was insufficient to satisfy section 10(e) because it appeared as part of Consolidated's argument that its offer was unconditional and was not accompanied by citations to any of the authorities that Consolidated is relying on in this appeal. Brief for Respondent 23.

[7] The close factual inquiry required by this standard is illustrated by our decision in Burinskas v. N.L.R.B., 357 F.2d 822 (D.C.Cir.1966). The Board, following remand from this court, had set aside an earlier order and adopted the trial examiner's original recommendations. These recommendations included ordering the employer to reinstate discharged employees with full backpay. The employer then appealed to this court, arguing that its backpay liability should be tolled for the time between the Board's two decisions. The Board countered by arguing, inter alia, that the employer had failed to make such a tolling argument before the Board, and was therefore barred from so arguing on appeal. In rejecting the Board's argument, this court first noted that the employer had objected to "the remedy" proposed by the trial examiner in its original objections to the Board. We then turned to the setting in which the Board approved that remedy and observed that there were a number of then recent Board decisions regarding the propriety of tolling backpay liability between inconsistent Board decisions. Finally, we concluded that it was "more likely than not that the Board, with its expert sensitivities alerted by some considerable past familiarity with the tolling issue in this context of a change in litigating fortunes took [the] more limited [backpay] objection to be comprehended within the broader exception." Id. at 825. We also noted that the Board's compliance officer had addressed the tolling question in a letter to the employer following the Board's second decision. Id. at 825–26.

The General Counsel's own brief, however, set the issue of Hennessey's grounds for refusal in the proper context. The General Counsel argued that "the fact that Hennessey declined the offer [should not] relieve [Consolidated] of its obligation to tender a valid offer of reinstatement." Answering Brief in Response to Respondent's Exceptions to the Decision and Recommended Order of Administrative Law Judge Dated July 30, 1980 6–7. He then proceeded to quote a recent Board opinion in which the Board ruled that an employer who had been ordered to reinstate certain employees was not excused from that order by letters from these employees " 'to the effect that they did not wish to return to [his] employ.' " Id. at 7 (quoting Leroy W. Craw, 224 N.L.R.B. 241, 242 (1979), enf'd, 622 F.2d 579 (3d Cir. 1980)). In addition, the question whether Hennessey's grounds for refusing Consolidated's offer have any independent legal significance was addressed by the ALJ who stated that:

> Having discharged Hennessey for unlawful reasons, it was and is Respondent's responsibility to remedy the unfair labor practices. The facts indicate that Hennessey made statements indicating that his reason for not going back to work was the lack of backpay in the award. Respondent's liability to reinstate Hennessey, however, continues until a proper offer of reinstatement is made.

J.A. 16. In the light of both Consolidated's emphasis on the significance of Hennessey's grounds for refusing Consolidated's offer, and the ALJ and General Counsel's arguments that those grounds were of no importance to the disposition of this case, we find that the Board had adequate notice of the issue raised here on appeal.

B. Hennessey's Refusal of Consolidated's Offer

Although the question whether Hennessey improperly refused an offer of reinstatement was before the Board, the Board did not address that question in its opinion, relying instead on the findings and conclusions of the ALJ.[8] The ALJ, however, had simply assumed that Hennessey's reasons for refusing Consolidated's offer were irrelevant to the determination of Consolidated's backpay liability. Consolidated argues that this assumption is not in keeping with Board precedent and that by failing to distinguish or overrule cases that require an inquiry into an employee's grounds for refusing reinstatement, the Board has acted arbitrarily. Because we find that the Board's policy as to unjustified refusals of reinstatement offers remains unexplained, we remand this issue to the Board to reconsider its opinion.

In stating that Hennessey's reasons for not going back to work were of no importance, the ALJ failed to take account of Board precedent that emphasizes the actual reasons why an employee refuses an offer of reinstatement even when the validity of the offer itself is challenged. In Research Designing Service, Inc., 141 N.L.R.B. 211 (1963), for example, an employee who had been unlawfully discharged refused an offer of reinstatement because of the possibility of being laid off once again. Id. at 224. The trial examiner nonetheless ordered that the employee be reinstated with full backpay since, had he accepted the offer of reinstatement, he would not have been returned to his former status but would rather have been treated as a new employee for seniority and vacation pay purposes. Id. at 230. In reversing this ruling, the Board stressed that the employee "refused the offer of reinstatement for other reasons." Id. at 216 (emphasis in original). The Board therefore ruled that the employer's liability for backpay was tolled by the discharged employee's refusal of an offer of reinstatement.[9] Similarly, in L. Ronney & Sons Furniture Manufacturing Co., 97 N.L.R.B. 891 (1951), enf'd as modified, 206 F.2d 730 (9th Cir. 1953), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 937, 74 S.Ct. 377, 98 L.Ed. 425 (1954), the Board tolled an employer's back pay liability for a discharged employee who refused reinstatement because she was working at another job.[10] The Board noted that the reinstatement

[8] See p. 9 supra.

[9] The Board also reversed the trial examiner's order with regard to another employee who had refused reinstatement because "he was working longer hours and making more money at his current job." Research Designing Service, Inc., 141 N.L.R.B. at 216. The trial examiner had not made any specific findings regarding the latter employee's reasons for refusing reinstatement.

[10] With regard to another employee, the Board in L. Ronney found that there was sufficient evidence that he would have accepted the employer's offer had it not been conditional. L. Ronney & Sons Furniture Mfg. Co., 97 N.L.R.B. at 893. In support of this ruling, the Board emphasized the offer was invalid because it was subject to an illegal union-security provision. It nonetheless tolled the employer's backpay liability because it "appear[ed] that [the discharged employee] would not have accepted [the employer's] offer, even had it been unconditional." Id. at 892. Other cases pursue this same inquiry into the reasons why a discharged employee rejected an offer of employment, holding that an employer's backpay liability is tolled when an employee rejects an offer of reinstatement without knowledge of the conditionality of the offer. See, e.g., Hribar Trucking, Inc., 166 N.L.R.B. 745, 756 n.19 (1967), modified on other grounds, 406 F.2d 854 (7th Cir. 1969); Eastern Die Co., 142 N.L.R.B. 601, 604 (1963), enf'd, 340 F.2d 607 (1st Cir. 1965), cert. denied, 381 U.S. 951, 85 S.Ct. 1804, 14 L.Ed.2d 724 (1965); Ekco Products Co., 117 N.L.R.B. 137, 150 (1957).[11] In each case, the issue is whether the evidence clearly establishes that the employee would have turned down the offer of reinstatement even if it had not contained the invalid condition. See, e.g., Atlantic Maintenance Co., 134 N.L.R.B. 1328, 1329 (1961), enf'd, 305 F.2d 604 (3d Cir. 1962); id. at 1329 n.1 (Member Rodgers, dissenting).

In ignoring the issue of Hennessey's reasons for declining Consolidated's offer, the Board may have relied on a recent case cited in the General Counsel's brief. Brief to the National Labor Relations Board In Answer To Respondent's Exceptions Thereto 7. The question in Leroy W. Craw, 244 N.L.R.B. 241 (1979), enf'd, 622 F.2d 579 (3d Cir. 1980) was whether a conditional reinstatement offer should be deemed to comply with an order of the Board[12] to reinstate employees who had engaged in an unfair labor practice strike when the employees either failed to respond to the offer or refused it for other reasons. The employer had sent out letters offering striking employees reinstatement, but indicating that returning employees would be subject to physical examinations and would only be paid at a substantially equivalent rate to the one they had originally earned. The Board found that both of these conditions were invalid—the physical examinations because they treated returning employees as new employees; and the rate of pay because it failed to include increases in wages that the employees would have received had the employer accepted their offers to return to work at the end of the strike. Id. at 242. After determining that the employer's offers of reinstatement were inadequate, the ALJ proceeded to consider whether the employer's backpay liability should be tolled in the case of employees who rejected those offers. He concluded that backpay was not tolled, stating that: "[the discharged employees'] replies to the effect that they did not wish to return to Respondent's employ do not obviate the need for Respondent to extend to them an unconditional offer of reinstatement, nor do their replies terminate their backpay periods."[13]

Although Leroy W. Craw could signal a change of Board policy abandoning any inquiry into the reasons why a conditional offer is refused, the case might also be reconcilable with earlier Board precedent. The offer in Leroy W. Craw plainly stated its invalid conditions and employees who rejected that offer because they had procured "better jobs" might well have gone back to the company if faced with a valid offer. Thus, the ALJ's conclu-employee's "express awareness of the conditional nature of the * * * reinstatement offer." On appeal, the Ninth Circuit found that this portion of the Board's order was not supported by substantial evidence. N.L.R.B. v. L. Ronney & Sons Furniture Mfg. Co., 206 F.2d 730, 737–38 (9th Cir. 1953), cert. denied, 346 U.S. 937, 74 S.Ct. 377, 98 L.Ed. 425 (1954). Concluding that the "evidence as a whole is inconsistent with the conclusion that [the employee] refused employment on account of the implicit condition in the offer," the court ruled that the employee was only entitled to backpay up until the offer of reinstatement. Id. at 738.

[11] Cases involving time conditions also support an inquiry into the employee's reasons for rejecting an offer of reinstatement. Time conditions on acceptance are somewhat different from conditions that go to the nature of an employee's work because they do not prevent the employee, if he accepts in a timely manner, from being made whole. Time conditions are therefore not really conditions on the offer, but rather limitations on the time for acceptance. As such, they must comport with the employee's "fundamental right to a reasonable time to consider whether to return." Penco Enterprises, Inc., 216 N.L.R.B. 734, 734–35 (1975). Accord, Murray Products, Inc., 228 N.L.R.B. 268, 268 (1977), enf'd, 584 F.2d 934 (9th Cir. 1978). Nonetheless, the inquiry in such cases is similar to that with invalid conditions on employment—that is, courts look to the reasons why an employee failed to accept the offer of reinstatement within the time imposed by the employer before inquiring into whether that time condition is unreasonable. See N.L.R.B. v. Betts Baking Co., 428 F.2d 156, 158–59 (10th Cir. 1970); N.L.R.B. v. Harrah's Club, 403 F.2d 865, 871 (9th Cir. 1968).

[12] In Leroy W. Craw, 227 N.L.R.B. 601 (1976), modified on other grounds, 565 F.2d 1267 (3d Cir. 1977), the Board had held that a company had engaged in an unfair labor practice by not reinstating unfair labor practice strikers when they unconditionally applied for reinstatement. Id. at 609. The Board had therefore ordered the company to offer those employees immediate reinstatement.

[13] On appeal, the Board adopted the findings and conclusions of the Administrative Law Judge. See Leroy W. Craw, 244 N.L.R.B. at 241.

sion may be seen as consistent with an inquiry into whether an employee rejected an offer of reinstatement for reasons other than its invalid conditions.

In contrast, Hennessey's refusal of Consolidated's offer would seem an appropriate case for applying the rule of Research Designing and L. Ronney. The testimony regarding Hennessey's reason for refusing Consolidated's offer was uncontradicted; he would not return without backpay. R. 61. That reason was not valid under Board precedent because it violated Hennessey's duty to mitigate his damages. See National Screen Products Co., 147 N.L.R.B. 746, 748 (1964). On the other hand, while Hennessey was present when the presumably invalid condition on his reinstatement—the final warning letter—was announced, R. 99, 184, Hennessey testified that he had no recollection of being told about that condition, R. 100, and did not learn about it until five weeks later.[14] Id. There is therefore no reason to believe that the invalid condition on Consolidated's offer even entered Hennessey's mind when he decided to turn down the offer of reinstatement. Looking to the actual reasons why Consolidated's offer was refused seems especially appropriate when there is every indication that Consolidated acted in good faith.[15] Unlike the employer in Leroy W. Craw, who made a conditional offer of reinstatement in violation of an express order from the Board, Consolidated offered Hennessey reinstatement in accordance with the terms of the arbitrator's decree; no Board precedent at that juncture specifically held that this offer would be inadequate; and Hennessey gave no indication that the warning letter bore any significance in his decision not to return to work. It was only after Hennessey filed his charge with the Board, which was several months after the arbitrator's decision, that Consolidated received notice that the warning letter presented any problem at all.

In view of the Board's failure to reconcile its decision in this case with its precedent, and its failure to explain its reasons for abandoning any inquiry into the reasons why a conditional offer is refused, we have no choice but to remand this case to the Board to explicate the circumstances, if any, under which an inquiry into whether an employee would have rejected a valid offer of reinstatement is

[14] This testimony was given during questioning by the ALJ:

Judge Stone: * * * As best you can [,] tell me exactly what [the Joint State Committee] told you the results of the grievance hearing were?

Hennessey: Well, sir, they told me that the discharge had been overturned. That the pay claim had been denied. The company was responsible to pick up my pension and health and welfare benefits with full seniority rights.

Judge Stone: Now, was there anything else said to you at all?

Hennessey: No, sir, not that I remember.

Judge Stone: Did they give you anything in writing?

Hennessey: No, sir. I picked up a copy of the results of the grievance about five weeks later. And it was at that time when I finally realized there had also been a thing where the discharge had been reduced to a final warning letter.

Judge Stone: * * * Now, did you know at the time the grievance hearing was over, when you were orally told, did you know at that time there was anything about a warning?

Hennessey: No, sir, I did not.

R. 99–100.

The ALJ did not make any findings regarding Hennessey's awareness of the final warning letter, presumably because of his conclusion that Hennessey's reasons for refusing Consolidated's offer of reinstatement were of no importance.

[15] Consolidated also argues that its good faith reliance on the arbitration award provides an independent basis for overturning the Board's decision. It suggests that even in cases in which the Board properly refuses to defer to an arbitrator's award, the Board should nonetheless look to the award to determine the interim rights of the parties. Thus, it argues, Hennessey should have been required to accept employment as conditioned by the arbitrator's decree, even though the Board ultimately ruled that the arbitrator's award contained an illegal condition.

Because we are remanding this case to the Board to reconsider the significance of Hennessey's motives for refusing Consolidated's offer, we need not reach the question whether Consolidated's good faith reliance on the arbitrator's decree, in itself, would be sufficient to toll backpay liability. We note, however, that resolution of this question depends on whether the Board could properly further the strong national policy in favor of private settlement of labor disputes without abdicating its responsibility to remedy violations of national labor law. See Local Union No. 2188, International Bth'd of Elec. Workers v. N.L.R.B., 494 F.2d 1087, 1091 (D.C.Cir. cert. denied, 419 U.S. 835, 95 S.Ct. 61, 42 L.Ed.2d 61 (1974); Associated Press v. N.L.R.B., 492 F.2d 662, 667 (D.C.Cir.1974). Thus, the Board might well reach different conclusions regarding the employer's right to rely on an arbitrator's decree pending a Board decision on a charged unfair labor practice depending on the nature of the arbitrator's decision and the specific circumstances following its issuance. In this case, among the significant factors the Board would have to consider are (1) the arbitrator ordered reinstatement with a warning letter, (2) Consolidated conformed its offer to the terms of the decree and (3) Hennessey waited two and a half months after the decree before filing his charge with the Board. Although Hennessey filed his charge within the statutory period of six months, and the Board ruled that the offer was improperly conditioned, a more refined consideration of the policy in favor of private settlement might lead the Board to find that Consolidated's good faith reliance on the arbitrator's award should work to suspend its backpay liability. Different considerations would of course be implicated if the arbitrator's award had been plainly conditioned on a surrender of the employee's statutory rights, or if the arbitrator had upheld the discharge, thereby requiring no reinstatement offer at all. In these cases, the Board might find that allowing the arbitration award to reduce the remedy received by a wrongfully discharged employee would seriously compromise the remedial purposes of the Act.

[16] We are especially hesitant to decide this question without the benefit of the Board's reasoning in the light of contradictory signals from the Board regarding the analogous situation in which an employer who has made no reinstatement offer at all seeks to reduce his backpay liability by proving that an offer would have been rejected. Compare Roadway Express, Inc., 254 N.L.R.B. NLRB v. Custom Sheet Metal & Service Co., Inc.

666 F.2d 454 (10th Cir.), December 14, 1981—243 NLRB 1102

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before HOLLOWAY and DOYLE, Circuit Judges, and KUNZIG, Judge*

455

KUNZIG, Judge: This matter comes before the court on application of the National Labor Relations Board for enforcement of its order[1] pursuant to section 10(e) of the National Labor Relations Act as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e). The Board has found Custom Sheet Metal & Service Co., Inc. in violation of sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1), (5),[2] based upon its refusal to sign a collective bargaining agreement negotiated by the Sheet Metal Contractors' Association of Oklahoma, Inc., and the Sheet Metal Workers, Local Union 124. The critical issue in the case is whether "unusual circumstances" existed such as to justify the Company's withdrawal from the Association shortly before agreement on the contract was reached. We conclude that unusual circumstances did exist, and therefore deny enforcement.

I. Background

In January of 1975, Billy Herron, a union member and journeyman sheet metal worker in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, purchased the Stalcup and Kiser sheet metal shop and incorporated the business as the Custom Sheet Metal & Service Co., Inc. ("Company"). Shortly thereafter, the Company voluntarily agreed to abide by the terms of the collective bargaining agreement then in effect between Stalcup and Kiser and Sheet Metal Workers, Local Union 124 ("Union"). The Company soon became a member of Sheet Metal Contractors' Association of Oklahoma, Inc. ("Association"). At this time the Company was engaged principally in the sheet metal building and construction industry, as were most of the members of the Association. When the initial contract expired, a new contract was executed between the Association and the Union to be effective from July 1, 1975 to June 30, 1977. This agreement provided that only journeyman and apprentice union sheet metal workers would be employed to perform sheet metal work for the Company and that union membership was required within eight days of commencing employment.

During the two-year term of the contract the Company's business expanded, and its operation began to change from building and construction work to the assembly-line fabrication of sheet metal products. This trend continued to the point where 95% of the Company's business involved the inplant manufacture of sheet metal products (primarily restaurant equipment), and only 5% involved on-site installation.[3] In response to this change in its business operation, the Company president approached the Union business agent to negotiate some modifications in the contract then in effect. The two men met—Billy Herron for the Company, and Parker Sneed for the Union—and the net result of their discussion was a "Kitchen Equipment Addendum" which reduced the wage rate to be paid to assembly-line employees of the Company and which extended the time in which employees were to become members of the Union from eight to thirty days.[4] The Company was the only member of the Association allowed by the Union to take advantage of the cost-saving provisions of the "Kitchen Equipment Addendum."[5]

> (1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 157 of this title; * * *
> (5) to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees, subject to the provisions of section 159(a) of this title.

[3] The parties do not dispute the fact that the Company's business operation changed dramatically during the 1975-77 period. The Administrative Law Judge found that as of the time of the hearing, the Company "had not bid on any large or new construction jobs for over 2 years."

In March of 1977 the Union notified the Association of its desire to open negotiations for a new contract to succeed the 1975–77 agreement. The Association subsequently agreed to meet with the Union, and Billy Herron, the Company president, was appointed to the Association's bargaining committee as representative for those businesses involved in the assembly-line manufacture of restaurant equipment and specialty products.

The first negotiating session took place on May 10, 1977, and among the Association's proposals was a request that provisions similar to those included in the "Kitchen Equipment Addendum" be added to the new contract. The Union rejected this proposal at the meeting, and consistently rejected the proposal at bargaining sessions held on May 17 and 31, and June 7, 14, 21, 23, and 24. Despite the Union's refusal to incorporate the "Kitchen Equipment Addendum" into a new agreement, the parties did agree to a contract at the bargaining session on June 24, 1977, subject to Union ratification. At the membership meeting on June 30, 1977, the Union rejected the Association's offer and went on strike the next day.

During the next few days Billy Herron, the Company president, was contacted by the Company's major customer, Sonic Industries, regarding the availability of certain kitchen equipment which had been previously ordered by Sonic.[6] Herron informed Sonic that 30 of his 32 production employees were on strike, but that another bargaining session was scheduled for July 5. The Association and Union representatives met on July 5, but were unable to reach agreement despite the assistance of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.

On July 6 Sonic Industries again contacted Herron and informed him that it intended to purchase the items it needed, and its future requirements, from other suppliers. Faced with the loss of a customer which provided fully 75% of its business,[7] and the apparent lack of meaningful progress in the bargaining sessions between the Union and the Association, the Company withdrew from the Association on July 6, thereby terminating the Association's bargaining authority for the Company. The Union was promptly informed of this action by telegram.[8] On July 7 the remaining members of the Association met again with the Union representatives, and after a 12-hour session an agreement was reached which was accepted by the Union membership on July 11, 1977.

Shortly thereafter, the Union representative contacted Herron to obtain the Company's adoption of the new agreement. Herron refused to sign the agreement which provided that only journeyman and apprentice sheet metal workers would be employed by the Company,[9] a provision which had been previously modified vis-a-vis the Company by the "Kitchen Equipment Addendum" so as to allow the Company to pay its assembly-line employees less than the journeyman pay scale.

[4] The contract in effect during 1975–77 stated, "The employer agrees that none but journeyman and apprentice sheet metal workers shall be employed on any work described in Article 1." Article 1 was broadly drafted and covered both installation and manufacturing work. The ultimate effect of this provision was to require the Company to pay the wage scale applicable to journeyman and apprentice sheet metal workers to its assembly-line employees, even though the latter group performed only relatively simple tasks. Because the Company's operation had changed to the point where 95% of its work was in manufacturing and only 5% in installation, an accommodation in the contract was deemed necessary for the Company to be competitive against non-union manufacturers of restaurant equipment. The "Kitchen Equipment Addendum" allowed the Company to hire relatively unskilled employees for its assembly-line operation and to pay those employees at the initial rate of 60% of the journeyman's base pay salary.

[5] The "Kitchen Equipment Addendum" was apparently never reduced to writing, but was honored by both the Company and the Union.

[6] The Administrative Law Judge found that "as of July 6, between $80,000 and $125,000 worth of work for Sonic [was] in progress at Respondent's plant and the items being produced for Sonic could only be used by Sonic, so in that sense, these items were custom made."

[7] The Administrative Law Judge found that "[a]t this point in time Sonic was the purchaser of 75 percent of Respondent's production."

[8] The telegram stated, "Custom Sheet Metal and Service Co., Inc., permanently withdraws the authority of Sheet Metal Contractors Association of Oklahoma, Inc., to represent it in all collective bargaining matters effective immediately."

[9] The contract as negotiated also contained an eight-day Union security clause in contrast to the thirty-day clause provided for in the "Kitchen Equipment Addendum."

In response to the Company's refusal to sign the agreement, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge with the Board on July 17, 1977. In a two-page order affirming the findings of the Administrative Law Judge, the Board found that the Company's withdrawal from the Association bargaining unit and its refusal to execute the contract for the 1977–79 period violated sections 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act. The Company has been ordered to provide various relief, and most notably has been ordered to execute the 1977–79 contract, but not to give effect to the provision requiring that the Company employ only journeyman and apprentice sheet metal workers (Article III) and the eight-day Union security clause (Article V). The Board's order does impose the wage scale applicable to journeyman and apprentice sheet metal workers on the Company, but leaves unresolved the exact job classification of the Company's assembly-line employees and the length of time in which Union membership is required as a condition of employment.

II. The Right to Withdraw from Multi-Employer Associations

The applicable rules governing multi-employer bargaining have developed on a case-by-case basis with little Congressional interference.[10] As enunciated by the Board in its seminal opinion in Retail Associates, Inc., 120 N.L.R.B. 388 (1958), once negotiations between a multi-employer association and a union have begun, none of the parties may withdraw from such bargaining without the consent of the opposing party, absent "unusual circumstances." This formulation has been widely adopted by the circuits which have considered the question,[11] and is clearly the law in the Tenth Circuit. NLRB v. Tulsa Sheet Metal Works, Inc., 367 F.2d 55, 57 (10th Cir. 1966). Thus, the central issue in this case is whether "unusual circumstances" justified the Company's withdrawal, and whether the Board's finding to the contrary is supported by substantial evidence.

The Courts of Appeal of the various circuits have recognized three situations which constitute "unusual circumstances" sufficient to justify an employer's withdrawal from a multi-employer association after bargaining has begun: (1) extreme financial hardship threatening the existence of the employer as a viable business entity,[12] (2) fragmentation of the multi-employer bargaining unit,[13] and (3) bargaining impasse.[14]

III. Application of the "Unusual Circumstances" Standard

We recognize at the outset of our analysis that a combination of events—a striking labor force, a threat from the Company's major customer to purchase ordered goods elsewhere, and an apparent lack of progress in negotiating a new "Kitchen Equipment Addendum"—left the Company in an extremely difficult financial situation. Suddenly faced with the imminent loss of a customer which purchased 75% of its production, and having lost other customers since the initiation of the strike,[15] the Company withdrew from the Association and gave prompt notice of this decision to its employees and the Union. We believe the evidence in the case justifies the Company's withdrawal on the first theory encompassed by the "unusual circumstances" standard—extreme financial hardship threatening the existence of the employer.

[15] In his findings of fact, the Administrative Law Judge noted that "with the initiation of the strike, Respondent lost a number of its smaller customers."

The Board does not contest the determination that the Company was faced with the immediate loss of three-fourths of its business, but reaches the conclusion that such circumstances do not threaten the very existence of the Company. We disagree, for it appears to us that the impending loss of 75% of the Company's business does threaten its very existence, especially in an era of high interest rates and heavy debt financing.[16] The Board's decision does not indicate the percentage of business loss which would satisfy the "extreme financial hardship" test, but if 75% was deemed insufficient, one can only wonder as to the percentage the Board would have found sufficient—85%, 90%, 95% * * * 100%?

The timing of Billy Herron's decision to withdraw his Company from the Association, which came on the heels of Sonic's call informing him it had located other equipment suppliers, also indicates that Herron was motivated by vital economic considerations in his decision rather than anti-union sentiment. Indeed, there is no evidence that at the time of Herron's decision to withdraw he was motivated by considerations other than the financial position of the Company. We note that Herron had been a Union member himself, and voluntarily entered the Company into a collective bargaining agreement with the Union in 1975. The evidence indicates that the Company was willing to work with the Union in reaching agreement on a new "Kitchen Equipment Addendum." As the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit recently noted, "[T]he soundness of a withdrawal from a multi-employer unit is to be tested by considering the actual motivation of the employer seeking to withdraw from the unit." NLRB v. Custom Wood Specialties, Inc., 622 F.2d 381, 385 (8th Cir. 1980) (emphasis added). Such reasoning, applied to this case, dictates a result in favor of the Company in view of the perilous economic conditions facing the Company and the total lack of evidence of bad faith towards the Union.

The facts in this case are distinguishable from those facing this court in NLRB v. Tulsa Sheet Metal Works, Inc., 367 F.2d 55 (10th Cir. 1966), where the employer's "unusual circumstances" argument was rejected. In Tulsa Sheet Metal, the firm which withdrew from the multi-employer association had been a solid member of the association for twelve years at the time of its withdrawal. By contrast, the Company in the case at bar had been a member of the Association for only two years, during which time its business operation radically changed from on-site construction to inplant manufacturing. Even though Custom Sheet Metal was a party to the contract executed between the Association and the Union during the 1975–77 period, as a result of the transformation in its operation, the Company reached agreement with the Union on a "Kitchen Equipment Addendum" which significantly modified the wage, job classification, and union security provisions applicable to the other members of the Association. This modification of the contract, which applied to one member of a multi-employer Association consisting of approximately 44 members, indicates that the Union was aware of the unique position of the Company in the Association and suggests that the Company's withdrawal was indeed prompted by "unusual circumstances." [17]

Finally, and most significant, is the fact that the Company in this case was faced with serious economic difficulties due to the imminent loss of 75% of its business, a situation not present in the Tulsa Sheet Metal case. In summary, Tulsa Sheet Metal is simply a different case from the one now before the court. The facts are distinguishable—the rejection of the "unusual circumstances" argument not applicable to the case at bar.

[16] The decision of the Administrative Law Judge recognized that "[r]espondent was concerned because it had borrowed money to finance its operations and was paying interest on the money borrowed." The record also reflects that the Company was particularly concerned with losing business to out-of-town manufacturers which were not shut down by the strike. The other members of the Association, all involved in the building and construction industry, were not similarly faced with this competitive threat.

[17] Cf. Retail Clerks Union, No. 1550 v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 210, 216 (D.C.Cir.), cert. denied, 379 U.S. 828, 85 S.Ct. 41, 13 L.Ed.2d 31 (1964) ("[T]he evidence showed a melange of group and individual negotiation and agreement, carried on over such a period of time, as to suggest a commonly accepted flexibility in the format of bargaining which would not automatically outlaw every departure from the fold.")

Apart from the issue of whether "unusual circumstances" existed, there is a serious question in this case as to whether the Board's remedy can properly be imposed upon the Company. Because the Company is no longer engaged in the building and construction industry, the Company would ostensibly violate section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(f), by executing a contract which limits employment to those with "minimum training or experience qualifications" (i.e., journeyman and apprentice sheet metal workers—Article III) and which contains an eight-day union security clause (Article V). In recognition of the fact that the contract contains provisions which are illegal [18] as applied to a manufacturing concern, the Board has ordered the Company to execute the agreement, but not to give effect to the illegal provisions. The Board has cited our decision in Tulsa Sheet Metal as authority for this remedy, but here again we reject the Board's contention.

We recognize that the governing standard for determining whether a Company should be ordered to execute a collective bargaining agreement was enunciated by this court in Tulsa Sheet Metal: "Employment contracts should not be completely obliterated because some provisions are beyond the legal limits of the parties' bargaining power, unless such illegal provisions permeate the complete contract to such an extent as to affect its enforceability entirely." [19] The Tulsa Sheet Metal court, relying in part upon a "savings and severability" provision in the contract, went on to hold that provisions regarding subcontracting and union security were "not basic to the whole scheme of the contract." [20]

In this case, the illegal provisions regard union security and, more importantly, the minimum qualifications for commencing employment. The contract in question refers to only two classifications of workers who can be employed by the company—journeyman, and apprentice sheet metal workers—and other sections of the contract are entwined with this classification, including the wage scale to be paid by the Company. If any provision of a collective bargaining agreement is truly vital, it is a provision pertaining to the classification of employees, and this seems especially true when the wage scale in a contract is directly tied to the classification scheme. Moreover, the contract in the case at bar contains no "savings and severability" clause, unlike the agreement in Tulsa Sheet Metal. We seriously question the wisdom of ordering the Company to sign a contract, but not to give effect to a provision regarding minimum employee qualifications which forms the very foundation on which the agreement rests. As the Supreme Court recognized in NLRB v. Rockaway News Supply Co., Inc., 345 U.S. 71, 78, 73 S.Ct. 519, 523, 97 L.Ed. 832 (1953), "[t]here may be cases where a forbidden provision is so basic to the whole scheme of a contract and so interwoven with all its terms that it must stand or fall as an entirety." We believe that such a case is now before us,[21] in contrast to that facing the court in Tulsa Sheet Metal.[22]

In summary, we conclude that the Company's withdrawal from the Association was justified on the ground that it was faced with extreme financial hardship threatening its existence as an employer. Unlike Tulsa Sheet Metal, here there is ample evidence in the record of extreme financial hardship sufficient to invoke the "unusual circumstances" standard. Moreover, the Board has misread our decision in Tulsa Sheet Metal in formulating a remedy in the case at bar. We find the remedy proferred by the Board inapplicable on the ground that a provision of the contract which the Board has excused the Company from executing "permeate[s] the complete contract to such an extent as to affect its enforceability entirely." [23] Finally, we reiterate the lack of even a scintilla of evidence of antiunion sentiment on the Company's behalf at the time the decision was made to withdraw the Company from the Association. Although the Board's decision is entitled to considerable deference by a reviewing court, where the Board's order has "no reasonable basis in law" or is "fundamentally inconsistent with the structure of the Act" it should not be enforced. NLRB v. Bartlett-Collins Co., 639 F.2d 652, 655 (10th Cir. 1981), citing Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 497, 99 S.Ct. 1842, 1849, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979).

[22] Even our decision in Tulsa Sheet Metal concedes that "not all provisions of a collective bargaining agreement are severable." 367 F.2d at 59.

[23] Id.

For the reasons stated above, we hold on these facts that "unusual circumstances" clearly existed so as to justify the Company's withdrawal from the multi-employer association bargaining unit and the Company's subsequent refusal to execute the 1977–79 agreement. We find that the Board's decision to the contrary is not supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole,[24] and therefore conclude that the Company did not violate sections (8)(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act as charged by the Board.

Enforcement of the Board's order is denied.

Pittsburgh-Des Moines Corporation v. NLRB

663 F.2d 956 (9th Cir.), December 14, 1981—253 NLRB 706

On petition to review Board Order

Before Merrill and Nelson, Circuit Judges, and Sweigert,* District Judge

956

Merrill, Circuit Judge: Pittsburgh-Des Moines Corporation (the Company) petitions for review of the order and decision of the National Labor Relations

957

Board determining that the Company had failed to bargain in good faith with the collective bargaining representative of certain employees in violation of § 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq. The Board cross-petitions for enforcement of its order. The Board affirmed factual findings of an administrative law judge from which the following facts appear.

For some time the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America (the Union) has represented the Company's employees in two distinct units under two separate collective bargaining contracts. The latest contracts expired March 31, 1979, at which time the employees in both units went on strike. Prior to that date, the parties had engaged in seven or eight bargaining sessions without reaching an agreement.

On May 17, 1979 a bargaining session was held at which the Union was represented by its business representative Richard Parra and the Company by its district manager Floyd Bedwell. The Company proposed two year renewals of the former contracts without substantial change save in two respects. It proposed a new section on strikes and lockouts, Section XVII, which incorporated a no-strike clause from the former contracts with some elaboration and provided that the Company might fire any employee found to have engaged in a strike in violation of the section. Also the Company proposed to discontinue use of the Union's welfare and pension funds and to provide employee coverage by a qualified plan under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA), 29 U.S.C. § 1001 et seq., utilizing "a reliable insurance company" as carrier.

After some bargaining, the parties caucused separately and thereafter communicated through a mediator. Parra testified that the mediator told him confidentially that there was "no problem" with the language of Section XVII, but that the Company was holding steadfast on medical coverage and pension provisions. Parra testified that he understood this to mean that the Company had withdrawn its proposed Section XVII. (Bedwell testified that no member of his team had ever stated that the Section was being withdrawn or deleted.)

On May 23, Parra got in touch with Ned Ware, a Company executive of a higher level than Bedwell who had not attended the May 17 bargaining session, and without success sought Ware's assistance in preserving use of the Union pension plan. Later that day, Parra telephoned Ware and stated that he would schedule a ratification vote by the employees on the Company proposal and wanted to confirm his understanding that the Company's proposed Section XVII had been dropped. Ware responded that he had no knowledge of the section having been dropped and would have to check it out and report back to Parra. Another conversation between the two occurred May 29 at which time the mechanics of returning employees to work were discussed but without any reference to the strike/lockout provision. Without having received any confirmation from Ware of his understanding with respect to the section, Parra proceeded to conduct a vote of the Union members in ratification of the Company's proposed contract, reporting to the employees that Section XVII had been depleted. The vote was favorable and the employees returned to work.

*Honorable William T. Sweigert, Senior United States District Judge, Northern District of California, sitting by designation.

Parra then arranged with Company officials to prepare drafts of the contracts for execution. The Company prepared drafts incorporating Section XVII, and mailed them to the Union on June 10.

When Parra received the contracts, he immediately telephoned Ware to protest the inclusion of Section XVII. Ware denied any understanding that the section was to be dropped and suggested that the Company might consider further discussion towards a trade-off in contract language. Parra refused to consider any exchange, asserting categorically that an agreement had been reached and that the section had been deleted. Parra then re-authored the contract documents deleting Section XVII and sent these drafts signed by the Union to the Company. Ware responded that there had been no agreement to delete Section XVII and that the Company declined to execute the re-authored agreement.

On July 12, having heard nothing further from the Union, Bedwell wrote Parra to the following effect:

> It is clear that we are in disagreement regarding certain essential contract terms and have not been able to consummate an agreement.
>
> By this letter, we hereby withdraw our last contract proposal and suggest that we get together in the immediate future to continue negotiations to reach an agreement. We will review all matters and have a new proposal for your consideration.
> I hope to hear from you as soon as possible regarding the scheduling of a meeting for negotiations.

On July 16 the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Company alleging that since about June 21 the Company had refused to execute a collective bargaining contract upon which the parties had agreed. In due course, after investigation of the charge, the Regional Director advised the Union that no complaint would be issued. On August 22, the Union withdrew the charge. It then resurrected the drafts of agreement sent by the Company on June 10, signed them and forwarded them to the Company. Bedwell responded:

> This contract proposal embodies terms of an offer which was unconditionally withdrawn by the Company by a letter dated July 12, 1979. Accordingly, the proposal we received is rejected by the Company. Enclosed is your copy of this rejected proposal which we have not signed.
> The Company remains ready and willing to meet with you to bargain in good faith in order to reach an acceptable agreement. I will be preparing a counter proposal from the Company which I will forward to you shortly.

After further exchange of correspondence with each party adhering to its position the Company drew up new proposed contracts and sent them to Parra on September 11. Bedwell stated:

> You will note that while certain language changes have been made, the Company's proposals contain the same economic provisions which were included in our previously withdrawn proposal.

He expressed hope for an early resumption of negotiations.

While the economic provisions affecting the employees remained the same, substantial changes were made respecting Union membership, check-off of Union dues, management prerogatives and grievance procedures. There was also an expansion of the substance of Section XVII.

On September 17, Bedwell wrote Parra again urging that a negotiating session be arranged and suggesting September 19 as a date. He stated:

> At this meeting, I hope to explain further the Company's current proposals and the circumstances which have contributed to those proposals. The Company will certainly consider any counter proposals the Union may have.

Parra responded by telephone that the Union was not willing to reopen negotiations. Bedwell immediately responded with a mailgram expressing regret over the Union's position and stating:

> The Company is anxious to meet with you for the purposes of negotiating the contract. Al> though we apparently have some differences, I believe that through negotiations, these differences can be resolved. We are ready to move in good faith to reach an agreement. You have not even given us a chance to explain our proposal, or to hear any counter proposals you may have.

> The Company remains ready and willing to negotiate with the Union at a time and place of your choice. We want to reach an agreement with you.

This brought a response from the Union attorney, Richard Macey, advising that "negotiations are not in order at this time" because a contract already existed, and that he had advised the Union not to meet with the Company representatives.

On September 25, Bedwell wrote again denying that any agreement had ever been reached on the withdrawn proposal and stating, "I am still awaiting an opportunity to discuss [the new] proposal with you, and to consider any counter proposals the Union may have."

This brought forth a consent from the Union to meet to discuss what "minor variations" from the June 10 proposal "might be acceptable." On October 10, an unsuccessful negotiating session was held, the Union refusing to negotiate save on the basis of the June 10 proposal. On October 23, Bedwell wrote Parra offering to substitute the Union's proposed grievance procedure section for the Company's last proposal and to include a provision respecting the crossing of picket lines which was desired by the Union but had been eliminated from the Company's last proposal. He again urged further negotiations.

Macey responded:

> Your company has consistently ignored that * * * the Union is not and will not enter into any negotiations with your company other than on the basis of a compromise for an existing contract.

On the basis of these facts, the administrative law judge concluded that as to the contentions of General Counsel that Company conduct constituted "surface" or bad faith bargaining "there is utter lack of merit."

The Board concluded otherwise. It stated, "[W]e conclude that by withdrawal of its original proposals tentatively agreed upon and by the substitution without explanation of regressive proposals, Respondent has failed to bargain in good faith * * *."

We find ourselves in agreement with the administrative law judge.

The question is "whether or not the [Company] genuinely desires to reach an agreement." NLRB v. MacMillan Ring-Free Oil Co., 394 F.2d 26, 29 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 393 U.S. 914, 89 S.Ct. 237, 21 L.Ed.2d 199 (1968). Upon this question, the Board must consider the " 'totality of the circumstances' which are indicative of mental state," Seattle-First National Bank v. NLRB, 638 F.2d 1221, 1227 (9th Cir. 1981), and it does not suffice to rely solely upon the terms of contract proposals, id. In NLRB v. Pacific Grinding Wheel Co. Inc., 572 F.2d 1343, 1348 (9th Cir. 1978), this Court stated:

> This circuit has specifically held that the Board can look at the content of the bargaining proposals as part of its review of all the circumstances. NLRB v. Holmes Tuttle Broadway Ford, Inc., 465 F.2d 717, 719 (9th Cir. 1972). In addition, however, the Board must show 'substantial evidence that the company's attitude was inconsistent with its duty to seek an agreement' before a finding of failure to bargain is warranted. NLRB v. MacMillan Ring-Free Oil Co., [supra].

We hold that the Board has failed to show substantial evidence to this effect. The record to us demonstrates a desire on the part of the Company to reach agreement and the Union's unreasonable insistence to point of impasse that agreement had already been reached.

The withdrawal of the June 10 proposal followed the Union's flat and unequivocal rejection of that proposal and its insistence, with no support for its position, that Section XVII had been deleted. We cannot accept the proposition, implicit in the Board's conclusion, that in the face of such rejection the Company was somehow committed to all portions of the proposal as to which tentative agreement had been reached; that the Union could hold the Company to what the Union liked while rejecting that which it disapproved. As we stated in NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d 871, 883 (9th Cir. 1978):

> Absent abuse * * * it is perfectly legitimate for a party to retract a proposal before the other side has accepted it. It may do so because the offer was germane only to the context in which it was made * * * or because it has further determined the relative bargaining strengths of the opposed sides. The law does not require that each offer and indication of possible acceptance be included in the final contract before a legal impasse is reached.

960

The proposal, as a package, was the result of hard bargaining—bargaining hard enough to have included a strike. We must assume that the proposal, advanced in the course of the strike, was the result of compromise and that concessions may well have been tendered in some areas with the hope of securing agreement on those provisions which the Union chose to reject. " 'To bargain collectively' does not impose an inexorable ratchet, whereby a party is bound by all it has ever said." Id.

We conclude that following rejection of the proposal by the Union, its withdrawal by the Company was fully justified and that the proposal then ceased to exist and could no longer form the basis for an agreement.

As to the submission of the September 11 proposal, the Company at all times made it abundantly clear that all changes from the June 10 proposal were negotiable and that counter proposals would be welcomed. The Company justifies its proposal of those changes on the ground that its bargaining position had been strengthened since June 10: the Union had failed in its effort to secure from the Board an unfair labor practice complaint; its strike, in the course of which the June 10 proposal had been advanced, had been terminated.[1] The Company contends that its improved position, in the context of hard bargaining, warranted its decision to negotiate from scratch.

In our judgment, in the light of the Union's flat rejection of the June 10 proposal and the Company's reiterated willingness to negotiate the September 11 proposal, this effort on the part of the Company to secure renegotiation of the contract in the climate of its improved bargaining position cannot be said to be so unreasonable as to give rise to an inference that the Company intended that no agreement be reached, with the result that the Union was released from any further obligation to bargain. See NLRB v. Randle-Eastern Ambulance Service, Inc., 584 F.2d 720 (5th Cir. 1978).

As to the failure of the Company to explain its actions, it is abundantly clear from the record that the Company repeatedly sought the opportunity to explain and that its requests were rejected out of hand. If there was a breakdown in negotiations, it occurred in the face of urgings by the Company that negotiations continue. If there was any refusal to bargain, it was on the part of the Union.

The petition of Pittsburgh-Des Moines Corporation is granted. The Board's prayer for enforcement of its order is denied.

NLRB v. Rich's Precision Foundry, Inc.

667 F.2d 613 (7th Cir.), December 15, 1981—250 NLRB 1317

On petition to enforce Board Order

Before Pell and Cudahy, Circuit Judges, and Dumbauld, Senior District Judge*

617

Pell, Circuit Judge: This case arises on the petition of the National Labor Relations Board (Board or NLRB) for enforcement of its order finding the Respondent, Rich's Precision Foundry, Inc. (Company), in violation of §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act as amended, 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(a)(1) and (3) (1976). The Company has cross-petitioned this court pursuant to 29 U.S.C. § 160(f) to review and set aside the order. The primary issues for our determination are whether the Board's findings that the Company violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) were supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole and whether the employees allegedly discharged for union activities were supervisors excluded from the protection of the Act.

---

[1] While the Union asserts that the strike was ended through misunderstanding on the part of Parra, there is nothing to suggest that the Company contributed to such misunderstanding. The only basis asserted by Parra for his conclusion that Section XVII was to be deleted was a confidential aside from the mediator which was never confirmed by the Company and which would seem to have been intended by the mediator only to aid the Union in further negotiation and not to represent that agreement had already been reached. Parra's reckless report to the Union members that the section had been deleted cannot be held against the Company.

*The Honorable Edward Dumbauld, Senior District Judge of the Western District of Pennsylvania, sitting by designation.

The Board[1] found that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining an overly broad no solicitation and no distribution rule, threatening employees with discharge and plant closure for union support, conveying to employees an impression of Company surveillance of union activities, interrogating employees about union activities, soliciting an employee to engage in anti-union activity, and inducing employees to abandon the union by granting an increased Christmas bonus. The Board also found that the Company violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discharging Felix Birt and Homer Acres for their union activities and by laying off Kurt Elder and Greg Schumacher temporarily for lack of work until replacements for Birt and Acres were arranged. The Board ordered the Company to cease and desist from the unfair labor practices, to reinstate Birt and Acres, to make whole Birt, Acres, Elder, and Schumacher for all wages lost as a result of their unlawful layoffs, and to post an appropriate notice to inform the employees of these actions.

I. THE FACTUAL BACKGROUND

A. The Company's Operations and Personnel

The Company manufactures and distributes brass and aluminum castings at its foundry in Yorktown, Indiana. The Company employed approximately 65 people at the time of the alleged violations. The management and supervisory personnel of the plant included Richard Reece, owner and president; Steven Bailey, plant manager; and several foremen, including Dewey Miller and David Bennett. One of the Company's shop rules subjected employees to discipline for "distribution of any literature of soliciting or selling of any kind during working hours."

Prior to their discharges, Felix Birt and Homer Acres were employed at the plant as senior molders. Acres and Birt, in the course of their duties, gave assistance and instruction to the other less experienced molders in their department. The Company 618 asserted that these instructional duties excluded Birt and Acres from the coverage of the Act as supervisors under 29 U.S.C. § 152(3) (1976). In support of its position, the Company introduced a December, 1978 organizational chart which included Birt and Acres in a list of foremen. President Reece testified their names were thus listed simply "because they're foremen"; a molder, Greg Schumacher, who worked with Birt, testified that Reece had once told him that Birt was a foreman.

B. Threats Against Union Organization

Birt testified that in mid-June Reece stated in a conference with the molders that there "definitely [would be] no union" and that "anyone caught talking about a union would be fired." Bailey and Miller, who were present at the meeting, testified that they had never heard Reece make such a statement. Reece did not testify as to the incident.[2]

In August or September, Birt and Acres began to talk to the other employees about organizing a union due to dissatisfaction with wages and working conditions. In November, Acres and Birt, along with the other molders, ceased work to protest the Company's failure to install a shield on an overhead hopper. As spokesman for the molders, Birt met with Reece, Bailey, and Miller to request the Company to install the shield and grant a future pay raise. Birt said he warned them at one point that "if they [the company] didn't * * * that we would get a union up." Approximately the last week in November, Birt and the other molders were discussing with foreman Miller the possibility of a union contract. Birt said that if the employees did not get a raise, they would "get a union," to which Miller replied they "couldn't do that" and "if [they] did, that they would close the door first." Miller did not deny making this statement.

C. The Locker Search

About December 1, Acres distributed to the employees a union pamphlet outlining examples of illegal conduct by an employer during a union campaign. On December 5, Miller and Bailey conducted a search of Birt's locker at the foundry. Birt testified that Miller and Bailey "said that they saw an employee from the cleaning room reading a piece of paper, and they have reason to believe that it had something to do with the union that could hurt the company, and they wanted to search my locker." Another witness corroborated that Miller had said that he was searching for a paper that an employee had been reading. Bailey testified that Miller had suggested the search because "he believed that Felix [Birt] had something that he should not have." He also confirmed that Miller had told Birt that he believed Birt had something "that would be a detriment to the company." Upon searching the locker, Miller pulled out a piece of paper which turned out to be a tardiness warning on the back of a copy of the shop rules. Bailey then apologized to Birt but indicated he was "very disappointed." There was testimony that an employee had been dismissed for drug problems one month earlier and that there had been some problems with employees drinking alcoholic beverages in the plant.

[1] Inasmuch as the Board affirmed the "rulings, findings, and conclusions" of the administrative law judge and adopted his order without any significant change relevant to our review, the decision, order, and opinion of the administrative law judge will herein be referred to as the decision, order or opinion of the Board.

[2] There was also testimony by Birt that Reece had said in a May meeting that "he'd close the doors * * * before he'd go union." Bailey, who was present at the meeting, denied hearing Reece make such a statement. Although the May incident occurred outside the six-month statutory limitaion period, the administrative law judge considered it only as background evidence shedding light on matters within the period.

D. The Questioning of Anna Caldwell by Manager Bailey

Between December 5 and 7 Birt arranged a union organizational meeting for the evening of December 7. Both Birt and Acres publicized the meeting to the employees. In the morning of December 7, Bailey called a cleaning lady at the plant, Anna Caldwell, into his office. He asked her the nature of her discussion with other employees, including Acres, in the lounge, to which she replied that she had been talking with Acres about "bootlegging." According to Caldwell, Bailey responded, "Now, come on Anna, what were you talking about?" She replied that that had been all they were talking about, but if he "was asking about the union" she would be "the first to sign the card." She then left Bailey's office without any further discussion.

E. The Discharges of Birt, Acres, Elder, and Schumacher

A union organizational meeting was held on December 7 in which several employees, including Acres, Birt, Caldwell, Elder, and Schumacher, signed cards in support of the union. The next day, Reece instructed the plant manager Bailey and foreman Miller to discharge Birt and Acres but to say they were being laid off for lack of work so that they could draw unemployment benefits. Birt and Acres testified that around one o'clock in the afternoon Miller and Bennett told them to clean out their lockers and go to Bailey's office. Acres also testified that he had work to do when he was approached by Miller and Bennett. When Acres and Birt arrived to meet with Miller, Bennett and Bailey in Bailey's office, they were told by Bailey they were being "laid off." When Birt and Acres asked if they were being fired, Miller explained they were being laid off so they could draw unemployment. Birt also testified that Miller told them, "I warned you I would get you sooner or later." Acres and Birt then obtained their paychecks and left the foundry.

Their discharges resulted in shutdown of two production lines. Kurt Elder and Greg Schumacher, who worked with Birt and Acres on these production lines, were temporarily laid off when they ran out of work to perform as a result of Birt's and Acres' discharges. Elder and Schumacher were recalled approximately one week later after Birt's and Acres' positions had been filled.

F. The Unemployment Claims

Both Birt and Acres filed claims for unemployment compensation. In response to a notice of the claims from the Indiana Employment Security Division, Bailey certified on an Eligibility Information Report that Birt and Acres were ineligible for unemployment. The reason given on the form was that they had been laid off "partially due to lack of work" but would not be re-employed due to their "insubordination, poor performance, refusal to accept supervision, and in general * * * defiant attitude." The Company does not appear to have otherwise contested their eligibility.

G. The Company's Statements and Conduct After the Discharges

On December 15, Acres went to the foundry to pick up his last paycheck. Reece's secretary told Acres that he could have his paycheck after he had talked to Reece. According to Acres, Reece told Acres to "go out and tell the people that the damn union wasn't no good," and to ask Miller for his job back. Reece also asked how many people were at the union meeting the day before. When Acres replied that Reece "didn't have to ask because he already knew," Reece asked Acres to meet with Bailey, Miller, and himself that afternoon. Acres did so, and during the meeting Reece said that "before he would have a union he would close the damn doors." Acres said that Reece then told him he "was the highest paid man that he had, and why was I in on this, I was the leader of the whole group, I was following Mr. Birt and everybody else was following me." Acres also testified that Reece advised him that he could come back to work "if [he would] just put the union down."

The same afternoon Geraldine Cook, who shares an apartment with Acres that they rent from Reece, went to the foundry to pay Reece the monthly rent. According to Cook, Reece asked her "what was the trouble" with Acres. When Cook replied that she did not want to get involved, Reece said, "I don't want a union in here, and I want things straightened out." He also told her it was "not necessary to be late with the rent" and that "all he [Acres] has to do is come back and ask Dewey [Miller] for his job back, and talk the union down." Cook's and Acres' testimony as to their encounters with Reece on December 15 were uncontroverted.

Approximately one week later, the Company gave its employees $50.00 cash bonuses instead of a ham, turkey, or fruit as had been done in the past. In the Christmas party, Reece made a speech during which, according to employee Otis Cherry, he stated that he "couldn't afford to have a union in the place and pay discrimination wages; if he did, he'd have to close the doors."

In January of 1979, Acres returned to the plant to pick up his W-2 forms. Acres testified that Reece again asked him to "put down the union, and ask Mr. Dewey Miller for [his] job back."

The original charge alleging unfair labor practices on the basis of these events was filed with the NLRB on December 11, 1978. The parties entered into a settlement on May 22, 1979 which was set aside by the Regional Director on June 29, 1979 due to the Company's refusal to comply with the terms of the settlement. In its post-trial brief after the conclusion of the hearing before the administrative law judge, the Company justified its refusal to comply as follows:

> Formal settlement was once effected in this matter and subsequently withdrawn upon Respondent's realization that the Complainant [Birt] and Acres were guilty of conduct which constituted legitimate defenses to the charges and constituted just cause for the discharge of Birt and Acres.

The Board contends that this statement demonstrates that the purported grounds for the discharges of Birt and Acres were merely after-acquired pretexts for the retaliatory discharges.

H. The Company's Evidence of an Intentional Slowdown by Birt and Acres

The first time that the Company advanced what it claimed to be its actual reason for laying off Birt and Acres was in the testimony in the administrative hearing. Reece stated that Birt was laid off due to "evidence from several papers and data that we fill out every day that there was an automatic slowdown" and that Acres was similarly laid off for an "intentional slowdown." Reece said that he had based his decision on their production data. He later identified the data as "several years' experience, production slips * * * [and] scrap tickets," although he later testified that the scrap tickets had "not that much" to do with his decision to lay off Birt. He admitted that the slowdown had come to his attention a couple of months prior to December 8, but claimed that he did not take any action until then because he wanted to "straighten it out * * * through morale and management." The only evidence of any action taken by management prior to December 8 is Reece's testimony that foreman Miller and manager Bailey had talked to Birt and Acres. Neither Bailey nor Miller testified as to any such discussions with Birt or Acres having taken place.

However, Reece subsequently testified that a comparison between Birt and Acres and the other molders could not be made from the production records from September to December 8 because all the molders were involved in the slowdown. In contrast to his earlier testimony, Reece claimed that he had chosen to lay off Birt and Acres because they were "leaders * * * responsible for training" the other molders, although he conceded they were only responsible for training when foreman Miller was absent from the floor. When the apparent contradiction in his testimony as to the reason for the discharges was brought to Reece's attention, Reece again revised his position to state that Birt and Acres were laid off for not being leaders in terms of maintaining the morale of the other molders.

There was testimony in the hearing from Company employees that Birt and Acres had made statements to them in October and November to the effect that they were intentionally going to slow down production. Greg Schumacher, who poured metal for both Birt and Acres in November and December of 1978, testified that he had noticed an absence of molds from their production lines although there did not appear to be any shortage of the necessary materials at that time. The availability of adequate materials was substantiated by both Miller and Bennett. Other employees testified that, during this time, some cores used in the molding process had stacked up in the core room because they were not being used by the molders at the usual rate. One of the core room employees remarked that the back-up of cores began to disappear after Acres had been replaced. Acres and Birt both denied any statements as to a threatened slowdown.

The documentary evidence introduced by the Company to manifest the slowdown consisted of daily production records for September to October and a summary of the Company's gross sales for 1978. The Company's gross sales for September were $45,762.66; for October $117,694.59; for November, $107,237.96; and for December, $70,968.64. Plant Manager Bailey asserted that gross sales were a direct reflection of the molders' production. The production records, according to both parties, showed that Acres had averaged 111 pieces per day from a commonly used mold and that Birt had averaged 80 per day from the same mold for the months of October, November and December. There was some testimony that the Company had had problems with this specific type of mold in late 1978 and, as a result, had made some changes in production methods both before and after the discharges. The records also showed that Birt's scrap rate in December exceeded his scrap rate and that of other molders in previous months. The Company also introduced evidence that a molder with relatively little experience, who had been hired for the molder position after the discharges, averaged 116 pieces per day in February and March of 1979 from the mold upon which Birt's and Acres' averages were also based.

II. THE § 8(a)(1) VIOLATIONS.

A. Solicitation of Acres for Anti-Union Activities and Conditioning His Re-Employment on Such Activities

Section 8(a)(1) makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their rights to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing. 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1) (1976). Initially, we note that the Company has not contested in its brief or oral argument that it violated § 8(a)(1) by soliciting Acres to engage in anti-union activity and by conditioning his re-employment upon his engaging in such activity. It is well established that an employer violates § 8(a)(1) by soliciting employees to engage in anti-union activity, and by conditioning the re-employment of discharged employees upon engaging in such activity. TRW-United Greenfield Division v. NLRB, 637 F.2d 410 (5th Cir. 1981); NLRB v. Wagner Iron Works, 220 F.2d 126 (7th Cir. 1955), cert. denied, 350 U.S. 981, 76 S.Ct. 466, 100 L.Ed. 850 (1956). Accordingly, the Board's finding that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) by soliciting Acres for anti-union activities and conditioning his re-employment on these activities is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole and is enforced without the necessity for further discussion. Dreis & Krump Manufacturing Co., Inc. v. NLRB, 544 F.2d 320 (7th Cir. 1976).

B. The No Distribution and No Solicitation Rule

The Board, relying on Essex International, Inc., 211 N.L.R.B. 749 (1974)[3] and C&W Mining Co., Inc., 248 N.L.R.B. 270 (1980), found that a shop rule prohibiting solicitation or distribution of any kind during working hours, without further refinement or definition by the employer and notice thereof to the employees, infringes on the employees' right to engage in union solicitation and distribution on their breaks and lunchtime, as set forth in Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 65 S.Ct. 982, 89 L.Ed. 1372 (1945).

Although our attention has not been directed to a case in this court explicitly addressing the specific issue of whether a prohibition of solicitation during working hours is impermissibly broad, we hold that the rule, in the absence of evidence that it was narrowly enforced and the employees were informed of such enforcement, is unlawfully broad. The rule is susceptible to an overly broad interpretation that would unlawfully infringe employees' rights by prohibiting solicitation and distribution of union materials from the beginning to the end of the workshift, including breaks and lunchtime. See generally W.W. Grainger, Inc. v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 1118 n.3 (7th Cir. 1978), enforcing 229 N.L.R.B. 161 (1977). The existence of an overly broad rule may violate § 8(a)(1) even without a showing that it had been enforced because its mere existence may chill the exercise of § 7 rights. Utrad Corp. v. NLRB, 454 F.2d 520, 523–24 (7th Cir. 1971). Accordingly, the Board's finding that the rule violated § 8(a)(1) is enforced by this court.

C. Threats of Discharge and Plant Closure for Union Activity

For the remaining § 8(a)(1) violations, the Board's order must be enforced if the Board's findings are supported by substantial evidence based on the record as a whole. Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951); American Diversified Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 640 F.2d 893 (7th Cir. 1981). Moreover, absent exceptional circumstances, credibility determinations made by the administrative law judge ordinarily will not be disturbed on review. Sarkes Tarzian v. NLRB, 374 F.2d 734 (7th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 839, 88 S.Ct. 64, 19 L.Ed.2d 102 (1967).

Again we note that the Company did not contest before the Board or before this court the administrative law judge's finding and conclusion that Reece had threatened in June to discharge anyone caught talking about a union. Nor did the Company contest the administrative law judge's finding and conclusion that Miller had threatened Birt that the Company would "close the door" before it would have a union. Under § 10(e) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976),[4] the Company's failure to object to these findings precludes review in this court absent a showing of extraordinary circumstances excusing its failure. NLRB v. Colonial Haven Nursing Home, Inc., 542 F.2d 691 (7th Cir. 1976). Under these circumstances, the Board is entitled to summary enforcement of that part of the order finding that Miller's threat and Reece's threat in June violated § 8(a)(1). Id.

As to Reece's alleged threats of plant closure in the Christmas party and on December 15, the Company first argues that the general testimony of several Company witnesses that they had never heard Reece make such threats should be credited over that of Acres as to the December 15 incident and that of Otis Cherry, Birt's brother-in-law, as to the Christmas party incident. Reece did not testify whether he made any of the alleged threats.

The administrative law judge specifically pinned his findings of these § 8(a)(1) violations on his evalution of the credibility and demeanor of the witnesses. The administrative law judge determined that Reece's failure to deny the statements supported both Acres' and Cherry's credibility. As further support of Cherry's credibility, the administrative law judge noted that Cherry continued to work for the Company, and concluded, "the undenied testimony of an employee whose livelihood is controlled by the employer against whom he testifies should be given credence." We see no exceptional circumstances which would warrant or reversal of the administrative law judge's credibility determination.

[3] The Board has since overruled Essex in part, on grounds that do not affect the present case. In Essex, the Board concluded that a prohibition against solicitation during working hours was presumptively invalid, but a prohibition against solicitation during working time was not. IN TRW Bearing Division v. Anderson, 257 N.L.R.B. No. 47 (July 3, 1981), [1980–81] Lab.L.Rep. (CCH) ¶ 18,164, the Board concluded that a prohibition against solicitation during working time was also presumptively invalid.

[4] Section 10(e), 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) (1976), provides in part:

> No objection that has not been urged before the Board, its member, agent, or agency, shall be considered by the court, unless the failure or neglect to urge such objection shall be excused because of extraordinary circumstances.

Credibility determinations aside, the Company, relying on Singer Co. v. NLRB,

429 F.2d 172 (8th Cir. 1970), contends that the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness cannot constitue substantial evidence on the record as a whole. However, Singer merely stands for the proposition that "the uncorroborated testimony of an untrustworthy and interested witness, who stands to profit from a back pay award, may be held under such facts and circumstances not to constitute substantial evidence on the record as a whole." Singer Co. v. NLRB, 429 F.2d 172, 180 (8th Cir. 1970), quoting NLRB v. Barberton Plastics Products, Inc., 354 F.2d 66, 69 (6th Cir. 1965). In light of all the circumstances in this case, we do not regard either Cherry or Acres as an untrustworthy witness. As the Board's opinion noted, Cherry had little to gain and much to lose from his testimony. Nor did he stand to gain personally from any back pay award. There is also sufficient indicia of Acres' trustworthiness as a witness for his testimony to constitute substantial evidence on the record as a whole. The Company advanced no basis for finding Acres untrustworthy other than his interest in the back pay award. Acres, as was the case with the witness in Singer, was a veteran, highly valued employee until the incidents leading to his discharge. He had no history of false statements or other misconduct. Accordingly, there was substantial evidence on the record as a whole for each of the Board's findings that the Company violated § 8(a)(1) by threats of discharge and plant closure for union activities.

Alternatively, the Company contends that, in any event, any alleged threats of plant closure made by Reece in the Christmas party were not threats but predictions of the economic consequences of union organization which fall outside the ambit of § 8(a)(1). See, e.g., NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). Cherry testified that Reece had stated "he couldn't afford to have a union in the place and pay discrimination wages; if he did he'd have to close the doors." An employer's prediction, however, > must be carefully phrased on the basis of objective facts to convey * * * demonstrably probable consequences or * * * a management decision already arrived at. * * * If there is any implication that an employer may * * * take action solely on his own initiative for reasons unrelated to economic necessity * * *, the statement is * * * but a threat of retaliation.

NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596, 600 (7th Cir. 1978), quoting NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1942, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

The Company made no effort in the hearing[5] to show that Reece's statement that "discrimination wages" would necessitate closing the plant, the only statement even arguably some form of economic prediction, was anything other than a threat. In this petition and before the Board, the only evidence of economic consequences asserted to justify Reece's statement is a statement in the Board's opinion that the Company was in difficult financial circumstances. Substantial evidence demonstrated that the intent and purpose of all three statements were, and were correctly determined by the Board to be, threats of retaliation.

Nor does the case of NLRB v. Larry Faul Oldsmobile Co., 316 F.2d 595 (7th Cir. 1963), cited by the Company, affect our decision. In Faul, a manager's statement that "he might as well as throw the place up for grabs" was made in response to a direct question as to the future of the company by an employee who had already been discharged. Under those circumstances, the court determined that the statement could not in any sense be interpreted as a threat against unionization to current employees. In this case, Reece's statement was made in a speech to current employees shortly after a union organizational drive. The Board was thus warranted in finding that the statement was coercive and thus violated § 8(a)(1).

---

[5] In its brief, the Company relied on testimony by Reece that the Company had been delinquent in payment of withholding taxes. Reece's statement, however, was not made in relation to his statement that unionization would force the plant to close; it was in response to General Counsel's introduction of a plea of guilty on July 30, 1979, to delinquency in payment of withholding taxes in order to impeach Reece's credibility.

D. Coercive Interrogation of Employees

Section 8(a)(1) does not per se prevent any employer from questioning employees about unionization efforts. NLRB v. C&P Plaza Department Store, 414 F.2d 1244 (7th Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 1058, 90 S.Ct. 756, 24 L.Ed.2d 754 (1970). Employee interrogation only becomes a § 8(a)(1) violation if the questions asked, when viewed and interpreted as the employee must have understood the questioning and its ramifications, could reasonably coerce or intimidate the employee with regard to union activities. NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596 (7th Cir. 1978). In determining the effect of an employer's interrogation on an employee, the court should consider, inter alia: (1) the background of the employer-employee relationship; (2) the questioner's identity; (3) the nature of the information sought; (4) the place and method of the interrogation; and (5) the truthfulness of the reply. First Lakewood Association v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 416 (7th Cir. 1978).

The Board based its finding of coercive interrogation on three separate incidents: the questioning by Bailey of Anna Caldwell on December 7, and the two episodes of Reece questioning Acres on December 15. On this petition and before the Board, the Company did not object to the Board's finding and conclusion that Reece's questioning of Acres constituted coercive interrogation in violation of § 8(a)(1). Once again, review in this court is precluded by 29 U.S.C. § 160(e) and that portion of the Board's order not contested is summarily enforced. NLRB v. Colonial Haven Nursing Home, Inc., 542 F.2d 691 (7th Cir. 1976).

The Company's only objection to the Board's findings of coercive interrogation relates to the interrogation of Anna Caldwell. The Company asserts that the questioning of Caldwell was not coercive and that the Board's inference that the questioning related to union activities was purely speculative.

We do not agree with either contention. The record demonstrates the presence of factors which fully justify the Board's finding of coercive interrogation in relation to union activities. Caldwell's reference to the union showed that she viewed the interrogation as related to union activities. As the Board's opinion noted, the interrogation occurred only one day after the search of Birt's locker, and one day before the union organizational meeting. The questions revolved around Caldwell's conversation with Acres, a leader of the organizational movement. The Company has never advanced any legitimate reason for the inquiry. From this evidence, the Board could justifiably infer that the questioning was for the purpose of obtaining information on union activities.

Regarding the coerciveness of the questioning, the questioning was conducted by Bailey, the plant manager, in his office and of an employee in a position with which he would ordinarily have no direct contact. After Caldwell's initial response, he pressured her to tell him what she and Acres had "really" been discussing. Under these circumstances, there was substantial evidence on the record as a whole for the Board to find that the questioning of Anna Caldwell was coercive interrogation in relation to union activities.

E. Surveillance of Union Activities

An employer violates § 8(a)(1) when it conveys to employees the impression that it is engaged in surveillance of their union activities. First Lakewood Association v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 416 (7th Cir. 1978). The Board's findings of surveillance were based on the locker search on December 5, the interrogation of Anna Caldwell on December 6, Miller's statement to Birt on December 8 that the Company knew about the union meeting the evening before, and Reece's conversation with Acres on December 15 in which he stated that he knew Acres and Birt were the union leaders.

For the reasons stated in the Board's opinion and previously in this opinion, we agree that Caldwells' interrogation conveyed to her a sense of surveillance of union activities and thus violated § 8(a)(1). As to the statements of Miller and Reece, we see no exceptional circumstances for overturning the Board's credibility determinination that these statements were in fact made. The Company, nevertheless, urges that none of these statements was sufficient to convey a sense of surveillance. Taking into consideration our limited scope of review, we must disagree. Miller's statement that the Company knew about the union meeting could create an impression of surveillance in that there was no showing how Miller knew about the meeting or whether it was general knowledge. Similarly, Reece's claim that he knew who the union leaders were could convey an impression of surveillance. Although our decision on Reece's and Miller's statements might have been different from that of the Board had our review been de novo, the Board's findings of improper surveillance based on these incidents is enforceable as supported by substantial evidence.

The Company voiced two objections to the Board's finding that the locker search violated § 8(a)(1). It argued that the search was not union related because it was necessitated by narcotics and alcohol problems and because it had occurred prior to the union organizational meeting. The administrative law judge expressly discredited the vague testimony of alcohol and drug problems, and we see no reason to overturn that determination. The Company's argument that the search could not be union related because it occurred prior to the meeting is frivolous. The Company clearly knew of Birt's union involvement prior to the actual meeting. For the reasons stated in the Board's opinion, therefore, there was substantial evidence demonstrating that the object of the search was a union-related document. Therefore, we find that there was substantial evidence for each of the Board's findings of improper surveillance.

F. The Christmas Bonus

The Board concluded that the "change to cash above the value of previous gifts during a union campaign, and at a time Respondent apparently was in difficult financial circumstances, without reasonable explanation thereof and in the context of other efforts to discourage union activity, persuades us that the Respondent was utilizing the occasion to impress on its employees that it was the source of benefits to them and gave the the cash bonus as an inducement to abandon union support." An employer violates § 8(a)(1) by conferring a benefit upon his employees to induce them to abandon union activity. NLRB v. Exchange Parts, Inc., 375 U.S. 405, 84 S.Ct. 457, 11 L.Ed.2d 435 (1964); NLRB v. Colonial Haven Nursing Home, Inc., 542 F.2d 691 (7th Cir. 1976). The determination of whether the granting of benefits stems from unlawful economic motives or is intended to discourage employee interest in organization is the kind of inference which is primarily for the Board. NLRB v. Colonial Haven Nursing Home, Inc., 542 F.2d 691 (7th Cir. 1976). The question on this review is not whether we would have interpreted the employer's intention as did the Board in the first instance but whether the Board's resolution of this factual issue is supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Universal Camera v. NLRB, 340 U.S. 474, 71 S.Ct. 456, 95 L.Ed. 456 (1951).

We cannot say that substantial evidence does not support the finding that the bonus was intended to induce employees to abandon the union. In finding an unlawful purpose, the Board may properly rely on such factors as the employer's knowledge of union activity, manifestations of anti-union animus, suspicious timing, and departures from past practice. Russel Newman Manufacturing Co. v. NLRB, 407 F.2d 247, 252 (5th Cir. 1969). There was evidence of each of these factors to demonstrate anti-union motivation. The Company's primary contention against enforcement is that there could be no disparate value and thus benefit between the Christmas bonus and past gifts because no cash value was assigned to prior gifts. It was certainly a reasonable inference from the evidence, and within the competence of the Board, to conclude that a bonus of $50.00 would exceed the value of a gift of fruit or a gift of a ham or a turkey. Although we think this issue is a close one, our limited scope of review requires us to uphold the Board's decision.

III. THE § 8(a)(3) VIOLATIONS

A. The Discharges of Birt and Acres

Section 8(a)(3) provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer "by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization * * *." 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(3) (1976). The crucial determination behind the fining of a § 8(a)(3) violation must be that the employer's discharge or layoff of employees was discriminatorily motivated. NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596 (7th Cir. 1978); Electri-Flex Co. v. NLRB, 570 F.2d 1327 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 911, 99 S.Ct. 280, 58 L.Ed.2d 256 (1978). Motivation is a question of fact to be determined by the Board from consideration of all the evidence and in making this determination the Board is free to rely on circumstantial, as well as direct evidence. NLRB v. Gogin, 575 F.2d 596 (7th Cir. 1978); W. W. Grainger, Inc. v. NLRB, 582 F.2d 1118 (7th Cir. 1978).

The Board concluded that Birt and Acres were discharged for their union activities and that the alleged slowdown was merely a pretext for the discriminatory discharges. The facts upon which the Board relied are set forth in detail in the opinion and need not be repeated at length here. The Board properly relied on evidence in the record of manifest hostility toward unionization combined with knowledge of the discharged employees' union activity, NLRB v. Tom Wood Pontiac, Inc., 447 F.2d 383 (7th Cir. 1971); coincidence in time between the employees' union activity and their discharges, Borek Motor Sales, Inc. v. NLRB, 425 F.2d 677 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 823, 91 S.Ct. 45, 27 L.Ed.2d 52 (1970), the employees' good work records, NLRB v. Henry Colder, 416 F.2d 750 (7th Cir. 1969), and implausible or shifting explanations for the employees' discharges, Satra Belarus, Inc. v. NLRB, 568 F.2d 545 (7th Cir. 1978). Of these factors, the last mentioned was the one most compellingly demonstrated by the evidence. No reason was given to Birt and Acres for the layoffs at the time. They were told they were being laid off for "lack of work" although they had work to do. The Company's contention that this reason was given so that Birt and Acres could draw unemployment was belied by the Company's initial attempt to defeat their claims for unemployment compensation. More importantly, a purported explanation for the admittedly false reason for the discharges fails to answer the question of the actual motivation for the discharges.

The first time that any potentially nondiscriminatory reason for the discharges was advanced by the Company was in the hearing before the administrative law judge. The reason advanced at that time was the purported slowdown conducted by Birt and Acres. Reece admitted he knew of this purported slowdown several months prior to December 8, and his explanation that he wanted to correct the problem through management is highly unconvincing in light of the lack of evidence from Miller or Bailey that any management action was actually taken by them as Reece contended. The administrative law judge explicitly discredited Reece's testimony on this point and there is no reason for overturning that determination.

Also, regardless of the legal status of the Company's representation,[*] the Company's refusal to comply with the terms of the settlement reinforces the Board's findings of illegal motivation. The Company claims that, although the slowdown was the cause for the discharge at the time it was made, it entered into a settlement not knowing it was a valid defense to the charges and withdrew when it found that it was a defense. It is inconceivable to this court, as it apparently was to the Board, that the Company believed if an employee, in fact, was discharged for an intentional slowdown, the intentional slowdown could not be valid grounds for dismissal. We must agree with the Board's interpretation of the evidence as demonstrating the Company's belated discovery of a hoped-for defense to the charges it was facing.

None of the evidence of this alleged slowdown serves to diminish the substantial evidence of discriminatory motivation behind the discharges or to support Reece's credibility as to his motivation. The testimony of the core room employees that cores were backed up in October and November cannot in and of itself establish that Birt and Acres were engaged in an intentional slowdown. Nor is there any evidence that any of these employees reported their observations to management personnel. Similarly, evidence that an employee with less experience than Birt and Acres had better production records in February and March of 1979 can, at best, be corroborative of other independent evidence of a slowdown. Such evidence of production in 1979 records is inconclusive in light of the many variables in production, most notably the several changes in production methods for the months in question.

[*] The parties devoted much of their argument to defining the nature of the Company's representation during the settlement proceedings. The Company contends it had no "legal counsel" until the hearing before the trial examiner. The Board, on the other hand, states that the Company had a "legal representative" from the time the charge was filed with the NLRB. We note only that the Company did have a "legal representative" from the time the charge was filed with the NLRB in the sense that it had permissibly designated someone to represent it throughout the proceedings. The precise nature of the representative's expertise is not before this court and is irrelevant to our determination in that we do not believe that the assistance of an attorney was necessary for the Company to realize that an employee could be lawfully discharged for an intentional refusal to work if that were, in fact, the cause of the discharge. Moreover, the Company's objection to Acres' and Birt's applications for employment benefits based on their "poor performance" indicates that the Company was aware that a slowdown could be just cause for discharge.

The Company's only direct evidence of the alleged slowdown were the gross sales figures for the final months of 1978 and Birt's scrap records for December. Noticeably, the Company does not point to anything in Acres' production records which showed any slowdown on his part. The significance of Birt's scrap records can be dismissed in that Reece admitted Birt's scrap records had "not much" to do with the decision to discharge him. From the records of gross sales, the figures show that the Company had relatively high sales and thus production in October and November, the two months of the purported slowdown. The lower sales in December are, at best, inconclusive, as they are also attributable to the closing of the foundry for Christmas and the closing of two production lines as a result of the discharges.

The only remaining items of evidence of the slowdown which merit discussion are the various threats supposedly made to other employees by Birt and Acres of a slowdown. Needless to say, evidence of threats of a slowdown is not tantamount to evidence of a slowdown having taken place. There is no evidence that these threats were conveyed to management prior to the discharges nor did Reece testify that he relied on these threats in making his decision. Yet, even if Birt and Acres did engage in a slowdown, Reece admitted that he believed all the molders participated in the slowdown. Reece's shifting justifications for the selection of Birt and Acres, the union organizational leaders, for discharge failed to convince the administrative law judge of Reece's credibility on this point, and we ultimately see no reason to overturn that determination. Our conclusion is reinforced by the undisputed fact that Reece offered Acres his former job if he would abandon the union.

For these reasons, we conclude that there was substantial evidence on the record as a whole for the Board's findings that the discharges of Birt and Acres were discriminatorily motivated and that the slowdown was merely an after-acquired pretext to obfuscate the actual anti-union motivation for the discharges.

C. The Discharges of Schumacher and Elder

It is agreed by the parties that the discharges of Birt and Acres cut off production on the molding lines to which Elder and Schumacher were assigned. As a result, Schumacher and Elder were temporarily laid off for lack of work until the Company was able to renew production on the molding lines. The administrative law judge concluded that Elder and Schumacher were laid off in violation of §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) because their layoffs were "part and parcel of Respondent's discriminatory acts."

Although the ostensible reason for Schumacher's and Elder's layoffs was lack of work, the direct proximate cause of the layoffs was the Company's unlawful discharges of Birt and Acres for their union activity. If it had not been for the unlawful discharges of Birt and Acres, Elder and Schumacher would not have been laid off. The two molding production lines were set up with Birt on one line and Acres on the other as molders. Elder and Schumacher's sole responsibility was to assist Birt and Acres in pouring the molds and shaking the molded pieces out of the mold. Thus, it was directly foreseeable that there would be no work for Elder and Schumacher at least temporarily if Birt and Acres were discharged.

The present issue of the Company's liability for Schumacher's and Elder's layoffs can best be analogized to the issue of liability in which innocent employees are laid off in mass with employees discharged for their union activities. In those cases, it is well established that a showing that the Company discharged each employee for union activities is not necessary for finding §§ 8(a)(1) and (3) violations if the cause of the discharges is anti-union activities. Dillingham Marine & Manufacturing Co. v. NLRB, 610 F.2d 319 (5th Cir. 1980); Merchants Truck Line, Inc. v. NLRB, 577 F.2d 1011 (5th Cir. 1978); Majestic Molded Products, Inc. v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 603 (2d Cir. 1964); NLRB v. Tesoro Petroleum Corp., 431 F.2d 95 (9th Cir. 1970); M. S. P. Industries, Inc. v. NLRB, 568 F.2d 166 (10th Cir. 1977).

Our holding on this very issue is a very limited one. Only when, as here, a directly foreseeable layoff would not have occurred but for the unlawfully discriminatory action, can the resultant layoff also constitute a violation of §§ 8(a)(1) and (3).

For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that the Board's findings and conclusions in their entirety were supported by substantial evidence on the record as a whole. Accordingly, the decision and order of the Board is

Pease Company v. NLRB

666 F.2d 1044 (6th Cir.), December 16, 1981; certiorari denied May 17, 1982—237 NLRB 1069

On petition to review Board Order

Before KENNEDY and JONES, Circuit Judges, and PHILLIPS, Senior Circuit Judge

1045

NATHANIEL R. JONES, Circuit Judge: The Pease Company (the Company) petitions this Court to review and set aside an order of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) directing the Company (1) to cease threatening employees that it would be futile to have a union represent them, (2) to cease its refusal to bargain collectively in good faith with the Ohio Valley Carpenters District Council, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (the Union), and (3) to offer strikers, whom the Board found to be unfair labor practice strikers, immediate reinstatement and back pay upon their unconditional application.[1] The Board has filed a cross-application for enforcement of its order. We find that the Board's order is not supported by substantial evidence in the record as a whole. We therefore grant the Company's petition and deny enforcement of the Board's order.

I.

The Company, an Ohio corporation, manufactures and sells prefabricated doors, houses and building products. The Union has represented the Company's production and maintenance employees since 1945. Until 1969 the Company operated with a single plant in Hamilton, Ohio. In that year a second plant was added in Fairfield, Ohio, and in 1974 a third plant was added in Hamilton, Ohio. The Union's representative status was extended to the new plants and employees in the three plants constitute a single bargaining unit.

The most recent contract between the Company and the Union was effective from March 1, 1974 through February 28, 1977. On November 1, 1976, the Union requested negotiations for a new contract and the parties agreed to begin negotiations on December 15. Since the Company is alleged to have engaged in mere surface bargaining, it is necessary to give the highlights of the eighteen bargaining sessions from December 15 to March 13, when the case was heard by the Administrative Law Judge (ALJ).[2]

At the first meeting, the Company made no substantive proposals, but proposed a six-point format for the negotiations: 1) the parties should be free to make proposals at any time; 2) they could change proposals at any time; 3) they could not trade language for money; 4) they should straighten out contract language first; 5) they should keep negotiations moving, without the necessity of a last-minute rush; and 6) they should regard all agreements as tentative until total agreement was reached. The Union went through approximately half of the 1974 contract and indicated proposed changes.

The day before the second meeting, on January 14, Operations Manager William Schnitzler attended a grievance meeting with the Union President, Jesse McVey, and the Union's Chief Negotiator, Edwin Swope. According to testimony by McVey and Swope before the ALJ, Schnitzler remarked at the close of the meeting that he would not have to hear any more grievances in eight weeks, when the present contract was due to expire. They also testifed that in December Schnitzler had made a derogatory remark to a subcontractor about union help, followed by the comment that in a couple of months he would not have to worry about it. These remarks were interpreted as an indication that the Company did not intend to reach agreement with the Union on a new contract.

[2] Reconstruction of the course of negotiations was made unduly difficult by the failure of the ALJ to provide a chronological account of the meetings. Though the ALJ stated that a "session-by-session, blow-by-blow recitation of the negotiations" would have served no useful purpose, 237 N.L.R.B at 1074, such a recitation would be the better practice where an allegation of surface bargaining has been made.

At the second session, on January 5, the Union introduced a proposal to limit the Company's right to subcontract. The Company made three major proposals: to limit seniority to the plant rather than the unit; to reduce the period of layoff status without loss of seniority from eighteen months to six months; and to increase the probationary period for new employees from thirty to ninety days. The parties did not reach agreement on any of these proposals.

On January 19, a third meeting was held. The Union modified its position on subcontracting, proposing that an employee displaced by subcontracting receive severance pay or be given the right to transfer to another Company plant without loss of seniority or other contractual rights. The Company modified its stance on the plant seniority issue with an offer to retain unit seniority for employees hired before April 1, 1969. The Company also sought equalization of overtime. Again no agreement on these proposals was reached.

Further meetings were held on February 1, 8, 18, 23 and 24. Subcontracting continued to be a major source of disagreement. The Company presented revisions of its proposals to establish plant seniority, to reduce the period of employee status on layoff and to reduce the role of seniority in the assignment of overtime. On February 18, the Company proposed a job reclassification scheme, and separate meetings were held to discuss its application to each of the three plants. On February 27, the Company proposed to delete the shop rules from the contract. The Union did not agree to any of these Company proposals. A federal mediator joined the negotiations on February 24 and urged the parties to present their economic proposals notwithstanding the extensive disagreements over contract language.

On February 25, the Union held a meeting to inform its membership of the progress of the negotiations and to take a strike vote. The employees voted to strike, and actually went out on strike on March 1, after an unproductive session on February 28.

The Union and the Company continued to meet after the strike. The Union submitted a wage proposal which called for a 42 percent wage increase over the term of the contract. The Company's proposal provided no wage increases and placed a cap on the cost of living adjustment clause contained in the previous contract. There was some movement on the probationary period issue. The Union suggested a forty-five day period, and the Company responded by lowering its suggested period from ninety to sixty days, but no agreement was reached. Similarly, on the issue of employee status during layoff, the Company proposed a one-year retention of employee status for senior employees and nine months for junior employees. The Union, however, would accept no reduction of the eighteen month retention period provided by the previous contract, having originally sought extension of the period to twenty-four months. On April 13, six weeks after the strike began, the Company tightened its previous positions. It withdrew its cost-of-living adjustment proposal, proposed that the Union security clause for employees hired after March 1 be eliminated, and proposed that supervisors be permitted to do unit work.

On April 29, the parties met, but agreed to meet again only if the mediator thought it necessary. By mid-June, the Company had hired about 220 replacements and all three unionized plants were in operation.

The Board, in agreement with ALJ, found that the Company had violated §§ 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) by failing to bargain in good faith with the Union. The Board, in disagreement with the ALJ, found that the statements alleged to have been made by Schnitzler also violated § 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening that union representation would be futile. The Board further found the strike an unfair labor practice strike from its inception.

II.

The Company contends that the Board's finding of a § 8(a)(1)[3] violation based on the two remarks attributed to Operations Manager Schnitzler is unsupported by substantial evidence. We agree.

---

[3] Section 8(a)(1) provides that:

It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

(1) to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 * * *.

Section 7 provides that:

Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 8(a)(3).

Jesse McVey, the Union President, and Edwin Swope, the Union's Chief Negotiator for a new contract, testified that in December 1976 Schnitzler made a derogatory remark about union help to an independent contractor working in the plant, followed by the comment that in a couple of months he would not have to worry about it. Schnitzler admitted making the derogatory remark but asserted that it was made in September and denied stating that soon he would not have to worry about union help. The ALJ credited Schnitzler's account. The Board nonetheless held that Schnitzler's derogatory remark, coupled with the statement that soon he would not need to worry about union help, which the ALJ found was not made, conveyed the message that the Company did not intend to engage in good faith bargaining and that bargaining therefore, would be futile.

The Board is free to find facts and draw inferences different from those of the ALJ, but the reviewing court has an obligation to examine more carefully the evidence in cases where a conflict exists. Larand Leisurelies, Inc. v. NLRB, 523 F.2d 814 (6th Cir. 1975). Here McVey and Swope both testified that Schnitzler's statement was made after December 15. But as the ALJ noted, this testimony was clearly in error because the independent contractor to whom the statement was made did not work for the Company after December 3. The ALJ credited Schnitzler's testimony that the statement was made in September, was limited to a derogatory comment about union help, and made no reference to the upcoming negotiations. 237 N.L.R.B. at 1073 n.2. Yet the Board, without explanation, reversed the ALJ and credited the testimony of Swope and McVey that Schnitzler stated that he would not have to worry about the Union after a couple of months anyway. This determination is unsupported by substantial evidence, because the evidence conclusively establishes that Schnitzler's derogatory remark was made from three to six months before the expiration of the contract, at a time when a further remark about not having to worry about union help in a couple of months would have been nonsensical.

Schnitzler's second statement was made on January 4, 1977. As he left a conference room at the end of a grievance meeting, Schnitzler remarked that in a couple more months he would not have to hear any grievances. Schnitzler testified that this statement only reflected his belief that someone other than he would listen to grievances under the new contract, because he was spending an increasing amount of time at the Company's new Denver facility. The ALJ, while finding that the statement implied that there would be no new union contract, did not find that Schnitzler implied a Company determination not to negotiate a contract in good faith. The Board, however, found a § 8(a)(1) violation, holding that the statement implied that bargaining, and thus union representation, would be futile.

This statement does not support a § 8(a)(1) violation. This was an isolated remark made to the Union President and its Chief Negotiator. The statement was ambiguous; an innocent interpretation is clearly consistent with the words used, while a threat is present only by a strained interpretation. Where, as here, there is no background of antiunion animus by an employer, trivial and ambiguous conversations between a company official and an employee cannot form the basis of a § 8(a)(1) violation. St. Louis Car Division v. NLRB, 439 F.2d 1145, 1148 (8th Cir. 1971); Broadway Motors Ford, Inc. v. NLRB, 395 F.2d 337, 340 (8th Cir. 1968). We therefore conclude that the Board's finding of a § 8(a)(1) violation on the basis of this statement is unsupported by substantial evidence.

III.

The ALJ began his discussion of the eighteen bargaining sessions with the observation that:

> General Counsel does not contend, nor does the evidence show, that the Company ever refused to meet at reasonable times or with reasonable frequency, or that the Company ever failed or refused to discuss a proposal. During the first five or six sessions, which extended into February, the parties met from 1 p. m. to 3:30 p. m., when the first shift ended, at which time the Union representatives indicated that they wished to leave. As the contract expiration date approached, the parties met with increased frequency. All issues eventually were discussed between > the parties, and the principal issues were discussed at length.

237 N.L.R.B. at 1074. Nonetheless, the ALJ and the Board concluded that the Company had failed to bargain in good faith, in that the Company had, in the Board's words:

> Determined that it would not negotiate a contract except on its own terms, which it knew would be unacceptable to the Union and would force the Union to strike.

237 N.L.R.B. at 1069.

The Company contends that the ALJ and the Board erred in not finding that the Company simply was engaged in lawful hard bargaining. We agree.

1049

The Company correctly notes that the "acceptability" of its proposals to the Union is the touchstone from which all the Board's findings of bad faith emanate. This approach has led the Board astray, because good faith bargaining does not require that Company to make proposals that are acceptable to the Union. Rather, the Company's duty to bargain is defined by § 8(d) of the Act, which states that:

> To bargain collectively is the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment, or the negotiation of an agreement, or any question arising thereunder, and the execution of a written contract incorporating any agreement reached if requested by either party, but such obligation does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession * * *.

Thus the Company may insist on a proposal, however unacceptable to the Union, and if the insistence "is genuinely and sincerely held * * * it may be maintained forever though it produce a stalemate." NLRB v. Herman Sausage Co., 275 F.2d 229, 231 (5th Cir. 1960). A lack of good faith may not be found merely because a party attempts to secure provisions that the other party deems unacceptable, but rather may be found only from "conduct clearly showing an intent not to enter into a contract of any nature." NLRB v. United Clay Mines, 219 F.2d 120, 125 (6th Cir. 1955).

The Board also errs when it predicates a finding of bad faith bargaining on the view that the Company's proposals forced the Union to strike. First, there is no indication that the Company would not have allowed the bargaining unit employees to keep working after the contract expired whlie negotiations continued. The Union's decision not to seek an extension merely reflected a determination that its interest would best be served by exerting economic pressure on the Company. Moreover, the decision by the Union to strike provides no evidence that the Company bargained in bad faith:

> [T]here is nothing in the Act which gives employees the right to insist on their contract demands, free from the sort of economic disadvantage which frequently attends bargaining disputes.

American Ship Building v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300, 313, 85 S.Ct. 955, 965, 13 L.Ed.2d 855 (1965). Thus employees have no right to insist that company proposals be acceptable to them without the need to resort to a strike to attempt to gain desired concessions.

The proper standard, then, is not whether the Company made proposals which were acceptable to the Union, but rather, whether the Company desired "to reach ultimate agreement, to enter into a collective bargaining contract." NLRB v. Insurance Agents, 361 U.S. 477, 485, 80 S.Ct. 419, 425, 4 L.Ed.2d 454 (1960). Our examination of the specific indicia relied on by the ALJ and the Board leads us to conclude that neither the proposals nor the tactics of the Company, nor the sum of its conduct, amounts to substantial evidence of bad faith.

The ALJ found that the six-point format proposed by the Company was used "as a means of thwarting and frustrating agreement," that the Company acted in bad faith by disclosing its proposals "bit by bit over the course of negotiations," and that the time spent in negotiations prior to the strike "was grossly inadequate to enable the parties to arrive at a contract." 237 N.L.R.B. at 1074. We disagree. The ALJ conceded that the Union agreed to the proposed format, and no contention is made that the Union ever requested a departure from that format. The ALJ found the prohibition against trading contract language for better economic terms particularly offensive, but again, there is no indication that the Union desired to do so or would have been prevented from making such a proposal. As regards the alleged inadequacy of time, the record clearly establishes that the Company had disclosed what the ALJ termed its "principal objectives" by the fifth session on February 8. 237 N.L.R.B. at 1072. The Company's only other major proposal, the job reclassification scheme, was introduced on February 18. This permitted sufficient time for separate meetings at each plant and the formulation of the Union's response, which was to reject the Company's proposals. Thus the fact that no agreement had been reached by March 1 cannot be attributed to unlawful tactics of the Company, but must instead be acknowledged as the result of each party exercising its right not to agree to the proposals of the other party.

The ALJ also faulted the Company for not making enough concessions on issues of substance and for not making those concessions the Company was prepared to offer at an earlier stage of the negotiations. The ALJ stated that:

> [A]lthough the Company submitted the plant-seniority proposal on January 6, it did not include a cutoff date until January 19, when it did so ostensibly to meet the Union's demand for protection of senior employees. This alleged concession was in any event more cosmetic than real, because employees with a seniority date prior to April 1, 1969, had such great seniority that they were virtually immune from economic layoff. Similarly, the Company made no real movement toward compromise on its proposal to reduce layoff status without loss of seniority from 18 months to 6 months. On March 14, 2 weeks after the strike began, the Company proposed a cutoff date of April 1, 1969, which would accord the senior employees layoff status for 1 year. In view of the Company's ostensible concen for senior employees and their virtual immunity from layoff, it is difficult to see why, if the Company were acting in good faith, it did not submit this cutoff date in its initial proposal, or soon thereafter. The Company made no movement in the direction of compromise on the real issue, i.e., layoff status of employees who faced a real possibility of layoff, until well after the strike began, when it verbally suggested the possibility of 9 months' layoff status for the junior employees with more than 18 months' seniority.

237 N.L.R.B. at 1074. This passage demonstrates the extent to which the ALJ wrongfully passed judgment on the timing and quality of the Company's concessions. As this Court has noted:

> Nothing in the labor law compels either party negotiating over mandatory subjects of collective bargaining to yield on its initial bargaining position; good faith bargaining is all that is required.

McCourt v. California Sports, Inc., 600 F.2d 1193, 1200 (6th Cir. 1979). The ALJ's notions of good faith notwithstanding, a party is not required to lead with its best offer; it is free to bargain. NLRB v. Katz, 369 U.S. 736, 82 S.Ct. 1107, 8 L.Ed.2d 230 (1962). Furthermore, there is nothing in the record to indicate that earlier concessions on these issues would have led to an agreement in light of the other substantial issues separating the parties.

Several substantive proposals made by the company were deemed to be indicative of its bad faith. These included the reduction of employee layoff status, the switch from unit to plant seniority, a longer probation period for new employees, modification of the method for assigning overtime, and the continuance of the Company's existing right to subcontract production. While unusually harsh and unreasonable proposals may support a finding of bad faith bargaining, NLRB v. Wright Motors, Inc., 603 F.2d 604 (7th Cir. 1979), the Company proposals challenged here do not meet this description.[4] The ALJ apparently believed that

[4] In Wright, the company's proposals supporting a finding of bad faith included (1) a guarantee of an "open shop," limiting the union's right to secure members and check off authorizations, (2) a management rights clause, not subject to the grievance procedure, which gave the company exclusive control over hours, work rules, and production, and allowed the company to shut down its business without regard to the effect on employees, (3) a no-strike, no-lockout clause which required the union to fine any employee who engaged in a prohibited work interruption, granted the company the right to seek an injunction and damages against the union without arbitrating the claim, made all union members liable individually and collectively for damages, and required the union to waive its legal right to remove a suit from state to federal court, (4) an article on arbitration providing only limited and permissive arbitration, and (5) a provision allowing the company to set hourly wage rates and to grant promotions at its sole discretion. 603 F.2d at 608 n.5.

In Continental Insurance Co. v. NLRB, 495 F.2d 44 (2d Cir. 1974), a finding of bad faith was predicated in part on (1) the company's refusal to recognize the union as the sole and exclusive bargaining representative unless the union agreed not to organize or represent other company em-since the Company offered no concessions in the area of subcontracting it was obliged to offer better concessions in the other areas. 237 N.L.R.B. at 1076. But the law is well settled that "the Board may not, either directly or indirectly, compel concessions or otherwise sit in judgment upon the substantive terms of collective bargaining agreements." NLRB v. American Insurance Co., 343 U.S. 395, 404, 72 S.Ct. 824, 829, 96 L.Ed. 1027 (1952). See also Gulf States Mfrs., Inc. v. NLRB, 579 F.2d 1298, 1318 (5th Cir. 1978), rev'd in part on other grounds, 598 F.2d 896 (5th Cir. 1979) (en banc); NLRB v. Tomco Communications, Inc., 567 F.2d 871, 877 (9th Cir. 1978).

The ALJ also found that the Company withdrew its prior cost-of-living proposal after the strike to ensure that no agreement was reached. We disagree. The offer was not withdrawn at a time when agreement was imminent; even if the offer had not been withdrawn, substantial disagreement would remain over both economic and non-economic issues. Moreover, the offer was not withdrawn until six weeks after the strike began. An employer has a right to withdraw proposals made before a strike to reflect the changed economic background. Omaha Typographical Union, No. 190 v. NLRB, 545 F.2d 1138 (8th Cir. 1976); NLRB v. Alva Allen Industries, Inc., 369 F.2d 310 (8th Cir. 1966).

Though we have reviewed seriatim various factors relied on by the Board for its determination that the Company has engaged in bad faith bargaining, we recognize that the ultimate finding of bad faith is based upon the totality of the circumstances. NLRB v. Milgo Industrial, 567 F.2d 540, 545 (2d Cir. 1977). We conclude, however, that this is simply a case of hard bargaining between two parties who used their respective economic power to their best advantage. We hold that there is not substantial evidence on the record as a whole to support the Board's finding that the Company failed to bargain in good faith in violation of § 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

The Board also found that the strike was an unfair labor practice strike. Inasmuch as we have determined that no unfair labor practice was committed by the Company, it follows that the strike was and continued to be an economic strike from its inception.

Accordingly, the Company's petition to review the Board's order is granted, and the Board's cross-petition for enforcement is denied.

ployees, (2) the company's insistence that arbitrators of grievances be picked exclusively by the company and (3) wage, vacation and severance pay proposals substantially less generous than the benefits provided to employees before the union was certified. 495 F.2d at 49.

In NLRB v. Johnson Manufacturing Co., 458 F.2d 453 (5th Cir. 1972), a finding of surface bargaining was based on the Company's insistence that the Company retain complete and exclusive control of wages and working conditions, with the Union required to relinquish its right to bargain prior to any change.

In NLRB v. Holmes Tuttle Broadway Ford, Inc., 465 F.2d 717 (9th Cir. 1972), the court found substantial evidence of bad faith where the Company, after months of bargaining leading to the Union's acceptance of its proposals, raised spurious objections to its own proposals, and then stated that it would only sign a contract of seven weeks duration.

The Company's proposals in the instant case, unlike the company proposals discussed above, are not harsh, vindictive or unreasonable.

lough, president of the international, the local insisted upon inclusion in the contract of the National Stabilization Agreement for the Sheet Metal Industry, which provided for a trust fund for the benefit of employees funded by employer contributions.

The association resisted the local's demand, and the local struck. After a month the association surrendered and agreed to a contract containing the trust fund. The union membership ratified the proposed contract and returned to work. The association and the local formally executed a three-year agreement incorporating the trust fund retroactively to August 1, 1974, the date of the strike. Thereafter the association filed unfair labor practice charges that form the basis for this case, alleging that the local, the international and Carlough violated §§ 8(b)(1)(B) and 8(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act ("NLRA"), 29 U.S.C. §§ 158(b)(1)(B) and 158(b)(3), by insisting to impasse on incorporation of the trust fund into the contract.[1]

The trust fund was established by the international in 1973 to provide supplemental economic assistance to "under-employed" union members. The Board found that the international's intention was "to achieve a rough approximation in disposable income and fringe benefits between union members who were fully employed and those who were unemployed, due to local economic conditions, for a substantial portion of the year." The trust fund was to be funded by contributions at 3% of total payroll wages from all sheet metal contractors who agreed to incorporate it into their collective bargaining agreements. The Sheet Metal Contractors Association of San Francisco was the first employer association to include the trust fund in a collective bargaining agreement, and, accordingly, it selected the first employer trustee. The portions of the trust fund agreement relevant to this proceeding are set forth in the margin.[2]

The Administrative Law Judge found that the provisions of the trust fund agreement precluded the association from "equal" representation in the administration of the fund, and the trust fund therefore violated § 302 of the Labor Management Relations Act ["LMRA"], 29 U.S.C. § 186.[3] The ALJ looked at other cases in

---

[1] The association also charged, and the Administrative Law Judge found, that the local, the international and Carlough violated §§ 8(b)(1)(B) and 8(b)(3) by insisting to impasse on incorporation of Article X, § 8 of the international's Standard Form Union Agreement, which provides that in the event the association and the local are unable to reach agreement on the terms of any future contract such terms will be submitted to arbitration by the National Joint Adjustment Board. This board is comprised of representatives of the international and the National Sheet Metal and Air Conditioning Contractors Association, to which the Central Florida association and its employer-members do not belong. This finding is not challenged.

[2] Section 1. UNION AND EMPLOYER TRUSTEES. The operation and administration of the fund shall be the joint responsibility of one Trustee appointed by the Employers and one Trustee appointed by the International Union. The number of Trustees may be changed from time to time but there shall always be an equal number of Employer and Union Trustees.

Section 4. TERM OF TRUSTEES. Each Trustee above named, and each successor Trustee shall continue to serve as such until his death, incapacity, resignation, or removal as herein provided. Employer Trustees may be removed and replaced at will by a majority of the then Employer Trustees and Union Trustees may be removed and replaced at will by the General President of the International Union.

Section 6. DESIGNATION OF EMPLOYER TRUSTEES BY EMPLOYER PARTIES. Any Employer who is or may become a party to this Agreement and Declaration of Trust agrees irrevocably to designate as its representative in the operation and administration of the Fund such Trustees as are named in said Agreement and Designation of Trust as Employer Trustees, together with their successors selected in the manner provided herein, and agrees to be bound by all the actions taken by the said Employer Trustees Pursuant to this Agreement and Declaration of Trust.

[3] Section 302, 29 U.S.C. § 186, provides in relevant part:

> (a) It shall be unlawful for any employer or association of employers or any person who acts as a labor relations expert, adviser, or consultant to an employer or who acts in the interest of an employer to pay, lend, or deliver, or agree to pay, lend, or deliver, any money or other thing of value—

which the Board had considered conduct that violated statutes other than the NLRA in finding an unfair labor practice[4] and reasoned that "[i]f it is right for the Board to consider violations of laws other than this entire statute, and in part predicate unfair labor practice findings upon such misconduct surely it may, and ought, take like heed of violations of related provisions of the very statute it is charged with enforcing." The ALJ concluded that by bargaining to impasse for a trust fund that violated § 302 of the LMRA, the international and the local had committed an unfair labor practice in violation of § 8(b)(3) of the NLRA.[5] The ALJ recommended that the Board order the international and local to delete the provisions for the trust fund from the 1974 contract or at the option of the association to void the entire agreement and renew the collective bargaining process; to refund any contributions made by members of the association to the trust fund; and to cease and desist from demanding the trust fund.

The Board did not adopt the ALJ's findings of fact and conclusions of law on the grounds that it lacked jurisdiction to interpret § 302 and that Congress had granted the federal district courts exclusive jursidiction to determine the structural validity of trust funds under § 302. As a general rule, the Board posited, it does not enforce other statutes except at the express direction of the Supreme Court as in Scofield v. NLRB, 394 U.S. 423, 89 S.Ct. 1154, 22 L.Ed.2d 385 (1969), where the Court held that the Board must assess union rules to determine if they frustrate the overriding policy of all federal labor law, not just the NLRA.[6] The Board pointed out that when considering other statutes at the Court's direction it only evaluates facial compliance with the statutes. In contrast the Board said neither the Court nor Congress had directed the Board to enforce § 302, which in the present case would require interpretation of complex multiemployer trust agreements.

(c) The provisions of this section shall not be applicable * * * (5) with respect to money or other thing of value paid to a trust fund established by such representative, for the sole and exclusive benefit of the employees of such employer, and their families, and dependents (or of such employees, families, and dependents jointly with the employees of other employers making similar payments, and their families and dependents): Provided, that (A) such payments are held in trust for the purpose of paying, either from principal or income or both, for the benefit of employees, their families and dependents, for medical or hospital care, pensions on retirement or death of employees, compensation for injuries or illness resulting from occupational activity or insurance to provide any of the foregoing, or unemployment benefits or life insurance, disability and sickness insurance, or accident insurance; (B) the detailed basis on which such payments are to be made is specified in a written agreement with the employer, and employees and employers are equally represented in the administration of such fund, together with such neutral persons as the representatives of the employers and the representatives of employees may agree upon * * *; and (C) such payments as are intended to be used for the purpose of providing pensions or annuities for employees are made to a separate trust which provides that the funds held therein cannot be used for any purpose other than paying such pensions or annuities, * * *.

(d) Any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment for not more than one year, or both.

(e) The district courts of the United States and the United States courts of the Territories and possessions shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, and subject to the provisions of section 381 of Title 28 (relating to notice to opposite party) to restrain violations of this section, without regard to the provisions of [the Norris-LaGuardia Act].

The ALJ stated:

No employer except employers who participated in the initial establishment of SASMI may participate in the selection of any employer trustees; by contrast, the International Association retains such a right to remove and select union trustees from time to time. There is an inequality of representation in that the General President of the International may remove and replace the union's trustees at will, whereas the employers have no comparable right. Thus, the removal and replacement of employer trustees may be had only by a majority vote of the preselected "employer trustees" and not by any action whatsoever of the employers themselves. Thus, there is basis for concluding the increase in the number of trustees can be so manipulated by the union president as to control the majority of trustees. All the International President need do is refuse to agree to an increase in the number of employer trustees unless he approves the person advanced by the "employer trustee."

Section 6 of [SASMI] concerning the selection of trustees to the Fund on the part of employers makes a mockery of the idea that the Florida employers could have the least voice in any selection of who should represent them as employers. For them to be bound "irrevocably to designate" the trustee already named in the original Trust Agreement back in 1973 means McKenzie, the man put on the trustee board in California, forever pre-empts the entire matter. The reality is that they never had any choice and it was intended that they should never have any choice.

(3) to refuse to bargain collectively with an employer * * *.

[6] As a result of the Scofield mandate, the Board explained, it found that the union in Carpenter Local Union No. 22, 195 NLRB 1 (1975), had restrained and coerced a member in retaliation for his complaining about the conduct of an intraunion election in violation of his right to participate freely in internal union affairs guaranteed by the LMRA.

(1976), from its decision in the present case. In Boyle the employer had refused to appoint a trustee to administer a trust fund, even though he had agreed to the collective bargaining agreement that provided for the trust fund. The Board did not adopt the ALJ's finding that the employer had refused to bargain in good faith or his recommendation that the employer be compelled to comply with the trust provisions. Instead, because the proposed trust fund violated § 302(c)(5)(C) by mixing pension benefits with other fringe benefits, the Board held that the employer had not refused to bargain in good faith. In the present case the Board explained that it had merely used § 302 as an aid in Boyle to determine whether the employer had refused to bargain collectively in violation of § 8(a)(5). However, in Central Florida, the Board had the view that it would first have to determine the validity of the trust fund under § 302 and then predicate an unfair labor practice finding upon any such violations.

The Board acknowledged its obligation to accommodate other statutory policies in administering the NLRA. It discerned an intent by Congress to compel compliance of trust funds with the requirements of § 302 without depriving the employees of their benefits. This intent the Board said could only be achieved by the district courts, which have the equitable powers to correct technical defects in a fund without disturbing employer contributions and employee benefits. By contrast, the Board only has the power to jettison the whole trust fund from the collective bargaining agreement. Therefore, the Board concluded, it would not extend its jurisdiction to determine the validity of the trust fund under § 302.

The Board also decided the association's other claims, which the ALJ had found unnecessary to address.[7] The Board found that the employer-appointed trustee of the trust fund was not a collective bargaining agent of the employer within the meaning of § 9 of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 159, and that the trustee's sole responsibility is to the employees as a fiduciary. Thus, although the association had been denied the choice of a trustee, who had been appointed by the first participating employers association, by striking for the trust fund the union local had not coerced the members of the association in violation of § 8(b)(1)(B).

Second, the Board held that the general counsel had not sustained the burden of proving that the trust fund authorizes strike benefits. The Board reviewed the trust documents and found no mention of strike benefits and no evidence that the trustees interpreted the trust agreement to authorize such benefits.

Finally, the Board held that the trustee designation clause was a mandatory subject of bargaining. The Board noted that the payments from the trust fund were clearly wages within the meaning of § 8(d),[8] and concluded that the trustee designation scheme was "inextricably interwoven and subservient" to the trust fund as a whole because multi-employer, industrywide trust funds, which cannot add a trustee for every employer who participates, afford greater financial benefits to the employees.

The association raises the following as error:

1. The Board erred in deciding it lacked jurisdiction to rule upon the validity of the trust fund under § 302. To the contrary, the Board has the statutory authority and obligation to assess the legality of a trust under § 302(c)(5) in determining whether the fund is an illegal subject of collective bargaining.

2. The Board erroneously concluded that trustees are not collective bargaining agents of the parties who appointed them.

3. In holding that the trust fund did not authorize strike benefits, which would render it a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, the Board ignored the evidence and contrary federal law under § 302(c)(5)(A).

4. The Board erred in finding the trustee designation clause a mandatory subject of bargaining.

[7] The association raised three other claims: (1) the trust fund, which denied the association the right to select its own trustee, coerced the association in its selection of a collective bargaining representative in violation of § 8(b)(1)(B); (2) the trust fund is a nonmandatory subject of bargaining over which the union cannot strike because it permits payment of strike benefits; and (3) the trustee designation clause is a nonmandatory subject of bargaining because it pertains solely to the relationship between a party and its representative.

[8] "For the purposes of this section, to bargain collectively is the performance of the mutual obligation of the employer and the representative of the employees to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment * * *."

Even though the benefits payments from the fund are a mandatory subject of bargaining the trustee selection mechanism is an independent clause that does not relate directly to the employer/employee relationship.

We affirm the Board's decision.

I. Jurisdiction of the Board to determine validity of a § 302 trust.

We are reviewing the Board's decision that the union did not commit an unfair labor practice under § 8(b)(3) by bargaining to impasse for a trust fund alleged by the association to violate § 302 of the LMRA. This issue presents problems of the interplay between the NLRA, which the Board administers, and the LRMA, which the district courts enforce. The issue can be divided as follows: Did the Board interpret § 8(b)(3) correctly and did it properly accommodate § 302 in its interpretation? When presented with a question of statutory construction of the NLRA this court defers to the interpretation given the statute by the Board as the agency charged with its enforcement if that interpretation is reasonable and consistent with prior holdings, Bayside Enterprises, Inc. v. NLRB, 429 U.S. 298, 304, 97 S.Ct. 576, 581, 50 L.Ed.2d 494 (1977); Udall v. Tallman, 380 U.S. 1, 16, 85 S.Ct. 792, 801, 13 L.Ed.2d 616 (1965).

Sections 8(a) and (b) respectively define employer and union unfair labor practices. In addition to prohibiting specific acts § 8 also incorporates the rights and requirements of §§ 7 and 9 of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. §§ 157 and 159.[9] Section 8(b)(3) makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to refuse to bargain collectively with an employer representative who has a concomitant duty to bargain under § 8(a)(5). Section 8(d) defines collective bargaining as meeting and conferring in good faith with respect to "wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment," the so-called mandatory subjects of bargaining.

The Board has consistently held that a violation of § 302 of the LMRA is not ipso facto an unfair labor practice. Cheney California Lumber Co., 130 NLRB 235, 240 (1961); affirmed, 319 F.2d 375 (9th Cir. 1963); Baggett Industrial Contractors, 219 NLRB 171, 172 (1975). This is a reasonable interpretation of § 8, and the association does not challenge it. That section contains the exclusive acts that constitute an unfair labor practice while a violation of § 302 is a criminal act, a misdemeanor, § 302(b).

The association contends, however, that the union's insistence on the inclusion of an illegal contract provision, in this case the trust fund, within the collective bargaining agreement amounts to a refusal to bargain in good faith. In this manner, the association argues, the Board would be enforcing the NLRA and not § 302.

The proposition that striking for an illegal contract provision is a refusal to bargain in good faith is not beyond dispute. It has generally been applied in cases where the illegal contract provision violates another part of § 8.[10] The right of an employer to be free from economic coercion by the union to implement an illegal contract term is at least within the realm of protection afforded in § 8. However, if the Board were to extend such protection whenever a contract provision is alleged to violate any statute, two problems might arise. First, the Board would be interpreting and, in effect enforcing, statutes in areas outside of its expertise.[11] Second, the Board's limited method of enforcement might conflict with another statute's enforcement scheme.

[9] For example, neither employers nor unions may interfere with an employee's exercise of rights guaranteed in § 7, see §§ 8(a)(1) and 8(b)(1)(A). A union may not force an employer to bargain with one union when another union has been certified under the provisions of § 9, see § 8(b)(4)(C).

[11] In NLRB v Amax Coal Co., —— U.S. ——, —— n. 21, 101 S.Ct. 2789, 2798 n. 21, 69 L.Ed.2d 672, 685 n. 21, the Court noted that if the administration of trust funds were considered "collective bargaining" within the meaning of § 8(d), the Board would have to review the actions of the trustees to determine if they were bargaining in good faith under § 8(a)(5). This, said the Court, would force the Board to regulate areas not committed to it by Congress.

The Board's decision in the present case that it has no jurisdiction to determine the validity of a § 302 trust fund is not entirely consistent with its past decisions addressing allegations of § 302 violations. In Cheney California Lumber Co., supra, a union struck to compel the employer to agree to a health and welfare trust proposal contended by the employer to violate § 302. The Board did not adopt the trial examiner's finding that the proposal did not provide the safeguards required by § 302 because the evidence showed that the union was striving for a legal trust and further negotiations on the trust were contemplated. The Board observed that it did not have direct responsibility for enforcing § 302 and stated that, in the absence of a determination of the trust proposal's illegality by the agency charged with enforcing § 302, it was "not prepared to say that [the union's] insistence thereon constituted a refusal to bargain in good faith." 130 NLRB at 241–42. In John F. Boyle Co., 222 NLRB 1309 (1976), the Board rejected the ALJ's finding that the employer had refused to bargain in good faith when it would not appoint a trustee to administer the trust proposed in the collective bargaining agreement it had signed. The Board pointed out that the trust proposal, which contemplated one fund for both pension and welfare benefits, violated § 302 on its face.[12] Therefore, the Board concluded, it would not order employer compliance with the collective bargaining agreement that would result in establishing a clearly illegal trust fund.

By speaking in terms of jurisdiction the Board throws its past decisions into doubt. Jurisdiction is either present or absent. Lack of jurisdiction is inconsistent with John F. Boyle Co., where the Board examined the trust fund documents to determine if the proposed trust comported with § 302 requirements. The problem is properly addressed in terms other than jurisdiction. We instead focus on the Board's authority to define a refusal to bargain as including union insistence upon a contract provision that may violate a statute other than the NLRA. The Board might have adopted two extreme positions: premising a refusal-to-bargain charge upon union insistence on a contract term that violates any statute, or restricting a refusal-to-bargain charge solely to union insistence upon a contract term that violates the NLRA. It appears to us that the Board has chosen a compromise between the two extremes—that a union may bargain to impasse over a trust fund that may violate § 302 unless a court has already determined the fund's illegality or the illegality is evident on the face of the documents.

In this case the Board stressed that the alleged violation of § 302 hinged upon an in-depth analysis of a complex multi-employer trust fund. At the time of the Board's decision there had been no finding of a trust fund's illegality by a district court, except for findings of fact made pursuant to the issuing of a preliminary injunction in Mobile Mechanical Contractors Association, Inc. v. Carlough, 382 F.Supp. 1134 (S.D.Ala. 1974). These findings, the Board held, were provisional and had no collateral estoppel effect in other judicial proceedings. Record 489 n. 10.

Several factors make the Board's decision reasonable and consistent with past decisions. Bayside Enterprises, Inc. v. NLRB, supra. First, because management and union are equally represented the trustee selection process does not clearly or obviously violate § 302(c)(5)(B). The disparate means of replacing trustees permit employers to contribute without sacrificing stability of administration. If this structure is invalid the invalidity is not readily discernible on the face of the documents. Second, the trust fund is a multi-employer fund that was already functioning and to which the association members were contributing when the complaint was brought. Given the difficulty of the question involved, the Board was understandably reluctant to declare this large trust fund illegal, interfere with the bargaining process, and deprive employees of their benefits based upon its own interpretation of a law in which it has no special expertise.

Our finding that the Board's interpretation of § 8(b)(3) was reasonable does not end the inquiry. The Supreme Court has cautioned the Board to accommodate its administration of the NLRA to other statutory schemes in light of the entire scope of Congressional purpose in labor law. Southern Steamship Co. v. NLRB, 316 U.S. 31, 62 S.Ct. 886, 86 L.Ed.2d 1246 (1942) (Board's reinstatement of striking seamen unlawfully discharged ignored Congressional mandate to punish seamen who disobey their employer for mutiny). The association argues that by refusing to determine the validity of the trust fund under § 302 the Board undermined the purpose of that section because its non-action would permit the union to coerce the employer to make illegal payments to union representatives.

[12] Section 302(c)(5)(C) requires pension benefits to be kept in a separate trust.

The Board's decision does not frustrate either the purpose or enforcement scheme of § 302. Courts have recognized Congress' intent with respect to existing trust funds to ensure the continued flow of benefits to the trust beneficiaries despite structural flaws in the trust. National Stabilization Agreement of the Sheet Metal Industry Trust Fund v. Commercial Roofing & Sheet Metal, 655 F.2d 1218 (D.C. 1981), pet. for rehearing denied, June 17, 1981 (unpublished) (employer cannot raise the invalidity of the trustee selection process as a defense to a collections action brought in district court for refusing to contribute to the same trust fund in the present case; employer may still bring an action in district court to cure structural defects). As the Board observed, its cease and desist powers to remedy an unfair labor practice cannot cure defects in the trust fund but can only enjoin payments and further demands for the fund. In comparison, a district court can enforce compliance with § 302 by eliminating the invalid provisions of the trust. Associated Contractors of Essex County, Inc. v. Laborers Int'l Union, 559 F.2d 222, 225 (3d Cir. 1977).[13]

Nothing in the Board's ruling before us prevents or discourages the association from seeking relief in the district court. The Board simply refused to relieve the members of the association from their obligation to contribute to the trust fund or to impose cease and desist sanctions against the local for demanding the trust fund.[14]

Where the Board has predicated in part an unfair labor practice upon a violation of another statute the Board found that the other statute's policies would be frustrated if, for example, an employer action has the effect of discouraging access to another agency to file complaints, see, e.g., Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975) (discharge of employee for complaining to the Occupational Safety and Health Administration is a restraint on concerted activity even though the employee had not acted with other employees because the purpose of OSHA is to benefit all employees). A union fine against a member for complaining about an intraunion election procedure frustrated the policy of the LMRA that permits employees to participate freely in internal union affairs, Carpenters Local Union No. 22, 195 NLRB 1 (1972).

We defer to the Board's interpretation of § 8(b)(3) that the strike by the union for the trust fund was not a refusal to bargain in good faith. The Board's application of the statute is reasonable and consistent with past decisions. NLRB v. Pipefitters, 429 U.S. 507, 97 S.Ct. 891, 51 L.Ed.2d 1 (1977).

II. Trustees as collective bargaining agents

NLRB v. Amax Coal Co., ——— U.S. ———, 101 S.Ct. 2789, 69 L.Ed.2d 672 (1981), disposes of the association's argument that by striking for the trust the union coerced the employer's choice of a collective bargaining agent. In Amax, an employer who ran deep-shaft coal mines participated in a national multi-employer trust fund, the employer-appointed trustee of which had been selected by a coal operators association to which the employer belonged. The employer subsequently opened a surface mine with respect to which its membership in the association did not apply. The employer refused to contribute to the trust fund on behalf of the surface mine employees and the union struck. The operators association had already been chosen by the management trustee. The employer charged the union with an unfair labor practice, contending that the union was coercing it in its selection of a collective bargaining agent in violation of § 8(b)(1)(B). The Court unequivocally rejected this argument by holding that a trustee acts solely as a fiduciary and cannot administer the trust fund in the interest of the party who appointed him. ——— U.S. at ——— - ———, 101 S.Ct. 2794–95,

[13] The Board's decision in John F. Boyle Co., supra, which did not compel an employer to establish a trust fund that clearly did not comport with § 302, also accommodated § 302. Congress did not intend to force employers to contribute to trust funds not yet established. Bricklayers, Masons and Plasterers Int'l Union v. Stuart Plastering Co., 512 F.2d 1017 (5th Cir. 1975); NLRB v. St. Louis Cordage Mills, 424 F.2d 976 (8th Cir. 1970). Where a trust fund has not been established there is no interest in continued benefits, although in St. Louis Cordage Mills, the court ordered the Board to fashion a remedy requiring the employer to pay the amount due into a fund not administered by the decertified union to ensure the employees would derive benefits. 424 F.2d at 981.

[14] Whether the district courts can enjoin a strike for a trust fund that violates § 302 has never been properly brought to this court. See Mobile Mechanical Contractors Ass'n v. Carlough, 566 F.2d 1213 (5th Cir. 1977) (issue moot).

69 L.Ed.2d at 680–81. Bargaining to impasse to compel the employer to join the trust fund where the employer cannot choose the management trustee was not an unfair labor practice.

The association contends that Amax is not controlling because the Court's holding that an employer-appointed trustee is not a collective bargaining agent is premised on a valid trustee selection process. The association brings forward several reasons which it says demonstrate that the trustee selection process in the present case is not valid. First, in Amax, although the individual employer could not appoint the trustee, the operators association to which it belonged had the opportunity to choose the trustee, while in this case the association had no voice in selecting a trustee because the first participating employers association already had chosen the sole management trustee. Second, the international president, Carlough, had helped select the sole management trustee.[15] Finally, Carlough himself serves as the union-appointed trustee and, the association says, cannot divorce his union responsibilities from his fiduciary obligations when administering the trust fund.

We hold that these asserted differences do not cause the trustees of the trust fund in this case to function as collective bargaining agents. A trust fund could not operate if each late-joining employer or association of employers could upset an earlier choice of a management trustee on the ground it had no opportunity to participate in the selection. Although Carlough was appointed by the union, he is required to administer the trust as a fiduciary and in the sole interest of the employees. With respect to union participation, through Carlough, in the selection of the management trustee, even if the participation is to a degree prohibited by § 302, the trustee must still serve as a fiduciary with his sole obligation running to the employees. As we pointed out in Part I, the proper remedy for alleged unequal representation in the selection mechanism is for the association to bring an action in district court. The asserted defects that are said to distinguish this case from Amax do not diminish the duty of trustees, whether management-appointed or union-appointed, to serve as fiduciaries nor do the defects permit the trustees to act as collective bargaining agents. One violation of § 302 cannot justify another.

III. Strike benefits as a nonmandatory subject of bargaining

The trust fund pays benefits to "involuntarily underemployed" workers. The association argued that striking union members could receive benefits for being involuntarily underemployed. A union cannot bargain to impasse for strike benefits because they do not come within the scope of wages or other mandatory subjects of bargaining listed in § 8(d), Operating Engineer, Local 12, 187 NLRB 430, 432 (1970). Payment of strike benefits from an employer-funded trust violates § 302, which lists the type of permissible payments. See Carpenters v. Delaware Contractors Ass'n, 344 F.Supp. 1281, 1285 (D.Del.1972), aff'd, 477 F.2d 564 (3d Cir. 1973) (Congress impliedly prohibited payments to union representatives not specifically excepted).

After reviewing the trust fund documents and other evidence presented to the ALJ the Board found that the documents did not explicitly provide for strike benefits and the trustees had not so interpreted them. The possibility that trust payments could be made to strikers under the guise of involuntary underemployment did not transform the trust fund into a nonmandatory subject of bargaining. Thus the general counsel had not met his burden of proving an unfair labor practice.

The association also contends that the Board erroneously placed the burden of proof on the general counsel instead of the union, which has the burden of establishing a trust's strict conformity with § 302 requirements. Further, the association asserts that the Board ignored Congressional intent to eradicate even the possibility that an employer would contribute to "union war chests." See, e.g., United Marine Division v. Essex Transportation Co., 216 F.2d 410, 412 (3d Cir. 1954).

Consistent with our findings in Part I, absent a prior court determination or explicit violation it is reasonable for the Board to refuse to premise an unfair labor practice on the fact that the payment structure might violate § 302. This holding does not end the inquiry because the Board must still determine whether the trust fund contemplates strike benefits, rendering it a nonmandatory subject of bargaining under § 8(d). It is appropriate for the Board to look to § 302 as an interpretive aid for detecting whether strike benefits are contemplated just as it looked to § 302 to determine if the trustees could be considered collective bargaining agents as that term is used in § 8(b)(1)(B). But the Board need not apply § 302 evidentiary standards (which determine when a trust fund is invalid for not safeguarding against the payment of strike benefits) to § 8 proceedings to determine if the union is bargaining for strike benefits, particularly when those standards conflict with established § 8 evidentiary standards. The possibility that a fund may be used to provide surreptitious strike benefits is sufficient for a court to 501 find the fund violates § 302, Carpenters v. Delaware Contractors Ass'n, supra, but it is not a sufficient basis upon which to premise an unfair labor practice. Section 8 places the burden of establishing an unfair labor practice on the general counsel who must prove an actual, not a potential violation. Chevron Oil Co. v. NLRB, 442 F.2d 1067, 1069 (5th Cir. 1971).

[15] The district court so held in the companion case, Mobile Mechanical Contractors Association, Inc. v. Carlough, 456 F.Supp. 310 (S.D.Ala.1978), affirmed on other grounds, ——— F.2d ——— (5th Cir. 1981). We accept this finding as correct for purposes of the present case.

Under this standard we find adequate support in the record for the Board's decision. The only tangible evidence that strike benefits were contemplated comes from a representative of the international who told an association member that funds would be disbursed during a strike only if the strike occurred during the two annual disbursement periods.[16] Before making this statement the representative assured the member that payment would be made in strictest compliance with federal law.[17] The Board's conclusion that this evidence did not establish an unfair labor practice was reasonable.

IV. Trustee selection process as a mandatory subject of bargaining

Only contract provisions that pertain to the employer-employee relationship are considered mandatory subjects of bargaining over which a union may strike. Allied Chemical & Alkali Workers v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 404 U.S. 157, 178, 92 S.Ct. 383, 397, 30 L.Ed.2d 341 (1971). The association contends that the employer's selection of a trustee does not affect the benefits paid out, or any other term or condition of employment, and cannot be considered a mandatory subject of bargaining.

The Board's judgment as to what constitutes a mandatory subject of bargaining is entitled to considerable deference, Ford Motor Co. v. NLRB, 441 U.S. 488, 495, 99 S.Ct. 1842, 1848, 60 L.Ed.2d 420 (1979), and we find its reasoning persuasive. A multi-employer trust fund can provide greater benefits from a larger pool of money. But the size of the fund may present problems of administration. To provide an efficient yet stable administration the trustee selection process must be carefully structured. If all employers could select and remove trustees the trust fund could not function. Thus the record supports the finding by the Board that a sufficient nexus existed between the trustee selection mechanism and the benefits. The Board's decision is consistent with its earlier decisions in United States, etc., Local No. 220, 177 NLRB 632 (1969) (union's demand that an employers association participate in a regional trust fund in which the association could select only two of the six employer trustees is a mandatory subject of bargaining); Carpenters, Local 964, 181 NLRB 948 (1970), enforced, 447 F.2d 643 (2d Cir. 1971) (union demand that employer trustees of a welfare fund be selected from an explicit class of employers was beyond mandatory scope of bargaining where the union had not articulated any connection between the trustee selection and benefits).

The Board's interpretation of § 8(d) does not conflict with or fail to accommodate § 302 by permitting the union to participate in the selection of the employer-appointed trustee. In Amax, ——— U.S. at ———, 101 S.Ct at 2800–01, 69 L.Ed.2d at 688, the Supreme Court declined to hold that § 8(b)(1)(B) limits the freedom of a union to try to induce an employer to select a particular trustee, because the NLRA and the LMRA have different purposes and standards to enforce. The Court also noted that to prevent the union from striking to obtain an employer's participation in a multi-employer trust fund when the employer objects to the trustee selection mechanism would hinder Congressional policy in favor of multi-employer trust funds. Id. ——— U.S. at ——— n. 22, 101 S.Ct. at 2799 n. 22, 69 L.Ed.2d at 686 n. 22. If the selection process violates § 302 the association can seek relief in a district court.

In summary, we affirm the Board's decision that the strike to obtain the trust fund was not a refusal to bargain in good faith despite alleged structural defects in the trust; that the union did not attempt to coerce the employer's choice of a collective bargaining representative; that the union did not strike over strike benefits that are a nonmandatory subject of bargaining; and that the trustee designation clause was a mandatory subject of bargaining.

The order of the Board is AFFIRMED.

California Dump Truck Owners Association v. NLRB

On petition to review Board Order

Before ELY and NORRIS, Circuit Judges, and COPPLE,* District Judge

NORRIS, Circuit Judge: We are called upon in this case to review an order of the NLRB declaring a provision in a collective bargaining agreement to be an unfair labor practice under § 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(e) (1976). The Board invalidated article XIII of the Master Labor Agreement between unions and contractor-employers in the Southern California construction industry because it prohibited general contractors from hiring non-union dump-truck owner-operators. The unions petition to deny enforcement of the Board's order, and the Board seeks a judgment of enforcement.[1] The owner-operators seek an order directing the Board to grant a make-whole remedy requiring the unions to reimburse them for initiation fees and dues paid to the unions, and for income lost by those truck owners who were denied work. We enforce the Board's order, but remand with directions to the Board to fashion a make-whole remedy or show cause why a make-whole remedy is inappropriate.

309

I.

Section 8(e) prohibits agreements between unions and employers that require a self-employed person to join the union in order to work for the employer.[2] A construction industry proviso to § 8(e) carves out an exception for "work to be done at the site of the construction." Our inquiry is whether the Board erred in ruling that the operation of the owner-operated dump trucks in question is not on-site work within the meaning of the § 8(e) proviso.[3]

The facts are not in dispute. The dump truck operators haul materials from construction sites to remote dump sites, from "borrow" pits to construction sites, and from one construction site to another construction site. The truck owners spend most of their time on public roads away from the construction site. The only time spent at the construction site is during loading and unloading, when the dump truck operator ordinarily remains in his vehicle. See Joint Council of Teamsters No. 42, et al., 248 N.L.R.B. 808, 816–17 (1980).

On these facts, the Board found that the owner-operators are delivery persons, not construction site workers, and therefore their work is not covered by the on-site proviso. That finding is consistent with Board findings in similar cases involving delivery of goods to a construction site. See Drivers Local 695 v. NLRB, 361 F.2d 547, 552 n.19 (D.C.Cir.1966). In doubtful situations, we give weight to the Board's application of the Act, NLRB v. Denver Building and Construction Trade Council, 341 U.S. 675, 692, 71 S.Ct. 943, 953, 95 L.Ed. 1284 (1951); where, as here, the situation is not doubtful, we readily enforce the Board's order.

*The Honorable William P. Copple, United States District Judge for the District of Arizona, sitting by designation.

[1] The general contractors intervene in support of the Board's position; they are represented by the Associated General Contractors of California, Inc., the Building Industry Association of California, the Engineering Contractors Association, and the Southern California Contractors Association. The unions include the Joint Council of Teamsters No. 42, et al. The truck owners are represented by the California Dump Truck Owners Association and the Associated Independent Owner-Operators, Inc. The proceedings below are reported at Joint Council of Teamsters No. 42, et al., 248 N.L.R.B. 808 (1980).

[2] Section 8(e) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 158(e) (1976), provides that: "It shall be an unfair labor practice for any labor organization and any employer to enter into any contract * * * whereby such employer * * * agrees to * * * cease doing business with any other person * * * Provided, that nothing in this subsection shall apply to an agreement between a labor organization and an employer in the construction industry relating to the contracting or subcontracting of work to be done at the site of the construction."

[3] As a preliminary matter, the unions argue that the dump-truck owner-operators are not self-employed independent contractors, as the Board held, but employees of the general contractor. This argument is foreclosed, however, by Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. NLRB, 564 F.2d 271 (9th Cir. 1977), in which this court held that these same dump truck owners are independent contractors.

None of the unions' arguments against the Board's order is persuasive. First, they cite this circuit's recent interpretation of the on-site proviso in Pacific Northwest Chapter of the Associated Builders and Contractors, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 654 F.2d 1301 (9th Cir.) (en banc), cert. granted, ——— U.S. ———, 102 S.Ct. 90, 69 L.Ed.2d ——— (1981). That case is not on point. The only issue decided in Pacific Northwest was whether the § 8(e) proviso "renders lawful clauses in collective bargaining contracts forbidding the employers to subcontract work at any construction site to a firm not having a contract with the signatory union." 654 F.2d at 1304 (emphasis added). In Pacific Northwest, where it was undisputed that the workers were engaged in on-site work, the court recognized that "the construction industry proviso narrowed the geographical scope of the [rule allowing secondary tactics] by introducing the jobsite limitation." 654 F.2d at 1313.

Second, the unions compare the on-site proviso in § 8(e) to an on-site proviso in the Davis Bacon Act (concerning minimum wages for construction workers on government contracts), arguing that the Federal Wage Appeals Board has held that it includes transportation between a construction site and a remote dump site. See T. L. James & Co., Wage Appeals Board Case No. 69-2 (Aug. 13, 1969). We question the unions' reading of T. L. James. The Wage Appeals Board only held that a remote dump site or borrow pit is a part of the construction site. Slip op. at 6. The Board did not explicitly address the issue of transportation between the main site and the remote site. Moreover, we reject the unions' comparison of the two Acts. Neither the legislative history nor the text of the statute suggests that Congress intended § 8(e) to parallel the Davis Bacon Act.

Third, the unions rely on a Ninth Circuit affirmance of an arbitration award where, in the process of interpreting a provision in a collective bargaining agreement, the arbitrator determined that transportation between a construction site and a supply site was on-site work within the meaning of § 8(e). See La Mirada Trucking, Inc. v. Teamsters Local Union 166, 538 F.2d 286, 288 (9th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1062, 97 S.Ct. 787, 50 L.Ed.2d 778 (1977). That decision has little bearing on the case before us. In La Mirada, the court did not interpret the on-site proviso to § 8(e); the court merely held reasonable the arbitrator's interpretation of a provision in a collective bargaining agreement, which the parties had stipulated to be identical to the on-site proviso of § 8(e). 538 F.2d at 289. Thus, the La Mirada court did not hold as a matter of law that transportation between a supply site and a construction site fits within the construction industry proviso.

II.

The truck owners claim that the Board's cease and desist order is an inadequate remedy. They contend that the Board should also order reimbursement of initiation fees and dues that the truck owners had paid to the union plus compensation for income lost to those truck owners who were denied work.

Although § 10(c) of the Act[4] vests broad discretion in the Board to fashion remedies that effectuate the policies of the Act, see Fibreboard Paper Products Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 379 U.S. 203, 216, 85 S.Ct. 398, 405, 13 L.Ed.2d 233 (1964), that discretion is not unlimited. See Acco Construction Equipment, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 511 F.2d 848, 852 (9th Cir. 1975). In cases where money has been collected illegally, the Board should order a refund, absent some rational ground for not doing so. Id. We hold that the Board has failed to offer a rational ground for refusing to order reimbursement in this case.

A.

The Board's principal reason for denying reimbursement is that the unions neither directly coerced the dump truck owner-operators to pay union fees nor illegally coerced the general contractors to accept article XIII in the collective bargaining agreement.[5] Either form of coercion would have constituted a violation of § 8(b)(4) of the Act.[6] Although the Board ruled that article XIII violated § 8(e) of the Act, it reasoned that reimbursement is inappropriate in the absence of a § 8(b)(4) violation.

[4] Section 10(c) of the Act, 29 U.S.C. § 160(c) (1976), provides that "the Board shall * * * take such affirmative action * * * as will effectuate the policies of this subchapter."

We reject the Board's reasoning that the purposes of the Act are effectuated by reimbursement for violations of § 8(b)(4), but not for violations of § 8(e).[7] To be sure, reimbursement is inappropriate in the absence of coercion. See Local 60, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. N.L.R.B., 365 U.S. 651, 655–56, 81 S.Ct. 875, 877–78, 6 L.Ed.2d 1 (1961).[8] But when an unlawful collective bargaining agreement is itself coercive, there is no logical reason for denying reimbursement because of the absence of a technical § 8(b)(4) violation. Article XIII presented the truck owners with the grim choice of joining the union or foregoing work with the signatory employers. Although the unions may not have employed coercive tactics, violative of § 8(b)(4), the inclusion of article XIII in the collective bargaining agreement would necessarily have had the effect of coercing otherwise reluctant truck owners to join the union.[9] See Sheraton-Kauai Corp. v. N.L.R.B., 429 F.2d 1352, 1357 (9th Cir. 1970).

We are unable to distinguish this case from two cases in which the Board ordered restitution to parties who joined unions pursuant to illegal collective bargaining agreements.[10] See Sheraton-Kauai Corp., 177 N.L.R.B. 25 (1969), enforced, 429 F.2d 1352, 1357–58 (9th Cir. 1970). Local 814, Teamsters (Santini Brothers) 208 N.L.R.B. 184 (1974), enforced, 546 F.2d 989 (D.C.Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 818, 98 S.Ct. 56, 54 L.Ed.2d 73 (1977).

In Santini Brothers, by staging a walkout, the union coerced the employer to accept a restrictive collective bargaining agreement; enforcement of that agreement, in turn, coerced independent truckers to join the union. The Board found violations of both § 8(b)(4) and § 8(e), and ordered reimbursement to the independent truckers.

We are not persuaded that the § 8(b)(4) violation in Santini Brothers justifies granting restitution in that case, while denying it here. The Board would have restitution turn on the union's use of a coercive tactic, violative of § 8(b)(4), to persuade the employer to accept a restrictive provision. The relevant inquiry, however, is whether the truck owners, irrespective of any coercion of the employer, were coerced into union membership by an unfair labor practice.

[5] The Board offered the following explanation for its denial: "We hereby deny the Charging Party CDTOA's request that we require Respondent Unions to reimburse any owner-operators for payment of initiation fees and dues, deducted contributions to union benefit funds, or income lost by reason of the enforcement of unlawful terms in MLA art. XIII. The Board has on one occasion adopted without comment an administrative law judge's recommended Order containing such a remedy. Local 814, Teamsters (Santini Brothers, Inc.), [208 N.L.R.B.] at 201. In the present case, however, no evidence has been introduced with respect to alleged losses directly attributable to actual coercion by Respondent Unions, nor has the remedial issue been expressly litigated. Furthermore, we find a reimbursement order, typically used to "make whole" employees for violations of the Act, to be generally overly broad and inappropriate in the context of 8(e) violations. We note that aggrieved owner-operators engaged in business as independent contractors may pursue a damage claim under Sec. 303 of the Act. For the foregoing reasons, we find that the reimbursement of owner-operators requested by CDTOA would not effectuate the remedial policies of the Act. See Local 60, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, et al. v. N.L.R.B., 365 U.S. 651, 81 S.Ct. 875, 6 L.Ed.2d 1 (1961)." 248 N.L.R.B. at 817 n.34.

[6] 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4) (1976).

[7] The NLRB claims that the Board has "consistently" declined to grant make-whole remedies in cases involving only violations of § 8(e). For support, the NLRB relies on Newspaper and Periodical Drivers and Helpers Union v. N.L.R.B., 509 F.2d 99 (9th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 831, 96 S.Ct. 51, 46 L.Ed.2d 48 (1975). In that case, however, the court merely held that the Board did not abuse its discretion in denying back pay to independent contractors terminated in violation of § 8(e). Moreover, the Board's own decision in Newspaper Drivers offers no explanation for denying a make-whole remedy. See Newspaper and Periodical Drivers' and Helpers Union Local 921, 204 N.L.R.B. 440, 448 (1973). Thus, neither the Board's decision, nor the Ninth Circuit's brief affirmance, provides support for a per se rule denying reimbursement in § 8(e) cases.

[8] In Local 60, the Board had ordered reimbursement of union fees and dues paid while an illegal closed-shop preferential hiring agreement remained in effect. The Court refused to enforce the Board's order because it found no evidence that union membership had been coerced. The Court emphasized that persons affected by the order were already union members when employed on the job in question, and that no one had joined the union specifically to obtain work on that job. 365 U.S. at 654, 81 S.Ct. at 877. Thus, Local 60 is readily distinguishable from the case before us.

[9] The Board stated that "no evidence has been introduced with respect to alleged losses directly attributable to actual coercion by Respondent Unions." 248 N.L.R.B. at 817 n.34 (emphasis added). We read the Board's statement as merely a finding that the unions did not directly confront truck owners and force them to join the union. Admittedly, the statement might be interpreted as an evidentiary ruling that the truck owners offered no proof that individuals had joined the union as a result of article XIII, as was the case in Local 60, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. N.L.R.B., 365 U.S. 651, 81 S.Ct. 875, 6 L.Ed.2d 1 (1961). We doubt, however, that the Board intended that meaning, since the record shows that at every available juncture the truck owners fought the unions' attempt at unionization. See Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 564 F.2d 271 (9th Cir. 1977).

[10] The Board cannot arbitrarily impose different remedies in similar situations. See Burinskas v. NLRB, 357 F.2d 822, 827 (D.C.Cir. 1966) ("nor can [the Board] treat similar situations in dissimilar ways").

The Board implicitly recognized this principle in Sheraton-Kauai. In that case, the employer and union illegally extended a union security clause in a collective bargaining agreement to employees of a new hotel, thus denying the employees an opportunity to resolve the question of union representation for themselves. The union did not coerce the employer in violation of § 8(b)(4); nor did the union directly coerce the employees. Nonetheless, the Board ordered restitution after finding that, by "submitting [the employees] to the terms and conditions of the * * * agreement," the union effectively coerced the employees into union membership. 177 N.L.R.B. at 29.

Reimbursement in this case, as in Sheraton-Kauai and Santini Brothers, would effectuate the policies of the Act by returning to the truck owners money paid to support a union they did not freely choose to join, and by depriving the unions of the benefit of their unfair labor practice. See Virginia Electric and Power Company v. N.L.R.B., 319 U.S. 533, 541, 63 S.Ct. 1214, 1219, 87 L.Ed. 1568 (1943); Graphic Arts International Union Local 280 v. N.L.R.B., 596 F.2d 904, 910 (9th Cir. 1979).[11]

B.

We find unpersuasive the other reasons offered by the Board for denying reimbursement.

First, we are confused by the Board's contention that the remedial issue was not expressly litigated. The truck owners raised the remedy issue in their brief to the Board as charging party. To the extent that factual issues remain—such as the amount of damages—they can be resolved in an NLRB proceeding. See N.L.R.B. v. Local 776, Film Editors, 303 F.2d 513, 521 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 371 U.S. 826, 83 S.Ct. 47, 9 L.Ed.2d 65 (1962).

Next, the Board said that the truck owners had an alternative remedy under § 303. It would be wasteful and unfair to force the truck owners, who have opposed unionization in legal proceedings for ten years, see Associated General Contractors of California, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 564 F.2d 271 (9th Cir. 1977), to renew the battle in a § 303 proceeding. Moreover, we see no reason to burden a federal district court with § 303 litigation, when reimbursement can be ordered in an NLRB proceeding. Cf. Sheraton-Kauai Corporation v. N.L.R.B., 177 N.L.R.B. 25 (1969) (by implication) (ordering reimbursement where a § 303 remedy might have been available), enforced, 429 F.2d 1352 (9th Cir. 1970); Local 814, Teamsters (Santini Brothers) 208 N.L.R.B. 184 (1974) (same), enforced, 546 F.2d 989 (D.C.Cir.1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 818, 98 S.Ct. 56, 54 L.Ed.2d 73 (1977).

Finally, the Board noted that reimbursement orders are typically used to "make whole" employees. We note, however, that the Board has also ordered reimbursement for employers and independent contractors when to do so would effectuate the policies of the Act. See, e.g., Graphic Arts International Union Local 280, 235 N.L.R.B. 1084, 1085 (1978), enforced, 596 F.2d 904 (9th Cir. 1979) (employer); Local 814, Teamsters (Santini Brothers) 208 N.L.R.B. 184 (1974), enforced, 546 F.2d 989 (D.C.Cir.1976), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 818, 98 S.Ct. 56, 54 L.Ed.2d 73 (1977) (independent contractors).

For these reasons we remand to the Board to fashion a make-whole remedy[12] or to show good cause why a make-whole remedy would not effectuate the purposes of the Act.[13] See Acco Construction Equipment, Inc. v. N.L.R.B., 511 F.2d 848, 852 (9th Cir. 1975).

313

---

[11] Counsel for the NLRB suggested that reimbursement would result in unjust windfalls to the truck owners who may have benefited from becoming signatories to the union. To the extent that the truck owners received actual benefits in return for their fees and dues, the value of these benefits may be deducted from the amount of reimbursable damages. We see no reason, however, to deny the truck owners the opportunity to show that they paid fees that did not lead to benefits. The issue whether fees and dues created comparable benefits remains to be litigated.

[12] We express no opinion at this stage of the proceedings as to whether the Board should order compensation for lost income resulting from enforcement of article XIII. The Board shall consider this claim of the owner-operators on remand.

[13] We note that the D.C. Circuit recently affirmed the Board's denial of a make-whole remedy for dump truck owner-operators in Building Material and Dump Truck Drivers v. N.L.R.B., 669 F.2d 759 at 765–767 (D.C.Cir.1981). For the reasons expressed in text, we reach a different conclusion.

Lorraine B. Pratte v. NLRB

530 F.Supp. 461 (N.D. Ill.), December 22, 1981

On petition for injunctive relief

463

SHADUR, District Judge: Lorraine Pratte ("Pratte") has sued the National Labor Relations Board ("NLRB"), its General Counsel and the Regional Director of its Region 13 (headquartered in Chicago), seeking injunctive and declaratory relief because of NLRB's claimed unlawful revocation of Pratte's appointment as a staff lawyer. By agreement of the parties, their written submissions (the verified Complaint and affidavits) constitute the evidentiary record for this Court's ruling under Fed.R.Civ.P. ("Rule") 65(a). In accordance with Rule 52(a) this memorandum opinion and order reflects the Court's findings of fact and conclusions of law.

Findings of Fact

Pratte is a June 1981 graduate of Harvard Law School, where she established a fine record (among other things, as Articles Editor of the Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review). Because she decided on labor law as a field of interest, she applied to NLRB's national office and the Chicago Regional Office.[1] In mid-January 1981[2] NLRB offered her employment as a Law Clerk-Trainee (Grade GS-9) at an initial salary of $18,585 a year. Pratte accepted the offer with alacrity, turning down a higher-paying position as an Assistant District Attorney in Philadelphia and abandoning any other placement efforts.

On February 3 (just a week after Pratte's prompt acceptance) the same NLRB person who had extended the offer[3] wrote to say NLRB was "unable to honor the written commitment which was made to you after November 5, 1980." That action was occasioned by President Reagan's January 20 announcement of an immediate hiring freeze for all civilian employees of government agencies. But the letter went on:

> We regret the necessity for this action; however, we will place your application in the group who will be given first priority for positions with this Agency when we are able to renew our hiring program. The instructions from the Office of Management and Budget provide that agency heads may request exemptions from the freeze where they believe that circumstances warrant such action. We intend to submit such a request to OMB concerning your situation and we will advise you of the results once they are received from OMB.

> We sincerely regret any inconvenience that the hiring freeze has placed on you, and we hope that your interest in working for the NLRB will continue.

True to its word, NLRB wrote Pratte March 17:

> In my letter of February 3, 1981, I regretably [sic] had to advise you that this Agency could not honor the written offer of employment which had been made to you after November 5, 1980. I am now pleased to inform you that the National Labor Relations Board has recently received its new authorized personnel ceilings for Fiscal Year 1982 from the Office of Management and Budget. We are now able to extend offers of employment for professional positions.

It therefore offered employment on the same terms as before. Just as with the initial offer the Toback letter said:

> You will be assigned to our Chicago Regional Office, and we will expect you to enter on duty on or about October 5, 1981, which is the beginning of Fiscal Year 1982. If our budget permits, some new employees may be able to enter on duty prior to October 5, 1981. If you accept our offer, please indicate when you will be available to commence work.

Toback's letter was confirmatory of the telephone call that had been made to Pratte by NLRB's Deputy General Counsel March 10. At that time she was told to "hold on" if she could because NLRB had been informed by the Office of

---

[1] Pratte sought to work for NLRB as an entree into the field of labor relations law. Work in the Region 13 office was particularly desirable because of the extensive trial experience she was told to expect early in her career, experience that would serve her well in future career opportunities in the labor relations field.

[2] Because all relevant dates occurred during 1981, no further year designations will be made in the statement of facts.

[3] B. Fred Toback ("Toback"), Executive Assistant in the Division of Operations Management, was the author of each of the letters offering and withdrawing offers (January 16, February 3, March 17, August 5 and September 29) discussed in this opinion.

Management and Budget that "the money would be coming through." Just three days after receiving the new Toback letter Pratte visited his office in Washington and drafted and delivered a handwritten acceptance letter. She had already forwarded the requested security clearance forms at the time of the original offer, so that she understood all systems were "go."

By letters dated August 5 and August 31 NLRB confirmed Pratte's appointment. Its August 5 letter spoke in future terms ("You will be appointed as a Law Clerk-Trainee * * * effective October 5, 1981"). August 31 converted that to the present:

> This will confirm your Accepted Appointment as Law Clerk (Trainee), GS-904-09, $18,585 per annum. Assignment is in our Chicago Regional Office located at the Everett McKinley Dirksen Building, 219 South Dearborn Street, Chicago, Illinois.
> This is a sensitive position and the appointment is subject to a Full Field Investigation under Executive Order 10450. It is also subject to an Administrative Trial Period of One year. All other conditions will remain as stated in Mr. Toback's letter to you dated 8-5-81.
> A tentative reporting date of October 4, 1981, has been set pending receipt and approval of your medical certificate.
> We look forward to your joining the National Labor Relations Board staff.

All the conditions referred to in the August 5 and August 31 letters have been satisfied.

If Pratte had been advised that the appointment was subject to any other conditions (most specifically, possible rescission on the basis of potential future budget reductions) she would not have accepted the appointment. But understanding the appointment to be unconditional (except for the purely ministerial acts that offered no problem) she did accept, and her reliance on the appointment was extensive and uncontradicted:

(1) Of course she ceased to seek other employment.

(2) Based on NLRB's requirements for lawyers, Pratte took the bar examination in the District of Columbia, which would permit her to practice as a government lawyer anywhere. That necessarily made her a less marketable commodity (particularly in the litigation area in which her primary interests lie) in the private practice in Illinois, where she found herself compelled to look for employment after NLRB's later attempted revocation.

(3) Having been advised of the need for NLRB regional office staff lawyers to travel as part of their work, Pratte purchased an automobile.

(4) On September 26 Pratte drove to Chicago. After checking with the Region 13 office and receiving confirmation of her official October 5 reporting date, she signed a one-year apartment lease in Chicago.

One day after NLRB's confirmation of her official reporting date, and the same day on which she had signed her lease, Pratte received a telephone call from NLRB's Washington office stating her appointment was being "revoked" as a result of a September 24 speech by President Reagan in which he announced he would ask Congress to approve additional budget reductions for certain federal agencies for fiscal year 1982. On September 30 she received a billet-doux from Toback predicated on the proposed cut in appropriations and stating:

> Therefore, we must inform you that we must rescind our offer of employment in which you were asked to report for duty on October 5, 1981.

This "Dear John" letter concluded in much the same tone as the earlier February 3 "unable to honor the written commitment" letter:

> We very much regret the necessity for this action. Please be assured that you will be placed in the group of individuals who will be given priority consideration for positions with this Agency when we are again in a position to permit additional applicants to report for duty.
> We sincerely regret any inconvenience which this current hiring situation has caused you, and we appreciate your interest in working for the National Labor Relations Board.

Finding herself unemployable as an Illinois lawyer, Pratte was able to obtain a temporary paralegal job. As soon as she was able to confer with counsel and prepare a Complaint and supporting documents she instituted this action.

Conclusions of Law

There is of course no dispute as to the familiar criteria to be employed in deciding on the propriety of preliminary injunctive relief. They were again repeated by our Court of Appeals this month in Machlett Laboratories, Inc. v. Techny Industries, Inc., 665 F.2d 795 (7th Cir. 1981), and require a plaintiff to show that (adapted to this case):

> (1) [she] has at least a reasonable likelihood of success on the merits,
> (2) [she] has no adequate remedy at law and will otherwise be irreparably harmed,
> (3) the threatened injury to her outweighs the threatened harm the preliminary injunction may cause the defendants, and
> (4) the granting of the preliminary injunction will not disserve the public interest.

At the threshold the Court must inquire into the reasonable probability of plaintiff's success on the merits. Though many of our Court of Appeals' decisions list the factors in a different sequence, O'Connor v. Board of Education, 645 F.2d 578, 580 (7th Cir. 1981) has made that priority plain.

On that threshold issue the government's presentation does it little more credit than its actions as to Pratte. Its responsive memorandum (G.Br. 10–15) deals with the arcane mysteries of "appointment" by the federal government (a necessary condition of becoming an "employee" as defined in 5 U.S.C. § 2105(a)) and concludes by explaining why Beacom v. EEOC, 500 F.Supp. 428 (D.Ariz.1980) is distinguishable, or if not, should not be followed. But it fails utterly to discuss or even mention, in that context,[4] the most recent decision by a Court of Appeals, National Treasury Employees Union v. Reagan, 663 F.2d 239 (D.C.Cir.1981), which discusses, distinguishes and rejects each of the several authorities on which the government seeks to rely.

It is unnecessary to repeat the analysis in National Treasury Employees. For the reasons there stated at length, the Court finds that the Form 50 on which the government relied there as here (a form self-characterized as a "Notification of Personnel Action") is not itself the personnel action—the document constituting the "appointment." Indeed Form 50's title itself tends to confirm that (though that is but one of the factors pointing to the Court's conclusion).

National Treasury Employees is a thoughtful, well-reasoned and comprehensive opinion. This Court will not essay to reinvent the wheel, but will instead quote the persuasive and relevant portion of the opinion stating (at 245-246):

> It appears to us that the federal government played hide-and-seek with job-seekers, assuring them that jobs awaited them and only later—on occasion, after the prospective employee had acted on the assurance of a job—reversing itself. Not one of the approximately 20,000 members of the class which is the subject of these cases [in our case, Pratte] received a letter stating that he had been conditionally selected, subject to budgetary factors. Not one received a letter stating that he had been conditionally selected, subject to the discretion of the appointing officer to change his mind at any time prior to the completion of the Standard Form 50. All class members received letters stating that they had been selected for employment and should report for work on a certain date in the future.
> Underlying this system of apparent government indifference to the consequences of its actions has been the fiction of the Form 50, backed by predictions of the dire consequences that would follow if the fiction were to be retired. A fiction supported by speculation cannot, however, bear the burden urged upon it by the Government. On the basis of our analysis of the appointment procedures in use in these cases, as established by the Personnel Manual and the other evidence, we believe that the completion of the Form 50 was not the "last act" required of the appointing authorities within the meaning of Marbury. The members of the class before us were appointed to the positions for which they were unconditionally selected.

Just so Pratte received a letter from NLRB saying in essence, "You are hired. You are one of our lawyers," without the slightest reference to any aspect or condition of budgetary restraints. For the reasons so well expressed in National Treasury Employees and fully applicable here, the Court holds that Pratte was in fact "appointed" by her acceptance of the August 5 Toback letter and the August 31 confirmation of appointment.

[4] True enough the government's memorandum later mentions National Treasury Employees, but in a different section and on a different issue.

That however brings Pratte only part-way home. Because Pratte had not entered into "performance of the duties of [her] position" before NLRB reversed its field and told her not to report, she was not technically an "employee" within the definition of 5 U.S.C. § 2105(a). That meant that she was lacking the statutory protection afforded "employees." Baker v. United States, 614 F.2d 263, 266 (Ct.Cl.1980) so teaches, and National Treasury Employees confirmed that proposition and went on to define the nonstatutory protection of an appointee. It said (at 247), "An appointee remains appointed, of course, until [her] appointment is properly revoked." And it continued (id. n.13), "It would appear that a properly authorized refusal to allow [an appointee] to enter on duty on the date previously selected would be an effective revocation."

Certainly NLRB's September 29 letter was such a "refusal." Thus the question was whether the refusal—the revocation—was "proper" as National Treasury Employees would require.

National Treasury Employees provides no answer beyond that stage of the inquiry. At that point the opinion went on to deal with the class issues. It did however recognize quite specifically that (at 253), "It is possible that there exists a third group of class members: those whose appointments were not properly revoked and who did not enter onto duty."

Accordingly this case resolves itself to the question of the propriety of the attempted revocation, really a question of timeliness. Its answer depends on whether detrimental reliance of the type that would give rise to an estoppel, occurring before an attempted revocation, precludes the revocation from being timely and thus proper.

Our Court of Appeals is not among those that use the simplistic terminology that the government may never be estopped. Instead it recognizes estoppel against the government in appropriate circumstances, although it urges great caution. Gressley v. Califano, 609 F.2d 1265, 1267–68 (7th Cir. 1979); United States v. Fox Lake State Bank, 366 F.2d 962, 965–66 (7th Cir. 1966).

This opinion has already identified Pratte's substantial reliance on her appointment. She ceased seeking other employment. She took the District of Columbia bar examination in reliance on NLRB's requirements, rather than taking the bar in the jurisdiction where she contemplated working—this made her much less employable locally in private practice. Because of the travel requirements for an NLRB staff attorney she bought an automobile. She signed a one-year apartment lease after speaking with NLRB personnel just a week before she was due to report—and after having been given no warning.

Reliance then is established. Estoppel however requires that reliance be reasonable. On that score it seems to the Court that it is bizarre in the extreme for the government to say on the one hand that Pratte should have been on notice of a possible repeat performance of the original offer and withdrawal, and on the other hand that the government was not. What the government really advances is the extraordinary notion that the agency had no reason to believe that the budgetary state of affairs would change so drastically in September, yet may hold Pratte to a more strict standard than that. Which of the parties really knew the facts? Had NLRB stated the risk or had it included any caveat when it renewed the offer and later confirmed Pratte's appointment, she would not have taken the job. Instead NLRB's only reference to budget was not in restrictive, but rather in expansive, terms. Its March 17 offer effectively said, "Maybe if we get more money you can report earlier." It gave her every reason to believe that the original problem that had caused the withdrawal of its initial offer had been resolved. Indeed it was NLRB and not Pratte that was on notice of the potential of reduction by June 1981, when Congress enacted a final budget for fiscal 1981 rescinding $1 million out of NLRB's prior approval. Nevertheless it sent her a confirmation of appointment nearly three months later.

Frankly the Court considers the government's position somewhat disingenuous. NLRB induced action by Pratte when that suited its needs. This Court's many years as a law firm hiring partner make plain what NLRB did here: When hiring is done it is done pursuant to the employer's contemplated needs, and with the firm expectation that the hired associate will in fact report for work. Any defeated expectation can create serious disruption for the employer in a seller's market. Today however we are in a buyer's market for young law graduates, and it appears quite obvious that NLRB has seriously disadvantaged Pratte.

It is however not necessary to decide the ultimate issue of whether estoppel will lie. At this point in the proceedings the only question is whether Pratte has demonstrated a reasonable likelihood of success on that issue. That, it seems to the Court, cannot be gainsaid in light of the Seventh Circuit decisions on estoppel, the Beacom case and the holding in National Treasury Employees.

Determination of the reasonable likelihood of success also controls the question of what constitutes the status quo, an issue on which each party's argument is somewhat circular. NLRB's assertion that the status quo is non-appointment hinges on its argument that Pratte was never "appointed." In much the same way Pratte's contention that the government is seeking to change the status quo, while she is trying to preserve it, hinges on her argument that she was "appointed."

With the threshold having been crossed, we turn to the "adequate remedy at law" or "irreparable harm" issue. In this case, that is peculiarly within the ken of lawyers: We are dealing with the impact on a lawyer of this kind of conduct. Many of the major burdens on Pratte, it is true, are financial, though incidentally some might pose difficulties in terms of recovery. Though she wouldn't otherwise have bought a car, presumably she got value for what she paid. Much the same applies to her apartment lease. Presumably her lost earnings during the employment period would be recoverable if she succeeds on the merits.

But how do remedies at law deal with the long-term career impact, the loss of placement opportunities,[5] the loss of valuable experience and of promotion opportunities? Law students with top records from top-ranked national law schools are highly salable commodities, but that is much less true of a law graduate forced into a market at a time when hiring generally has become more uncertain and in an unseasonable period in relation to the normal hiring season. All those factors, amplified as they are by Pratte's decision as to which bar exam to take (a decision made in reliance on NLRB), satisfy the second condition for preliminary injunctive relief. This is much like the familiar situation in which a wrongdoer is not heard to assert that the plaintiff can't show harm, where it is really the wrongdoer's own conduct that created the difficulty in doing so.

As to the third factor, the balancing of harms, the government argues that the harms just outlined as to Pratte are outweighed by harms to the government. That contention is without merit. First, neither side has focused on one significant factor, though Pratte does argue that the government predicates its decision not on present harm (at this point NLRB still has the funds needed to honor its hiring commitments in hand[6]) but on possible future effects. More to the point is that if Pratte is successful on the merits, NLRB is liable for her salary in damages in any case. Thus any harm to NLRB arising out of an injunction is really no different from the damages it confronts by reason of the claim. Second, the current decision is of very limited scope. Circumstances applicable to Pratte may well not apply to anyone else, let alone to the entire group of appointees NLRB has now sought to reject. In any balancing of harms the Court then concludes Pratte must prevail.

Finally the Court turns to consideration of the public interest. There is a paramount public interest in government responsibility—a quality singularly lacking on the uncontroverted facts here. What countervailing public interest does the government advance? Teaching young lawyers to watch out when they deal with government? If the public interest lies in promoting the orderly operation of the agency, NLRB might better address its arguments to the administration and to Congress rather than to Pratte or this Court.

All criteria for issuance of a preliminary injunction have been met. One last comment may nevertheless be in order. In substantial part the government seeks to rely on authorities that deny preliminary injunctive relief where complete retroactive relief is available in administrative proceedings, or in judicial review of such proceedings. But Pratte occupies the no-man's-land[7] between appointment and service: She doesn't have the benefit of administrative proceedings, precisely because she is not an "employee." Consequently the Court concludes that the otherwise-existing right to a preliminary injunction is not lost for the reason advanced by the government.

[5] Parenthetically Harvard's placement service is much less useful to alumni than to students, because it is geared to serve the latter and the prospective employers seeking to hire them upon graduation. Because this particular piece of information derives from the Court's knowledge outside the record, it has not been taken into account in arriving at the Court's decision.

[6] There is a question as to an agency's right to husband currently appropriated funds against contingent future needs.

469

Rule 65(a) has been dealt with, but Rule 65(c) remains. Because Pratte could not provide the funds necessary for any significant bond required under that Rule, and NLRB has not made any showing of damages in any case, the Court determines that no bond should be required under Rule 65(c) and waives the provision of such a bond.

Counsel are requested to prepare and submit a draft order granting a preliminary injunction as prayed in the Complaint and approved in this opinion.

Montgomery Ward & Co. v. NLRB

668 F.2d 291 (7th Cir.), December 30, 1981—253 NLRB 196

On petition to review Board Order

Before SPRECHER and WOOD, Circuit Judges, and BROWN, Senior District Judge*

294

HARLINGTON WOOD, Jr., Circuit Judge: Montgomery Ward & Co., Inc. ("Wards" or the "Company") has appealed to this court for review of a Decision and Order issued by the National Labor Relations Board (the "Board") on November 4, 1980. The case arises from an attempt by the employees at a Greensburg, Pennsylvania, Montgomery Ward Credit Service Center to gain representation by the Amalgamated Food Employees Union, Local 590 (the "Union"). The Administrative Law Judge (the "ALJ") found that the Union obtained authorization cards from a majority of employees and that the Company, after receiving the Union's demand for recognition, committed numerous violations of the National Labor Relations Act in an effort to undermine the Union. He further found that a bargaining order was necessary to remedy the unfair labor practices. The NLRB affirmed the ALJ's findings.

The Union solicited authorization cards from employees at the Greensburg Credit Service Center beginning on July 2, 1979. The Union representative distributed cards to a number of employees to give to their fellow employees. On the afternoon of July 9, 1979, the Union representative presented a written demand for recognition as the bargaining representative of the employees at the Greensburg Credit Service Center. On July 10, 1979, Wards acknowledged the request and informed the Union that it would not recognize it as the bargaining representative.[1]

On July 13, 1979, the Union filed a petition for an election. On the same date, the Union filed an unfair labor practice charge[2] alleging that Wards had, since July 9, 1979, restrained, coerced and interfered with employee rights. On September 10, 1979, the Union filed an amended unfair labor practice charge, which alleged a violation of section 8(a)(5) and which had the effect of blocking the election that was scheduled to be held on September 13, 1979. Subsequently, on November 1, 1979, the Union withdrew its election petition.

Following the issuance of a complaint on the basis of the Union's amended unfair labor practice charge, a hearing was held before Administrative Law Judge Maloney. He found that Wards had committed violations of section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act. Specifically, the ALJ found that Wards' supervisors improperly discussed the Union during the pendency of the Union's election petition and that the Company granted a wage increase on July 11, 1979.[3] The ALJ also found that Wards violated section 8(a)(5) by refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union as the representative of the majority of the Greensburg employees.

*The Honorable Wesley E. Brown, Senior District Judge of the District of Kansas, is sitting by designation.

[1] The Regional Labor Relations Manager at Wards explained to the Union representative, "In our opinion, your Union does not enjoy a majority status among the employees described and in any event, without proof of that allegation we could not take further action." The written demand did not claim that the Union had obtained authorizations from a majority of the employees. Lack of majority status can be a defense to the bargaining obligation. Grismac Corp., 205 N.L.R.B. 1108 (1973), enforced, 87 L.R.R.M. 2154 (7th Cir. 1974).

[2] Notwithstanding the pendency of the unfair labor practice charge, the Union entered into a Stipulation for Certification upon Consent Election Agreement with Wards that was approved by the Regional Director on August 2, 1979. The Agreement provided for an election on September 13, 1979, in a unit described as, "All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by Montgomery Ward & Co., Incorporated at its Greensburg, Pennsylvania Credit Service Center; excluding all other employees and guards, professional employees and supervisors as defined in the Act."

The ALJ concluded that the Union represented a majority of the employees based on authorization cards procured by the Union's organizers. At the hearing, 41 cards were placed in evidence by the General Counsel. Two of the cards were not signed until July 10, the day after the Union made its recognition demand. The ALJ expressly found that it was unnecessary for him to consider the significance of those cards in determining the Union's majority status.

The ALJ also determined that Donita Pierce and Linda Ohr were employees on July 9 when the Union made its recognition demand. Pierce and Ohr were clerical employees at the Greensburg facility when the Union began its solicitation of authorization cards in early July, 1979. Pierce's last day of work was Tuesday, July 3. She had worked eight hours as scheduled on Monday, July 2, and Tuesday, July 3. She failed to show up for work as scheduled on Thursday, July 5; Friday, July 6; Monday, July 9; or at any time thereafter. As a result of her absence on July 5, she forfeited holiday pay for July 4.

Ohr's last day of work was also July 3. She had worked 6 hours on Friday, June 29; 6.8 hours on Saturday, June 30; 6.1 hours on Monday, July 2; and 4.2 hours on Tuesday, July 3. Like Pierce, Ohr forfeited her July 4 holiday pay when she failed to work on July 5. Neither woman ever contacted Wards to explain her absence.

Although the two women did not return to Wards after July 3, 1979, the ALJ reasoned that they were still employees of Wards on July 9. A Wards administrative personnel rule provided that employees who did not call in when absent would be carried on the personnel rolls for three days before being officially terminated. Moreover, the ALJ rejected the Company's contention that five of the 39 cards signed prior to July 9 were invalid. Wards argued that the five employees had been misled regarding the purpose of the cards. The ALJ concluded that Wards waived its right to object to the validity of three of the cards (signed by Wunderley, Ghrist, and Corn) when it failed to object to their introduction into evidence. He further found that statements made to the remaining two employees (Falkosky and Robinson) were not such as to invalidate their cards.

Consequently, the ALJ concluded that, as of July 9, the Union had acquired 39 valid cards. The ALJ further found that the office and clerical unit consisted of 74 employees. Thus, on the basis of his findings, the ALJ concluded that the Union had 39 signed cards out of the 74 employees, more than the number needed to establish majority status.

Having found that Wards violated section 8(a)(5) of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to recognize the Union as the representative of the majority of the employees, the ALJ granted the General Counsel's request that Wards be ordered to bargain with the Union on the basis of the authorization cards. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969). The ALJ relied on the granting of the wage increase as the basis for concluding that it was unlikely that a fair election could be held.

In establishing the Union as the sole bargaining representative of the Greensburg employees, the Judge gave no weight to an employee petition prepared after the wage increase. Addressed to the Union and Wards, the petition stated:

> We the undersigned are employees and eligible voters of Montgomery Ward Credit Office in Greensburg, Pa. We employees are petitioning a right to an election to determine if we choose to be represented by Local Union No. 590. This petition is in no way a commitment determining anyone's individual position on a vote.
> We, therefore, strongly urge that our rights be restored, and an election be agreed upon by Local Union No. 590, and Montgomery Ward Credit Management. cc: National Labor Relations Board—Pittsburgh, Pa. General Counsel of

---

[3] The ALJ applied a presumption that the increase was granted in order to undermine the Union's organizing effort. He found that Wards did not adequately rebut that presumption.

National Labor Relations Board—Washington, D.C.

The petition was signed by 47 of the 72 employees in the unit. Of the 47 employees who signed the petition, 18 had also signed union authorization cards. The petition was presented to the Union representative at a meeting called by the employees. He declined to accept the proffered petition. Copies of the petition, in addition to requests for an election, were sent to the Regional Office in Pittsburgh and the General Counsel in Washington. Nevertheless, the ALJ concluded, "[T]here is no reason to give any weight to this petition in determining the appropriateness of a bargaining order." Wards filed exceptions to portions of the ALJ's decision and recommended Order.

The Board affirmed the ALJ's decision and adopted his recommended Order, with few exceptions. The Board agreed that there were 74 employees in the unit when the Union demanded recognition on July 9. The Board joined the ALJ in not considering the significance of the two cards signed on July 10 and accepted the ALJ's finding that Pierce and Ohr were employees of the unit. Thus, the Board also concluded that the Union had at most 39 cards as of July 9.

Wards acknowledged the validity of 34 cards, but contended that the cards signed by Wunderley, Ghrist, Corn, Falkosky, and Robinson were invalid because of Union misrepresentations about the cards' purpose. The Board affirmed without discussion the ALJ's ruling with respect to the validity of the cards signed by Falkosky and Robinson. With respect to the validity of the cards signed by Wunderley, Ghrist, and Corn, the Board agreed with Wards that Administrative Law Judge Maloney had erroneously ruled that the Company's objections had been waived. Nevertheless, the Board found that the cards of Wunderley and Ghrist were valid notwithstanding certain statements that had been made to them concerning the cards' purpose. Because this meant that at least 38 of the 39 cards were valid, a bare majority of the 74 employees, the Board found it unnecessary to pass on the validity of Corn's card. Accordingly, the Board found that by July 9, the date that the Union demanded recognition, the Union had obtained 38 valid authorization cards in a unit of 74 employees. The Board adopted the ALJ's decision concerning the bargaining order, but made no independent findings concerning the appropriateness of the order.

In seeking review, Wards does not contest the Board's findings that certain conduct of its employees violated section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, 29 U.S.C. § 158(a)(1). Instead, the Company contends that the Union did not possess valid authorization cards from a majority of the employees at the time it demanded recognition from Wards. Therefore, Wards argues that the Board erred and exceeded its statutory authority by issuing a bargaining order which establishes the Union as the exclusive representative of the Greensburg employees.

Specifically, Wards challenges the validity of three of the signed authorization cards. It alleges (1) that two of the employees who signed cards (Pierce and Ohr) were no longer employed with the Company on July 9, and (2) that one of the five cards (Falkosky's) was signed on the basis of representations that it would be used only by the Union for the purpose of obtaining an election. Wards also contends that the Board failed to show that the "possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election * * * by the use of traditional remedies * * * is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order." NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 614–15, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1940, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969).

The National Labor Relations Act provides that the labor organization designated by a majority of employees in an appropriate bargaining unit shall be the exclusive bargaining agent for those employees.[4] Although the most widely used method of designating a union as the bargaining representative of a group of employees is through the Board's election procedures, bargaining status may also be established through the employer's voluntary recognition after the union claims majority status. A third method of establishing union representation is through a Board-ordered recognition without an election.

[4] Section 9(a) provides inter alia:

> Representatives designated or selected for the purposes of collective bargaining by the majority of the employees in a unit appropriate for such purposes, shall be the exclusive representatives of all the employees in such unit for the purposes of collective bargaining in respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, or other conditions of employment * * *.

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Supreme Court set forth the standards for approving bargaining orders issued by the Board to remedy unfair labor practices committed by an employer during a union campaign. Under Gissel, a bargaining order may issue (1) without a showing that the union at one point represented a majority of the employees, if the employer's "outrageous" and "pervasive" unfair labor practices have eliminated the possibility of holding a fair election, or (2) in "less extraordinary cases marked by less pervasive practices," if the union at one point represented a majority of the employees, the employer's unfair labor practices "have the tendency to undermine majority strength and impede the election processes," and "the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and of ensuring a fair election * * * by the use of traditional remedies though present, is slight * * *." In the instant case, the Board determined the Company's misconduct fell within the second standard outlined in Gissel.[5] Thus, before 298 we can consider enforcing the bargaining order issued by the Board, it is necessary to determine whether the Union represented a majority of employees at the time it made its demand.

We begin by examining whether Pierce and Ohr were employees of Wards on July 9 since their votes were necessary to maintain a majority. Although the Board normally has wide discretion in supervising the election process and in resolving questions arising during the course of representation proceedings, see, e.g., NLRB v. A.J. Tower Co., 329 U.S. 324, 330–31, 67 S.Ct. 324, 327–28, 91 L.Ed. 322 (1946); National Van Lines, Inc. v. NLRB, 273 F.2d 402, 407 (7th Cir. 1960), no particular deference is due the Board's conclusion here. In Choc-Ola Bottlers, Inc. v. NLRB, 478 F.2d 461 (7th Cir. 1973), this court reviewed a person's eligibility to vote in a Board election.

> [T]he question of . . . eligibility . . . is a pure question of law, dependent entirely on whether a person in [the employee's] situation can be said to be an employee within the meaning of the Act. Therefore, there is no occasion for the Board to exercise its discretion in this matter.

478 F.2d at 464. Although the Union never held an election in this case, the eligibility requirements for voting in an election are analogous to the eligibility requirements for counting signed authorization cards.

In the absence of special circumstances,[6] an employee is eligible to vote in an election if that employee holds a full-time position within the appropriate bargaining unit and is on the company payroll both at the end of the payroll period preceding the ordering of the election and on the date on which the election is held. NLRB v. New England Lithographic Co., 589 F.2d 29 (1st Cir. 1978), R. Gorman, Labor Law 43 (1976). When an employee is off the job on the date of the election, however, this court and the Board have stated that "whether one is an employee is a question to be determined by his reasonable expectation of employment within a reasonable time in the future." Choc-Ola Bottlers, Inc. v. NLRB, 478 F.2d 461 (7th Cir. 1973); Lake City Foundry Co. v. NLRB, 432 F.2d 1162 (7th Cir. 1970); Whiting Corp. v. NLRB, 200 F.2d 43 (7th Cir. 1952); Western Union Telegraph Co., 32 N.L.R.B. 210, 215 (1941); Massillon Aluminum Co., 27 N.L.R.B. 165, 168 (1940). Thus, a person who has no reasonable expectation of future employment as of the date of a union recognition demand cannot be considered to be an "employee" within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act for purposes of determining majority status.

The "reasonable expectation of employment" standard includes two elements that must be satisfied before an employee's card may be counted: a subjective element—the employee's intent or expectation—and an objective element—the reasonableness of the expectation. The personnel policy at Wards, which provided that employees who did not call in when absent would be carried on the personnel rolls for three days before being terminated, relates only to the objective element or reasonableness of the expectation. Such a policy may restrict a person's "reasonable expectation" where that person in fact has some interest in returning. See Lake City Foundry, 432 F.2d 1162, 1170 (7th Cir. 1973). For example, in Walter Packing Inc., 241 N.L.R.B. 131 (1979), the company policy was to fire employees who were absent and failed to call in sick. The employee was scheduled to work on the day of the election beginning at 6 a.m. He did not report for work, nor did he call in to explain his absence. He appeared to vote and cast a ballot. The Board concluded that he continued to be an employee until the expiration of the time allowed for an employee to call in sick (8:30 a.m.). Although the employee later appeared and had an expectation of continued employment, the Board considered him terminated because of the company policy.

[5] The Supreme Court in Gissel made it clear that it is the Board's task to determine which of the three categories of severity embraced the employer's coercive and discriminatory conduct. 395 U.S. at 612 n.32, 89 S.Ct. at 1939 n.32.

[6] When other circumstances exist, such as striking, laid-off or part-time employees, the standard is modified. This is especially true when an employee is not at work on the day of the election or demand.

The policy at Wards, however, cannot create "expectations" in the case of an employee who has no intention of returning. At issue in this case is whether Ohr and Pierce expected to return to their jobs. The General Counsel and, ultimately, the Board, must show that Ohr and Pierce intended to return since they bear the burden of proving that the Union represented a majority of employees in order to sustain the imposition of the bargaining order. See, e.g., NLRB v. West Sand and Gravel Co., 612 F.2d 1326 (1st Cir. 1979); G.P.D., Inc. v. NLRB, 406 F.2d 26 (6th Cir. 1969); Crawford Mfg. Co. v. NLRB, 386 F.2d 367 (4th Cir. 1967). Regardless of where the burden lay, however, we must examine the entire record and ascertain whether there was substantial evidence for the Board's finding that the Union represented a majority of the employees. National Can Corp. v. NLRB, 374 F.2d 796, 804 (7th Cir. 1967).

In the past, the Board has been able to meet its burden of showing employee status in cases where the employee communicated some continuing interest in his job. In Lake City Foundry Co. v. NLRB, 432 F.2d 1162 (7th Cir. 1970), the employee ceased work prior to the date on which the union claimed a card majority. This court, contrary to the Board, found that he should have been considered an employee as of the date of the recognition demand. The company supervisor's testimony indicated that the employee had some expectation of returning.

> Now, on Monday [Foster] didn't come in and he called me up and said his wife was in an accident or had fallen and was in the County Hospital and he was taking care of her. And he said he didn't know when he would be in, but he would be in as soon as he could.

432 F.2d at 1169 (emphasis in original). Neither Pierce nor Ohr ever contacted Wards to suggest that her absence was anything other than a total abandonment of her employment as of the close of business on July 3.

An employee who is known to be absent from work because of illness or is on leave of absence is presumed to have the requisite expectation of future employment. For example, in NLRB v. Staiman Brothers, 466 F.2d 564 (3d Cir. 1972), the employee whose vote was disputed was hospitalized and had not returned to work at the time of the election. Nonetheless, he frequently visited the company's premises, and told the foreman that he did not know when he would return to work. In finding that the employee was eligible to vote, the court relied on the fact that the employee expressed a continuing interest in his job. Similarly, in Elvin Salow Co., 209 N.L.R.B. 833 (1974), the Board reversed a finding that the employee had abandoned his employment. The employee feared retaliatory action by striking workers and made numerous telephone calls indicating he would return to work after the strike ended. See also Trailmobile Division, Pullman, Inc. v. NLRB, 379 F.2d 419 (5th Cir. 1967) (leave of absence); NLRB v. Atkinson Dredging Co., 329 F.2d 158 (7th Cir. 1964) (temporary sick leave).

There was some evidence that Ohr might have been absent from work because of illness. The testimony indicates that she "cut her hand doing dishes or something and she had stitches" some time prior to July 3. Ohr came to work the day that she got stitches, but later called in sick. Her supervisor testified that she "would get phone calls * * * saying that Linda had a doctor's appointment and she would call," but never heard from Ohr again. The General Counsel presented no further evidence that the absence of either woman was caused by illness or by leave of absence. In fact, since Ohr had a pattern of calling Wards in the past when she was ill, the fact that she did not do so after July 3 may reasonably indicate that she had no expectation of continuing employment.

Employees who quit or abandon their job lose their employee status because they no longer have the requisite expectation of future employment. Whiting Corp.

v. NLRB, 200 F.2d 43 (7th Cir. 1952); John A. Thomas Crane & Trucking Co., 224 N.L.R.B. 214 (1976); Roy Lotspeich Publishing Co., 204 N.L.R.B. 517 (1973); Atlantic Coast Fisheries, 183 N.L.R.B. 921 (1970). In Roy Lotspeich Publishing, an employee gave notice of resignation before the election and did not work on the day of the election. Although he was paid for the election day and technically still employed that day, he was ineligible to vote. The Board held that "when an employee quits his employment and stops working at a date prior to election day, he is not eligible to vote." See also Walter Packing, Inc., 241 N.L.R.B. 131 (1979).

In Whiting, this court set aside a Board order requiring the company to bargain where the employee who had cast the deciding vote in the representation election had quit prior to the balloting. This court placed great weight on the fact that the employee ceased work prior to the date of the election and never returned to work thereafter. Although the General Counsel sought to sustain its burden of proof by calling the employee to testify concerning his intentions, this court found that the burden had not been met and that he had quit and lost his employee status.[7]

Both Ohr and Pierce ceased work for unexplained reasons and never returned. The party seeking to establish a person's continuing "employee" status must present credible evidence that the employee had a reasonable expectation of employment in the future. The General Counsel did not come forward with any witness to testify, or any documentary evidence to establish that either woman expressed an interest in coming back to work after leaving on July 3. Neither woman called Wards to explain her absence or to suggest that she might return. Since the General Counsel proferred no evidence to support its contention that either of these women had a reasonable expectation of returning to work, the only conclusion is that both employees quit work as of the end of the day on July 3 with no apparent intentions ever to return.

In Atlantic Coast Fisheries, employee Bonaviri stopped reporting for work and did not notify the employer why he was absent, or that he was coming back. Bonaviri's explanation at trial was that he had developed an arm infection and was instructed by his physician to stay home. His testimony was not corroborated and, in fact, was contradicted by others. He made no report of injury, presented no doctor bill, and made no claim for Workmen's Compensation. When Bonaviri applied for unemployment compensation, the Massachusetts Division of Employment Security found that Bonaviri abandoned his job because he had failed to notify the employer that he was absent due to illness and had failed to notify the employer when he was able to return to work. On appeal, the Board affirmed, holding that he was not an employee eligible to vote in the representation election.

The fact that an employee who has abandoned his job is still carried on the employer's records is not sufficient to make that person an "employee" as a matter of law.[8] If such were the case, an employer could easily manipulate the employee count for its own benefit. Moreover, entries in an employer's records are often no more than an administrative matter. In fact, a supervisor at Wards testified that although Pierce was terminated as of July 5, her actual paperwork was not filed until the twenty-second of August. In apparent recognition of this rule, the ALJ properly gave no weight to the fact that Wards did not remove Ohr and Pierce from the company payroll records until some time after July 9, 1979.

[7] Similarly, in John S. Barnes Corp., 180 N.L.R.B. 911 (1970), an employee failed to report for work just before the Memorial Day holiday. After the second day of his absence, his father called and stated that the company "could assume he was no longer an employee." Although it was not until June 3 or 4 that his termination papers were complete, he was not counted toward the majority required for the demand made on June 2. The Board found that since he left the company's employment prior to June 2 and never returned, he should not be included in the unit.

[8] In Whiting Corp., 200 F.2d 43 (7th Cir. 1952), this court found that the worker in question had quit and had lost his status as an employee notwithstanding the fact that at the time of the union's demand for recognition, he was carried on the company's records as "suspended on account of illness." Similarly, the Board found that an employee was not eligible to vote in Roy N. Lotspeich Publishing Co., 204 N.L.R.B. 517 (1973), even though he was still considered by his employer to be on the payroll and was paid for the election day because the Board found that he had quit two days before. Finally, in John S. Barnes Corp., 180 N.L.R.B. 911 (1970), an employee who was technically on the payroll, was not included in the unit since the employee left the company's employment and never returned. See also Lake City Foundry Co. v. NLRB, 432 F.2d 1162 (7th Cir. 1970).

Furthermore, both the ALJ and the Board ignored the fact that, under the Company's policy, when Ohr and Pierce failed to appear or contact the company on July 9, they were deemed to have been terminated effective July 5, the first day of their absence. Thus, if the Wards policy has any significance, it supports the conclusion that these women cannot be found to have been employed as of July 9.

The Board also argues that it was improper to consider the fact that neither woman ever returned to her job or was ever heard from again. The Board contends that developments which occur after the demand "cannot color the picture as it stood on the critical date." NLRB v. Jessie Jones Sausage Co., 309 F.2d 664, 666 (4th Cir. 1962); NLRB v. Belcher Towing Co., 284 F.2d 118, 121 (5th Cir. 1960). These cases, however, may be distinguished. In Jessie Jones, the company experienced seasonal fluctuations in its work force and had a practice of reducing its work force during the slack season. The company discharged sixteen workers, eight of whom voted in the election. Of the eight, several had been laid off before, but had eventually been recalled to work. The critical issue was whether they had a reasonable expectation of reemployment at the time of the election. The court found that they did have such an expectation and were therefore eligible to vote. The court further held that it was irrelevant whether they were in fact eventually reinstated. Since the employees had a reasonable expectation of reemployment, subsequent changes in the corporation's personnel requirements which made it impractical to rehire employees did not invalidate their votes. In Belcher, the court held that a part-time employee was ineligible to vote because he did not share a sufficient interest in the terms and conditions of employment to warrant participation in the election of a collective-bargaining agent. Although the employee did, in fact, later become a full-time employee, such later actions did not validate his ballot.

In both Jessie Jones and Belcher, the status of the employee after the election was controlled by the employer. Moreover, in both, the later action did not change the employee's status at the time of the election: the employees in Jessie Jones still had an expectation of future employment at the time of the election and the employee in Belcher was still working on a part-time basis at the relevant time. In this case, however, the fact that neither Ohr nor Pierce ever returned to her job sheds light on whether either woman had any expectation of employment. Since they never returned, we can infer that they abandoned their job as of July 5 and thus were not employees on the date of the Union demand.

Moreover, there is support for the proposition that employee behavior after the relevant date may be viewed in order to shed light on the status of the worker at the time of the demand. In Whiting, this court noted that the employee "left at that time and never returned" and never asked for reemployment. 200 F.2d at 45. Similarly, in John S. Barnes Corp., the Board found that the employee should not be included in the unit since he "left the Company's employment prior to June 2 and never returned. . . ." 180 N.L.R.B. at 932. Finally, in Elvin Salow Co., the Board found that "the very fact that [the employee] did return to work * * * and continued working 302 for the employer for a month thereafter negate[d] any abandonment intent." 209 N.L.R.B. at 834.

The authorization cards signed by Pierce and Ohr should not have been counted in determining whether the Union had the support of a majority of employees on July 9. Therefore, if Falkosky's card is valid, there were, at most, 36 valid cards in a bargaining unit of 72 employees. Since 36 cards is not a clear majority of the unit of 72 employees, it is necessary to examine the Company's contention that Falkosky signed her authorization card on the basis of a misrepresentation.[9]

A union may gather, from a majority of employees in a bargaining unit, authorization cards naming that union as the exclusive bargaining representative. Although cards are commonly used to make a "showing of interest" to the Board in support of a petition for a representation election, they may also be used to demonstrate majority support and thus to induce the employer to bargain without an election. In spite of the acknowledged superiority of the election process, cards may be a more reliable indicator of employee preference when employer unfair labor practices disrupt the election process and make a future fair election impossible. If the employer, however, can show that a card was gathered by misrepresentations as to the purpose of the card, the value of the card is greatly diminished.

[9] It is necessary to determine whether Falkosky's card is valid since if it is invalid, there would be 35 valid cards in a unit of 72 employees. Even if the Board, at a future time, determines that Corn's card is valid (raising the number of valid cards to 36 in a unit of 72), there still would be no majority. Therefore, if Falkosky's card is invalid, there would be no reason to remand.

Wards contends that Falkosky signed her card as a result of statements by the Union's organizers that the cards would be used for the sole purpose of obtaining a Board election. The authorization card which Falkosky signed stated:

> I hereby request membership in and also authorize the Amalgamated Food Employees Union, Local 590 of the Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, AFL–CIO, to represent me and bargain collectively with my employer in my behalf to negotiate and conclude all agreements concerning wages, hours, fringe benefits and other terms and conditions of employment.

The wording of the card leaves little room for ambiguity and the testimony clearly indicates that Falkosky read the authorization before signing the card.[10]

In NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 606, 89 S.Ct. 1918, 1936, 23 L.Ed.2d 547 (1969), the Supreme Court adopted the Board's Cumberland Shoe rule. Cumberland Shoe Corp., 144 N.L.R.B. 1268 (1963). If the card states on its face that the signer authorizes the union to represent the employee for collective bargaining purposes, and not merely to seek an election, it will be counted unless the employer can show that the unambiguous language on the card has been "deliberately and clearly canceled by a union adherent with words calculated to direct the signer to disregard and forget the language above his signature." Gissel, 395 U.S. at 606, 89 S.Ct. at 1936; Red Oaks Nursing Home, Inc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503, 507–08 (7th Cir. 1980); Texaco, Inc. v. NLRB, 436 F.2d 520, 523–24 (7th Cir. 1971). Thus, in Area Disposal, Inc., 200 N.L.R.B. 350 (1972), the Board counted unambiguous cards where employees were told that the "principal purpose" of the cards was to obtain an election. In Colonial Lincoln Mercury Sales, Inc., 197 N.L.R.B. 54 (1972), enforced, 485 F.2d 455 (5th Cir. 1973), the Board counted unambiguous authorization cards signed by employees allegedly believing that they were only for the purpose of obtaining a union meeting. And, in Unarco Industries, Inc., 197 N.L.R.B. 489 (1972), unambiguous cards were counted where employees were told the union needed "so many more cards before they could go ahead and get an election." See also Red Oaks Nursing Home, Inc. v. NLRB, 633 F.2d 503 (7th Cir. 1980) (card counted where union representative stated that card was needed to "form a committee so there could be an election"); Peerless of America v. NLRB, 484 F.2d 1108 (7th Cir. 1973) (cards counted where employees told cards were to be used to petition for an election and that the cards would be used to show interest in the union and get a union representative to come to talk about the union).

Where an employer is able to prove that authorization cards were represented as being solicited for the sole purpose of obtaining an election, such cards will not be valid for purposes of determining the union's majority status. Fort Smith Outerwear v. NLRB, 499 F.2d 223 (8th Cir. 1974). A finding of misrepresentation is not confined to situations where employees are expressly told that the "sole" or "only" purpose of the card is to obtain an election. It is not the use or nonuse of certain key or "magic" words that is controlling. The inquiry must focus on "whether or not the totality of circumstances surrounding the card solicitation is such as to add up to an assurance to the card signer that his card will be used for no purpose other than to help get an election." Gissel, 395 U.S. at 608 n.27, 89 S.Ct. at 1937 n.27; Medline Industries Inc. v. NLRB, 593 F.2d 788, 794 n.6 (7th Cir. 1979).

We find that the Board's decision to count Falkosky's card was supported by substantial evidence. The language on the card was neither canceled nor negated. Moreover, since Falkosky's testimony vacillated, it was within the ALJ's discretion to find that no misrepresentations were made to her.[11] Finally, even if Falkosky overheard statements that the cards were being used only to obtain an election, she could not remember whether "union adherents" made the statements.[12]

[10] Of course, an employee who signs a card may not understand all the legal ramifications that may follow. But as the Supreme Court noted in Gissel, "We cannot agree . . . that employees as a rule are too unsophisticated to be bound by what they sign unless expressly told that their act of signing represents something else." 395 U.S. at 607, 89 S.Ct. at 1939. Since Falkosky read the card, she must have been aware that she was effectuating the authorization the card declares.

It appears that Falkosky's recollection of the employees' comments was based more on her impressions and assumptions than upon any specific recollections of conversations. As the Supreme Court noted in Gissel, "[E]mployees are more likely than not, many months after a card drive and in response to questions by company counsel, to give testimony damaging to the union, particularly where company officials have previously threatened reprisals for union activity in violation of § 8(a)(1)." 395 U.S. at 608. Moreover, we attach significance only to what the employee was told by either the solicitor or the card itself and disregard her subjective understanding.

"[A]n employee's thoughts (or afterthoughts) as to why he signed a union card and what he thought that card meant cannot negative the overt action of having signed a card * * *." Levi Strauss & Co., 172 N.L.R.B. 732, 734 (1968) (quoting Joy Silk Mills v. NLRB, 85 N.L.R.B. 1263, enforced, 185 F.2d 732 (D.C.Cir.1950), cert. denied, 341 U.S. 914, 71 S.Ct. 734, 95 L.Ed. 1350 (1951)). In these circumstances, "to open up avenues of proof of subjective intent would create strong temptations for employers to induce employees to assert a retroactive disavowal * * *." Levi Strauss & Co., 172 N.L.R.B. at 734.

We, therefore, find that the Union had 36 valid cards in a bargaining unit of 72 employers. Since Gissel requires that the Union attain majority support before issuing a bargaining order, we cannot enforce the bargaining order at this time.[13] We remand the case for purposes of allowing the parties to consider any remaining cards which were not considered below. Since Wards did not contest the Board's findings that certain conduct of its employees violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, the Board's order with respect to these violations should be enforced.

Therefore, enforcement is, in part, denied and, in part, enforced and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

[11] Her response to the same questions fluctuated:

> Q. Were you ever told that the purpose of this card was just to obtain an election?
> A. No, I can't really say that[.] I was asked if I would sign the card.
> Q. No one ever said to you that this card would be just used to obtain an election?
>
> A. I don't remember my being told that, I assumed that, I thought that's what it was for.

Later, on cross-examination, she testified as follows:

> Q. If I understand your testimony it was, you also heard the employees who were soliciting others to sign these cards, say that these cards would be used to obtain an election, is that correct?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Did you hear those employees making those statements before you signed the card.
>
> A. Yes, I believe it was before.
> Q. And did you sign the card with that understanding?
> A. Yes.

In response to a question which suggested that the card solicitors said that the card would only be used to get an election, Falkosky responded, "I can't really remember whether they did. I guess that's probably what they were talking about when I heard—yes, I'd have to say yes."

[12] JUDGE MALONEY: What I want to know is who was the employee or employees who stated to you, that prior to the time, you signed the card, the purpose of the card, was solely to get an election, if you remember?

> A. I don't truthfully remember. I worked in a different group at that time, and it was the people that worked around me. They were talking about it, you know.

[13] Since the Union does not have majority support, we do not reach the question of whether the order should be denied enforcement because the Board did not carry out the detailed analysis mandated in Red Oaks, 633 F.2d 503, and did not establish that "the possibility of erasing the effects of past practices and ensuring a fair election * * * by the use of traditional remedies * * * is slight and that employee sentiment once expressed through cards would, on balance, be better protected by a bargaining order." Gissel, 395 U.S. at 614, 89 S.Ct. at 1940.
